For Reference

Not to be taken from this room

218510

218510

JOURNAL

ADIES'
HOME

JANUARY
1958 · 35c

THE MAGAZINE
WOMEN BELIEVE IN

DE 13 57

REENGAGE SUMMER A NEW SERIAL BY RUMER GODDEN

A NEW ERA IN ATTITUDES TOWARD SEX?

OMPLETE NOVEL CONDENSED-IN-THIS-ISSUE CATCH AS CATCH CAN

HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHIN

THE PEERAGE GAME

English Nobility Keeps the Wolf from the Door by Letting t

NOT A WHISPER OF BAD BREATH WITH NEW IPANA

...its distinct taste tells you so

• New Ipana® Tooth Paste with germ-killing WD-9 prevents bad breath. Use it regularly. Ipana's distinct taste and refreshing after-taste tell you it cleans your entire mouth.

• Ipana with WD-9 actually has twice the decay-germ killing power of any other leading tooth paste. So it can help your children fight tooth decay effectively, too.

Look for the BIG cap— only on NEW Ipana

Another fine product of Bristol-Myers

ANITA EKBERG, beautiful Lustre-Creme Girl and one of the world's most glamorous women says: "I started using Lustre-Creme Shampoo when I first came to Hollywood and I love what it does for my hair. I wouldn't be without it!" Lustre-Creme is used by the world's most glamorous women—shouldn't you use it, too?

For the most beautiful hair in the world

4 out of 5 top movie stars use Lustre-Creme Shampoo

When Anita Ekberg says—"I use Lustre-Creme Shampoo" . . . you're listening to a glamorous movie star whose beautiful hair is part of the charm that enchants millions.

Your hair can have that Hollywood-lovely look too, with the magic of Lustre-Creme Shampoo. Under the spell of its lanolin-blessed lather, you'll see your hair sparkle with dazzling highlights, shine like the stars!

Your hair is so easy-to-manage, too—behaves like an angel—even right after shampooing. Curls spring up soft and glossy—waves smooth right into place.

You'll see—and he will, too—how much lovelier your hair can look when you change to Lustre-Creme, the shampoo of the stars—when you use the shampoo that cares for "the most beautiful hair in the world"!

Lanolin-blessed creme or lotion never dries . . . it beautifies

Ladies' Home Journal

CONTENTS

VOL. LXXV NO. 1

January, 1958

JOURNALITIES

Elizabeth Land

One of our secret ambitions is to write an article about a writer writing an article about a How America Lives family. Perhaps the next best thing is to tell you about ELIZABETH LAND, who wrote Rich One Year, Poor Another! (page 101). "I met my husband in the middle of the Comal River," she says casually. "We were both sixteen and he looked good to me even wet." The Comal flows through New Braunfels, a small German-resort town down near Austin, Texas. They still speak German there and still bake strudel. The author and her husband are native Texans; he is a district landsman for Sohio Petroleum Company and she, like the subject of her story, is an "oil widow." "It has been a delight to write about people I know involved in a life which is my own," she says. "There should be some kind of little gold band encircling the third finger of the left hand of all males devoted to the oil business."

Hugh Beaumont

HUGH BEAUMONT's has been called "the face most often seen on television." "But," he says, "like a magazine writer's by-line, hardly anyone ever notices it. I'm a working actor, no special type." Besides bit parts and many supporting roles, he has been "starred" in more Grade-B motion pictures than he likes to recall. Nearly all of them have been televised repeatedly. Among his real-life roles, also varied, are those of writer and minister. "I am married to a former actress and minister's daughter (same girl), and we have three children—Hunter, Kristan and Mark. With our fat black Labrador retriever, we live happily in North Hollywood, and even more happily in the Minnesota north woods, our second home." Currently, Mr. Beaumont may be seen as the father in the family comedy series, Leave it to Beaver (CBS, Friday evenings). His second published short story, A Thing to Remember, appears on page 44.

Gladys Rockmore Davis

You would not expect a child to go through The Ordeal of Lady Godiva, but in GWEN WALKER's charming story on page 40, one does. The illustration is by GLADYS ROCKMORE DAVIS, and her sparkling green eyes become even more expressive when she talks of children. Paintings of her own son and daughter, when they were young, won her early recognition in the field of fine art. Now she often paints her three grandchildren. She says, "I feel children—even happy ones—are lonesome creatures, and I try to catch their expressions on canvas." She has painted ballet dancers at the Metropolitan Opera House and, more recently, Balinese dancers during a trip to that country in 1956. Her work is represented in the permanent collection of the Metropolitan Museum of Art as well as in many other fine-art museums in the United States.

Printed in U.S.A.

Condensed Novel Complete in This Issue

CATCH AS CATCH CAN, Frances and Richard Lockridge . 36

Stories

THE GREENGAGE SUMMER (First part of three), Rumer Godden . 34
HUSBANDS ARE TO LOVE, Mary Church . 38
THE ORDEAL OF LADY GODIVA, Gwen Walker . 40
A THING TO REMEMBER, Hugh Beaumont . 44

Special Features

"SPEAKING OF OPERATIONS—" Dorothy Thompson . 11
A CHILD MUST FEEL HE BELONGS, Benjamin Spock, M.D. . 14
NO LONGER "THE TOWN WITHOUT A DOCTOR" . 23
YOU CAN DO SOMETHING, Margaret Hickey . 23
THE PRECIOUS HOURS, F. Alexander Magoun . 42
TODAY IT COULD BE YOUR DAUGHTER, Goodrich C. Schauffler, M.D. . 43
THE PEERAGE GAME, Robin Miller . 46
HOW AMERICA LIVES:
RICH ONE YEAR, POOR ANOTHER!, Elizabeth Land . 101
TEEN-AGERS AND SEX IN AUSTRALIA . 113
DOGS AND PEOPLE, George and Helen Papashvily . 118

General Features

OUR READERS WRITE US . 4
THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE, Harlan Miller . 18
UNDER COVER, Bernardine Kielty . 28
MAKING MARRIAGE WORK, Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D. . 30
FIFTY YEARS AGO • JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN . 33
THIS IS A SLOPPY DRESSER, Munro Leaf . 78
ASK ANY WOMAN, Marcelene Cox . 92

Fashion and Beauty

MEMO: ON PERMANENT HAIR COLORING, Dawn Crowell Norman . 47
WINTER-INTO-SUMMER FASHIONS, Wilhela Cushman . 48
CREATIVE WOMEN, Nora O'Leary . 52
HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING!, Bet Hart . 70

Food and Homemaking

POTLUCK FOR GOURMETS . 54
COLLECTOR'S ITEMS: WINTER FRUIT DESSERTS . 56
HOME SAFE HOME, Margaret Davidson . 74
COOKING FOR A CROWD, Priscilla Ricker . 114

Architecture and Interior Decoration

AT HOME IN ANY NEIGHBORHOOD, Carol L. Crane . 82
PINOCCHIO QUILT, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland . 108

Poems

FINDERS KEEPERS, Dorothy Lee Richardson . 58
POSITIVE THINKING, Suzanne Douglass . 68
TWO O'CLOCK TALE, Carol L. Crane . 76
IN REPLY TO YOUR QUERY, SINCERELY, Elizabeth Graham . 88
SPOON-FEEDING RHYME, Georgie Starbuck Galbraith . 96
I SCARCELY SEE BUT FEEL YOU NOW AT FIRST, Polly Toland . 99
VOLUNTEER NURSE, Jane Merchant . 112
LINES TO FOUR SMALL CHILDREN, Janet Henry . 116

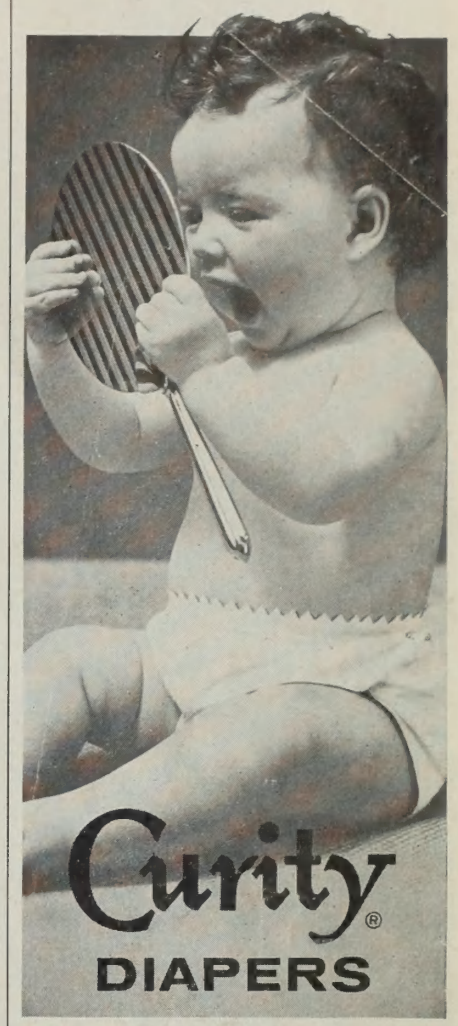
Cover: Mark Shaw, Photographer
Tina S. Fredericks, Picture Editor

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

At least 30 days before a change is to take effect please send your complete name, new address and a mailing label from a recent issue. If this is not possible, write out your old address and send it with the new one, including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent.

Ladies' Home Journal, © 1957 The Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Friday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office at Philadelphia, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada.



The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence.

Subscription Prices: U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; 4 Yrs., $11. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 Yr., $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U.S. payable in U.S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice.

Unconditional Guaranty. We agree upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

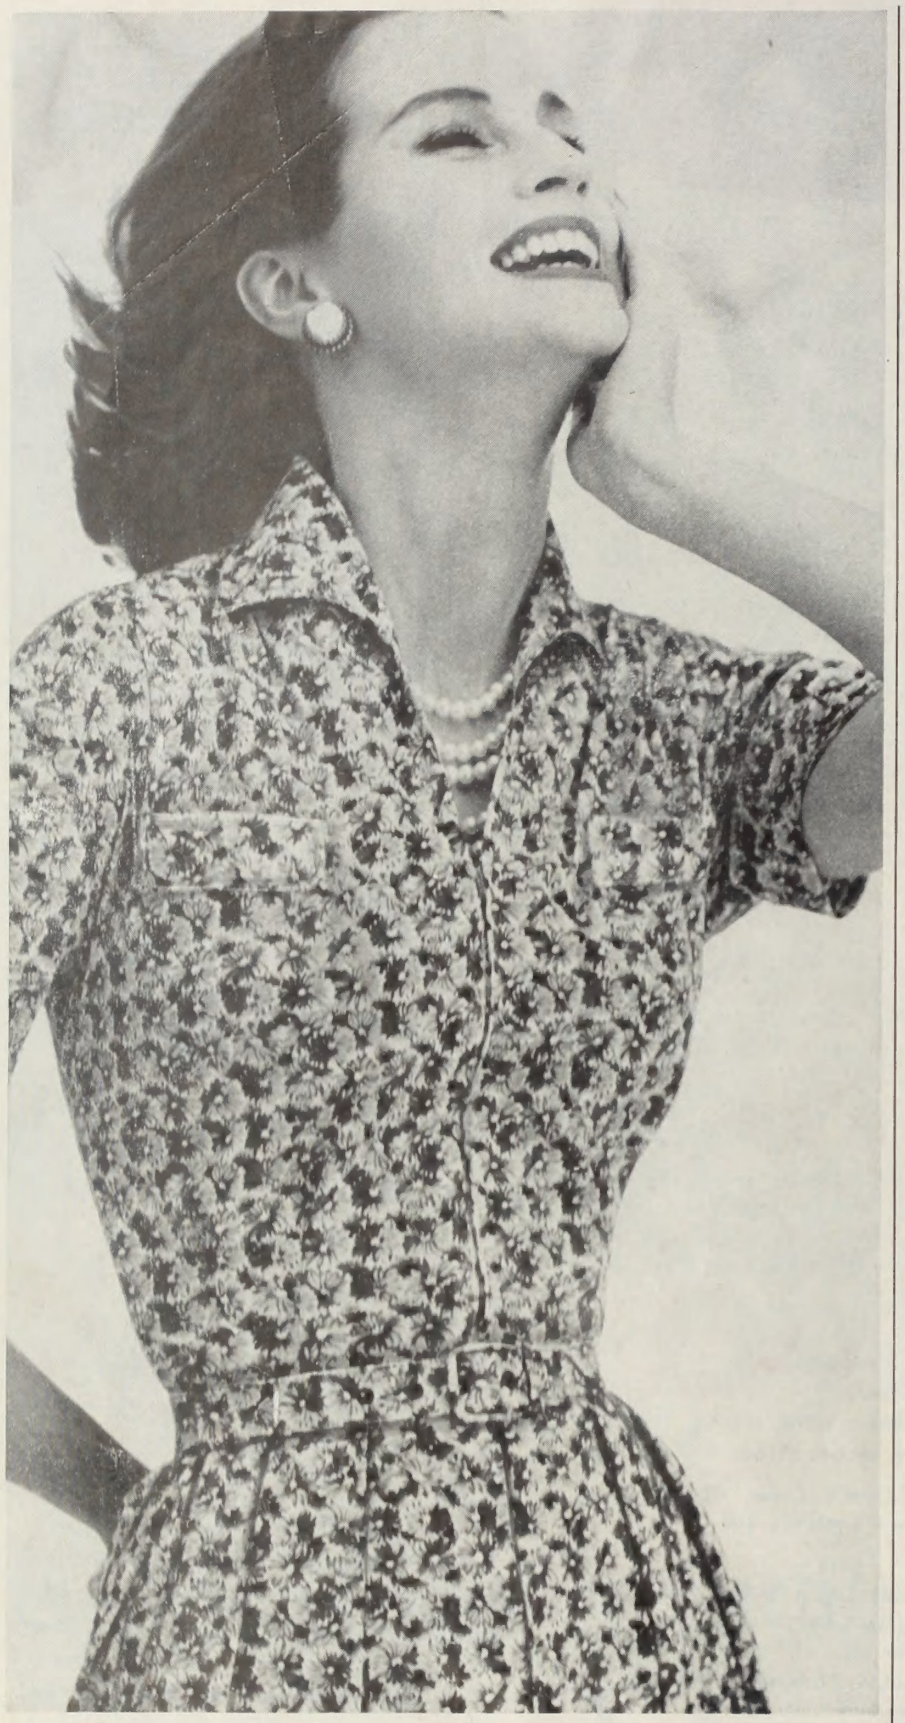
The Curtis Publishing Company. Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cary W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Benjamin Allen, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Donald M. Hobart, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C. Von Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary; Richard Ziesing, Jr., Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, and Holiday.

"Best drying story you ever heard"

DRY FASTER
Indoors or out

WASH EASIER
Stains disappear like magic

MORE ABSORBENT
Thirsty surgical weave works wonders



LONGER WEAR
Last entire diaper period—and more

Curity diapers are softer and smoother, even after countless launderings, when washed in quality products like Ivory Snow or Ivory Flakes. Buy Curity—whites, pastels, gay prints and double-duty night diapers for sleep or travel—at infants shops and departments, everywhere.

PATENTED

THE KENDALL COMPANY
Kendall Mills Division, Walpole, Mass., Dept. JB18
Enclosed is (indicate choice):
☐ 50c for full size Curity Night Diaper
☐ 25c for full size Curity Regular Diaper
☐ 75c for both
Send coins only and print clearly. Only one of each diaper to a family.
Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____
Good in Continental United States and Hawaii.

Shelton Stroller

"the carefree fashion"

Meet Spring's most welcome fashion—the first of the new season's 100% nylon jersey SHELTON STROLLERS. Refreshingly pretty—and as easy to care for as it is to wear: washable, drips dry, needs no ironing and never, never stands for a wrinkle! Tomorrow—see all the new SHELTON STROLLERS and enjoy wearing America's "carefree fashion!" 12 to 20, 12½ to 22½. About $13.

(Other Shelton Strollers in Sizes 10 to 20, 12½ to 22½, 38 to 44.)

for name of nearby store and FREE FASHION FOLIO write to:

Shelton CASUALS Department L-10, 1350 Broadway, New York 18, N. Y.

OUR READERS WRITE US

Good-by Forever, She Began . . .

Decatur, Georgia
September, 1957

Miss Anne Einselen
Chief Explorer
Discovery Department

Dear Chief: If the September issue was directed at me personally, it was a direct hit, especially the blurb on unsolicited manuscripts and the tremendous odds against being admitted to the hallowed inner literary circles. I have about as much confidence in the American editorial system as I would in a dermatologist with the seven-year itch. It's a farce.

An unknown writer has as much chance of being published as he does of making a killing on a fixed roulette wheel. I have rejection slips from every first-class magazine on the stands, devoid of sound and fury, signifying absolutely nothing.

Three years ago when I retired from the shorthand set to await the arrival of my little boy, I decided to follow the suggestion of people who have been exposed to samples of my dubious prose and submit some material for publication. After all, I am supposedly a direct descendant of Ralph Waldo Emerson and made straight A's in English and Latin. At first rejection slips didn't discourage me. "Practice makes perfect," quoth I.

Eventually, this pastime retrogressed from a hobby to a compulsion. I began to regard rejection slips as so many high-handed personal insults. Oh, I played the game according to the rules—crackly white bond paper, double spacing, wide margins and inky black ribbons so as not to strain the jaded eyes of any editor upon whom I had the audacity to foist my pathetic efforts. I read Writer's Digest and "slanted" at every market in the business, paying heed to taboo and word limitations. I became bullheaded. A short course at Emory University brainwashed me with the "seat of the pants" theory. I have seen the light and now realize there is a wide path between perseverance and wishful writing.

I am sure that you editors in your well-oiled swivel chairs receive a large percentage of material from people who, like myself, are misdirecting their efforts. This must be painfully obvious to the trained eye. I wish you had the guts to come right out and say so. The time wasted in preparing such useless literature, if added up, would probably equal the lifetime of the entire population of a good-sized town. This is downright criminal, in my opinion.

I wish that three years ago when I first stepped onto the literary treadmill I had received an honest rejection slip stating simply, "This stinks." It obviously did, and still does if, after three years, I have made no progress. Although I appreciate the courtesy shown by your magazine in sending me two personal notes rejecting my two latest manuscripts, I would have appreciated even more a communication less courteous and more to the point, telling me that I was wasting my time. Waste is sinful, and I can think of nothing more deplorable than wasting the few hours we have on this earth.

I have wasted my last nickel on bond paper, fresh typewriter ribbons, postage and Manila envelopes. I shall find something more rewarding with which to occupy my spare time—conversational French, perhaps, and losing the ten pounds I have gained this summer. My rosebushes are covered with black spot, my windows need washing, my silver is tarnished and my closets are cluttered. This is as much your fault as it is mine, and you are supposed to be "The Magazine Women Believe In"! Hogwash!

From here on out, our relations will be strictly publisher-reader. I quit! And when we buy an old house and fix it up, I will not send you a single "before and after" picture or so much as fifty words on how we did it. I will keep my big typewriter case shut. Sincerely,
PATRICIA B. SIMS

P.S. I still love the JOURNAL. After all, no one is perfect.

▶ Those stories that came back weren't good enough, Patricia, but they weren't stinkers either. But if they had been and we had told you that they were, you know in your heart that you wouldn't have believed us—any more than we believe that you're going to shut down that typewriter forever. The odds look long against unknown writers in the mass, but they aren't really long against those who have what it takes. And the prizes are big and getting bigger. Keep on trying—and loving—the JOURNAL. ED.

Decatur, Georgia
October, 1957

Dear Chief: Since I swore off writing, I have felt as if my nose itched and I couldn't scratch it. I have tried various substitutes. I even took up bird watching, but the people directly behind us became nervous because I spent so much time peering in their direction with binoculars.

As you predicted, it didn't work, and I am wondering if some sort of injections are available to help would-be writers kick the habit. Until they are, I guess I will keep right on collecting rejection slips, attending courses to learn even more about the care and feeding of editors (editor husbandry), and hoping that in time either rejection slips or yours truly becomes more inspired. Sincerely,
PATRICIA B. SIMS

Journal Cake in India

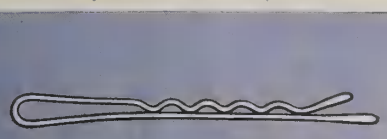
Banjera Hills
Hyderabad, A.P.

Dear Editors: The JOURNAL, my favorite magazine, is a great pleasure to receive in India. Much of it is just inspirational here—but recently I did instruct some neighbors on how to make an American cake with Indian ingredients. One neighbor spoke no English (the directions were translated by her daughter and the recipe taken down); but the friend shown in the picture is a regular reader of the JOURNAL and has a file of several years' copies.

Friendly mix-up.

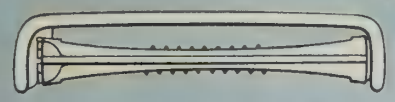
The day Mrs. Rao came to make the cake two back JOURNALS (still new for India) had just come. A good time was had by all. Yours truly,
LOLA DONAHUE

Our Romantic Birthday



Newark, New Jersey

Dear Editors: Don't tell me that candle on the November cover is a birthday



CONTINUED ON PAGE 26

DISCOVERED BY PROCTER & GAMBLE

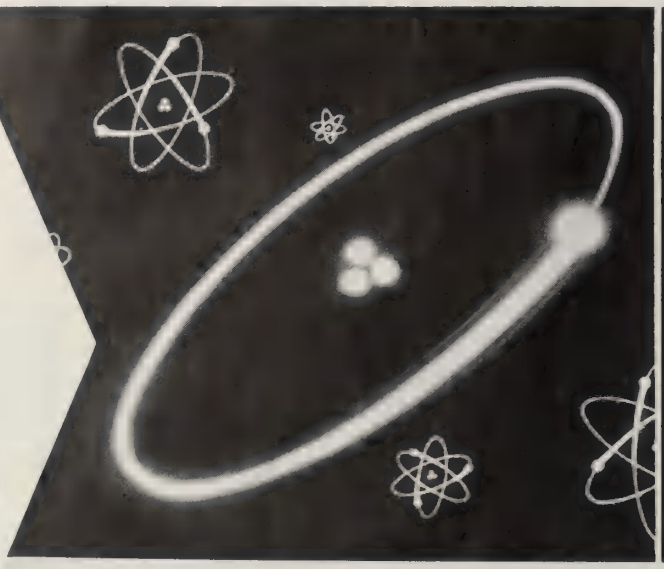
First and only permanent with pin curl ease, rod curl strength

Pin curls for the crown. "Top hair" needs this softer wave... and Lotion plus new Liquifix give longer lasting quality to these pin curls.

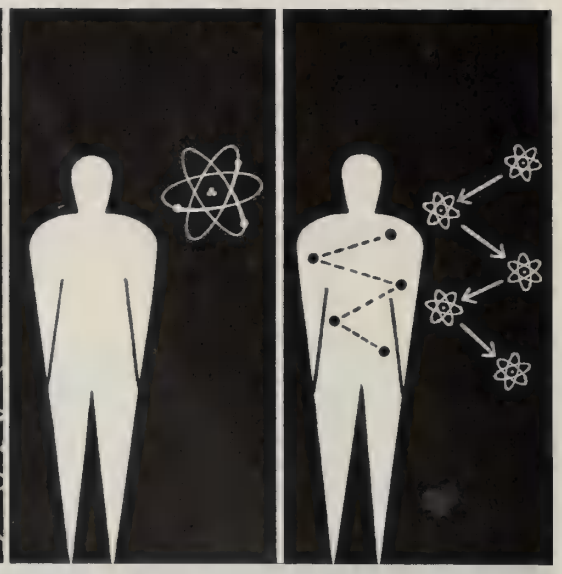
Rod curlers for sides, back, top front give added curl-strength to harder-working areas... now doubly reinforced by Lotion and new Liquifix.

Wonderful new soft waves that last and last! A wonderful new method, wonderful new Liquifix. It's here! The first, the only all-over permanent with the ease and the lasting quality you've asked for . . . yet it's so unbelievably soft and natural. That's because new PIN-IT gives the right kind of waves for the different areas of your hair . . . then locks in your permanent with special lotion and new Liquifix neutralizer. Best of all, this new Twice-a-Year PIN-IT keeps your hair just the way you like it, from the first day to months later.

new twice-a-year



Pin-it



©P&G

Apply Lotion and Liquifix with New Target-Point Squeeze Bottle

from the laboratories of atomic medicine comes new proof of a more effective way to relieve distress of colds...

This is a peaceful atom working for human health. Its job is to trace how medicines act in the body—where they go, how fast, what they do.

Scientists used this atom in animal laboratory tests on many colds medications—found Vicks VapoRub acts faster, works hours longer!

ATOM TRACER TESTS PROVE.. VICKS VAPORUB acts faster, longer than aspirin or any cold tablet

... WITHOUT INTERNAL DOSING

When your child has a cold, rub VapoRub over the area of lungs and heart—throat—back and neck where cold tension is. Acts instantly.

VapoRub penetrates while medicated vapors relieve head, throat, cough, bronchial congestion. Works as long as 10 hours! Your child feels good again fast.

While aspirin and cold tablets are still in your stomach . . . Vicks VapoRub is already treating nose, throat, bronchial area—keeps bringing relief hours after those tablets have stopped working.

Now—from the laboratories of atomic medicine comes new proof of a more effective way you and your family can get relief from miseries of colds.

For scientists have used atom tracer tests to check the action of colds medications—and found that Vicks VapoRub acts faster and longer than aspirin or any cold tablets.

No other type of colds medication treats all 3 cold areas — nose, throat, chest — all at once — for hours — with every breath—without internal dosing.

So it's no wonder that more mothers rely on Vicks VapoRub than any other medication. Why don't you turn to VapoRub, too? Enjoy the fast relief—the peace of mind—VapoRub can bring.

"Vicks" and "VapoRub" are registered trademarks of the Vick Chemical Co., Greensboro, N.C.

Vicks VapoRub and Asian Flu

Whether caused by a cold or Asian Flu... VapoRub relieves nose stuffiness, coughs, local bronchial congestion — for symptoms aspirin does not help. If fever, call your doctor.

LOOK WHAT YOU RECEIVE NOW

IF YOU JOIN THE LITERARY GUILD AND AGREE TO ACCEPT AS FEW AS 4 SELECTIONS DURING THE COMING 12 MONTHS

Take 4

OF THESE FINE BOOKS

FOR ONLY $1.97

(value from $14.35 to $45.00 in publishers' editions)

Yes-Any three of these

PLUS

Any one of these AS YOUR FIRST BONUS IN ADVANCE

SEVEN WONDERS OF THE WORLD by Lowell Thomas. From Mt. Olympus and New York to Rio and Angkor Vat in words and photos! Orig. pub. in different format, $6.95.

STORIES TO REMEMBER Thomas B. Costain & John Beecroft select 6 complete novels, 33 shorter stories! 60 illustrations; 832 pages; 2 volumes. Pub. edition, $7.50.

PICTORIAL HISTORY OF AMERCAN PRESIDENTS by John and Alice Durant. Every president in words and 566 rare illustrations! Orig. pub. in different format, $10.00.

MILTON CROSS' NEW COMPLETE STORIES OF THE GREAT OPERAS. Includes every aria, complete action and stories of 76 operas, old and new. 704 pages. Pub. ed., $3.95.

YES, you actually receive four fine books—at once—for only $1.97—on this amazing offer! Read below the advantages of membership in the Literary Guild—then choose the 4 books you want. SEND NO MONEY! Pay later—after your 7-day free trial examination! Mail the coupon NOW.

AMY VANDERBILT'S COMPLETE BOOK OF ETIQUETTE. Your way to be socially correct always, by America's foremost authority. 704 pages! New 1958 edition. Pub. edition, $5.50.

AROUND THE U. S. A. & WORLD IN PICTURES. Ed. by Runyon & Bergane. All 48 states (in a new edition) and 10 world "tours" in 2,000 photos! 2 vols. Orig. pub. at $15.00.

BELOW THE SALT by Thomas B. Costain. The thunder of war, savage king, and the unleashed passions of the "lost princess" of England run through this tumultuous novel! Pub. ed., $3.95.

BETTER HOMES & GARDENS DIET BOOK. Complete guide to family health! Eating charts, facts on reducing drugs, calories. Now — eat better, feel better, look better! Pub. ed., $2.50.

THE DAY CHRIST DIED by Jim Bishop. The powerful, inspiring drama of the most momentous hours in world history! One of the great books of the year—and of all time! Pub. ed., $3.95.

ENCYCLOPEDIA OF COOKING by Meta Given. Brand-new approach to cooking! Plans meals, guides shopping; 2,000 recipes, hundreds of pictures! 2 vols. Pub. edition, $10.00.

THE FACE OF AMERICA. Life in every corner of the U.S. in 81 double-spread, full-color photos and delightful text—from the series of the Saturday Evening Post. 11" x 14". Pub. ed., $10.

THE FAMILY TREASURY OF CHILDREN'S STORIES. Ed. by P. R. Evans. A fine library of favorite stories and poems for ages 2 to 14. 250 pictures, 1024 pages. 3 vols. Pub. ed., $7.50.

HAMMOND'S ILLUSTRATED TRAVEL GUIDE by Dr. E. J. Jordan. Thrilling new scenic guide to the most beautiful spots in the U.S.! 151 color photos, 64 color maps. Pub ed., $7.50.

KIPLING: A Selection of his Stories and Poems by John Beecroft. This great writer's finest works, including Kim, Jungle Book, stories, poems. 2 vols., 1038 pages. Pub. ed., $7.50.

Ladies' Home Journal INTERIOR DECORATION by Elizabeth Halsey. Now—work home miracles! 237 pages, 400 pictures, dozens in full color. 10½" x 14" in size! Pub. edition, $6.95.

THE LIFE OF CHRIST IN MASTERPIECES OF ART. From Nativity to Crucifixion in 44 magnificent full-color reproductions by El Greco, Rembrandt, etc. 10" x 12¾". Pub. ed., $10.00.

MODERN HOME MEDICAL ADVISER. Ed. by Morris Fishbein, M.D. 24 specialists tell you about disease and illness—both symptoms and treatment. Pub. edition, $4.95.

THE SCAPEGOAT by Daphne du Maurier. He woke up to find himself living another man's life — with a strange wife and mistress! An exciting smash-hit best seller! Pub. edition, $3.95.

Thorndike-Barnhart DICTIONARY. Latest De Luxe Edition. The only all-new quality comprehensive desk dictionary. Handsomely bound in 2 volumes. Pub. edition, $10.00.

WHICH 4 BOOKS DO YOU WANT WITH MEMBERSHIP IN THE LITERARY GUILD? IP-BB

THE LITERARY GUILD OF AMERICA, INC., Publishers. Dept. 1-LHJ, Garden City, N. Y.

I accept your offer and I understand that

THE GUILD AGREES

1 . . . to send me at once the THREE books I have checked here:

—CHECK THREE:—

- ☐ Amy Vand. Etiquette (230)
- ☐ Around World & U.S.A. in Pictures—Set (8)
- ☐ Below the Salt (225)
- ☐ Better Homes & Gardens Diet Book (218)
- ☐ The Day Christ Died (213)
- ☐ Ency. of Cooking—Set (3)
- ☐ Face of America (228)
- ☐ The Family Treasury of Children's Stories—Set (51)
- ☐ Hammond's Travel Guide (16)
- ☐ Kipling—Set (33)
- ☐ Ladies' Home Journal Interior Decoration (7)
- ☐ Life of Christ in Masterpieces of Art (227)
- ☐ Modern Home Medical Adviser (22)
- ☐ The Scapegoat (205)
- ☐ Thorndike-Barnhart De Luxe Dict.—Set (9)

2 . . . to send me a valuable Bonus Book free with each fourth selection I accept.

3 . . . to send me NOW my first free BONUS in advance, as checked below:

—CHECK ONE:—

- ☐ Seven Wonders of World (212)
- ☐ Stories to Remember—Set (80)
- ☐ American Presidents (37)
- ☐ Milton Cross' Operas (21)

4 . . . to allow me to examine these books 7 days free, after which I may return them if not satisfied; otherwise, the Guild will bill me only $1.97 plus shipping charge for all four.

5 . . . to send me FREE each month the magazine "Wings."

6 . . . to offer me as many as 60 outstanding books during the coming year from which I may choose my selections.

7 . . . to bill me only $2.00 plus shipping (occasional extra-value books slightly higher) for each book I accept, regardless of the publishers' prices of $3.50, $3.75 or even $4.00. I will receive them as soon as they are published, and will pay for them only after receiving them.

In return

I AGREE

1 . . . to advise the Literary Guild in advance on the form provided when I do not wish to receive a selection.

2 . . . to accept at least 4 Guild selections or alternates at $2.00 each, plus shipping, during the coming 12 months, after which I may cancel my membership at any time.

Mr.
Mrs. .....
Miss (Please Print)

Street and No. .....

City .....

Zone .....State .....

TO RESIDENTS OF CANADA: Selection Price, $2.20 plus shipping. Address LITERARY GUILD (CANADA), 105 Bond St., Toronto 2, Ontario. Offer good in U.S.A. and Canada. G506

Contour® YOUR BEDS

with PACIFIC Contour® SHEETS

only PACIFIC makes Contour® SHEETS and now PACIFIC brings you these Great Savings during January only!

Now you can cut your bedmaking time in half with these famous Pacific Contour sheets . . . at terrific January Savings! All Pacific Contours have the effortless Flexicorners that slip over every corner without tugging . . . stay smooth and snug. Choose them in white, colors or the new exciting multi-stripes with flat sheets and cases to match. Stock up now . . . and remember . . . when you ask for Contour sheets . . . you want Pacific.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Pacific Mills Domestics Corp.,
an affiliate of Wamsutta Mills, Dept. PS35, 1430 Broadway, New York 18, N. Y.

FREE...ANY 3

of these superb High-Fidelity

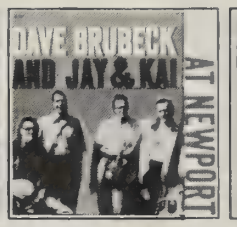
12" COLUMBIA LP RECORDS

if you join the Columbia LP Record Club now—and agree to purchase 4 selections during the coming 12 months

Two delightful ballet scores. Offenbach's gay masterpiece — Chopin's romantic reverie

The best-loved of all piano sonatas in definitive performances by Rudolf Serkin

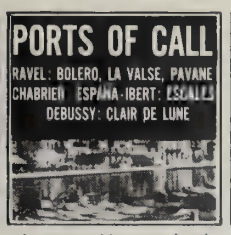
Johnny Mathis sings 12 favorites—Old Black Magic, Day In Day Out, It Could Happen To You, etc.



Erroll Garner plays Caravan, No Greater Love, Avalon, Lullaby of Birdland and other top hits

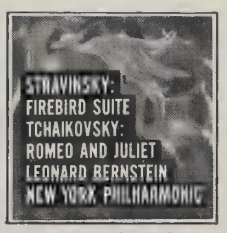
Tenderly, Deep Purple, Soon, Laura, September In The Rain, You Go To My Head, 6 others

Duchin plays The Man I Love, April Showers, Am I Blue?, Stardust, Blue Room, Brazil and 9 others



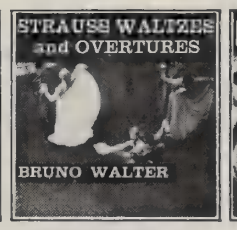
7 exciting new jazz improvisations from the history-making Newport Jazz Festival

Complete score! The Rain In Spain, You Did It, I Could Have Danced All Night, Show Me, etc.



Suave arrangements of Fascinatin' Rhythm, Embraceable You, Somebody Loves Me, Liza, 10 more

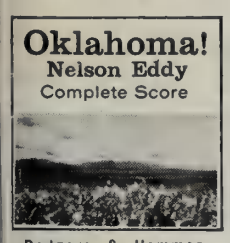
A romantic musical journey with Eugene Ormandy and The Philadelphia Orchestra



Recordings of the famous European concert tour. Armstrong and his All-Stars in 10 numbers

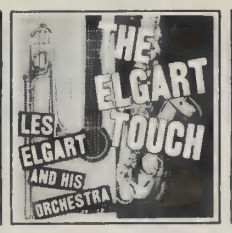
Stunning hi-fi performances of the "Firebird" and "Romeo and Juliet." New York Philharmonic

Doris Day sings The Song Is You, But Not For Me, Autumn Leaves, Gone With The Wind—8 more



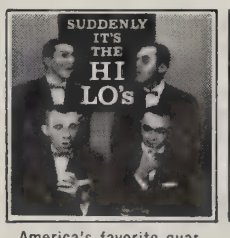
Emperor Waltz, Blue Danube, Vienna Life, Gypsy Baron Overture, Die Fledermaus Overture, etc.

The Moon of Manakoora, Lotus Land, Poinciana, Jamaican Rhumba, Malagueña, Flamingo, etc.

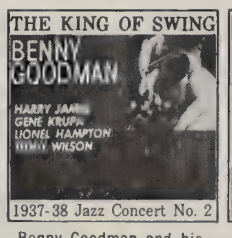


Sinatra sings: I Could Write A Book, Love Me, Mad About You, Nevertheless and 8 more

Rodgers & Hammerstein's fabulous hit. The complete score with Nelson Eddy as Curly



Oscar Levant plays Concerto in F, Rhapsody in Blue. Also included—An American in Paris



12 inimitable Elgart arrangements — Street Of Dreams, Slo Roll, Where Or When, etc.

Eight of the best-loved melodies of all time — magnificently performed in superb hi-fi sound

America's favorite quartet sings Love Walked In, Stormy Weather, Tenderly and 9 others

Benny Goodman and his Original Orch., Trio and Quartet in Always, Moonglow, Peckin' — 8 more

6 works: the heroic Symphony No. 3, the joyous Academic Festival Overture, 4 Hungarian Dances

The complete score of Lehar's operetta — the celebrated Merry Widow Waltz, Vilia, Maxim's, etc.

© Columbia Records Sales Corp., 1957 ® "Columbia", LP, Marcas Reg.

- ☆ You receive, at once, any 3 of the records shown above — FREE. One is your gift for joining, and the other two are your Bonus records "in advance"
- ☆ After you have purchased only four records, you receive a 12" Columbia LP Bonus record of your choice FREE for every two additional selections you purchase from the Club
- ☆ You enroll in any one of the four Club Divisions: Classical; Jazz; Listening and Dancing; Broadway, Movies, Television and Musical Comedies
- ☆ Every month you receive, FREE, a new issue of the Columbia LP Record Club Magazine—which describes all forthcoming selections
- ☆ You may accept or reject the selection for your Division, take records from other Divisions, or take NO records in any particular month
- ☆ Your only membership obligation is to buy four selections from the more than 100 to be offered in the coming 12 months. You may cancel membership any time thereafter
- ☆ The records you want are mailed and billed to you at only $3.98 (original cast Musical Shows somewhat higher), plus small mailing charge
- ☆ You must be delighted with membership or you may cancel it by returning the free records within ten days

COLUMBIA LP RECORD CLUB TERRE HAUTE, INDIANA

FREE — ANY 3 — MAIL ENTIRE COUPON NOW!

COLUMBIA LP RECORD CLUB, Dept. 530
TERRE HAUTE, INDIANA

Please send me as my FREE gift the 3 records whose numbers I have circled at the right — and enroll me in the following Division of the Club:

(check one box only)

☐ Classical ☐ Listening and Dancing ☐ Jazz
☐ Broadway, Movies, Television and Musical Comedies

I agree to purchase four selections from the more than 100 to be offered during the coming 12 months . . . at regular list price, plus small mailing charge. For every two additional selections I accept, I am to receive a 12" Columbia LP Bonus record of my choice FREE.

Name.....
(Please Print)
Address.....
City.....Zone.....State.....

CANADA: Prices slightly higher, address 11-13 Soho St., Toronto 2B
If you wish to have this membership credited to an established Columbia Records dealer, authorized to accept subscriptions, please fill in the following information:

Dealer's Name.....
Dealer's Address.....85-2

CIRCLE 3 NUMBERS BELOW:

1. Eddy Duchin Story
2. Beethoven: 3 piano sonatas
3. Erroll Garner ("Caravan")
4. Gaîté Parisienne; Les Sylphides
5. Easy To Remember—Luboff Choir
6. My Fair Lady—Orig. Broadway Cast
7. Brubeck and Jay & Kai
8. Gershwin Hits—Percy Faith
9. Sinatra—Adventures of the Heart
10. Ambassador Satch
11. Firebird; Romeo and Juliet
12. Day By Day—Doris Day
13. Johann Strauss—Waltzes
14. Lure of the Tropics—Kostelanetz
15. Ports Of Call
16. Oklahoma!
17. Levant Plays Gershwin
18. The Elgart Touch
19. The Great Melodies of Tchaikovsky
20. Suddenly It's the Hi-Lo's
21. King of Swing—Benny Goodman
22. Brahms: Symphony No. 3
23. The Merry Widow
24. Wonderful, Wonderful—Mathis PE-1

That Ivory Look—so clear...so fresh ...so easily yours

Wash your face regularly with pure, mild Ivory Soap. Gentle enough for a baby's skin —so right for your complexion.

This adorable snow baby has That Ivory Look. A snowy fresh and sparkling look your complexion can have through the magic of Ivory's mildness. Make a simple change to regular care with Ivory Soap—the soap mild enough for a baby's skin. And soon your complexion will be fresher, clearer—altogether lovelier. You'll have That Ivory Look!

99 44/100% pure®...it floats

More doctors advise Ivory than any other soap

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
BRUCE GOULD
BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD
EDITORS

COLIN SIMKIN COLLECTION

CENTRAL PARK, WINTER

"SPEAKING OF OPERATIONS—"

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

Speaking of operations—I've just gone through one and am not quite convalescent. For the first time in years I thought there would be no contribution from me to this issue of the JOURNAL. Major surgery has been performed—on my life—chiefly consisting of removing an enormous number of adhesions, and scar tissue.

It began last spring when my husband and I returned from a long journey abroad to settle back into our four-story-and-basement house in New York, home for sixteen years. But for the past three years my husband has had recurrent bouts of lumbago or sciatica—"not serious," the doctor says, but very painful at times. His studio was on the top floor, and coming into the living room he let himself into a chair with a groan, saying, "I adore this house, but the stairs are killing me."

"Then," said I, "let's sell it."

He scoffed. "You love it. You've said you'd die in it."

"But I never intended it should kill us. Anyhow, it's too big. This house should have children. We have rooms we seldom use. It's hard to manage. We're in the country a third of the time and often travel. What we need is a small apartment."

Still, when we put the house on the market I half hoped there would be no bidders. Mistaken. It was snapped up, for occupancy in the fall, leaving us little time to find an apartment and move.

A "small" apartment had to have seven rooms unless we were to retire: a living room, a room which could accommodate a library, one for my secretary and files, one for my artist husband to work in and use as a dressing room, a bedroom, a kitchen and a maid's room. And we wanted to buy it.

We were going to miss the secret garden in midtown Manhattan, shared by twenty-two houses and otherwise inaccessible: a little private park with trees, fountains, and the coming and going of birds. The garden had sold the house to me years ago. Standing on the balcony, looking into it, I knew I would be happy there, and happy we have been. If we were to leave the garden it must be for rooms with a view, and not over skyscrapers but upon something more natural, and preferably moving and lively. It must be the river, we thought, the East River, ever-flowing and lively with craft.

In the next weeks we almost abandoned the hope of another home in the only big city that has ever been my home. There were many apartments for sale. But builders had been, apparently, prejudiced against seven rooms. We were offered nine, at smart addresses, with living rooms the size of a skating rink, dining rooms large enough to banquet Queen Elizabeth, views on brick and mortar, and a price your contributor couldn't dream of. Or we were offered six rooms in which one couldn't swing a duster. Then, suddenly, we heard of it.

Our reaction was what mine had been to the house, many years ago. I felt, "I shall be happy here. It suits us." And, friends, never buy a home unless it's love at first sight. Across the living-room window that filled the whole east wall there was nothing to block the view. On the river a double-decker excursion boat crowded with passengers was majestically passing, recalling my girlhood when sight-seeing on the waters around Manhattan was a passion. "This is it," we said, without hesitation. And it had just seven rooms and a foyer.

Folklore says great changes occur in every life every seven years, and this was a seven-times year for me. But, also, I have quoted in these pages that "there is a time for everything under the sun" and there is a time when one should reduce one's responsibilities and holdings. We had given big parties in the house, though less and less frequently. It was clear from even a cursory glance around the new dining room, which would have to be turned into a library as well as an eating place and thus diminished in floor space, that we could never have a sit-down dinner for more than six guests.

The thought did not appall me. We live in a different epoch from the prewar one, when excellent domestics were obtainable for a wage fairly well-to-do people could afford, and one didn't need to think much about grocery bills.

Executive Editor: Mary Bass
Special Projects Editor: Laura Lou Brookman
Associate Editors: Hugh MacNair Kahler, Wilhela Cushman, William E. Fink, Louella G. Shouer, Mary Lea Page, Dawn Crowell Norman, Margaret Davidson, Nora O'Leary, Glenn Matthew White, Donald Stuart, Tina S. Fredericks, Helen Everitt, Peter Briggs, Anne Einselen, Margaret Parton, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland, Geraldine Rhoads
Contributing Editors: Richard Pratt, Bernardine Kielty, Gladys Denny Shultz, Margaret Hickey, Ruth Mills Teague, Barbara Benson
Assistant to the Editor: Nelle Keys Perry
Editorial Associates: John Werner, Ruth Mary Packard, Ruth Shapley Matthews, Alice Conkling, Joseph Di Pietro, Elizabeth Goetsch, Nancy Crawford Wood, Jean Todd Freeman, Eileen Sharpe, Betty Coe Spicer
Assistant Editors: Victoria Harris, Alice Kastberg, Virginia Price, Dorothy Anne Robinson, Albert Serwazi, June Schwartz, Liane Waite, Joyce Posson, Neal Gilkyson Stuart, Ruth Imler, Elizabeth Hart, Elizabeth McFarland
Editorial Assistants: Lee Stowell Cullen, Patricia Martin, Flora Kerestedjian Alberte Wright, Simone Smith, Hazel Owen, Corinna Wildman, Isabel Blythe, Helen Olchvary, Olivia Donovan, Abbot Mills, Sally Platt, Marley Marseilles, Dorothy Markinko, Mary Jane Engel, Jean Anderson, Joan Cornog, Jean Hartman Culp, Grant Harris, Mary Tinker Hatch, Mary Wright

"Where did the Wilsons get that gorgeous new convertible?"

The answer is this. Mrs. Wilson puts the family savings in her Insured Savings and Loan Association. A friendly man there gave her a simple savings suggestion. "Every hundred miles you drive," he said, "put in another $5.00. When you get ready to turn the car in, you'll have the money you need to make up the trade-in difference."

You'll find really helpful savings advice at the Insured Savings and Loan Association near you! Plus unusually good returns on the family money, unsurpassed security —with savings insured up to $10,000 by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, an agency of the U. S. Government. Get the things you want sooner the Insured Savings and Loan Way!

WHERE YOU SAVE DOES MAKE A DIFFERENCE

Look for this symbol of safety where you save

FEDERAL SAVINGS AND LOAN INSURANCE CORPORATION · SAFETY OF YOUR SAVINGS · INSURED · UP TO $10,000

This message is sponsored by The Savings & Loan Foundation, Inc., 1111 E Street, N. W., Washington 4, D.C.

I had been told that the reconstruction we began planning, either out of sheer necessity for our professional work or from determination to make as comely and convenient a last home as we could afford, would keep us in an uproar for months. "Firms will be weeks beyond schedule. Estimates will be enormously exceeded. Workmen will quit or fail to show up."

The kitchen, the heart of every home, had to be remodeled, for it was neither convenient nor attractive. The dining room-library presented some tricky problems, and we were to be our own designers. But none of the dark forecasts came true. Carpenters, electricians, plumbers, glaziers, upholsterers were precise, expeditious, and scrupulously fulfilled their estimates except where I added second-thought items. They co-ordinated their work with one another, often under exasperating circumstances. One month from the day we got occupancy we moved in with everything built and painted, and with every dish, glass and pot and pan washed and cupboarded, thanks to the energy of several women who had worked for me in the past and quickly responded to a petition for their services.

Two days later my husband arrived from the country where I had exiled him for the duration. For men are much more susceptible than women to nervous collapses, are driven frantic by domestic confusions, and loathe what they call "petty details." He looked around in astonishment. "What a wonderful job you have done," he said warmly, and it was honey on my heart.

But creating the new home had not been nearly so nerve-racking as leaving the old one.

One has an attachment to things one has long lived with, and it was clear that I would have to divorce myself from much inappropriate furniture and, first of all, my dearest treasures: books. My carefully selected library (or so I had thought) contained at least 4000 books, though now I had to think, not in numbers but in linear feet. Measurement of the new library space and even the 50"-high shelves that were already in the living room and were to line all but one wall of the foyer made it clear that I would have to part with what amounted to a whole wall. Some I could eliminate with little pain, but in the case of others it was a wrench.

Even the emperor has straw-sandaled relatives.
CONFUCIUS

And if you ever have to move a library, friends, don't leave it to a professional mover. Transport it in cartons, and be glad if you or any member of your family owns a station wagon. Pack it in cartons of not more than forty volumes and transport it in takes that you can manage. This job I had to do myself—not the packing and transporting, but the selection and reshelving. And if, along with all the other household paraphernalia, you have to deal simultaneously with several thousand volumes, you will be led away gibbering. Get every book disposed of before anything else is moved.

Furthermore, don't think you can rearrange your books in the previous order. Tall and wide volumes could stand side by side with normal-sized books in the taller, deeper shelves of the old library. In the new dwelling, such shelves were limited. And I do wish publishers would stop issuing outsized volumes, 10" or 12" high and 8" or more wide. They would if they wanted to encourage private collectors. Art books containing reproduction plates require large-page space, and we have many, with none of which we wished to part. But the ideal size for a printed work is 5" or 6" wide and not more than 7½" tall, that can be accommodated on a shelf 7½" deep. It is lovely to hold in the hand and, if well printed, easy to read.

Unhappily, few modern books are well printed, to say nothing of the poor quality of their paper.

I have books ten years old whose print is smudgy and paper already yellowed and brittle. In contrast, a small-volume edition of Anatole France published forty years ago has pristine pages and elegant printing, easy on the eyes.

The volumes of Mark Sullivan's Our Times, an admirable history of American cultural development, as printed in 1935, are of immeasurably better type and paper than the memoirs of Winston Churchill dated more than a decade later.

A curious psychological effect is induced by this physical senility of books. One thinks that if they are not manufactured to last even one person's mature lifetime, the publishers must believe their contents, too, to be transitory. I fear this is often true. I discarded many books that had greatly interested me at first reading, sure, however, that I would never open them again.

Apart from books—paper!

In nightmares I have dreamed of the extinction of humanity, not by H-bombs but under a smothering of paper. Every morning "information" arrives, printed or mimeographed, from industries, organizations, governments, put out by "public-relations counsels," all of it special pleading and all of it prejudiced. No human being could read, let alone digest, a fraction of such matter, yet some of it finds its way into files.

Other material goes into files for an originally good reason that later ceases to be valid, such as state papers, culled from newspapers but later available in library books. Or it is passed from file to file until the moment when half the steel cabinets must be eliminated. One's temptation is to throw everything out and begin from no past at all. In the dusty mess of weighing and judging one finds duplicates that can certainly be discarded and much that never should have been there at all. And from the top shelves of a storage closet untouched for years come albums of ancient photographs, schoolboy notes from one's son, aged nine, letters from friends no longer in this world—or worse, no longer friends—and even old love letters.

One browses over these, sometimes with grief, sometimes with delight, and finally neatly wraps, marks and catalogues some of them, to go back on the highest shelf and be reopened again—when? Ever? One leaves the question to one's heirs.

Linen closets! If you have a capacious one in your home, as I did, when did you last go through it? Clothesbaskets of stuff came out of mine: torn sheets I thriftily intended to mend or cut up and sew for cleaning cloths; remnants of upholstery material; boxes of broken things one intended to mend; silken shawls, rotted with age.

During the uproar at the house where workmen for the next owner were already on scaffoldings, and the walls were stripped of pictures, the windows of curtains, sculptures were standing on the floor and the whole house wore the aspect of a junk shop, my three-year-old grandson arrived with his mother. After one horrified look he threw himself flat on the floor and howled. "Gwanny's house," he moaned. "All gone!" And looking up with tear-smudged cheeks, he gasped, "And where's Mats?"

Max, his adored step-grandfather, was still in exile. There was no good telling him "Mats" would be back soon. The familiar environment of granny was gone, along with the man who went with it. I felt like a ghost attending my own funeral, and that the smile I had summoned was vanishing like the Cheshire cat's. There was nothing to do but take him to the new apartment, which, though barren of furniture (except books), was clean, tidy, and contained familiar human faces.

He climbed on the window sill and looked out at the river. "Boats!" he cried rapturously. "Boats!"

Granny came back to life.

Eventually, when nearly everything was in place, though there was still reupholstered furniture to arrive, my husband came and his praise was honey on my heart. But his first words were "What has happened to you? Haven't you been eating? You're a wraith!"

This was exaggerated, but I had been losing half a pound a day while eating normally.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 117

High-protein breakfasts...different, delicious and fun with Quaker Oats and a variety of toppings

What fun your youngsters can have eating their favorite toppings on creamy-delicious Quaker Oats! It's a tempting way for growing children to get the abundance of protein provided by Quaker Oats. And modern mothers know that protein is the body-builder every child needs for growth.

For a whirl of fun in choosing oatmeal toppings, Quaker Oats offers a specially designed Merry-Go-Round Server. (Not sold in stores.) Also ideal for ice cream sauces, candies, nuts, relishes, salad dressings. Perfect for children's parties. See special offer below.

Quaker Oats and Mother's Oats are exactly the same

SPECIAL OFFER

MERRY-GO-ROUND SERVER Only $1.00 and 1 Blue Star from Quaker Oats or Mother's Oats package

Unique! Has 4 sections for oatmeal toppings and removable sugar holder in center. Made of sturdy, lustrous plastic. Comes apart for easy washing. Get extras for children's dressers or play rooms. Use handy order blank at right.

SEND ORDER BLANK TODAY!

MERRY-GO-ROUND SERVER, Box Q, Chicago 77, Illinois

I enclose $____ in ☐ cash ☐ check ☐ money order—and __ Blue Star(s) from package(s) of Quaker Oats or Mother's Oats for __ Merry-Go-Round Server(s).

Name_____
(Please print)

Address_____

City_____ Zone____ State_____

This offer good only in U. S., Hawaii, and while supply lasts. Void where prohibited, taxed, or regulated.

Helena Rubinstein solves your beauty problems

The world's greatest authority in beauty science helps millions of women

HELENA RUBINSTEIN has had more experience with skin problems than anyone in the world. Since her medical student days she has been working to keep young skins beautiful . . . to correct bad skins . . . to make aging skins look younger.

Today dry skin, aging contours, large pores, blackheads are no longer tragedies. With the help of Helena Rubinstein's scientific skin care every woman can solve her own beauty problems. The first step is knowing what to do. The second step is doing!

DRY SKIN? "PASTEURIZED" FACE CREAM SPECIAL corrects dry skin by supplying oils and moisturizing ingredients that penetrate deep into the sub-skin tissues. Use for daily cleansing. Also massage into skin before retiring and leave on overnight. 1.50.

AGING SKIN? Here's wonderful news for women over 35 who want to look younger! The oil glands that keep your skin smooth and unlined in youth can now be reactivated! The miracle is Progesterone, the most feminine sex hormone of all. For the first time, both Progesterone and Estrogenic Hormones are available in ESTROGENIC HORMONE CREAM so you can correct wrinkles caused by dryness, bring moisture back to aging skin. Only Helena Rubinstein's ESTROGENIC HORMONE CREAM has Progesterone! 3.50.

FACIAL HAIR? NUDIT is a new scientific formula that wipes off facial hair! It is safe, quick, easy. It is the only hair remover that comes with SUPER-FINISH, the medicated cream that eliminates redness or rashing. NUDIT melts off hair below the surface of the skin for more lasting effect. 1.50.

SAGGING CHIN? CONTOUR-LIFT FILM gives you a "face lift" that takes years off your appearance. This invisible liquid, used night and day, "lifts" and tones the skin. Little lines, crepiness seem to smooth out, flabby contours become firmer. 3.00.

DEHYDRATED SKIN? SKIN DEW is the remarkable new beauty discovery created in Helena Rubinstein's Paris laboratories. It is a fragrant pink lotion that is delicious to use and indispensable for a fresh young look. SKIN DEW® sinks deep into the skin's under layers replacing moisture. It is instantly absorbed without a trace of grease. Wonderful as a foundation under make-up. Perfect as a glamorous night cream. 3.00.

BLACKHEADS? Now you can actually wash away blackheads and correct oily skin problems with BEAUTY WASHING GRAINS. These miraculous little granules combine with water to clean out pores, turn greasy shine to pretty glow. 1.35.

PIMPLES? For skins that "break out," Helena Rubinstein has formulated new greaseless MEDICATED CREAM. Its medicated ingredients dry surface blemishes and actually help the skin heal itself. A boon to teenage boys and girls. 1.25. Prices plus tax

Helena Rubinstein beauty products are available at leading department and drug stores or write Helena Rubinstein®, 655 Fifth Avenue. N. Y. 22, N. Y.

A CHILD MUST FEEL HE BELONGS

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

WIL BLANCHE

Generally speaking, a person becomes a psychopath because nobody loved him much as a child.

DR. SPOCK

"There are some important lessons we can learn— as citizens and parents— from the sad fate of psychopaths."

I promised months ago to tell about the types of sailors who were my patients during the war, because they help to explain certain needs of children. Most of the time I was in the Navy I was in charge of one or another "psychopaths' ward." This was an informal name for a ward in which the patients with certain psychiatric diagnoses were locked up. But these patients weren't locked up because they had a dangerous kind of mental illness but because they had broken the rules and were prisoners. Of course most of the sailors who were "A.O.L." (absent over leave) or who went "A.W.O.L." (absent without leave) never got to a psychiatric ward. They were fined or they were confined, and they learned their lesson. But if a sailor had repeatedly got into trouble, had been punished again and again with increasing severity, and still showed no sign of improvement, he might be referred for psychiatric examination, to see what was the matter with him. If the examination showed that this was a lifelong pattern which could be expected to continue, he would be discharged. Most of the men who got to a ward like mine had committed at least three offenses, of increasing seriousness, before they had been in service a year. Many of them on their most recent offense had been deserters for several months.

Not all the patients in the psychiatric prison ward would turn out to have the same kind of disturbance. Some of the marines had been in battle for long periods and had developed the chronic overwhelming terror which was called combat fatigue and which would occasionally make a brave man stay A.O.L. because he couldn't face the possibility of being sent back to a war zone. Some of these were rehabilitated and some were honorably discharged. A few of the patients in the prison ward would be conscientious but painfully sensitive, withdrawn young men who were driven close to breakdown by the teasing and hounding of their cruder fellows and by their inability, in crowded barracks, to find a minute of privacy or relief. They had fled to save their sanity. A few patients were mental defectives who had been eager to serve like other, brighter men and who had been "helped" to pass their induction mental tests by their pals or by the kindhearted petty officer who supervised the examinations. Once in, they didn't have enough judgment to be able to abide by the rules.

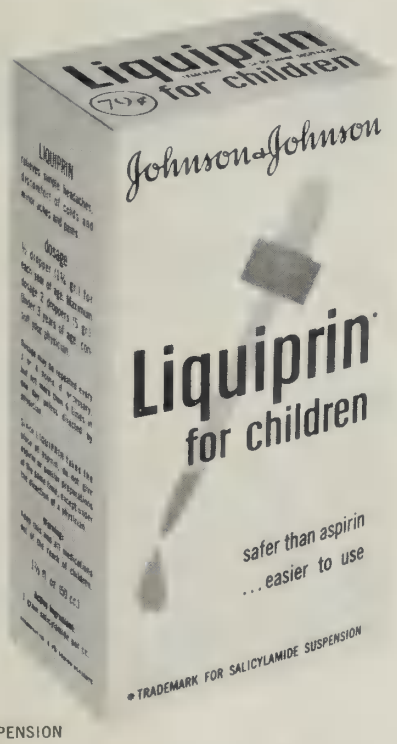
But the great majority of the men in the ward would be what are generally called psychopaths. Psychiatric terminology is often obscure. You can't always deduce from the derivation of a term what it means. You have to learn how it's used. The word "psychopath" might mean anyone who is suffering from any kind of nervous or emotional maladjustment, and it is occasionally used loosely this way. But to the specialist, a psychopath is the particular kind of maladjusted person who takes out his troubles on society by being a bad actor, in contrast to the psychotic, who has succumbed to his troubles and lost his sanity, and in contrast to the neurotic, who usually manages to keep going but suffers inwardly with phobias or compulsions or hypochondriacal symptoms.

Some psychopaths are real criminals or inveterate liars or other fancy kinds of scoundrels, but these did not often get into the armed services. The usual psychopaths in the Army and Navy were simply fellows who had always been irresponsible, impulsive and demanding, and who never learned from experience. They were not very bad, but they were no good to anybody either. In civilian life, the merely irresponsible psychopath is not the dramatic threat to society which the hardened criminal is. He is mainly a burden to his family, and he is a nuisance wherever he works. In the services he is much more of a problem because the requirements are more demanding, the rules are arbitrary, the life is not pleasant and the psychopath just hasn't got it in him to make the effort to conform.

When I first became a psychiatrist in the Navy I had had no close experiences with psychopaths, aside from the brief frustrations that every civilian has occasionally in dealing with them in ordinary life. They don't come to psychiatric hospitals or clinics very often because it doesn't seriously occur to them that they might do better. As a newcomer, I was completely green about the thousands of regulations which govern all procedures in an armed service. The thirty demanding prisoner patients whom I found in the locked ward when I was assigned to it took full advantage of my innocence and conscientiousness at first. They would demand to know what was holding up their discharge papers or the allotment checks to their families and I would walk through miles of corridors to make inquiries at the proper offices. They must make telephone calls to find out about sick relatives and had to be sent under guard to the telephone booth.

One day there was a loud knock on my office door and I found a delegation of indignant men who said they weren't getting enough to eat. This sounded to me like a serious complaint in a hospital, and I went with them to the galley crew who supervised the serving of food. They pointed out garbage cans filled with discarded

CONTINUED ON PAGE 16



New! Liquiprin* for children... safer than aspirin, easier to use

Medical tests prove this new, easy-to-use liquid is gentler, less irritating than aspirin ...safe even for children who are upset by aspirin! Gets to work faster, too!

Mothers! Give your child these added benefits of LIQUIPRIN*—the new way to help calm the feverish, fretful child and ease discomfort of colds, minor aches and pains.

non-spill safety bottle
LIQUIPRIN is safer than aspirin and made safer still by a special medicine-monitor in every bottle. Children cannot pour or drink from this exclusive safety bottle.

LIQUIPRIN IS DESIGNED ESPECIALLY FOR CHILDREN!
LIQUIPRIN pediatric analgesic-antipyretic was developed to meet the special needs of children for something safer, gentler and less irritating than aspirin.

LIQUIPRIN IS BETTER THAN ASPIRIN FOR YOUR CHILD!
LIQUIPRIN contains salicylamide, a pain-relieving and fever-reducing agent of the same type as aspirin... BUT... it is chemically different. This difference makes LIQUIPRIN basically safer and ideal for children's use.

safer than aspirin—medical tests and actual hospital use prove LIQUIPRIN does not upset or irritate the stomach... safe even for children who are upset by aspirin.

gets to work faster—liquids work faster than tablets. LIQUIPRIN also leaves the stomach more rapidly, is more rapidly absorbed, gets to work sooner to relieve your child.

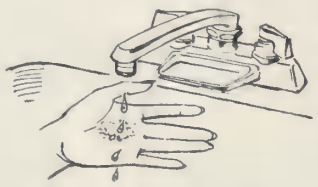
easier to take—children take tasty LIQUIPRIN directly from measured dropper or mixed with fruit juice, milk or formula. No more tablets to crush or dissolve. And what's more, you're sure of giving exact dosage.

YOUR DOCTOR KNOWS ABOUT LIQUIPRIN Get a bottle today—at all drugstores— 79¢

*TRADEMARK FOR SALICYLAMIDE SUSPENSION

a major advance in better child care from Johnson & Johnson

MOISTURE-PROOF your baby against diaper irritation



Here's How-

When changing diapers, apply soothing ZBT Baby Powder generously. ZBT protects like oil . . . guards tender skin against urine scald and diaper rash.

After baby's bath, sprinkle entire body with soothing ZBT Baby Powder, to protect against chafing and prickly heat.

Make this test! Smooth ZBT powder on the palm of your hand. Let drops of water fall on palm. See for yourself how ZBT Baby Powder repels moisture, where ordinary powders absorb it.

Used by hundreds of hospital nurseries

ZBT BABY POWDER CONTAINS OLIVE OIL

soothes like powder protects like oil

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 14

potatoes, vegetables, desserts and bread. I turned questioningly to the delegation, but they weren't embarrassed. "We don't like that stuff. We want more meat," they said. They wanted to be able to fill their stomachs with meat alone, at a time when civilians were being held to one modest portion a day.

They had to be confined within the space of the ward and a small exercise yard for a number of weeks until it was decided by a committee of doctors which ones should be discharged from the Navy and until their discharge papers were processed in Washington. This was a slow, boring business and it was difficult to maintain any kind of morale. The medical corpsmen were not proud to be serving their country by taking care of useless sailors, urging them to get out of bed in the morning, to make their beds, to clean up the ward and keep it clean, to stop their horseplay at night and go to bed again. The patients were often fresh or insulting to the nurses, who were sometimes left in tears. I secured volleyball equipment and the patients played loudly and argumentatively for one day and then lost interest. Very few could be interested in reading or in hobbies. They claimed that such activities made them nervous. They always complained that they couldn't sleep at night and demanded sedatives. On Sundays, through vigorous telephoning, they managed to get themselves visited by flashy-looking girls, with whom they sat publicly entwined in the locked corridor.

It used to make the corpsmen and me slightly resentful that the nurses obviously enjoyed the boldly affectionate manner of the better-behaved patients who were careful not to be offensive. "How can you like men who you know are selfish, unreliable, unprincipled, incorrigible?" we'd ask. "They're kind of cute," the nurses would answer. Of course men feel the same way about lady psychopaths. It's the psychopath's quick, easy, uninhibited forwardness and responsiveness that's appealing—at least up to a point. Beyond that point they have little to offer in the way of real love or devotion and they generally make very poor partners in marriage. Responsible men and women can't be so daringly flirtatious on first acquaintance because they want to know the other person better before becoming involved, to avoid the risk of disappointing or being disappointed, because they care about their reputations and perhaps because they are already committed to someone else. But none of these considerations worries the psychopath.

The psychopath is characteristically a very demanding person. If you could sympathize with him, you'd say he was pathetically demanding. He is wanting something all day, whether it is privileges, possessions or attention, and he wants it quickly—the way a hungry baby wants his milk. Yet it never occurs to him that he owes anything in return. This conviction that blessings should flow one way showed up in typical situations on the ward. When, in taking the medical history, I would ask the man why he had committed the offense, the commonest reply was, "I had to go over the hill. I asked for leave and they wouldn't give it to me."

After a man had been absent for several months, the red tape would finally catch up with him and if there had been a wage allotment to his family it would cease. When a sailor on my ward got a letter from home to this effect, he would come storming to my office and demand to know why this outrage had occurred. I'd explain that the Navy, like any other organization, doesn't keep on paying a person who has deserted his job. But the sailor would never blush with shame at being reminded that he had let his country down in wartime. He'd shout, "How do they expect my family to live?" After weeks of impatient waiting the patient would receive his discharge papers. It would not be too fine a discharge, but not a disgraceful one, either, because the medical report showed that he had been this way most of his life and couldn't have been expected to perform satisfactorily. He would come to me to complain. I'd remind him that in the olden days a man would be shot for deserting as he had, but this made no dent. He'd shout, "I know lots of guys who were over the hill longer than I was, and they got better discharges than this!"

How does a person get to be a psychopath? Not by heredity. Generally speaking, it happens because nobody loved him much the first few years of his life. The histories of the patients on my ward were, most of them, monotonously the same. One man's mother died when he was born and his father turned him over to a relative or to a neighbor who, he still remembers, didn't want him much. Another man's father died or deserted, his mother had to go to work, and she left him with someone who showed him no love. The result would be the same if a boy were placed very young in an old-fashioned orphanage where there was much too little affection to go around. It could also happen right in the boy's own family if nobody cared for him there.

By the time a psychopath of the neglected type reaches school he is most commonly a tense, restless, shallow child. He has little capacity to apply himself to any kind of work, and if he has been severely neglected, his intellectual function will be impaired. Never having been a real member of a family, he has no feeling of wanting to be a part of the group in his classroom. Never having known the joy of love, he doesn't try to evoke it from others and has little fear of displeasing them. (Nobody can really appreciate what he's never had.) Since no one ever gave him anything important, he has nothing real to give either. So in school he is apt to be among the pupils who pay no attention, are usually in trouble, and are really liked by no one. Most of my sailors had been left back two grades by the time they quit school at about fifteen. By then they were, of course, almost fully grown (head and shoulders above the thirteen-year-olds in the class) and unwilling to put up with the constant criticism of the teacher any longer.

One of the most consistent things about ordinary young psychopaths is their poor work records. It was rare for any of the sailors on my ward to have held a job as long as three months, and most jobs lasted only a few days or weeks. They didn't develop a feeling of belonging to the organization any more than they did in the service or in school or in their homes. So they had no sense of loyalty or obligation to it. Due to this and to their tenseness, distractibility and lack of purpose in life, they couldn't stick to the work or get it done. Yet their demandingness made them want a lot more than they were worth. The reasons they gave for changing jobs were, most often: "They didn't pay me enough money"; "The work made me nervous"; "The boss was always riding me."

You may at this point want to know whether the armed services did anything to rehabilitate the psychopaths or what society can do. A few rehabilitation programs were organized for some of the borderline cases, but the great majority (tens of thousands)

CONTINUED ON PAGE 120

No matter how active you are all day... New Mum stops odor without irritation

If you've ever worried about your deodorant failing . . . or about underarm stinging or burning from using a deodorant daily—now you can set your mind at ease.

New Mum Cream will stop odor right through the day and every day. And new Mum is so gentle for normal skin you can use it whenever you please—even right after shaving, or a hot bath. Mum Cream gives you the kind of protection you can't possibly get from any other leading deodorant—because it works a completely different way.

Contains no aluminum salts

Mum Cream is the only leading deodorant that works entirely by stopping odor . . . contains no astringent aluminum salts. And it keeps on working actively to stop odor 24 hours a day with M-3—Mum's wonderful hexachlorophene that destroys both odor and odor-causing bacteria!

When Mum is so effective—yet so gentle—isn't it the deodorant for you?

MUM® contains M-3...stops odor 24 hours a day

(BACTERIA-DESTROYING HEXACHLOROPHENE)

SO GENTLE FOR ANY NORMAL SKIN YOU CAN USE IT FREELY EVERY DAY

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

CERTIFIED AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF LAUNDERING

WON'T DAMAGE CLOTHES

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

How OLSON

CARPET MAGIC

Saves You up to 1/2

FREE

Accent Rugs

Just for Trying Olson Room size Rugs. If not delighted, we'll refund and you keep Gift Rug.

← Cut Edge Shows Actual Thickness

Reversible! 2 Rugs in One! Double Wear!

Lovely, New Tweeds, Twists

Take These 3 Easy Steps:

1 Mail the Coupon or a Postcard for the Beautiful, New, FREE Olson Rug Style Book, including Decorating Ideas and Model Rooms in full color. When the book arrives, . . .

2 Choose Your Rugs in armchair comfort in the quiet of your own home — and mail your order direct to the Olson Rug Factory. Then . . .

3 Send Your Old Rugs, Carpets, Clothing at our expense by Express or Freight. They'll call at your door. WE DO THE REST.

Here's Modern Rug Magic!

The valuable materials in your old carpets, rugs, clothing, etc., are reclaimed like new, sterilized, shredded, pickered, bleached, merged, blended with choice NEW WOOLS, then redyed respun into rug yarn, and woven in a week into deep textured new Reversible Broadloom Rugs or wall-to-wall Carpeting, fine enough for any home. 9 x 12 ft. weighs 46 lbs., not 32 lbs.

CHOICE of 44 patterns regardless of colors in your material. Any size up to 18 ft., any length.

Solid Colors Embossed Effects Leaf, Scroll Florals
Tweed Blends Early American Oriental Ovals

NO RISK OFFER. Satisfaction guaranteed. Over 3 million customers. Monthly Payments if you wish.

Mail Coupon or Postcard to Nearest Address.

FREE Money-Saving RUG BOOK in Colors, Model Rooms

Name.....

Address.....

Town..... State.....

OLSON RUG CO., Dept. A-63

CHICAGO 2800 N. Crawford | NEW YORK 15 W. 34th St. | SAN FRANCISCO 209 Post Street

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

"Let me know when they're tired, and I'll put them to bed."

Some of our town's illuminati who dine out a lot insist on sitting in a booth or at a corner table, even if they must wait ten minutes. They seem to fear attack from behind, maybe by table hoppers or a waitress laden with a heavy tray.

We have five or six couples in town who retreat to the Southland during the holiday season to avoid (1) sending Christmas cards, (2) drinking Tom-and-Jerries and eggnogs, (3) family dinners and (4) an orgy of Christmas gifts. Smarties; but they miss fun.

Since Doc Spock has ruled in his new revised statutes that parents needn't any more let their young trample all over 'em, our cowed moms and dads hardly know what to do with their new-found freedom.

Our town's matchmakers are tempted to incite romance between tall girl basketballers and 6½-foot male players. "In twenty years," they say, "we might have quite a crop of seven-foot athletes for the state university."

When she wants to wheedle her husband, my nearest neighbor calls him by his top wartime rank, "colonel," to put him in a good mood. But when she wants to put him in his place she calls him "corporal," though he never was a corporal.

I notice my Dream Girl knows instantly when she opens a present whether she wants to keep it, turn it in or give it away. (Unconsciously she even arranges them in separate piles around and near our Christmas tree.)

Roadside signs offering "home cooked" food leave me suspicious; I've taken to carrying canned soups in my car. Most dangerous of the "homemade soups" in roadside cafés is "homemade chili." (When cornered, I tame it with an order of mashed potatoes.)

We've been invited by the young married crowd for a ski excursion to Sun Valley in a private day coach. We're torn between the high compliment and our fear of sleepless nights and a broken leg.

I've bet our Air Force son a small sum that the Naval Academy will raise from veterans the $2,000,000 it needs for its self-financed Memorial Stadium.* My modest check goes in memory of my favorite cousin killed at the Rapido River in Italy.

One of our outdoorsy neighbors who hasn't vacuumed her carpet in twelve years now spends two hours vacuuming her new swimming pool for every hour she spends swimming. "It tans you evenly," she explains; "better exercise than sun bathing."

When I hear our high-schooler memorize the same lines from Chaucer we memorized thirty years ago, the ones about "that Aprille with his shoures soote," I relish a sense of life's continuity, akin to immortality.

At our round-table luncheon in the basement of the cafeteria we agreed that heavy tweed or flannel suits are too warm for our overheated modern interiors. Three out of eight of us were wearing summer suits.

"Lately I've noticed the downtown store-window dummies are prettier than they were," muses Peter Comfort, scraping his windshield with a yellow plastic scraper. "Kinda intellectual, too, but more like Junior Leaguers. Girls you'd like to know better."

*The U.S.A. doesn't pay for it.

I'm under pressure to enroll in two "adult education" classes, via my goddess, who's under pressure from two restless chums. She offers me a choice: Square Dancing, Welding or "What Good Music Will Do for You." We may compromise: Flower Arrangement or Golf.

One reason the collegians and coeds are so gay during the year-end holidays might be that so many of them are away from their "exclusive dars" with whom they're shackled on the campus.

That wily youn grandpa across the street hired a huse trailer and installed it in his back yard during a visit from his aughter's two tiny infants. His neihbors forgave him: he explained it as only a temporary refuge for himself.

Our brave-newworld teen-ager has discovered there re 37 electric motors whirring away in our house. "Can you imagine," he asks awe-struck, "all the chores I'd have to do if we weren't so overmechanized

Another exhil against exclusive dating: A coed whook a blind date with a collegian to fly from their college town for a Coke in the next town. Now they're happily wed. Wo if they'd been stubborn "exclusive" dats?

My solicito wife pressures me to ease up on my loved snow shoveling, better exerci than skiing. But I argue the firs igma of a family's decay is unsh·led, slushy, slippery sidewalks.

Cornered a cocktail party, I often find myself fled by a nonstop talker on one side, a de·e lady with no small talk on the other. a lazy man myself, I find the nonstop ·er less wearing if I don't listen too inty.

Remembwhen people used to call 'em scdals? Three occurred in the next to this autumn, and most people me asked, "What on earth can they pibly see in each other?"

One of richer matrons has built her cozy rDream House: two bedrooms and three-car garage on four levels, with bars; an architect tossed it together her for around $100,000.

Our liigroup of critics of TV want on screen close-up faces of the athl·in big games—football, baseball, ketball. The face is the façade o· soul, and athletes have souls. Y· distant shots they look like rob·

In the club locker-room gossip an odd par comes to light: Tall girls win mo· the beauty crowns, but petite gi·n more than their share of desirabls bands. And shucks: the differen only a few inches.

Some ple in our valley scheme and pl· weeks to be at exactly the right with exactly the right person the midnight New Year kiss. friends even prefer their own hids or wives.

. . . our youngest convinces me I'm a ard member of a waning generatio·

. . my Dream girl pressures me about and duties I've neglected,

. . y daughter cuts her red hair again I've paid her $25 to let it grow,

. . Junior listens attentively to my advic decides not to follow it,

Eyn I conclude it's more fun batt but with them so affectionately than in a vacuum a bachelor's ghosgoblins.

Fun bubbles both ways in a friendly "telephone break." You're glad you called, and it's so appreciated. Routine gets a poke in the ribs, the day gets an unexpected sparkle. So dust off your morning, pick up the phone, and just for fun—call someone.

Bell Telephone System

Working Together to Bring People Together

Buy yourself
a glamorous
new hat with the dollars
you save in

PEPPERELL'S

Hats by Mr. John

Whether you choose fine-combed Lady Pepperell Percales, Superfine Muslins, or thrifty Fine Muslins — every snow-drop white sheet is the longest-wearing possible. So load up your linen closets right now — at these low, low prices!

Can it be true? The entire palette of exquisite Pepperell pastels, including new high-fashion Turquoise, is now yours at the most wonderful prices imaginable! Do get lots of these top fashion leaders! You'll love them all!

JANUARY SALE

Lucky you! Here's your chance to let Pepperell, the fashion leader, dress up your beds — while you buy yourself a treat with your savings! Percales or muslins, fitted or regular, nylons, designer stripes and prints, Pepperell's widest range of pastels — they're all yours at wonderful White Sale savings. So watch your local newspaper for special Pepperell prices!

PEPPERELL FABRICS

No fooling — there's no tugging with Pepperell's exclusive Slip-On corners! They go on easier — last longer because they're ⅓ stronger — and they're reversible. 'Sanforized', too, for lasting fit. In white, colors, and new stripes.

Such sweet sleeping on any one of the luxurious sheets from Pepperell's famed designer collection! Whatever your choice . . . stunning stripes . . . beauty borders . . . or a delightful all-over print like Wildwood (shown above) . . . each and every one is a fashion-first! And what down-to-earth prices!

Softest Pepperell Blankets are yours in smart coordinated colors . . . with amazing Marvelok Weave that makes them warmer, ounce for ounce, than any comparably priced. You get newest fibers, too, including famous Acrilan*.

Slip-On and Marvelok Weave are registered Pepperell trademarks. *®Acrylic fiber by Chemstrand.

Giving your kids the fun and advantages you want for them? Taking them places and helping them do things?

Are you this woman?

Developing your talents so you'll be more interesting?

Taking the part that's expected of you in church and community affairs—enjoying your share?

you can be the woman you yearn to be with a Plymouth all your own

Don't be dependent on your husband's free time or your neighbor's good nature. Go where you want, when you want in a beautiful Plymouth that's yours and nobody else's. It's as simple to master as your familiar washing machine.

Push a button and you're in gear. No shifting, no nerve-racking shudder. Stop quickly without bounce: just touch the brake with your toe. Ferry a carload of kids with the securest feeling in the world. Every door has safety latches.

Go with the light, no honking behind you; the new Plymouth goes from a full stop into smooth, immediate action. Even parking is easier because the wheel never fights back and the big, wide windshield lets you see in all directions.

Go talk it over, now, with that Plymouth dealer who knows what it can mean to you to have a Plymouth all your own!

NO LONGER "THE TOWN WITHOUT A DOCTOR" ...Payson, Arizona

BOB TOWERS

First-born. Fifth child in the Bill Morris family, but to the brand-new Payson Clinic and the proud volunteers who built it, young Thomas Henry will always be "our first!"

You Can Do Something

By MARGARET HICKEY

"Why doesn't somebody do something?" is a question fast going out of date. With new communities mushrooming, old towns outgrowing their boundaries, there isn't time to sit around and wait for a mythical "somebody" to solve the problems. Instead, people are asking, "What are we going to do about it?"

This civic concern, interesting and a little amazing to the foreign visitor, begins sometimes in the home, often in the school, and many times at a meeting. In Payson, Arizona, for example, Junior Woman's Club members talked over the need for medical facilities and decided to do something about it. The story of their efforts is featured on this page.

In Beaverton, Oregon, several mothers who met at P.T.A. got together later because they discovered a common worry: their teen-agers were driving—sometimes in heavy traffic—into Portland, some ten miles away, for their fun and entertainment. This was to be expected, of course—Beaverton, though growing by leaps and bounds, then had only one tennis court, one bowling alley and two small movies.

Lacking money, but fired by determination, these mothers enlisted help from newspapers and community leaders, church members, housewives to form a new Tualatin Hills Park and Recreation Council. Two years of hard work followed—mass meetings, fund-raising and petition-signing drives. But it paid off when voters went to the polls to approve a new recreation district headed by a board of three directors.

Today twelve playgrounds serve some 35,000 district children; there is a brand-new swimming pool (financed by special bond issue); three new parks are being planned; a year-round recreation program for all ages operates in churches and schools under trained leadership.

In Denver, Colorado, problems of exploding population make it necessary for every neighborhood to deal with lack of schools and recreation facilities, rising crime rates and safety hazards. But citizens there don't need to work alone. A central clearinghouse—the Denver Area Welfare Council—helps make surveys and plan whatever project is in the offing, using experienced community workers.

Any community can have its own planning group by following these suggestions from the Denver Area Welfare Council:

Form a small steering committee of interested people.

Prepare a list of possible projects.

Contact organizations for a community-wide meeting.

Follow up with visits to these organizations, get their opinion on programs.

Appoint other committees to work on a constitution, get new members, work out a budget.

Now your council is ready for action! END

From his patrol car somewhere out on the 72-mile stretch of highway between the Arizona towns of Payson and Cottonwood, Deputy Sheriff Howard Childers' voice came into Payson headquarters over the two-way radio. "Get a doctor!" he demanded. "Put me through to a doctor on a telephone hookup. And make it fast. A woman is having a baby in a car forty miles from the hospital. There's nobody with her who knows anything about delivering babies. Get hold of a doctor who can tell me what to do!"

The answering doctor's voice sounded calm. He asked questions, gave answers. To one question, "What instruments are available?" Sheriff Childers' reply was, "A pocketknife and a piece of string." The baby was a healthy one, none the worse for his unceremonious entry into the world. On her belated arrival at the hospital the mother was pronounced "fine." The sheriff's reward: the grateful parents named their brand-new baby for him. To friends who congratulated him later on his emergency obstetrics he confided, "I was worried, real worried." Friends agreed that that was perfectly understandable. "Suppose the lady'd had twins?" Sheriff Childers went on. "I had only one piece of string!"

To the people of Payson, population 1200, the story was not a new one. For three years their town—high in the pine-clad mountains under the rugged and story-famed Tonto Rim—had been without a doctor, without medical facilities of any kind. Payson is 72 miles from the nearest hospital at Cottonwood, 90 miles from Arizona's major city of Phoenix. The drive to either place lies over winding, mostly unpaved roads that wash out when hard rains come, and where ridges sometimes lie buried under drifts of snow in winter. Quite a number of Payson babies have been born in cars or born at home without a doctor's help. Birth notices in the local newspaper often list as place of birth "highway between Payson and Cottonwood"—or "Phoenix." One three-year-old child had died of pneumonia. Many an accident victim had endured the pain of the long, rough ride to the hospital, or had been flown out if a small plane was available and the little airstrip was not mudded-in.

"We all had our accidents and emergencies," says slim, blond Hazel Owens. She says it quietly, but everyone in Payson knows how much feeling lies behind the words. Counted among those "accidents and emergencies" was the day Mrs. Owens' ten-year-old daughter Gwenna was seriously hurt in a fall from a moving car. Mrs. Owens credits Payson pharmacist soft-spoken Don Manthe with saving the child's life. Telephone-checking carefully with a doctor 72 miles away as he worked, Don applied emergency bandages, gave the frightened little girl a sedative to quiet her so that she might not injure herself further on the trip to the hospital. "Gwenna is fine now," her mother says gratefully.

Others will tell you of the times Don Manthe has given emergency aid to accident victims from mines, sawmills, ranches and farms in the rugged country surrounding Payson and nearby Pine; of the long day that Don and other volunteers spent working a tortuous way down into an almost inaccessible canyon to bring out a seventeen-year-old boy injured in a fall from a cliff while on a hiking trip. Again in telephone consultation with a doctor many miles away, Don was able to ease the victim's injuries enough so that he could survive the hospital trip. This same life-or-death telephone cooperation helped save a woman victim of a heart attack. But there were times and cases when it did not—when only immediate medical help would do.

"And I am not a doctor," says pharmacist Manthe firmly. "A doctor was what Payson had to have."

Payson's only doctor—elderly and semi-retired—died three years ago. No one came to replace him. Appeals to the state medical association were discouraging. The association hesitated to recommend a doctor for a town so remote that had no medical facility. Other problems stood in the way.

"A doctor isn't just a doctor, after all," says Walter Surrett, local manager for the Arizona Public Service (power) Company, who has gained considerable understanding of those problems during his town's doctorless years. "A doctor is a person, as well. We have to find a doctor who likes and understands the business of living in a small town. One who'll be happy to swap the pleasures of city living for the pleasures our mountain country offers—like hunting and fishing and horseback riding and getting to be part of a community that really needs and welcomes him. If he has a wife it's important that she like those things CONTINUED ON PAGE 25

NOW! MATCH YOUR TILE WITH DIAL!

Lovely New Colors IN Complexion Dial

Contains a wondrous new Skin Freshener for better than ever protection under make-up!

Complexion Dial's gentle new Skin Freshener — Super AT-7 — does what no ordinary soap, no drying synthetic, no greasy skin cream can possibly do! Sweeps away bacteria that so often spoil your complexion — without drying, without greasing your skin!

Then, Complexion Dial's new Skin Freshener stays on your skin. You can't see it or feel it. But it's there, protecting your complexion all day — even under make-up!

Today, buy Complexion Dial in colors — by the color of its gleaming new wrapper.

Pure luxury... sure protection for the beauty of your complexion!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 23

too." He grins as he goes on. "His kids—well, we don't worry much about the kids' liking this sort of life. I never met a kid yet that didn't."

"We've been without medical help long enough!" members of the Payson Junior Woman's Club decided. "To get a doctor we need a well-equipped place for him to work. So we'll get it, somehow we'll get it."

As Mrs. Owens puts it, "I guess you might say that the Payson Clinic was born along with all those babies born in cars because their mothers couldn't make it to the hospital in time—or couldn't afford to leave their families to go and stay two or three weeks in Phoenix or Cottonwood to wait near a hospital for a new baby's birth."

A fine new highway now being translated from the planning stage was due to make great changes in the small, isolated town of Payson. Finished, it would cut in half the rough, grueling five-hour trip to Phoenix. The new road would not eliminate Payson's need for its own medical facilities—even two and a half hours are too long in an emergency. It would, in fact, increase that need. Not only would the new road bring new growth to the town itself, but the whole lovely wooded area under the towering escarpment of the Tonto Rim would throng with summer people from May to October once that road was in.

"These summer people are going to need a doctor handy, too," Paysonites agreed. "More of them will feel at ease about coming to Payson if they know that they can count on medical help in case of accident or sudden illness."

From their first "indignation meetings" in the big cheerful meeting room of the Payson Woman's Club, the "Juniors," 30 of them, went out to raise enough money to build their clinic. "We know Payson isn't wealthy. We know it won't be easy for people to give money. But everyone knows how great the need is. We think people will back the clinic plan once they hear about it."

If there is anything that cannot bear free thought, let it crack.

WENDELL PHILLIPS

Their first effort—a style show, bake sale and raffle—brought in $414 and a lot of community enthusiasm for the plan. "We counted the money and the offers of help. We thought 'We're really under way!'"

A real-estate dealer donated a two-acre lot at the edge of town. The site looked perfect—close enough to be accessible, removed enough so that noise and dust from the town's sawmill would not be disturbing. A gently sloping, sun-splashed hillside surrounded with pine trees was marked off. "That's where the building will go. We could almost see it."

A second donated lot was raffled off and the proceeds went to swell the building fund. Other donated items raffled included "everything from a car to home-baked cakes to handmade quilts." There were card parties. News that donations were needed went out by letter and by word of mouth, reaching even to isolated farms, ranches and mines. After the first hard-working six months the Juniors were joined in their campaign by civic groups and local businessmen. The nonprofit Payson Clinic, Inc., was formed. Among its officers were Walter Surrett, president, and Don Manthe, vice president. Ann Perry, Doris Taylor, Hazel Owens and Alice Murphy served as treasurer, secretary and assistants. Board members included not only Paysonites, but business and professional people from all over the state who had been caught by the drama of Payson's struggle to build its clinic and find its doctor. For each dollar donated to the clinic fund, the donor got a "certificate of interest" plus a vote in the clinic's operation.

Through the Juniors' own efforts they had raised $2000. In the months that followed, the joint campaign raised $11,000; $5600 worth of land was donated, $1500 of lumber as well as other building materials. Contacted through volunteer efforts of the forest rangers, summer people gave generously to the clinic cause. Their opinion: "It's great! Much needed." Plans were drawn for the clinic building and checked for efficiency by medical authorities.

With cash, land, materials and offers of expert volunteer labor in hand, members of the Payson Clinic Board set out to borrow the additional $20,000 they estimated they would need to complete and equip the building as planned. Their clinic seemed almost an accomplished fact. One Junior, expecting a baby soon, joked about being "our first patient."

Then came a blow. Bank after bank, loan company after loan company turned them down. "They didn't think we could do it," says Walter Surrett. But at last they were fortunate enough to get their story to the ear of Jim Patrick, of Phoenix, vice president of the Valley National Bank. As Mr. Surrett puts it simply and gratefully, "He did believe we could do it."

Two years after the Payson Woman's Club Juniors declared, "We'll do it somehow!" the cream-walled $31,000 Payson Clinic stood on the site marked off for it, a reality at last. From its pine-paneled reception room through doctors' offices, examining rooms, operating room, wards, kitchen, laundry and all the other necessary features of a self-contained and efficient clinic, the building was bright, cheerful, functional. Both space and plans were at hand for future expansion as needed. Much of the clinic's basic equipment had been donated, like the ambulance (secondhand, but a great and unexpected bonus), the gleaming refrigerator, the automatic washer, beds—even the soft honey-toned pine paneling, a home product of Payson's own mills. Much had been bargain-purchased.

Pretty dark-eyed Betty McGoon, a Junior who volunteers two days each week for clinic work, points out such buys as $90 operating-room lights bought through war surplus for just the $9 handling charges. Of a $200 incubator she says, "Our board talked long and hard over this purchase. Perhaps we will never use it. But if we should need it to save the life of just one baby, we'll need it in a hurry. We all feel better knowing that it is here." The clinic has laboratory equipment, examining and operating tables, a glittering autoclave. "Our school nurse taught us how to sterilize hospital equipment."

Dedication ceremonies were held on December 23—"a sort of community Christmas present from us to us." Congratulated the guest speaker (that same Jim Patrick whose belief in the project had helped to make it possible), "All of you should take great pride in having worked so hard for something you believed in."

Hundreds of visitors toured the clinic. Those who had helped build it—wielding pick and shovel, hammer or saw, paintbrush or floor polisher—glowed with proprietary pride. Those who had not seen the building were generous with comments like "wonderful!" . . . "amazing!" . . . "exactly what we have needed for years" or "so good for the town and its future."

Several doctors were among the visitors. All admired the building and its equipment. "This is a real accomplishment for a town the size of Payson. Having a functional place to work is a real incentive to a doctor," said one. "Forward-looking" and "well designed" were other approving statements.

The only trouble was that all these approving doctors were busy men with established practices in other towns or cities. For all its realized dream of a fine and needed medical facility, Payson still had no doctor of its own.

"What good is the clinic without a doctor?" one Junior asked sadly as she dusted the empty, waiting desk in the cheerful room marked "Doctor's Office." Doctor or no doctor, the young women were still working hard at the clinic, keeping it spotless, raising money for more equipment, attending board meetings, completing plans to finance the nurse's education of a Payson girl, nineteen-year-old Betty Noth.

Doctors came to see the clinic and be interviewed by the clinic board. Some were not right for the job—some found the job not right with your youngsters every day!

CONTINUED ON PAGE 121

Germs Ride the School Bus

HOW LISTERINE ANTISEPTIC REDUCED COLDS

Those who did NOT gargle Listerine twice daily had

- 89% more severe colds than those who did
- 85% longer colds, measured in days
- 73% more sore throats
- 51% more "ordinary" colds

Wise mothers have their children gargle Listerine before and after school

The common cold is much too common among school children. Here's something mothers can do to help youngsters fight infection. Before and after school, have them gargle Listerine full-strength. Listerine kills germs by the millions.

Tests over 12 years proved that those who gargled Listerine twice every day had fewer and milder colds than those who did not.

Look at the figures on the chart above and start your whole family gargling Listerine Antiseptic today!

Gargle LISTERINE ANTISEPTIC

your No. 1 protection against infection!

only B&M bakes beans so good!

In the "down east" kitchens of B&M, carefully selected beans with generous pieces of tender pork are baked all day long in a golden-rich old fashioned brown sugar sauce. Once you've tasted B&M Brick Oven Baked Beans you'll know the flavor of honest-to-goodness "down east" baked beans.

B&M brick oven
BAKED BEANS

They're Extra Good with B & M Brown Bread

SEALED OVEN-HOT IN BOTH GLASS JARS AND TINS

BURNHAM & MORRILL CO., Portland, Maine

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 4

candle! I've been watching that courtship, and anybody knows it's the first anniversary of the couple's meeting. Why, even the ring box and the purple violets from last March are there! Look again, Journalities editor. Sincerely,

MARJORIE P. JACKSON

▶ Somebody was apparently in a romantic daze. But wasn't our groom lucky? Meeting his future wife on his birthday, that is! ED.

It Burns Me Up!

Dorchester, Massachusetts

Why don't they sell baby foods in jars that are graduated, as measuring cups are, to make it easier for mothers to determine the exact portions they are feeding infants? LOUISE KORISKY

Mountlake Terrace, Washington

I like most modern furniture, but why are most chairs, couches and sofas made so deep that people as short as I am must either perch on the edge of the seat or slouch to lean back? More variety, please. If it can be done in Early American, why not in modern? OSTA W. SHERMAN

New Legislation Needed

New York City

Dear Mr. Gould: The How America Lives article which describes the widowhood of Fern Morlang (October JOURNAL) is a moving, graphic report, and happens to have been published during a period when the National Travelers Aid Association, along with other national health and welfare organizations, is spearheading a movement to abolish restrictive residence requirements. Many people in the quest for greater economic security who move from one community to another find themselves in the same predicament as Mrs. Morlang; and they become in fact second-class citizens to the extent that the social protections deemed necessary for others are not available to them.

The final solution will depend upon enlightened public opinion which recognizes an individual's right to live where his best interests dictate. Only then will necessary legislative changes take place which will result in adequate programs for people in need, whether they have lived in the community one month or ten years. Articles such as Suddenly a Young Widow will carry tremendous weight in promoting better understanding of these problems. Sincerely,

LAURIN HYDE
General Director
National Travelers Aid Association

▶ Many, many JOURNAL readers offered help to Mrs. Morlang, and we are glad to report that she and the children are now living in a small town in North Dakota where they are "happier than we have been in any other place." ED.

Note to Printers

Cadiz, Ohio

Dear Sirs: Last week I drove my neighbor and her lovely six-week-old baby to the local pediatrician. She is a very solicitous little mother, and is suffering the pangs of her first-born. This suffering consists of: the baby's ears are too big, feet don't seem to fit, eyes crossed once, doesn't burp on cue.

The baby was no sooner deposited on the examining table till my neighbor started giving the doctor a vivid description of these disturbances plus the cure for them. After each statement he would inquire how did she know what to do, and she would emphasize, "Why, I read about it in Doctor Spock's baby book." After patiently listening to her extoll the virtues and the theories of the good Doctor Spock for several minutes, he finally announced wryly, "My dear, one of these days there will be a misprint in that book and you will read it and die."

Name Withheld

Everyone Needs Praise

Old Bridge, New Jersey

Dear Editors: Some years ago I heard a speaker say, "No human being can live without praise." Whether or not this is scientifically true I have no idea; but I am sure no human being can live happily without praise—or without giving praise.

The other day I watched my nine-month-old son pull himself into a standing position for the first time. His efforts were enormous, and he fell back several times before he finally stood. Each time he looked to me, apparently undecided whether to cry or to begin again. I urged him on with a smile and a few encouraging words, and when he finally achieved his goal he laughed with very evident pride. Naturally I joined in and praised him; it was a wonderful moment!

Currently, our daughter is fighting a battle with jealousy of the baby. Neither of her symptoms, whining and a reluctance to eat at mealtimes, is praiseworthy. But praise in other areas has been of great value. She really enjoys playing with the baby, and when she makes him laugh with her antics, we quickly praise her and tell her she is teaching him to love her.

Getting dressed is second nature to an adult, but to a four-year-old it is an accomplishment. Or when a child does consistently good work in school, we unconsciously come to expect it. It may take real effort to examine each paper and take time for a word of praise. But the dividends are immeasurable in terms of a child's happy face and his eagerness to share other parts of his life with you.

There may be people alive who have never heard a word of praise. I am sure there are a great many who never hear all the praise they deserve, and certainly no one is as happy as he could be if he heard—and said—at least once every day the words "Well done." Sincerely,

BARBARA F. JACOBS

Champion Knitter

Newberg, Oregon

Ladies' Home Journal: Greetings! Several years ago, the LADIES' HOME JOURNAL published a piece on knitting. Up to date, I have sent to Korea 301 pairs of mittens, and I think this is some kind of a record, for a man anyway. My wife taught me to knit while I was a policeman in Ohio, Mittens have arrived!

where we knitted for the Red Cross. Then my boy joined the marines, my old outfit. When he got to Korea, it was in the middle of the winter and he saw the plight of the little children, so he thought I should take up knitting again. It was part time for me, and finally it grew into a hobby. My mittens have won ribbons at several fairs, and I plan to make fifty pairs this year. Very respectfully,

ARNOLD SHERBURNE
72 years

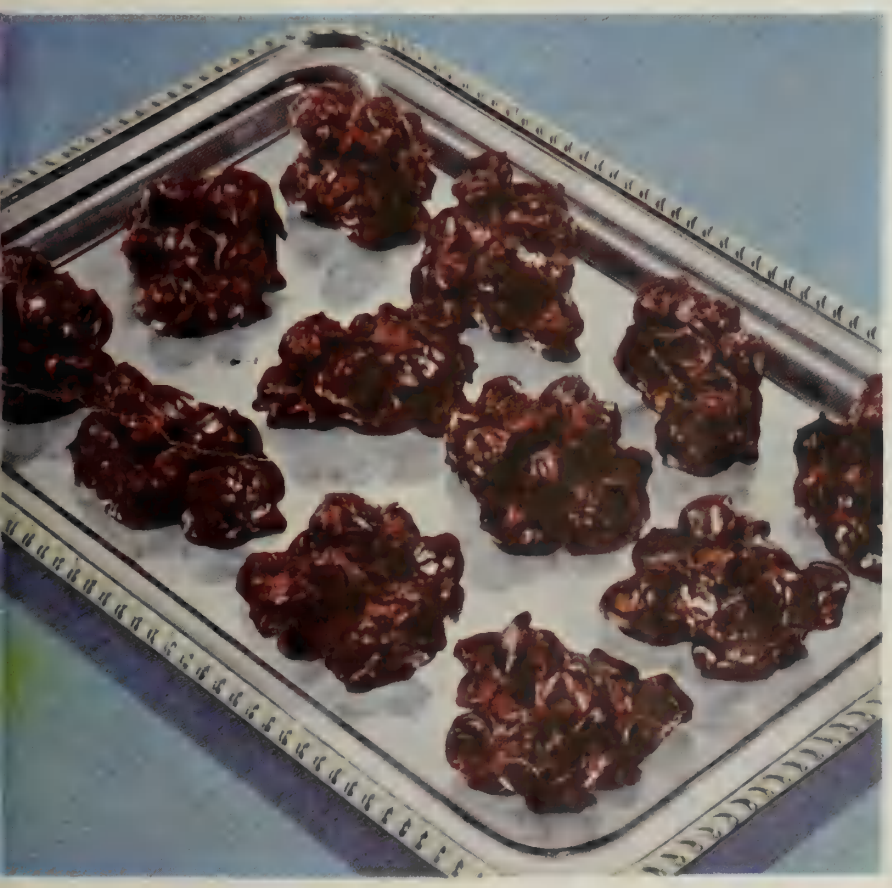
P.S. All my thumbs (which fit either hand) are rainbow thumbs in honor of the Rainbow Division of the great Northwest which fought so gallantly in Wars I and II.

Solving Problems Together

Inglewood, California

Dear Editor: A group of ladies in our town have formed a club to outwit their personal handicaps—visible and invisible. There are no set rules or obligations; we simply meet every week in one another's homes and discuss our problems. (We do not gossip or talk about one another.) We have no dues, but those who can spare a little money will give to a collection plate, and later this money will be used as needed or for some emergency. At present we have thirty active members.

We find strength and faith in a group and have been able to accomplish so many things! Sincerely yours,



MRS. R. H. CUMBERLAND

Marshmallowy, Quick and Easy:

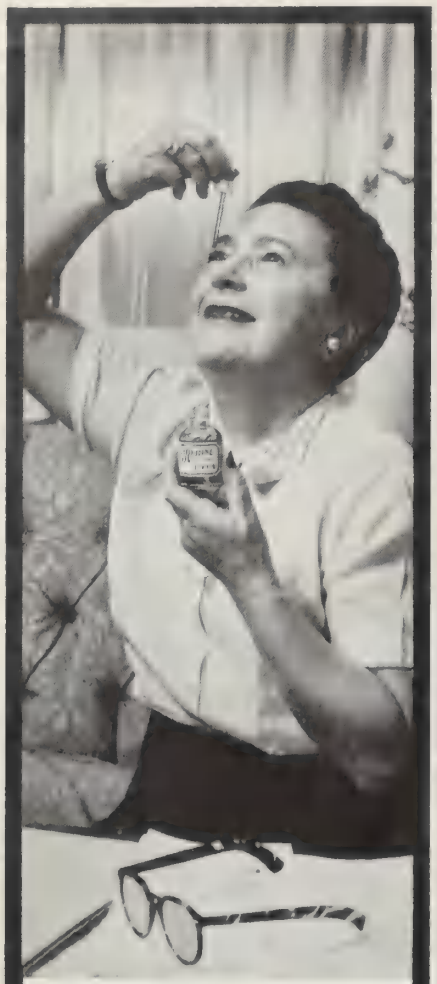
Kraft Recipe-size Marshmallows

You don't have to cut them up! Just measure out these tiny new marshmallows right from the bag. You'll rejoice in the new ease they bring to cooking, salads and desserts—and the way they stay fresh, fluffy and soft.

Float them on Hot Chocolate (use a ready mix, or cocoa, or just heat chocolate milk); mix them into a delicious Marshmallow Gelatin Dessert; and for a dandy candy treat try this easy recipe . . .

Chocolate Marshmallow Clusters recipe:

Melt one 6-ounce bag of semi-sweet chocolate pieces in double boiler. Gradually add 3 tablespoons milk, stirring until mixture is smooth. Cool about 5 minutes, then pour mixture over 2 cups Kraft Miniature Marshmallows in bowl. Toss lightly until marshmallows are coated with chocolate. Place, in clusters, on greased baking sheet. Chill until firm.



Free Recipe Booklet! Write to: Kraft Miniature Marshmallows, P.O. Box 1513, Dept. L1, Chicago 77, Illinois.

10 miniatures equal 1 regular size marshmallow

The only kind that stay soft!

"How I use Murine to rest my eyes"

Emily Kimbrough

Lecturer and Author, whose latest book is "Water, Water Everywhere"

"Whether I'm traveling or writing, my eyes are always on the go. Murine is such a pleasant way to relieve that tired, tense feeling." Your eyes, too, are always on the go . . . straining, working. Give them soothing comfort, pleasantly. Just two drops of Murine in each eye cleanses gently and refreshes. Keep your Murine with the unbreakable dropper handy. Use it regularly — to rest and comfort your eyes any time they feel tired or tense.

MURINE

*for your eyes

The Murine Co., Inc., Chicago, U.S.A.
*Trademarks Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

UNDER COVER

By Bernardine Kielty

© 1953 BY E. P. DUTTON & CO., INC.

"You and your friends in the wholesale rope business!"

Anyone can yodel. You may not think so. But read the pamphlet: "Inhale through the nostrils while counting slowly to twenty; hold your breath while counting to five; then exhale through the mouth while counting to twenty-five. . . . Stand up there in the mountains; sing your yodel; and listen to its warbling echo!" ANYONE CAN YODEL is by Bavarian-Coloradan Magnus Bucher, who runs a school of yodeling. (Big Mountain Press, Denver 10, Colorado.)

●

THE AMERICAN EARTHQUAKE is meat for the fifty-year-olders—a collection of Edmund Wilson's pieces written through the years 1923 to 1940, and much more personal than most earthquakes. Those were the years indeed! And here you get their immediate impact on an articulate off-center contemporary reporter. For the young they will be an eye-opener into the world of their parents' youth. (Doubleday.)

Going farther back, Dorothy Canfield Fisher has written a rare piece of Americana in MEMORIES OF ARLINGTON, VERMONT (Duell, Sloan & Pearce)—affectionate, affirmative, wise.

●

I suppose on the whole one's home expresses one's taste. At any rate, we read that top Nazis, when they got into the money in Germany, furnished their homes in super-duper style.

In UNHEARD WITNESS (Lippincott) Ernst Hanfstaengl says: "After all, these people came from nowhere and the only luxurious furnishings they saw were in the hotels in which they stayed, so they came to accept that style as the height of breeding and sophistication." He goes out of his way to indicate that although he might have been one of them politically, he was socially way upstairs.

Hanfstaengl (Putzi) tried many times to have Oswald Spengler, The Decline of the West philosopher, meet Hitler and the Boys. When they finally did meet, Spengler's comment was succinct and to the point: "Just a lot of pinheads."

At the opposite pole, in taste and politics, is THE EARLY AMERICAN FURNITURE MAKERS, by Thomas H. Ormsbee (McBride)—authoritative comment on the men, their times and their simple enduring products.

●

A novel of great importance to an unfortunately fast-growing number of people is THE TWELFTH STEP (Scribner), written by an active member of Alcoholics Anonymous, Thomas Randall, about six persons with drinking problems who meet at a drying-out hospital. The author believes that these true biographical stories can be most honestly presented in fiction form.

●

THE PICTURE HISTORY OF PAINTING (Harry N. Abrams, Inc., $15.00) is a handsome, 11″x14″, 320-page book for both art lovers and those with a beginning interest in art history. In color and black and white, every period of painting, from cave to modern, is simply illustrated.

●

Van Wyck Brooks, in some easygoing informal jottings (FROM A WRITER'S NOTEBOOK—Dutton) tells us that although he has had to read on an average of six or seven hours a day for the past twenty years, he still has read fewer than 6000 books—less than a book a day. Yet Lawrence of Arabia boasted that he read 40,000 books while at Oxford; Thomas Wolfe intimated that he'd read a good 20,000; and Hitler was said to have read 7000 military books. "How tiresome!" mutters Mr. Brooks. "And how completely untrue!"

H. L. Mencken used to call such people "the bibliobibuli"—"drunk on books, wandering through this most diverting and stimulating of worlds in a haze, seeing nothing and hearing nothing."

●

THACKERAY: THE AGE OF WISDOM (1847–1863) is a magnificent portrait of that urbane, hard-working novelist—fond father, clubman, sometime social lion, true Bohemian; and a most diverting re-creation of London in those prosperous years of spreading empire. This is the second and final volume of Gordon Ray's fine biography (McGraw-Hill). Far far better than THE TITANS, André Maurois' new book on the three Dumases.

●

Weather: snow followed by little boys with sleds.

For those long winter evenings—should you be left home in a speculative mood—read Dorothy Thompson's THE COURAGE TO BE HAPPY (Houghton, Mifflin). This is a gallant, encouraging, wise book that has more to give to women, I'd say, than that (also very good) best seller of yesterday, Anne Lindbergh's Gift From the Sea. Like that book, it is addressed to women, but in a clearer voice and with a more immediate usable philosophy.

Or dip into TALENTS AND GENIUSES Oxford), another delicious sample of Gilbert Highet's lighthearted scholarly humor, running this time from Bach to Buddhism, from Hadrian to Hollywood, from cave dweller to birds.

And speaking of cave dwellers: New York City, long scoffed at as City of Cliff Dwellers, has been maligned. Statistics show that 40 per cent (by far the largest amount) of residential acreage in the city is occupied by one-family detached homes surrounded by lawn and/or garden, and that 15.1 per cent of the city is vacant land—not streets, or homes, or park!

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

GALLIVAN

"Got into the wrong house yesterday—best meal I've had in months."

●

There are two books, out some months ago, that I cannot let go unmentioned. The first, ISLAM INFLAMED, by James Morris (Pantheon), is the book to read if you really want to know about the Middle East. The other is THE WORLD OF JOHN McNULTY (Harper) stories of the late and deeply lamented John McNulty—the voice of New York as he heard it on the old Bowery, in a ward at Bellevue, in a back hall. How warm these stories are! How understanding of the old codgers in Mat's saloon! How funny and sad and touching!

Slim figures

go with the Light refreshment

ROUND the rink or round the town, today's modern woman cuts a mighty pretty figure. Her trim, slim good looks tell you she's all for the modern trend toward lighter food and drink.

Pepsi-Cola fits right in with this sensible diet. For today's Pepsi, reduced in calories, refreshes without filling. Never heavy, never too sweet, Pepsi is the modern, the light refreshment. Have a Pepsi.

PEPSI-COLA

"Pepsi, please"

to refresh without filling

The danger in a "harmless flirtation"

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

THE MIDDLE-AGED "CRUSH"

As we all know, so-called "crushes" are common in adolescence. The bemused teenager may choose for an idol a classmate or football star, or someone totally inaccessible—a handsome teacher, the glamorous college roommate of an older brother or sister, or some celebrity still more remote. The object of all this adulation may be quite unaware of it, still less a participant.

We all know, too, that a man in or near his forties often becomes highly susceptible to the attractions of a woman other than his wife. But unless there has been some deep (though perhaps unrecognized) dissatisfaction in his own marriage, unless his overtures are accepted and encouraged by the other woman, and unless his wife makes an issue of it, his infatuation rarely amounts to anything more than a brief interlude of feeling himself a gay blade and a romantic figure.

Little if any attention is paid to wives' crushes. We are not speaking here of the extramarital affair, involving deep and lasting emotion, often physical intimacy, and perhaps the dissolution of the marriage. We are referring to a phenomenon which in its early stages is much more akin to the adolescent's infatuation. But crushes do occur among wives, as our research clearly demonstrates, and are far more likely to cause trouble among mature married women than among schoolgirls who often know in their hearts that what they feel isn't really love.

A wife's crush may start as nothing more than a mild flirtation, and usually she intends to limit the episode to just that. But too often it progresses to deeper involvement and perhaps ultimately to sexual intimacy. About one wife in three has been unfaithful to her husband by the time she reaches age 45. Whether or not the affair breaks up the marriage, her infidelity is apt to weigh heavily on her conscience, burden her with guilt and seriously disturb her serenity.

Most wives do not consider their extramarital activity an enduring alliance, since most of them do not expect to continue it. (Three fourths, according to Kinsey, and our findings point in the same direction.) Further, our research among several thousand college wives shows that a fourth of those who have had extreme crushes without sexual intimacy and half of those who have been physically unfaithful now regret that they ever became involved with another man.

Leaving aside questions of morality, ethics or religion, the wife who is toying with the idea of a "crush" may well ask herself whether she really wants to become or continue involved, and so invite a definite flirtation or a serious affair. She might check these points:

If you frankly admitted to your husband that you had a crush on someone, how would he react?

If he made the same admission, how would you feel?

If the crush becomes more than that, are you prepared to divorce him and marry the other man?

Would you want your children to know that you were interested in a man not your husband?

If the other man tired of the situation before you, would you retain your self-respect?

In general, do you strongly disapprove of infidelity or other types of involvement between a married woman and a man not her husband?

Does your ideal of the husband-wife relationship include a crush on an outsider for either?

Unless you can honestly say yes on each point, you'd better seek your satisfactions within the framework of marriage.

WAS OUR MARRIAGE A MISTAKE?

The case to be discussed here is not yet closed, but I have high hopes that it will be in a few months, with a happy ending. Had Mary consulted me while she was still single, our findings concerning her personality, attitudes and goals in life might have convinced her that she would be wise to postpone marriage, at least until she was better acquainted with the man who is now her husband. But because she is intelligent, opposed to divorce, and flexible enough to acknowledge and try to overcome her own shortcomings, I know she will make a sincere effort to achieve a successful marriage. Without extremely bad luck, and with the co-operation of her husband, she will do so.

Here are the personal statistics, as reported in her letter asking for an appointment. She is 26, a college graduate, with a good job as a teacher, which she continued to hold after marriage. Howard, her husband, is also a college graduate, and an engineer. His work takes him away frequently. They had been married four months.

When she came to see me, she said, "I'm independent by nature, and I like earning my own living. I'd really never thought much about marriage. I met Howard two years ago and we started dating. We had fun together, and wrote friendly letters while he was in the service. When he came back toward the end of last summer, I let him pressure me into getting married.

"I think I love him, and we do get along well sexually, but we have so many things not in common. He makes no effort to be nice to my friends, but sticks to his own—a hard-drinking crew, and I think he drinks too much himself.

"I can't discuss our problem with him—he walks out. He is as intelligent as I am, but he has no cultural interests, so we can't share much, since we don't like the same people. Sometimes he seems almost crude; for instance, his table manners annoy me to the point where he says I nag him—and I probably do. Maybe we're just plain incompatible. Maybe I don't really love him—I suppose if I loved him enough, I'd learn to put up with his ways and his friends. But I've told him I'd leave him if he kept up the drinking."

I did little during this recital beyond saying "I see," or offering to light the cigarettes which she chain-smoked. I did ask one question—how long had she lived in the same community and been free to date before they were married? The answer was a little over two months.

When she returned for her next conference, she asked for the conclusions drawn from the several tests we had given her. They were not very encouraging; in fact, they portrayed a woman far more likely to be an unhappy than a happy wife unless she made a special effort. She was dominant, set in her ways, far more interested in an outside job than in a home and children at present, not at all domestically inclined, and reluctant to compromise.

These and other findings painted a gloomy picture, but not a hopeless one. Further, as I pointed out, she has two assets in trying to overcome her handicaps (for that is what they amount to) and improve her marriage: she is willing to try, and her sexual relationship with her husband is satisfactory. This latter aspect can be enormously helpful, so long as she uses it to promote understanding, harmony, a sense of well-being, rather than as a punishment or reward (as she had done).

As we talked, she realized that she hadn't given their marriage a fair trial. The period of their acquaintance, courtship and engagement was so short that she really hadn't known her husband well when they were married. And now, after only four months of marriage, she was ready to break the most important contract of her life.

Marriage, by custom, ceremony and solemn agreement, is a contract "for better or worse." This means that each partner accepts the other for what he or she is. Unsuspected flaws will be discovered—but so will hidden virtues. Six months is the absolute minimum of time required before a marriage honestly undertaken can be reasonably evaluated—and a considerably longer period is necessary if the couple are frequently separated due to job requirements or other circumstances.

DO YOU AGREE?

Does infidelity usually mean that the person no longer loves the mate?

One instance, no; but continuing or repeated affairs, yes.

ASK YOURSELF:

Am I Invulnerable?

Few wives deliberately invite crushes, romances or other extramarital diversions, but the fact remains that many women do get involved every year. Answer the following questions with an honest "Yes" or "No" to see how crushproof you are. If you can't be sure, use a question mark.

Do You:

1. Often feel tense and dissatisfied?
2. Consider yourself sensitive?
3. Find that time drags heavily?
4. Sometimes wish you were single again?
5. Need a great deal of praise?
6. Enjoy being with men more than women?
7. Feel released and warm when you drink?
8. Believe that mild flirting is harmless?

Is Your Husband:

9. Too busy to spend time with you?
10. Quite attentive to other women?
11. Temperamental, or hard to live with?
12. Critical of you on many counts?
13. Jealous or suspicious at times?
14. No longer very loving or appreciative?

Credit yourself with 2 points for each "No" and 1 point for each question mark. If your total score is 23 or more, you are probably crushproof (the average happy wife scores 19 or 20). But if your score is 13 or less, and if you have been married seven years or longer, there is always a chance that if you meet the right man you might have a real problem. Wouldn't it be wiser to use your "Yes" answers as warnings to seek improvement in your marriage?

ut of the blue . . . the whitest, brightest nylon ever!

, keep your nylons bright the easy —with new La France. It's detergent, brightener and bluing all in one box.

La France prevents "nylon gray". . . actually keeps new nylon new-looking!

Brightens older nylons, too! La France washes away "grayness." Brings back the brightness and whiteness in just five washings. And it won't let fabric "yellow" as most bleaches will. Safe for colored fabrics, too.

P.S. La France is perfect for all your family wash, too . . . no special bluing rinse needed. Another fine product of General Foods.

New formula La France is detergent, nylon brightener and bluing all in one.

MARTHA HYER co-starring in "MY MAN GODFREY"

A UNIVERSAL-INTERNATIONAL PICTURE IN EASTMAN COLOR AND CINEMASCOPE

...natural gentleness you can count on, mildness you can believe in...four lovely new pastel colors...
and the promise of a soft smooth complexion...

THAT'S THE BEAUTY OF LUX

LUX can do as much for you as it does for Martha Hyer because above all Lux is naturally gentle.

Whether you choose one of the lovely new pastels or white Lux, you always get this same natural gentleness. And only gentle care every day is good enough for your complexion.

Lux has a rich but delicate Cosmetic Lather that cleanses thoroughly . . . rinses away quickly . . . leaves your skin soft and smooth. Delightful fragrance, too . . . and you have four new pastels to choose from! Lux . . . the proven beauty care of 9 out of 10 Hollywood stars . . . and used by more beautiful women all over the world than any other complexion bar. Do you use it?

Lever Brothers unconditionally guarantees complete satisfaction with Lux—or money back.

Journal ABOUT TOWN

Gossip about people you know,
editors you like,
and what goes on in New York

FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

In January, 1908, Georgia went dry and a handful of New York society women were seen smoking near the opera. The city at once passed an ordinance making it illegal for women to smoke. "Will the ladies rebel?" wondered the New York Times. People talked about the depression and the new "trial marriages"; I Hear You Calling Me was a hit, and America's great composer, Edward MacDowell, died.

Hundreds of readers wrote to the* JOURNAL following an article urging that children be told "the mystery of life" by the age of six or seven. "Why not hold to the stork theory, on which so many of us were brought up?" asks a woman in the January, 1908, JOURNAL. *"Because it is a lie," replied Editor Bok.

Mrs. Elizabeth Scott advises ministers' wives: "Keep out of the church kitchen. Keep out of church begging. Keep out of the church choir."

Health notes: "If you fear bronchitis, rub the chest with turpentine and sweet oil. Some skins can't take this."

"Lumbago: A good old-fashioned ironing with a hot flatiron works like magic. Several thicknesses of flannel are laid on the victim's back first."

"Angelica: You were indeed a foolish girl to bleach your hair. Do not add to your folly by dyeing it."

"The new short cuffed men's trousers revealing the ankles and flapping at every step like Mercury's wings are ridiculous," believes the* JOURNAL'S *fashion editor. "Remember, 'The higher the trousers, the fewer the brains.'"

"I am twenty years old and engaged to a man of fifty-five. Would it be proper to go to dances with his son, who is two years my senior?" writes Anxious. Answer: "Very ill-advised."

"A pretty bridal petticoat is white brocaded satin with deep flounces to the floor of white Spanish lace."

"Clothespins will keep the windows from rattling if they are split in two and used as wedges."

"Flour will clean the white bearskin coats that so many little children wear in winter."

Believes Mrs. Rorer: "A glass of whipped cream nicely seasoned finishes a dinner without taxing the digestion."

FRANK E. HALL

A beautiful labor of love, and some of the laborers (clockwise from lower left): Mrs. Frederick Chatfield, Jr.; Mrs. William H. Chatfield; Mrs. John F. Kraft, Jr.; Mrs. Augustus K. Oliver; Mrs. Bernard S. Horne; Mrs. Horace W. Reid; Mrs. Perrin March; Mrs. John Berdan; Mrs. Richard R. Deupree, Jr.; Mrs. Bennett Oliver; Mrs. George Ketchum; Mrs. John D. Evans; Mrs. John F. Walton, Jr.

The National Cathedral in Washington comes closer, perhaps, to being interdenominational than many places of worship in the U.S.A., and we were lucky to have a photographer there the day the High Altar rug was put in place and most of the women who helped to make it were there to stand beside it.

We were tipped off by the woman who is carrying on the whole many-sided Cathedral needlework project, true to the Middle Ages tradition of the famous European cathedrals—Mrs. George A. Garrett, a friend of the Goulds. Just now we've been talking to Mrs. John F. Walton, Jr., in Pittsburgh, who had charge of making the altar rug (10′ x 20′ in 22 pieces), which glows like a stained-glass window.

"I just called everyone I knew in Pittsburgh who was good at needlework," Mrs. W. told us, "twenty-two women . . . a few thought the colors were going to be too bright . . . some never saw each other . . . only I knew how things were going . . . putting the pieces together was the hardest . . . no, three of the group were Presbyterians, I am myself. The rest were Episcopalians. Why, any church can do the same."

Somewhere behind the scenes of almost everything we deal with daily here in the affairs of fashion, beauty, food, furnishings, houses, gardens, a story can be uncovered. For instance, a vital ingredient in the tops of strapless evening dresses, play clothes, bathing suits, and the bras worn with these glamour fashions, are, of course, the stays. But did you know that these involve 2½ million turkeys a year? Well, neither did Ruth Mary Packard until she was visited here at the Workshop by Charles E. Whalen, president of the venerable firm which became, back in 1890, the first to fabricate a strapless bra with turkey quill, or featherbone, as they called it. They use 10,000,000 quills a year. Only four from a turkey, Mr. Whalen told Ruth Mary, are strong enough and long enough for the process that produces the featherbone fabric which helps adapt the feminine figure to changing fashions. "We have a few of those 1890 bras at the shop," he informed our fashion assistant. "But how different they seem today, in both size and silhouette!"

In their continual search for new things and ideas, somebody on the magazine by now must have stopped in at every shop, store, studio or bazaar of interest in town—none more endearing or rewarding than one Corinna Wildman found the other day, called the Elder Craftsmen Shop. Everything in it is made by men and women over sixty. A lady of ninety knits entrancing dolls; an ex-streetcar conductor makes exquisite inlaid boxes; a retired banker, beautiful leather luggage. Prices from 35 cents for party favors to $400 for violins by a seventy-year-old craftsman. But write to them: 850 Lexington Avenue, New York 21.

It seems we missed a trick when we were running Scent of Cloves, by Norah Lofts, which has now been published in book form, its jacket impregnated, you might have known, with the scent of cloves, in case you've noticed a queer odor in the bookstores lately. "If this starts a trend, they'll have to introduce a new standing for books," a friend of ours at Doubleday phoned to say: "the best-smeller list."

It is one of Sandra Heath's attractive assignments to arrange flowers in the Entertainment Room; so, learning last fall that one of the next day's visitors to the Workshop would be Augusta de Zoeta, tulip emissary from the Netherlands, Sandra produced an especially striking tulip arrangement, though the season for fresh tulip flowers could hardly have been less in her favor. Augusta turned up fresh and pretty as a spring tulip in her favorite Volendam costume, observing that Sandra wore her hair in a Dutch bob, too, and stopping startled at the door to the Entertainment Room to see such an unexpected tulip display. "Why, we don't even have them now in Holland!" she cried.

ABBOT MILLS

Holland's Augusta de Zoeta (left) and the Journal's Sandra Heath.

"How did you do it?" So Sandra explained about the artificial-flower department at our big Fifth Avenue 5-and-10. "The hardest thing to explain," Sandra told us, "was why in a five-and-ten-cent store tulips should be a dollar apiece."

Eugenie d'Arsi (left) displays Elder Craftsmen work to Corinna Wildman.

ABBOT MILLS

THE

Her face was serene, with only the palest pink flush in her cheeks
to tell of the excitement inside.
"I hope the children haven't bothered you,"
Joss said.

GREENGAGE SUMMER

BY RUMER GODDEN

Who has the advantage in a duel of love . . .
the practiced charmer or the one who does not even know that he—or she—can be wounded? . . .
Beginning a new serial in three parts.

On and off, all that hot French August, we made ourselves ill from eating the greengages. Joss and I felt guilty; we were still at the age when we thought being greedy was a childish fault. Hester of course was quite unabashed; Will—though he was called Willmouse then—and Vicky were too small to reach any but the lowest branches, but they found fruit fallen in the grass; we were all strictly forbidden to climb the trees.

The greengages had a pale-blue bloom, especially in the shade, but in the sun the flesh showed amber through the clear green skin; if it was cracked, the juice was doubly warm and sweet. Coming from the streets and small front gardens of Southstone, we had not been let loose in an orchard before; it was no wonder we ate too much. Ever afterward, in our family, we called that the greengage summer.

"You are the one who should write this," I told Joss; "it happened chiefly to you," but Joss shut that out as she always shuts out things, or shuts them in so that no one can guess.

"You are the one who likes words," said Joss. "Besides," and she paused, "it happened as much to you."

I did not answer that. I am grown up now—or almost grown up.

"And we still can't get over it!" said Joss.

"Most people don't have . . . that . . . in thirty or forty years," I said in defense.

"Most people don't have it at all," said Joss.

If I stop what I am doing for a moment, or in any time when I am quiet, in those cracks in the night that have been with me ever since when I cannot sleep and thoughts seep in, I am back; I can smell the Les Oeillets smells of hot dust and cool plaster walls, of jessamine and box leaves in the sun, of dew in the long grass; the smell that filled house and garden, of M. Armand's cooking and the house's own smell of damp linen, or furniture polish, and always, a little, of drains. I can hear the sounds that seem to belong only to Les Oeillets: the patter of the poplar trees along the courtyard wall; of a tap running in the kitchen, mixed with the sound of high French voices; of the faint noise of the town and, near, the plop of a fish or of a greengage falling.

"But you were glad enough to come back," said Uncle William.

"We never came back," said Joss.

The odd thing was, when that time was over we—Joss and I—were still sixteen and thirteen, the ages we had been when we arrived on that stifling hot evening at the beginning of August. We were mother, Joss, I—Cecil—Hester and the Littles, Willmouse and Vicky. It must have been nine o'clock.

There had been no taxis at the station, but we found a porter who would take our suitcases on a handcart.

It was beginning to be dusk when our little procession left the station. The handcart bumped over cobbles that, even though we had not walked on cobbles before, we knew were unmistakably French.

Mother gave a small moan each time the porter turned into another street. It seemed a long way, and by the time we came to the hotel gates lamplight was showing in the houses and most of the doors were shut. At Les Oeillets every night at nine o'clock the dogs were let loose and the outer gates closed. We had to wait while the porter rang the bell.

It clanged. There was a deep barking. We did not know Rex and Rita then, but could tell it was a big dog's bark. Two voices commanded it to stop, a woman's, shrill, and a man's—or a boy's talking like a man; that was a good guess, for it was a large boy who appeared. He had on a white apron—we saw it glimmering toward us as he bent forward to pull the bolt; he held the gate open to let us pass. He was dirty and untidy and he did not smile.

Then we went into the hotel and, "Good heavens! An orphanage!" said Eliot.

Afterward he apologized for that. "But you were all wearing gray flannel," he said. "Why were you wearing gray flannel?"

Hester looked at him. "Perhaps you haven't been in England for a long time," she said gently. "Those were our school clothes."

In England we—except Joss—had been proud of them. There are two sorts of families: for one a school uniform is a step down, the feeling of being like everybody else; for the other that feeling is an achievement, the uniform a better, more complete set of clothes than any worn before. We belonged to the second category.

Of course a great many things happened before Eliot said that about the orphanage; he did not even come in until later; but it was Eliot whom we remember of that first evening.

"When he came, there was no more dreadfulness," said Hester, but I had to add, "Except the dreadfulness."

"What! Only two passports?" said Mlle. Zizi when I took ours to the office next morning.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 58

Copyright © 1957 by Rumer Godden

CATCH AS CATCH CAN

She was the loveliest girl he had ever seen. She wanted his help. But was she truly in danger—or was she danger itself?

By FRANCES and RICHARD LOCKRIDGE

It started with little things, with things of no real significance. It started with a silk robe cut to mold the slender body of a size-ten girl, and with an unexpected salutation on a hastily written note; with a fall suit taken, or worn, on a hot summer evening; and with a telephone call abruptly ended. For Linda Parks, at any rate, it started with such things, all of them too trivial to mention.

For Linda Parks—twenty-two years old, with black hair and deep dark eyes and a face which tapered softly from broad forehead to delicate chin—it began at ten minutes before six on the evening of Thursday, the twenty-sixth of July. It began when, on the fourth-floor landing of a house in Morton Street (Borough of Manhattan, City of New York), she shifted a bag of groceries from her right arm to her left and tried a doorknob with her right hand. She found the door unlocked, which was as she had expected, and pushed it open and went into a hot, narrow room and said "Hi" in a clear, cool voice. When she was unanswered, she said "Hi" again, this time more loudly. It then became apparent she was talking to herself.

She went to a curtained recess in which a gas plate stood on top of an electric refrigerator, next a small sink, and put the bag—which contained four lamb chops, a package of frozen broccoli, a head of lettuce and a quart of milk—on top of the gas plate.There was no use saying "Hi" again, since it was evident that Joyce was somewhere else. This was not according to plan.

It had been Joyce who, when Linda went out that hot morning, had suggested they eat "home" that evening. For an instant the word "home" flickered on the surface of Linda's mind, because home was a long way off—home was a big house, with trees around it, on the outskirts of Centerview, Iowa. No, it isn't, her mind flickered back. "Home," now, is right here. Be it ever so stifling. "Something thinning," Joyce had said. "Lamb chops?"

"I'll bring them," Linda said, and went out into Manhattan's heat, a small and lovely girl who looked cool in spite of everything. She spent the day sitting in offices, in being told they were not casting; in hearing that there might be something next week; in lunching on a tuna-salad sandwich in a mercifully cool drugstore.

Linda had brought the lamb chops and the broccoli. And, apparently, Joyce Holbrook had changed her plans—had gone out without locking the door, which wasn't particularly like her. Stood up, Linda thought to herself. With lamb chops. But she thought this without resentment. Joyce would pay for her two lamb chops, her half of the broccoli and lettuce and milk, and beyond that there was no obligation. They shared an apartment to save money, not to join forces. They had known each other two weeks and three days. Nobody needed to check in, or check out. If something came up—date, audition, screen test (and would that be something!)—whatever came up came first.

Linda put the food in the refrigerator, got out a Coke and carried it to the living room, where windows looked down on Morton Street.

She turned on a small electric fan and sat in front of it, and the fan blew a sheet of paper into her lap. She recognized the handwriting. Joyce had, after all, checked out. She read:

"Dear Lindy: Gone to the country for the weekend with the Nicholses. Remember the Nicholses? See you Monday."

So that's that, Linda thought, and a lucky girl she is. Momentarily she thought of the country, trees and grass and coolness.

She thought, Who are the Nicholses, that I should remember them? The only place she and Joyce had been together during the two weeks of their acquaintance had been an amorphous party and it was not, she thought, a party given by "the Nicholses." Whoever they might be. Well, Joyce thought she knew the Nicholses. Probably she had met them at the party, where she had met so many, so casually. A wiry, sandy-haired man named Bowen who did something at the district attorney's office; a black-haired man named Jenks who was associated with an agent. (That came closer home.) Assorted males and females, with assorted names. She didn't remember anybody named Nichols of whom, now, Joyce seemed rather to be making a point.

Again she shook her head over the Nicholses, who seemed to have been lugged in. And why, she thought—but still half thought—did she call me "Lindy"? Nobody does; she never did before.

It was too trivial a matter to pursue. She thought of a shower, fresh clothes. The shower was wonderful. She toweled, went to the closet shared with Joyce and reached in for her robe—the robe of yellow silk, cut to mold the slim body of a size-ten girl.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 79

THE JOURNAL'S
COMPLETE-IN-ONE-ISSUE CONDENSED NOVEL

© 1957 by Frances and Richard Lockridge

CATCH AS CATCH CAN
is soon to be published in book form by J. B. Lippincott Co.

Joyce was gone.

Joyce had taken a heavy tweed suit on the hottest day of summer.

"Something's wrong," Linda thought.

"Something I don't understand is happening."

Connie was pretty and witty . . .
but she wasn't very wise until Mrs. Mullany taught her the lesson of the lemon pie.

"Connie,
Connie,
Connie," he said,
as if I were warmth,
as if I were comfort,
as if I were love.

ANDS are TO LOVE

By MARY CHURCH

I think the loneliest morning in the world is the morning you wake up on the sofa bed in the study because you quarreled with your husband the night before.

I'd always thought it was supposed to be the husband who slept in the guest room, but after being perfectly horrid to me, Greg just went to bed in our bed in our bedroom. I had no choice but to join him, which I certainly wasn't going to do even though I longed to have him hug me, or take to the sofa bed, which I didn't want to get into all by myself, but I did.

So there I was on a morning in spring. The new-earth smell was coming in at the window. The romantic birds were turning my heart over with their singing, but no one sang any love song to me. What woke me up was the sound of my husband of less than a year starting our car in the carport.

I waited breathless, on my elbows, hoping he wouldn't leave, but he did. I heard the car slide out of the driveway and down the street. He hadn't apologized. He'd meant what he'd said the night before. He'd left the house without saying, "Connie, I love you." It was obviously the end of our marriage.

I put my head down into the pillow and cried until I was cold and hungry and as still as a dead thing. However, I didn't die, so there was nothing to do but get up.

I showered, put on orange tapered slacks with shoes to match and a striped jersey still new from my trousseau, and went out to our dream kitchen.

There it stood in all its glory—the built-in oven, the sink in the middle of the room with a faucet like a swan's neck bending over it, yellow tile counters, and all. I looked at it with loathing. The shine of it had bedazzled Greg, and turned him, in a few short months, from a romantic perfect husband into a married man who wanted a cook more than anything else in the world.

When we were first married and lived in his bachelor apartment and both of us worked, our life together had been exactly as I had dreamed that it would be.

We had paid almost no attention to domesticity. We'd gone to concerts and restaurants and danced. We were gay and happy and alive and in love.

And then we bought this house and Greg made me leave my job and little by little he had utterly changed, until last night our marriage had just blown apart.

"Why have a kitchen like this," he'd hollered at me, "if you don't intend to cook in it?" And this just as we'd finished dinner. "I'm hungry," he said.

"You're emotional," I said. "Let's go in the living room and listen to records."

You'd have thought I'd said something indecent. He became very angry, very unreasonable, very awful. Just thinking about that long, unlovely quarrel that had begun really from the very minute that he'd come home and continued on so dreadfully, I turned absolutely cold.

Quickly, before I could start crying again, I made myself some instant coffee, and mixed some frozen orange juice, and had wheat germ with skim milk—perfectly nourishing.

And so was the dinner I had last night—perfectly nourishing. I had tomato juice, chilled. Those turkey dinners that come all ready on a plate, with two slices of turkey, peas and potatoes. Also, I had nice cottage cheese and celery. For dessert, peaches and coffee.

And I'd been having dinners like it for weeks—months. Why he should go all apart over it, I couldn't think.

When Muriel Reeves, my best friend, and I were in college, we'd taken one course together in home economics—cooking. Our teacher was a woman who was everything Muriel and I wanted to be. Her name was Mrs. Cutler. She was thin and supple and fresh and crisp, and she sparkled with excitement and a zest for living. We were sure she had a strangle hold on love and joy.

The very first day in class she said, "Other domestic-science teachers may teach you to bake cake, pie and lumpy date puddings. I will not. Such monstrosities of culinary art will soon be as forgotten as gaslights. They make the people who eat them fat, and the women who bake them household drudges."

It was as if a clean wind had blown all the cobwebs out of cooking.

"I will teach you," she said, "to cook with a minimum of effort, to plan meals that nourish and that is all. Don't smother the nice young men you will marry," she said, "with fattening confections. Challenge them with the freshness of your personalities made possible by the leisure time you will have if you resist emotionally charged food."

Mrs. Cutler had to leave in the middle of the term. We heard that she had gone to Reno for a divorce, but we didn't believe it. The Mrs. Downey who took her place leaned to pie and roast beef with gravy and split-pea soup.

Muriel and I both dropped the course. We figured we knew all we needed to know about cooking, and we had other, more exciting things to do.

A year before I married Greg, Muriel married Johnny Hooper. They flew out to California to live. Johnny is a brain about jet planes, and I knew that he, at least, would not be old-fashioned about food.

As I finished breakfast, I decided to call Muriel. Unfortunately, I forgot about the time difference, and I called her at five o'clock in the morning her time.

When she finally woke up enough to know who I was, she became alarmed and emotional and stayed that way during the whole conversation. "Connie!" she screamed. "What's

CONTINUED ON PAGE 116

The Ordeal of Lady Godiva

By GWEN WALKER

"She is too small,"
the Group said,
"she is too young,
she cries too easy."
Penny was willing to do anything to prove them wrong.

"So this is the baby,"
people were always saying, supposing she loved to be treated like an outsized doll.
Penny despised their opinion.

I'm an egg, waiting to be hatched, Penny thought, lying in her bed, waiting for dawn. I'm an egg. I'm an egg. It made a lovely tune, smooth and secret, impenetrable. She held the covers very close beneath her chin so that not even a breath of air could get in and touch her awake, and she squeezed her eyelids closed against whatever light might be. In the warm dark hiding place of herself she snuggled, holding off revelation. But a singing joy of expectation started at the pit of her stomach and bubbled up through her little chest and swelled her throat so that she could not bear it, but must sit bolt upright, throw back the covers, open her eyes wide, and whisper the miracle which today would bring, "Godiva, the Lady Godiva."

The instant she had said it she was sorry, and clapped her hands over her traitor mouth while her big eyes scouted the room to see if her indiscretion had been noted. But Betsy was still asleep in her bed, a little round unstirring lump, and all the doors were closed—the hall door, the closet door, the folding bamboo screen which divided her room from Janet's at night. She was undiscovered.

In the dim light the clock on the dresser said five o'clock with its hands and numbers green as witches' eyes. Before Penny had learned to tell time she had been afraid of the night face of the clock, but now she could read it she conquered it each time she looked at it, and so held it at bay. Five o'clock meant nobody would be stirring in the house for an hour. Slowly, reluctantly she returned to her pillow, folded her arms beneath her head and stared at the ceiling. She thought of how Janet and Peter had argued about this betweentime of day. Peter said it was dark light, and that should have ended it because he was the oldest, a boy of twelve, and redheaded. Janet said light dark. Penny would have liked to agree with Peter, but everybody, even grownups, said Janet was exceptionally bright, so most likely she was right.

Would they never wake? She let her mind creep down the hall and peer into the bedrooms. First were her parents, Professor and Missy, in the big old mahogany four-poster, Professor looking very young in his sleep without his pince-nez, with the wisps that were left of his pale red hair sticking up like a baby's, and Missy quite alien with the gay smile wiped off her face and her brown curls tied up in a scarlet nylon sack. Next was the boys' room, with Peter hanging half out of his bunk and eleven-year-old Terry lying still as a statue, "keeping his secret," as Missy said, for his slim pale face was so dominated by his brilliant brown eyes that he had only to close them to be hidden. Peter was the bold one, always the first to walk the barn ridgepole or ride the wildest horse, coming home from school time and again with a black eye or a torn jacket. Terry was a dreamer, full of schemes and lovely fancies. Then there was Janet in her alcove beyond the bamboo screen, her soft brown braids always neat, her sweet round face grave and thoughtful, her quick little brown hands always doing things right, and Betsy across the room with a gypsy look and a gypsy's gay free laugh.

"Omnia Gallsworthy divisa est in partes tres," Peter had said last summer. He was joking, showing off the Latin he had learned from his private tutor, a college student the Professor wanted to help without hurting his pride. But he meant it, too, and Penny had seen the other children look at one another with their secret look. The Gallsworthy family was divided into three parts. There were Parents—Professor and Missy; the Group—Peter, Terry, Janet and Betsy, stairsteps, only a year apart; and then Penny, three years after the last of them, only six, the baby.

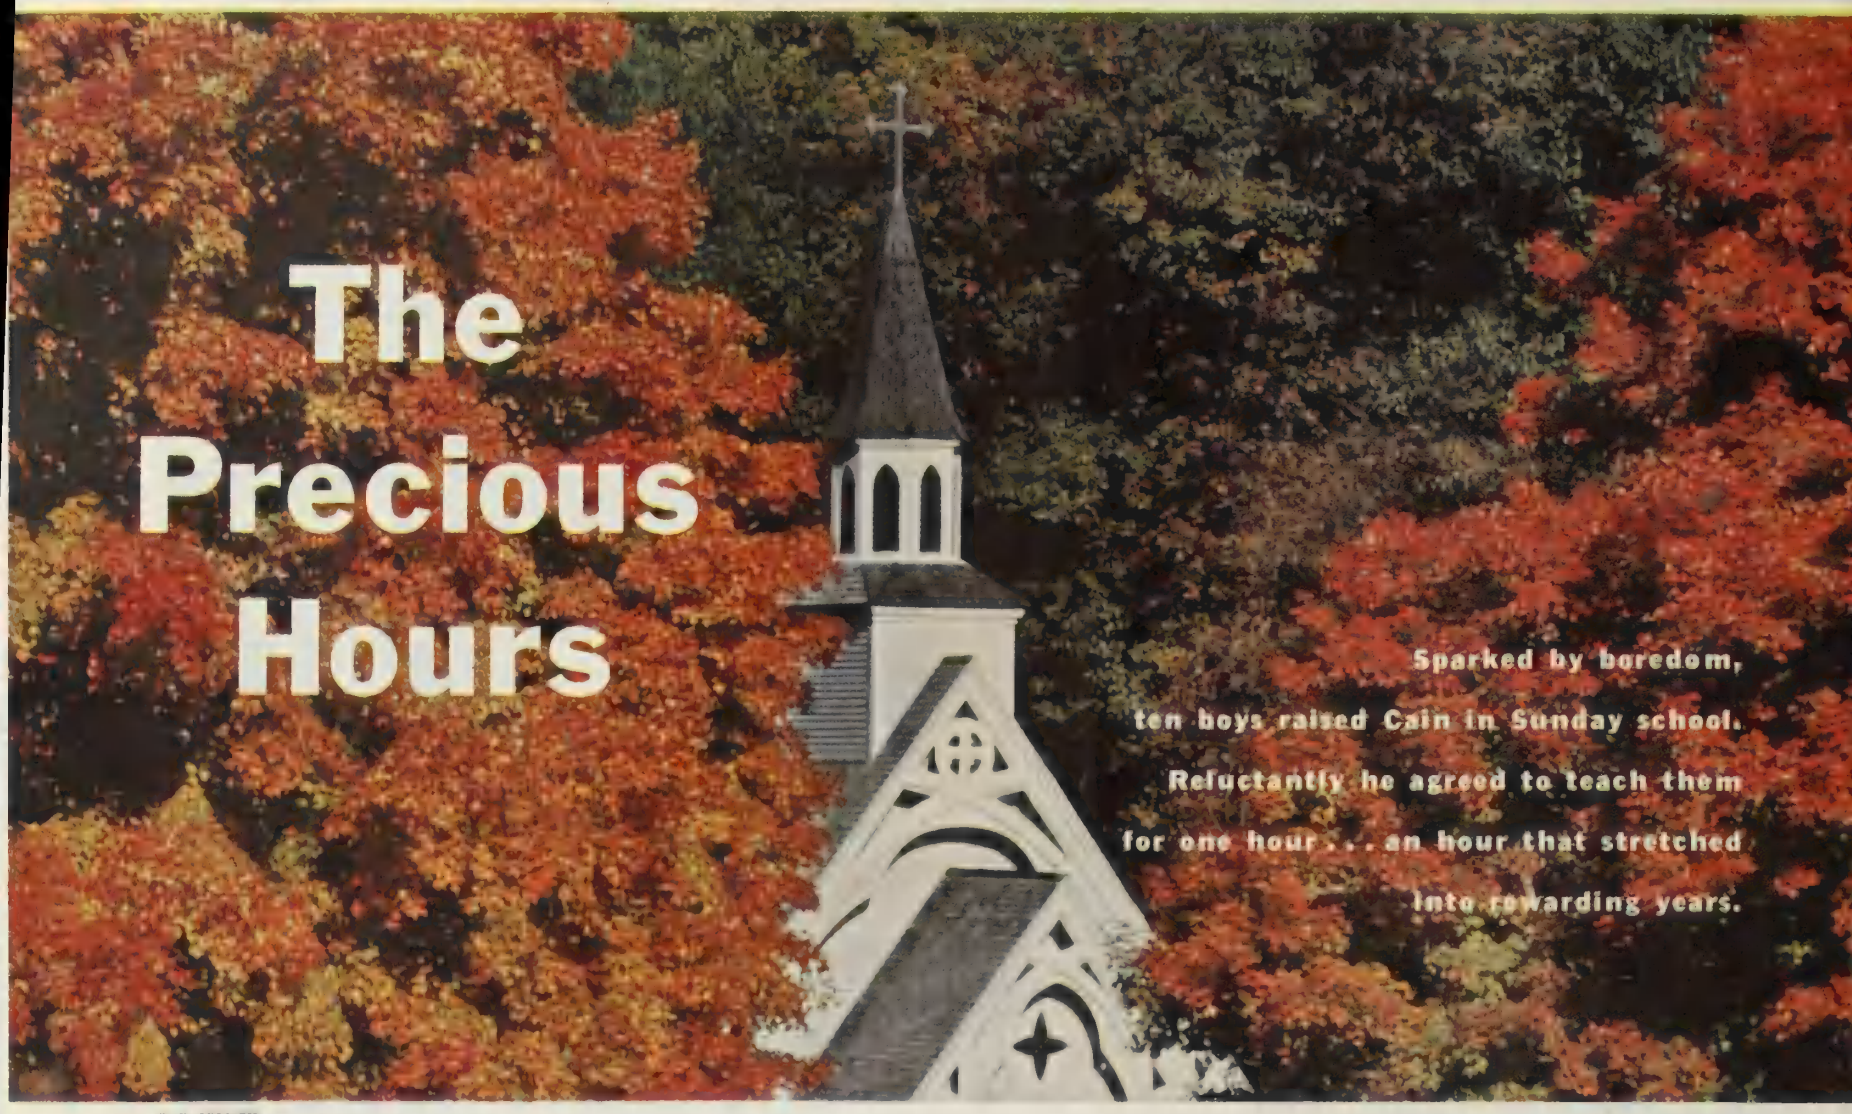
"So this is the baby," Missy's friends were always saying about Penny, petting her and dandling her, supposing she loved to be treated like an outsized doll. It wasn't true at all; Penny despised their opinion. She despised her fumbling plump hands and her short legs. It seemed to her utterly unfair that time, which kept making the others older, kept leaving her always the same distance behind. She wanted to grow, to catch up with the others, to become one of the Group.

Faraway Hill, where the Gallsworthys lived, had once been a farmhouse, but the pattern of living in the area had changed so that now, although still five miles from the nearest town, it was only a solitary country home. It was a big rambling house with shake sides silvered by time and the weather, and an old-fashioned slate roof which attracted more tourist attention than did the little monuments with which the local historical society had dotted the countryside. The meadow where the horses lived separated the house from the main road, and, neatly divided by a tree-shaded lane, sloped up gently to the yard where wide lawns, tall trees and hedged gardens half concealed, half revealed by contrast, the charm of the old house. It was a wonderful place for children to call home, with the meadow and the lane and lawns for playing, the secret nooks for children's dreaming, and the separateness of the house from neighbors to give them time and peace for dreams.

Professor was called "Doctor Gallsworthy" at Unity College, where he taught English literature, and Faraway Hill was built on books as surely as though its foundations had been all hard covers instead of fieldstone. Books marched around the walls of his study and sprawled on the living-room tables; they got up early enough to come to breakfast and stayed wide open and conversational until the last night light was doused. They attracted friends and innumerable students for evening arguments and colored the thoughts and the fancies of the children. Every evening—Penny supposed it had always been so, because it had always been so in her time—the Professor gathered his children about him and read to them. Before the fire in winter, in the wide embrace of the bay window in summer, the children listened while he spun out for them the sheer magic of books.

Tom Sawyer they knew, and Huckleberry Finn drifting and dreaming on the Mississippi; the Bruce and his companions slipping through the misty Scottish heather; Jim Hawkins trembling in the apple barrel; Alice shrinking and growing magically; Toad being mocked by the washerwoman; Rebecca defiant at the high tower window; hungry Oliver begging another bowl of porridge; little Nell among the waxworks; Jean Valjean rescuing the orphan girl; the devoted little mermaid, the cowardly lion, and uncounted more. The Professor was a wonderful reader. He could twist laughter into his voice, draw tragedy into a sigh, boom with fury, hiss like a snake. He made the world of books real to them, a world of high adventure, deep emotion and endless delight.

And so, because Faraway Hill was nearer to books than to neighbors, it was only natural that the children spent hours of their play in makebelieve, reliving their favorites. The lane became for them the Mississippi, the abandoned water tower a castle, the meadow the Wild West and the hedged garden the Globe Theater. Janet played Juliet and Betsy was Peter Pan, Peter swaggered as Lancelot and Terry loved any kind of part that let him be a deep dark villain. But Penny, whom Missy called "the biggest ham of them all," was never let be anything but a stupid lackey, or a guard outside the tower, or a scrubwoman. It was because she didn't belong to the Group.



Like the reading hour, the Group was older than Penny; but unlike the reading hour, it was not open for her to join. It was a very select and secret society. They even had special names which were kept hidden until Penny overheard one time and spoke them aloud—Galahad and Geoffrey and Guinevere and Genevieve. The first time Penny asked to join the Group they said, "You can't. You don't have a name like ours." Penny thought about it a long time before she found a name beautiful enough. It was Jennifer. They all howled with laughter when she told them. "It's not like at all," they

CONTINUED ON PAGE 77

ILLUSTRATED BY GLADYS ROCKMORE DAVIS

The Precious Hours

Sparked by boredom, ten boys raised Cain in Sunday school. Reluctantly he agreed to teach them for one hour . . . an hour that stretched into rewarding years.

R. E. CHRISTIE

By F. ALEXANDER MAGOUN

It all began more than four years ago with a telephone call and I was asked: "Would you be able to take a Sunday-school class for us, day after tomorrow?"

"You want me to substitute for somebody?"

"Well, not exactly, but could you take a class of ten-year-old boys—just for next Sunday?"

"You are asking me to take a class just for Sunday, but I'm not substituting. What is this all about, anyway?"

By dint of much prying, little by little the facts came out. Boiled down into the bare essentials, the truth was that this particular class had exhibited enough combined deviltry and exuberance to dispatch with considerable finality a new teacher every week since the fall term had begun more than a month ago. Now a new lamb was needed for the slaughter.

"It's Friday night already and we must have someone. Won't you please take them—just for next Sunday?"

"Just for next Sunday," I answered with emphasis on every word.

It was not to be so, for as I came out of the church that bright October morning, God spoke to me out of the brilliant foliage of a maple tree as truly as ever He spoke to Moses from a burning bush, or to Elijah following the wind, the earthquake and the fire. I had taught college boys for more than thirty years in one of America's great universities. Long years ago I had been a Sunday-school superintendent in a big suburban church. I had even once been the dean of a school of religious education. These ten little rascals were also raising Cain in public school. Several of them were sons of the most prominent families in this delightful New England village. If somebody did not change their irresponsible verve into responsible enthusiasms, the end result was not pleasant to contemplate. Here was not only opportunity staring me in the face; here was obvious duty demanding my best effort.

I looked up into the maple tree, marveling at the beauty of its red and yellow leaves quivering in the sunlight, but what I heard was a command to return. It was no creaky suggestion. It was an authoritative "You must." God spoke to me out of that tree.

What has happened in the intervening years has done a great deal for me, even softening just a little the blow of my older son's death under which I had so recently staggered when the telephone rang.

In agreeing to take the class on a permanent basis, two conditions were laid down: 1—that I would be completely free of any scheduled lesson books (at that time I had never seen what I thought was a good one), free to devise my own program and to carry it out in my own way; 2—that instead of the boys' going to another teacher the next year (usually an excellent plan), I would go along with them as they progressed from grade to grade. I also gave the boys a promise and an ultimatum. They agreed that much of the deviltry was due to being bored. I promised they would be bored no more. Also, the riotous behavior was over, and no fooling. I believed in being fair and kind. But I also believed in being firm without weakness. If they wanted to find out who was going to be boss, now was a good time to find out. (They did.)

Boys love games. So we devised a game. On a hundred 3″x5″ cards were typed a hundred questions about the Bible, and immediately underneath, the answers. For example: "Where did Moses receive the Ten Commandments? . . . Mt. Sinai." "How did the twelve tribes of Israel start? . . . Jacob's sons." "Who was sold into Egypt as a slave by his brothers? . . . Joseph." "Who was cast into a den of lions because he insisted on praying to his God? . . . Daniel." "Who preached the Sermon on the Mount? . . . Jesus." "Where was the Last Supper held? . . . In an upper room in Jerusalem." "Who was the first missionary? . . . Paul."

Each boy got ten cards. Then, going around the circle, each in turn would ask the lad on his left a question. If the boy could answer correctly, he got the card. The game was to see who could capture the most cards. They loved it. Because in self-defense they tried to ask the hard questions, the tough answers soon were learned. Before the year was out, answers would often be given while the question was still in process of being asked.

We did other things which were collaterally important. There was, as I saw it, no value in gulping down raw the answers to these questions. Answers should be meaningful. So we would read the Bible story appropriate to some question on the cards, after which the boys would choose parts and act out the story as they wished. Their imagination and originality amazed me.

The day they did Moses tending his father-in-law's sheep near Mt. Horeb, Bill wanted to be the burning bush. Outdoors he acquired a handful of twigs. He took off his coat, wrapping it around his head and shoulders so only one eye showed. That one eye was to represent God. Then he shook the twigs to suggest flame, and peering through them, in his deepest diapason said, "Moses, Moses. Come over here and take off your shoes. This here is holy ground!"

Later we did Moses before Pharaoh. Dick made a marvelous Pharaoh: regal, handsome, commanding, magnificently determined. I went to Boston for a mechanical snake from a jokeshop. This was hidden under the edge of the rug, to be picked up and wriggled realistically when Aaron threw down his rod before the king, and it became a serpent.

Thus did one activity supplement, emphasize and illumine another. But not always. David was trying to capture a card by naming three of the parables of Jesus. The first two were easy. Hoping to encourage him, I said, "You know another. Remember, you took part in acting it out only two weeks ago." With accents of complete disgust he answered, "Yeh, but I was only one of the hogs." He just couldn't manage to remember the Prodigal Son.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 72

Are we entering a new era in our attitudes toward sex?

Today it could be YOUR daughter

RUTH PRIGOZY BUSHMAN

By DR. GOODRICH C. SCHAUFFLER

Dr. Goodrich C. Schauffler, of Portland, Oregon, graduated from Williams College in 1918; from Harvard Medical School in 1923. For the past thirty years he has specialized in gynecology and obstetrics in younger patients. He is the author of "Pediatric Gynecology" and has contributed to most of the major reference works on this subject. He has had two daughters and three sons.

My patient was a pretty, bright girl in her late teens. She was making good grades at a college noted for its high scholastic standing. Yet she was going to have a baby, and she wasn't married. I asked her how many girls at this college were intimate with men. She estimated, "Nine out of ten aren't 'innocent' any more by their senior year." This admittedly was her estimate, not mine.

I was interested in the sincerity of these liaisons. "Would you say most of them go steady? Or is there considerable promiscuity?"

Her answer was indignant. "There is absolutely no promiscuity! We have a strict code; cheating is strictly taboo. Any girl who starts that is spoken to by an influential upper classwoman, who makes it clear that she's just a mixed-up little kid."

"And the young men—do they observe a similar code?"

"Well, perhaps not so much. I am not so sure about them."

"What about love?"

"Oh, I don't think that's an essential. Most of the kids would be embarrassed to talk much about love. They are more interested in learning about life."

"Do they look forward to marrying the man they are involved with?"

After some thought, she replied, "I don't think that enters in."

"What about babies?"

"Perish the thought! It simply isn't considered! Why don't you good doctors teach us kids about contraceptives?"

In recent years we doctors have observed, and have documented, an impressive percentage increase in the number of teen-age pregnancies. Most of these pregnancies are among unmarried girls, an increasing number from so-called privileged homes. The girl who gets in trouble today is not necessarily the girl from the wrong side of the tracks, who "never had a chance"; often she comes from the very swankiest part of town. Illegitimate pregnancies occur far more often among college girls, as well as among girls who do not finish high school; in the families of our neighbors; and, possibly, in our own.

Doctors in private practice who nowadays see young girls in serious trouble are frequently impressed by the fact that they are not tough, designing little "operators" involved in rackets or out for money. Nor are they true psychiatric cases. The subjects of most of our case reports are sweet, nice, normal girls like your daughter and mine.

What explains this increasing number of pregnancies among "nice" unmarried girls? It may be because privilege, in a money sense, has spread so widely throughout our population that we scarcely have a lower class any more. But I think myself that it is because youngsters who were once sheltered and disciplined are now allowed an exposure to and experience of the seamy side of sex formerly limited to older groups and depraved settings.

An idea is prevalent that modern boys and girls receive a better and more realistic education in sex than did their parents. A considerable furor was aroused when I stated to a group of obstetricians that young girls today, at their first awareness of relationships between men and women, are confronted with the whole tree of sex, instead of the leaves and branches. I was asked whether I meant by this that families, or educators, attempt to teach too much about sex too early. I did not. Although I do not entirely approve of the conventional methods of "teaching" sex—especially to large groups—I believe that the very effort to do so convinces children that their adults desire to understand and to help.

I simply meant that children today are subjected to sex in its rawest forms before they have the faintest concept of its total meaning in life, and we adults furnish the example. We have only to look about us to realize that, as a nation, we are preoccupied—almost obsessed—with the superficial aspects of sex: you might say, with sex as a form of amusement. This is not true sex, with its corollaries of love, marriage and childbearing. It is an almost hysterical bandying about of sex symbols, coming close to fetish worship. (Consider the present overemphasis of the breast, the stressing of erotic qualities in perfume.) We find this unrealistic sex in movies, in magazine illustrations, in advertisements; we hear it over the radio and see it on television; it is splashed on the covers of paper-backed books and through the comic magazines.

Perhaps you and I laugh at the writhings of an Elvis Presley or the exaggerated posturings of the "hot dames" on the covers of pocket books and in the movies. We may laugh, or turn away in disgust, according to our natures. But to children these things are sex education.

Recently a high-school girl, smart, attractive and straightforward, came to me because she feared she was pregnant. I had been this girl's doctor for years; I knew her parents. I said, "Betsy, how in heaven's name could such a thing have happened?"

"Doc, you ought to know how it is," she said. "We came out of that torrid movie, and he had two cans of beer, and it just couldn't be stopped!"

This boy and girl had been going steady and petting heavily, as many high-schoolers are "privileged" to do. Already they were near the breaking point. They were "privileged" to view a sex exhibition which probably would not have required beer to send them over the edge. As strictly adult fare and in a certain milieu, such suggestiveness may be excusable: as a steady, reiterative pressure on our children, it is indefensible.

Another patient of mine, a delightful, level-headed girl of fourteen, brought me a copy of an exposé magazine the other day. She showed me three separate spreads in which nationally known entertainers were pictured in a series of sex orgies which left scarcely anything to be imagined. The incidents were described with a tough humor that held no hint of condemnation. It all sounded like good, rowdy sport. Of course such magazines are not aimed specifically at a teen-aged audience—but you would be amazed if you knew how widely they circulate among our children. My fourteen-year-old patient said, "My boy friend thinks this is the way sex ought to be handled in our crowd. What do you grownups think?"

In my office practice it becomes clearer every day that teen-age girls—mine and yours—have a lot more book learning about sex and more know-how of a certain kind than you and I have perhaps acquired by middle age. Frequently I must try to explain to my adolescent patients why their parents do not understand facts which, to them, are elementary. But to those of us who try to unravel the tangled stories of their personal tragedies, it is pathetically obvious how confused and shallow much of this know-how is, how divorced from true emotional and intellectual maturity. Dangerously and pathetically, these well-informed children lack perspective and the ability to distinguish between momentary thrills and long-range happiness. And so we find intelligent girls assenting to sex without love, without even

CONTINUED ON PAGE 112

There came a sound from the boy—
a frightening sound—midway between a sob and a scream.

A THING TO REMEMBER

BY HUGH BEAUMONT

Every man wants his son to be proud of him. Whatever Doctor White said or did today would have a lasting effect on Frank.

"Of course I can't be definite as to time, Reverend White, but in my opinion you have perhaps six months to live. I felt you wouldn't want me to beat around the bush, so I've given it to you straight."

The doctor at the big university clinic had watched Doctor White carefully with tired, young eyes as he had spoken. And the minister, after years of experience in searching for the proper manner, the exact word in times of crisis, had sympathized with the other's problem and had smiled reassuringly at him. It was never easy to know precisely how to speak of death to a person confronted with the final, closed-door fact.

He had forced himself to keep an expressionless face and a calm voice when he had spoken. "There's no chance of a mistake, I suppose?"

The doctor had shaken his head regretfully. "I'm afraid not, reverend. This final test we ran was completely conclusive. Of course you'll probably want to double-check our findings with another lab and through your family doctor."

Dr. Edward George White, Doctor of Divinity, pastor of St. Mark's Community Church, membership two hundred and forty-seven, had thought of his inadequate salary and spoken firmly.

"No, I think not. Have to think of expenses now, of course." He had risen to his feet and drawn a big breath of air into his lungs. "Well," he had said, "that's that. Thank you very much, doctor." Then he had shaken hands with the medical man and stepped out onto the autumn-clad campus with a briskness he was far from feeling.

He glanced about at the familiar university buildings and was vaguely surprised that they looked no different to him than they had, a half hour before, when he had entered the School of Medicine building. It seemed to him that they should assume an unusual clarity, as though drawn into a super focus when seen through the eyes of approaching death. Either that or they should have a blurred, unreal quality. It disturbed him that they should appear so perfectly normal and unchanged. Slowly his mind began to fumble at his feelings to attempt an objective evaluation of his emotions. This was an opportunity that should not be overlooked. Sermon material here. He remembered a story told by a minister friend about having had to circle an airfield for forty minutes in a plane whose fuel was already perilously low. The friend had been able to turn the experience to account. He had, he had said, been able more than at any time in his life to sort through his beliefs and feelings and to determine, once and for all, the bedrock of his faith, to sift out his unshakable convictions. Doctor White was aware of no such inner clarity. Within himself he could find only emotional fuzziness and a desire to sit down. He moved to a stone bench a few feet off the sidewalk and seated himself.

Desperately, face drawn into a frown of concentration, he struggled for self-evaluation. He became aware of a half-nausea in the pit of his stomach. That and a queer sort of uncomprehending dullness in his mind seemed his only sensations. Shock, he supposed. The real feeling, born of realization, would come soon. He remembered the words he had spoken so often to others when they were faced with similar situations. Always such words had seemed so terribly inadequate to him, so pitiful in their smallness when squared up against the awful magnitude and mystery of death. But, he told himself sternly, it was the words, not the truths they strove to represent, that were inadequate. The truths were there, regardless of the fact that words so seldom did them justice. And they should mean something to him. To him, of all people, the truth should have ultimate and supreme meaning at a time like this. He probed within himself. Was he afraid? Did he really and deeply believe the things to which he had devoted his life? His mind answered Yes, but deep within his feelings made no response at all.

He wrenched savagely at his mind. Later, he told himself again. Later the feelings and inner conviction would come. Now he must think and think clearly. There were immediate and practical things to be considered. How should he tell Ellen and Frank? And when? Ellen he would tell at night. That would be the time. Close, both physically and spiritually, in the warmth and darkness of the bed, he could tell her gently, he could hold her close and help her to accept the fact and feel her way through the shock to adjustment.

But what of Frank? How did you tell a fifteen-year-old son that you were going to be with him six more months, at most? What was the time to tell, and what were the words? And what did one say and do afterward? How would the boy react? Doctor White drew a deep, apprehensive breath. He didn't know. There were so many things about his son he didn't know. So little about anything that he really knew. He thought of God. There, surely, was certainty, knowledge. He closed his eyes and prayed. Slowly, fumblingly, a small man, hunched on a stone bench in the autumn cold, reached out with words to eternity. After a time he straightened, and opened his eyes. He felt better. No nearer to rational conviction, but better in a wordless, inner way. Conviction would come later, he told himself again.

He rose and started again along the sidewalk to where he had parked his car, off campus. Now, he told himself firmly, he must think of practical, worldly things. What of money? He mentally calculated, as he had done so often before, the amount of pension that had accrued to him. It would not be adequate. Ellen would have to work. There was the insurance policy. Not much either, but they had struggled for years to keep it in effect. There was a double indemnity clause. For just an instant the thought of suicide crossed his mind. Then he shook his head and smiled faintly. No, even leaving aside the matter of ethics, he was not the kind of man for an act like that. Such a thing required a sort of negative courage, and he was no hero. Far from it.

With the thought, for the first time since his conversation CONTINUED ON PAGE 99

THE PEERAGE GAME

More than a thousand persons paid the half-crown fee the first day Harewood House, home of the Princess Royal, was open to the public "for maintenance." Harewood House had been open before the war, but proceeds then went to charity.

Lady Raglan personally greets "paying guests" and welcomes them to her home, Cefntilla Court, Usk, Monmouthshire.

By ROBIN MILLER

PHOTOS FROM EUROPEAN

The Duke and Duchess of Northumberland in the Long Gallery of Syon House, which is open to tourists from May to October. A former monastery, the house stands on the site of a battle between Britons and Julius Caesar's Romans.

GILBERT WILKINSON, FROM THE LONDON DAILY HERALD

"Bye, darling! See you at the Impoverished and Destitutes' Ball!"

Harassed by heavy death duties and taxes. Britain's noble peers are cashing in on the only tax-free asset they have left—their titles.

When sociologists of the future look back on the first half of the twentieth century it is an even bet they will think of it as the Age of Revolution. The last sixty years have toppled more thrones and scattered more aristocrats than any other era in history.

Even Britain, stanch cradle of tradition, staged its own bloodless social revolution after the war. "Nye" Bevan and his cohorts of envious Left-Wingers "soaked the rich" and did their level best to extinguish the splendor of Britain's great families. Since they were backed up by half the electorate, the aristocracy looked all set for extinction.

The reason that these modern Cromwellians did not succeed is the fact that they—like Cromwell—overlooked two basic facets of the British character. One is the adaptability of the individual Englishman, be he peasant or peer. The other is the almost religious awe with which the British man in the street regards a title. In her more envious moments little Mrs. Jones may long to rush up and down Piccadilly with a duchess' head on a pole, but she will be the first in line when the duchess opens her home to the public. She will also use a cold cream that is sponsored by a viscountess, drink tea that is endorsed by a marchioness, and sit glued to her television screen if a countess is a member of the quiz panel.

Faced by crushing death duties (on one great estate the death duties were $14,000,000) and taxes, the members of Britain's aristocracy also faced the fact that something must be done. Custodians of a fine tradition, they were not going to part with their historic estates without putting up a good fight. Even though they were not businessmen originally they have now adapted themselves with all the vigor of their shrewd ancestors, capitalizing on the Jones' hero worship, and cashing in on their one tax-free asset—their titles.

As a result, only twelve years after the Socialists launched their campaign, the Peerage Game is big business, and things are now looking pretty chipper for what was previously referred to, by the Laborites, as "an obsolete institution."

For those who still possess one, the Stately Home is undoubtedly the most profitable source of income—a pleasant switch on the bankruptcy that faced their owners in the recent past. Before the war many of these great houses were kept up only by great financial sacrifice to bolster family pride, or to rent to millionaires of dubious nationality for the hunting season, and opened at the most four times a year for charity. Many owners prayed for American buyers, or for the National Trust to take over. This, however, presented still more difficulties, for the National Trust operates on slender funds and will not accept a house without a substantial endowment for its upkeep. But now the owners would not part with their new business assets for all the tea in Twinings.

The first Stately Owners to open up to the paying public timorously did so on summer Sundays, hoping that a few passers-by would drop in to see the pictures or the Haunted Gallery. They were quite unprepared for the staggering response. As drawbridges came down and portcullises went up, the camera-toting hordes poured in ("like Tamburlaine!" gasped one peeress), poking into every nook and cranny, picnicking in the park, hobnobbing with the duke, and

CONTINUED ON PAGE 108

These are "before and after" pictures of model Margot Warner, showing her as a natural brownette, and then as a medium blonde. Some people will like the slightly artificial look of the new lighter color, others not. Margot has her hair coloring done professionally, needs touch-ups for the dark roots every three weeks, which is costly and time-consuming. Note the change in her make-up colors—the lighter eyebrow pencil, paler make-up base and powder, pinker lipstick. Margot purposely subdues these colors with the intention of making her new blondness seem as natural-looking as possible.

ROGER PRIGENT

LEOMBRUNO-BODI

TO: Journal Editors

MEMO: ON PERMANENT HAIR COLORING

FROM: Dawn Crowell Norman Beauty Editor

I have given considerable thought to the matter of permanent hair colorings for our readers, and these are my conclusions.

SAFETY IS A FIRST CONSIDERATION. There is potential danger in permanent bleaches and tints (dyes), if they are misused. Labels caution against using the preparations on eyebrows or eyelashes because "to do so may cause blindness." On the other hand, there are many household articles that could cause comparable harm if misused, such as ammonia, lye and flammable cleaning fluids. Extra precaution must naturally be used with hair preparations, since they are necessarily used near eyes. Reputable manufacturers are careful to abide by Government rulings which require suitable warnings to appear throughout the literature that comes with their products. (Home-permanent manufacturers caution users against "drinking" their product and to keep preparation "out of eyes, ears, nose and mouth." They also warn against using if "scalp is sore or tender" and add "Keep away from children and pets.")

Permanent hair colors should never be used until after a strand test (comparable to making a test curl before proceeding with a permanent wave) indicates that a woman's hair is in good condition and will take the color safely. Sometimes hair that has been previously colored or damaged, or for one reason or another is not in good health, will break off or discolor with the application of a bleach or dye. Allergy tests are also required with tints, to determine whether a woman is allergic to the product.

SOCIAL ACCEPTANCE doesn't seem, to me, to present a problem. Women nowadays rarely try to hide the fact that their hair has been artificially darkened or lightened. On the contrary, we find women are eager to talk about it with the idea of finding out which color might be best for them. Perhaps the thing most responsible for this relaxed attitude is that over the years hair-color preparations have been improved considerably toward the goal of achieving a natural look. In the old days henna shades, dense blacks and platinum blonds were heavy solid colors that blocked out all natural highlights and variations in natural hair shades. You occasionally see this kind of color job today, but it is one you can immediately spot, and it is not what most women want or get. Naturally, mothers would want to discourage their teen-age daughters from experimenting with hair colorings. No artificial formula can compare with the real-life beauty of healthy young hair (regardless of natural color), when it is kept clean, brushed and shining with highlights.

SUCCESS WITH GETTING GOOD COLOR. This is a big question, and it is impossible to come up with one answer to cover all women. Hair health, texture and natural pigment enter in. Some natural hair shades will take artificial colorings better than others. (Just as some heads of hair get beautiful, soft permanents—others frizz and look dried out.) In my personal experience of having hair color applied by a professional, I have been disappointed to discover that, no matter how subdued the original application of color might be, as time goes by and "touch-ups" are necessary, my hair gets lighter and lighter and takes on a brassy look, which I then have to have toned down with a product called a "toner," or with temporary rinses in drab shades. In one afternoon in the sun my hair (when artificially colored) can turn a shade lighter. By the end of last summer I was practically a "golden blonde"—not very convincing with brown eyes and medium-to-dark skin tones. But of course this doesn't always happen. I've known women who have had their hair artificially colored for many years without having any such problem. (It has been explained to me that the large amount of natural red pigment in my hair combined with the effects of the sun is responsible for the brassy look.)

I do definitely feel that bleaches and tints tend to dry hair and can eventually produce an unpretty strawlike texture. Fortunately, this can often be counteracted with the regular use of one of the many cream rinses which are applied after a shampoo. There are also excellent hair conditioners which are useful in restoring shine and highlights.

The times when women can get into real trouble and wind up with damaged hair are when they go to extremes of, for instance, bleaching dark brown hair to pale blond. This involves an extra process called prebleaching the hair of its natural color, and then putting the new color in. It is complicated, time-consuming, and potentially harmful to the health and texture of hair. Fortunately, most women are not interested in such extreme hair coloring. They are more apt simply to want to brighten their natural color by a shade or two, or to blend in or cover gray or white hair. Naturally the less dramatic the change in color, the less damage done and the more convincingly natural it will be. My experience points out to me that having a professional hair-coloring job done is not the answer to having the best job done.

Since many women ask themselves, "Should I change the color of my hair?" I believe it will be helpful to them, in making their decision, to have the above facts which are based on research, observation and personal experience.

Now is the time for trips into the sun . . .

and for looking ahead to glimpse, perhaps to plan summer clothes.

By WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor

A white pleated dress belongs in every vacation wardrobe. This is Arnel with a wool-and-cotton jacket, by Abe Schrader. Jewelry by Seaman Schepps. White pumps, Jean Bandler.

This green cotton rib-knit coat is a wonderful bright color addition over white, beige and neutrals. For Southern travel and summertime. By Jeanne Campbell—white calfskin bag.

WILHELA CUSHMAN

Winter into Summer Fashions

COLOR, color and more color is in sight for January and June. Sharp lemon-peel yellow to orange, bright blue-print blues, tropical pink. Reds range from flame to ruby, greens are olive and leaf tones.

With all the color, one must have a WHITE dress. Linen, raw silk, flannel, synthetic, often pleated. The easy, flat-pleated skirt is in beautiful contrast to the fashion of the well-cut CHEMISE which touches the hips, leaves the waistline free. This dress is a natural for South and summer in cotton or silk, sleeveless or sleeved, cool and divinely comfortable.

SHORTER skirts are a fact, no longer a forecast—the degree dependent on height and becomingness.

The COTTON COAT (straight and well tailored) fills a new light-coat need. In ribbed cotton knit, linen or mixtures. The wool coat for vacations and next summer is often pale yellow or white, keyed to go over the new colors.

Citron-printed silk-shantung chemise with pleated sleeves, worn with or without a belt, by John Weitz. Chalk-white necklace by Joseph Bobley.

Important overblouse dress in citrous yellow rajah silk by Mollie Parnis.

Linen chemise, very slightly shaped by Vincent Draddy. Bag by Greta.

Silk-twill cardigan jacket worn over silk or linen, by Sydney Wragge.

Winter into Summer Fashions

The flower bathing suit in nylon with Lastex with a deep-cut back. Fringed rubber cap.

Charming printed cotton with a velvet sash by Nettie Rosenstein.

WILHELM CUSHMAN

The DRESS-AND-JACKET becomes the most important costume idea. Travel-beige silk or wool for take-offs, white and bright for casual wear.

PRINTS are at their prettiest for evening and late afternoon. Often with matching slippers.

BATHING SUITS come printed too.
Very, very low backs are the fashion and two-piecers come back for the young.

The best SHORTS are white. Slim long pants return to patios and play scenes.
Both with overblouses.

SHOES are delicately shaped, slender and pointed.
Even cotton play shoes now have more-pointed toes.

Travel costume in beige tweed with a jersey blouse by Alvin Handmacher. Topaz necklaces by Nettie Rosenstein.

Left—Cashmere at its newest in peony red with a sailor collar and skirt of white silk in a shantung weave, by Frank Smith. For South or summer vacations.

The fashions on all these pages are presented to you because they show you the trends of the season and serve as a guide as you shop. You will find many of them in stores throughout the nation. However, if you do not find identical styles in your local shops, we believe similar ones will be available.

Eternally fresh and in fashion, the beautiful shirtwaist dress holds its own with all silhouettes. This one in silk broadcloth by Lou Kornhandler. Worn with golden starfish jewelry by Seaman Schepps.

Slim linen trousers, brilliant fashion with printed chiffon sweater by Jeanne Campbell.

Pleated wool skirt and matching blouse in plain colors or new plaids, by Pendleton.

Mrs. Rodgers designed these needle-point butterfly squares set in shantung pillows. A small butterfly on one pillow was worked by Mary Martin in an evening spent with the Rodgerses.

This charming mirror frame, made up of lovely porcelain flowers wired to a wooden base, was designed by Mrs. Rodgers for her guest room. Another, with white flowers, is in her dressing room.

Believe it or not, this enchanting eyelet lamp shade was once a ruffle on a petticoat. Mrs. Rodgers gathered it evenly over a plain white shade and accented it with a band and bow of velvet ribbon.

This is an ingenious idea for adapting a wallpaper design to a painted commode. The design can either be painted on or be cut out from the paper and glued on.

This amusing clock face of Swedish origin is one of many painted by Mrs. Rodgers and is used on guest-room doors to indicate the time to be called in the morning.

The designs for this beautiful fireside rug were adapted by Mrs. Rodgers from designs on her favorite Chelsea plates. The rug was made in six separate squares joined by narrow bands, the border added last.

CREATIVE WOMEN—NO. 1

Mrs. Richard Rodgers

By NORA O'LEARY
Pattern Editor

Endowed with boundless ideas and energy, Dorothy Rodgers is never without a "creative" project. It might be redecorating her living room, designing and making a new dinner dress for a theater opening, or making a pair of needle-point slippers for a music "great." (Her husband, Richard Rodgers, composer of the unforgettable music in "Oklahoma!" "Carousel," "South Pacific," and many other shows, is still happily wearing his, made several years ago.) She is a perfectionist in whatever she does. Her bound buttonholes compare with those of the haute couture, her needle point is inspired and original and she is noted for the thoughtful and amusing gifts she makes for her friends.

Fashion to Dorothy Rodgers is becomingness. Her hemlines haven't budged in years (14″ from the floor) and her beautiful three strands of pearls (two natural and one black) are as much a part of her make-up as her distinctive hairdo. She is infatuated with beautiful fabrics and is famous for her unorthodox uses of them. The fabric in her lovely evening coat on the opposite page was most certainly intended to upholster a chair, and the fabric in her sheerest bedroom curtains was designed for summer dancing. It is this curious visual talent that has contributed some of the most distinctive things in her wardrobe as well as in her house. Having a problem, whether it is in decorating or fashion, makes for more excitement, she feels. For instance, when she was making a very special slacks costume of yellow silk linen, the piece intended for the sleeves had been damaged and no more fabric was available. What did she do? Knitted the sleeves. In redoing her house in the country, Mrs. Rodgers, having chosen a beautiful wallpaper for her large foyer and stairway, was stumped for a rug. What did she do? Designed an oval one embracing the actual flower shapes and the colors in the wallpaper.

Mrs. Rodgers believes that equipment and comfort are essential to good workmanship. Her sewing room is the essence of efficiency. Her dress form was made to measure and she has ingeniously marked her lingerie line on the bodice so that the shape and depth of a neckline can be fitted to perfection.

Besides working at these creative activities, Mrs. Rodgers is a charming hostess, an excellent cook and an enthusiastic gardener. Also, she devotes many hours of service to the Public Education Association and the American Red Cross.

If you wonder where Mrs. Rodgers finds time to do all these things, I will tell you. She makes time, as so many creative people do, for the things that are interesting and rewarding.

This magnificent turquoise-and-gold sari was given to Mrs. Rodgers as a present. "It's too beautiful to cut," she said, "so I wear it Indian fashion. I made my choli (close-fitting blouse underneath) from a silk scarf that matched the sari perfectly."

Mrs. Rodgers fell in love with this upholstery fabric at first sight. She designed her evening coat to wear over short dinner dresses and finds it looks chic over black as well as with bright shades. Flat collar is set away from the neck-line, pockets are in side seams. Vogue Design No. 9390.

This cocoa color good wool-jersey dress Mrs. Rodgers designed to wear day in and day out. The comfortable chemise cut, the away-from-the-neckline collar with the button detail, and the tortoise-shell belt are very individual. Vogue Design No. 9391.

LEOMBRUNO-BODI

Mrs. Rodgers in her favorite costume photographed in her favorite place—her country patio. Her slim pink silk linen slacks and shirt she made two years ago. The long-sleeved shirt, slacks, Vogue Design No. 9381. Mrs. Rodgers believes that for best results each and every woman must adapt a good slacks pattern to suit her particular figure.

Other Views, Sizes and Prices of Vogue Patterns on Page 64. Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto, Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 5c additional for each pattern ordered.

© VOGUE

Potluck for Gourmets

"An exquisite scent of olives and oil and juice arose from the great brown dish . . . it was rich, it was tender, it was perfectly cooked."

Tender poached cod, encircled with green peas, is covered with a pungent-seasoned dill sauce, served with lots more of the same.

The boiled dinner is one of winter's most cherished traditions: a generous chunk of beef is simmered gently till the tender meat falls apart at the touch of a fork; its juices mingle with the vegetables which are cooked in the same kettle; a tangy helping of vinaigrette sauce complements the flavor of the beef. The steaming-hot broth left in the pot is served as a first course, in warm bowls—try floating on top a round of toast, buttered and spread with softened Cheddar and popped under the broiler.

One of these cold January nights, serve a platter of plump chicken fricassee, bathed in its own savory gravy, with onions and green beans cooked in the chicken broth, buttery almond rice—and more gravy! And, because it's the time of year it is, try a hot fruit compote for dessert—stewed apricots and sweet purple plums, heated with clove-studded lemon slices and a stick of cinnamon.

FRICASSEE OF CHICKEN

Into a large kettle put 3 cups canned chicken broth, 1 onion, peeled and stuck with a clove, 1 small carrot, diced, 2 or 3 peppercorns, 2 tablespoons chopped parsley, 1 tablespoon chopped chives, 1 teaspoon salt and ½ bay leaf. Dust 1 large cut-up chicken (about 5 pounds or so) with flour and brown well in a skillet. Add your pieces of chicken CONTINUED ON PAGE 76

Robust slices of corned beef, with Brussels sprouts, beautifully firm and green, make the classic New England Boiled Dinner. A sharp curried horse-radish sauce goes with this one.

STUART-FOWLER

Menu

Fricassee of Chicken
with onions and green beans

Almond Rice Gravy

Green Salad with hearts of palm

Hot Fruit Compote of apricots and purple plums

Coffee

Succulent chicken fricassee with plenty of golden gravy, green beans and onions, rice with crunchy almonds. Serve a green salad with chunks of hearts of palm, extra gravy, and your guests will come back for more.

Collector's Items

Winter Fruit Desserts

FROM THE JOURNAL KITCHEN

STUART

Deep-dish orange pudding under a delicate fluff of a meringue.

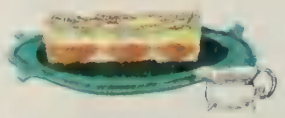
A dessert should lift the spirits as well as tempt the palate. There is never a better choice than fruit. We here present a collection of interesting fruit desserts that are light, unusual, not difficult to make, and that are sparked with the essence that makes a meal memorable.

Cranberry Relish in Cheese Mold: Allow a container of pot cheese (1 cup) and a large (9-ounce) package of cream cheese to stand at room temperature until soft enough to work with a fork, or put them into a blender and whip to a fluff. Have ready 1 envelope unflavored gelatin. Soften in ½ cup hot water until dissolved. Add to the cheese to help the blending. If the cheese is too cold, the gelatin will not mix in well. Pack into a 1-quart ring mold and chill until set.

Meanwhile make the cranberry relish as follows. Wash and pick over ½ pound fresh cranberries. Wash and core 2 tart red apples, but do not peel them. Wash 1 seedless orange. Cut up and remove as much inner membrane as possible, but keep the rind. Use only half the orange. Chop the fruits fine, or put through the food grinder. Add 1 cup sugar. Stir and chill several hours before using. When ready to serve, turn cheese ring out on a platter and fill the center with relish. You can decorate the edge of the platter with greens. This cranberry relish will keep for weeks in the refrigerator. Besides its use as a dessert, it is delicious served with cold turkey, chicken, veal or pork.

Lemon Honey on Fruit: Cream together 1 cup sugar and 2 tablespoons butter. Add the juice and grated rind of 1½ lemons. Heat. When hot, add 3 well-beaten eggs and stir quickly for 5 minutes. Take from the heat. To serve: Place a ring of canned pineapple on each dessert plate. On this place a banana, sliced lengthwise. Spoon over all some of the warm lemon honey and decorate with shaved candied ginger. The lemon honey is good served on plain cake or over fruit heaped on spongecake, or on gingerbread too. Makes 4–6 servings.

Cuzco Oranges: This interesting dessert was discovered at a little inn high in the Andes in the old Inca capital of Cuzco, Peru. Select fine seedless oranges, one for each person to be served. With each orange do the following: Cut off the two ends of the orange, making two disks. Spear these disks onto a dinner fork with the two curved sides together. Push the disks to the base of the fork. This much is pure decoration. Now peel the orange and scrape off the white membrane. Spear the orange on the fork, pushing it down to touch the top disk (the flat side of the disk will touch the end of the orange). When you have all the oranges speared on forks this way, stand them on a plate and put in refrigerator to chill. When you are ready to serve them, have ready a plate on which you have placed a generous mound of confectioners' sugar (with no lumps) and a shaker of cinnamon. Quickly roll each orange in the powdered sugar and sprinkle with cinnamon. These are eaten like a lollipop, from the fork.



Date-Nut Meringue: This is a particularly delicious meringue. Mix 1 cup crushed graham crackers with ¾ teaspoon baking powder. This takes about 14 graham crackers; crush them with a rolling pin. Beat 3 egg whites until stiff but not dry and add slowly 1 cup sugar, beating all the while. Then fold the cracker mixture into this. Add ½ cup chopped, pitted dates, ½ cup chopped walnuts and ½ teaspoon vanilla. Bake in a buttered pie plate, 30 minutes in a moderately slow oven, 325° F. Serve with ice cream or 1 cup cream, whipped, in which 3 tablespoons brown sugar have been dissolved before beating. This meringue can be made the day before it is to be served.

Orange Pudding: Use well-flavored, fresh oranges for this dish, as the success of it depends on the flavor of the oranges. Beat the yolks of 3 eggs slightly with a fork and add ¼ to ½ cup sugar and the juice of 3 or 4 oranges. Cook this until the mixture thickens a little. Boil it hard, stirring constantly. Split a dozen ladyfingers open and line the bottom of a 1-quart baking dish with them. Pour the orange custard over the ladyfingers and let this stand overnight in the refrigerator. Next day make a meringue by beating the whites of the 3 eggs until stiff but not dry and adding slowly ¼ cup sugar. Spread this over the ladyfingers and brown in a moderate oven, 350° F. Cool this again before serving with cream that has not been whipped.

Coconut-Walnut Delight: This is a delectable surprise, unusual and of an interesting consistency. Soften ½ cup butter and add slowly to it 1 cup flour, blending to a smooth paste. Spread this in a 9″x12″x2″ buttered glass baking dish and bake it 10 to 15 minutes in a moderate oven, 350° F. Meanwhile, mix ½ cup shredded or flaked coconut, 1½ cups brown sugar, 1 cup chopped walnuts, ½ cup finely chopped candied cherries, 2 tablespoons flour, ¼ teaspoon baking powder, ½ teaspoon salt, 2 eggs and 1 teaspoon vanilla. Spread this over the cooked paste and bake 20 to 25 minutes in a moderate oven, 350° F., then cool. Leave in pan. When cool, frost it with a mixture of confectioners' sugar and lemon juice in a proportion to be right for spreading. Serve in slices.

Fruit Crunch: Apricots or peaches, canned or dried, may be used for this dessert. Or you can use a combination of the fruits. If canned fruit is used, drain the fruit, reserving ½ cup syrup. If dried fruit is used, soak the fruit overnight, then cook it over low heat in the water in which it was soaked until tender, usually only 10 or 15 minutes. Use no sugar; the slow cooking brings out the natural flavor of the sugar in the fruit. Butter a baking dish. Arrange the fruit in it. Pour over it ½ cup of the juice from the fruit. Have ready 1 cup sugar mixed with ¾ cup flour into which you have worked 7 tablespoons butter until crumbly. Sprinkle this over the fruit and bake 30–40 minutes in a moderate oven, 350° F. Serve with plain milk or cream.

Individual Fruit Cobblers: Cream 2 tablespoons butter with ½ cup sugar. Add 1 cup flour which has been sifted with 2 teaspoons baking powder and ¼ teaspoon salt, alternately with ¼ cup milk. Fold in the whites of 2 eggs, beaten stiff. Butter 6 custard cups. Fill one third full with almost any canned fruit or a combination (blueberries, crushed pineapple, cherries, raspberries, blackberries, peaches, and so on). Sprinkle each with a little lemon juice. Drop a large tablespoonful of the batter on the fruit and bake or steam in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 30 minutes. Serve with whipped cream.

DRAWINGS BY ANNA JOHNSON

souper special

BUDGET BEATERS

Budget Beater:

SOUPER BURGER!

Imagine making chuck even thriftier. (And out of this world for goodness!) Vegetable Souper Burger. Brown 1 lb. ground beef and ½ cup chopped onion in heavy skillet; stir to separate meat. Add 1 can Campbell's Vegetable Soup, 2 tbsp. ketchup, 1 tsp. prepared mustard, dash black pepper; simmer about 5 min. Serve on toasted buttered buns. Enough "filling" for 6 buns . . . and for six happy people including the cook. It's a cinch to make!

VARIATIONS: Prepare your favorite hamburgers. When brown, remove from skillet; add can Campbell's Tomato Soup to drippings (about ¼ cup), or can of Cream of Mushroom Soup (2 tbsp. drippings); heat and serve over burgers.

Budget Beater:

SOUPER SANDWICH!

Cost: pennies. Time: about 6 minutes. Taste: terrific! Souper Cheese Sandwich with Tomato Soup sauce. Butter 4 to 5 slices of toast; place a slice of process cheese on each. Broil or bake until cheese melts. Heat 1 can Campbell's Tomato Soup — made from sun-ripened Campbell tomatoes; pour on sandwiches. Season sauce with 1 tbsp. chopped pickle or ¼ tsp. ground oregano for pizza lovers. Hint: makes a quick hot lunch for schooldays!

SOUPER SANDWICH VARIATIONS: Ham with Cream of Celery Soup sauce ▪ Beef with Cream of Mushroom Soup sauce ▪ Chicken with Cream of Chicken Soup sauce

Good n' thrifty cooks cook with Campbell's Soups

For other Budget Beaters ask your neighborhood grocer or write to Campbell Soup Company, Camden 1, N. J.

FORBES & WALLACE
Springfield, Mass.

WILLIAM H. BLOCK
Indianapolis

HALE'S
San Francisco

JOHNSON, STEPHENS & SHINKLE SHOE CO., ST. LOUIS, MO

America's Most Popular Nurser

Mrs. David VanDeveer of Library, Pa. feeding baby son David Wayne.

evenflo

makes happy babies

Baby is so much happier when he enjoys his bottle, feeds as fast or as slow as he wants. Evenflo's patented self-regulating Twin Air-Valve Nipple makes formula flow evenly, adjusts to your baby's feeding speed. Just a twist of the sure grip-no slip cap speeds or slows the flow. Babies fed with Evenflo Nursers are healthy, contented babies.

Mothers find widemouth Evenflo bottles easier to fill and clean, and the sanitary sealing of nipple inside bottle is so convenient for storing, carrying. Because it is easier to nurse and handier to use, more mothers use Evenflo than all other nursers combined.

25¢ Complete Unit
10¢ Nipples

evenflo®

Everything to feed your baby

EVENFLO, RAVENNA, OHIO

THE GREENGAGE SUMMER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 35

"Joss, my sister, has hers, the rest of us are on my mother's." I hated to have to say that. I had fought about that passport. "Why should Joss have one and not I?"

"She is sixteen," said mother, and added, "You forget how young you are."

Three years separated each of us children—father's expeditions usually lasted three years—but Joss and I had always been the Big Ones, as Willmouse and Vicky were the Littles, with Hester in a no man's land between. Our surname was Grey; I wished it had been Shelmerdine or de Courcy, but it was, simply, Grey. "Better than Bullock," said Joss. We had not quite escaped that; Uncle William was a Bullock, William John Bullock, and Vicky, Hester and I were as unmistakably Bullock as he, short, bluff, pink-faced, with eyes as blue as larkspurs.

Why could I not have been born to look like Joss, or be Joss? Joss and Willmouse were dark and slim with such an ivory skin that their lashes and hair looked darker. "Like Snow White," said Hester with the only trace of envy I ever heard in her. They were, too, delicately unusual; Willmouse had the peaked look of an elf while Joss' eyes had the almond shape that had given her her nickname. "Because Chinese people have slant eyes," said Joss.

"Are supposed to have them," father had corrected her. "Most of them have eyes as straight as anyone."

"They have them in paintings," said Joss, who knew all about painting. She and Willmouse were equally vain—and clever; Joss was a serious painter and Willmouse had what we called his "dressage." It was years before we found out that that had to do with horses, not clothes. Willmouse's scrapbooks and workbox and the dolls that so distressed Uncle William—"Dolls! Gordon's ghost!"—were part of it: the books held a collection of fashion prints, designs and patterns of stuffs; Willmouse needed his scissors and pins for draping his designs—"I don't sew," he said; "that will be done in my workrooms"—while the dolls, his models, Miss Dawn and Dolores, were not dolls but artist's lay figures carved in wood with articulated joints. They had been given to Joss by Uncle William to help her in her painting, but to mother's bewilderment she would not touch them, while Willmouse had annexed them. Mother could deal with us little Bullocks. Though we were often rude or obstinate, "That is normal," said mother, but with Joss and Willmouse it was as if, in our quiet farmyard, she had hatched two cygnets.

It had never been fair but now, I thought, it was growing more unfair, for Joss had blossomed; that was what people said of young girls, and I saw it was the right word: she was like a tree or a branch where every bud was breaking into flower.

She would not undress with me any more and I was glad, because my pinkness was still distressingly straight up and down while she had a waist now, slim and so supple I could not help watching it, and curves that tapered to long slim legs, while her breasts had swelled. She was restless, too, as if she were always excited, which was odd because her face was serene and withdrawn, almost secret, I thought, with only the palest pink flush on her cheeks to tell of the excitement inside.

"Is Joss beautiful?" I asked with a pang.

"Just now," said mother, "just now."

I tried desperately to keep up with Joss. At the moment I was more like a chameleon, colored by other people's business, and now I burned when I saw Mlle. Zizi's lips twitch as she read out our names from mother's passport.

"Where is your father?" asked Mlle. Zizi.

"In Tibet," said Hester.

"Ti-bet? What is he doing in Tibet?"

"Picking flowers," said Hester.

"Picking flowers!" Mlle. Zizi repeated it in French, and Paul gave a short guffaw which made me rap out, "Il est botaniste." I added, in English, that he was on an expedition. "He usually is," said Hester.

Mlle. Zizi and Mme. Corbet looked at each other. "Mon Dieu! Mon Dieu! Eh quoi?" said Mme. Corbet.

They began to talk about us in French as if we were not there. "They have not been in France before," said Mlle. Zizi, looking at the passports.

"They have not been anywhere," said Mme. Corbet.

"We have," I began hotly. "My sister Joss was born in India. Mother's old passport expired, that's all," but they did not listen.

"And they don't speak French."

That was wounding because, up to that moment, I had believed that Joss and I, particularly I, spoke French very well. "You ought to," said Joss, "you learned enough." That was not kind, for learning French poetry was a punishment at St. Helena's.

"We cannot be expected to look after them," Mme. Corbet was saying.

"We can look after ourselves," I said with dignity, "We are not little children."

Mlle. Zizi picked up Joss' passport. "Sixteen," she said, "a child," and asked me in English, "Have you no relative, no one at all who could come?"

Before I could stop her Hester had answered: "Uncle William."

Uncle William was mother's brother, ten years older than she—"Though it might have been a hundred," said Joss. Most grown people are like icebergs, only a little showing, the rest submerged—that is why a collision with one of them is unexpectedly hurtful—but mother was like a child transparently aboveboard and open, "To any scallywag," said Uncle William.

I sometimes wondered if he ranked father as a scallywag, but he did not say it and Uncle William said most things. "If you had listened to me," was his favorite. I do not think mother had listened to him when she married, but all the same, when she brought Joss back from India—babies cannot go on expeditions—he had met them and brought them to Southstone.

Uncle William spent money and time and effort on us children, "And words," said Hester, "heaps and heaps of words," while father came only at long intervals, yet we loved him and longed for him to come home; we ran our legs off on his errands and were proud of belonging to him. "Oh well," said Hester, "I will look after Uncle William when he is old."

Did we need Uncle William? I could never make up my mind, just as I could never make out if mother was very silly or very wise. Take her dealings with Willmouse. "He says he won't wear it," she had said, handing back his new school cap at his school.

"Then he must leave," said the headmaster.

Mother consulted with Willmouse and, "He would rather leave," said mother and Willmouse left, until Uncle William heard.

"Why can't I go to a girls' school?" asked Willmouse. "They don't have caps and perhaps I could wear my muff."

"Gordon's ghost!" said Uncle William.

The muff was white fur lined with satin; Willmouse had bought it with the money Uncle William gave him for his fifth birthday.

"What did you buy, boy? A cricket bat? A train?"

"A muff," said Willmouse.

"Gordon's ghost!" said Uncle William. We never discovered who the ghost was, but Willmouse often made Uncle William say things like "Gordon's ghost!" and "The only boy amongst them and he isn't a boy!"

Willmouse was little then, but I think we ourselves sometimes wished we had a proper boy. "He is Willmouse," said mother. That was what she understood about him, about us all, in our different ways. Perhaps if she had been left to deal with us alone there would not have been the discontent and rudeness.

I think now that the discontent was because we were never quite comfortable in Southstone and the rudeness came from the discontent. For one thing, we were much poorer than the people we knew, poor to be Uncle William's sister, nieces and nephew; and we had this curiously absent father while other girls' fathers went to offices and caught trains and belonged to the Sussex Club. Mother, too, was not like other mothers, nor like a grownup at all; she patently preferred being with Vicky or Willmouse or any of us to playing bridge, or organizing bazaars. We were odd, belonging and not belonging, and odd is an uncomfortable thing to be. I know now it was not good for us to live in Southstone. We should not have been so odd somewhere bigger, in London perhaps.

"In London," said Joss dreamily, "you can be anyone. You never know whom you are sitting next to. He might be a beggar or a duke."

"Or a thief," said Uncle William, who had decided views on London.

"Southstone ——" I began.

"Is where you live," said Uncle William.

"It's all middle, middle, middle," I said in despair. It was. No beggars and no dukes. "Just middle."

"My dear child, that is the world."

"The world is not all middle," said Joss.

"Most of it is. Why should you be different?"

We could not think of any reason, yet we knew we were; every heartbeat told us that. "How shall we ever get out of Southstone?" I asked Joss in despair.

Then we were rude to mother again and she took us to Les Oeillets.

I do not know what it was that drove her to it. Probably Joss and I had been more than usually difficult and unkind, for I had followed Joss in this new bullying of mother, of being horrid to Hester and snapping at the Littles, of criticizing: "Oh, mother! You are so slow." . . . "Do we have to have that disgusting old tea cozy?" . . . "Must you wear that hat?"

FINDERS KEEPERS

By DOROTHY LEE RICHARDSON

In Wissahickon woods one winter day
We found, encased in ice, a dollar bill,
Thawed it and spent it; and I have it still
In the soft old wallet of my memory,

From which, when feeling poor, I take it out
And buy again a ticket to the creek
(Half black, half frozen), buy, to paint your cheek
Bright red again, the wind's rude slap and shout,

And buy our supper at the Valley Inn,
Whose gable blessed us with a shaken shock
Of snow as we went in to spend our luck
On food, fire, shadow where your hand brushed mine

With tentative touch; for that was long ago
In time of reticence, when, like path and hill,
The heart awaited thawing under snow—
And melted in your hand like the dollar bill.

We did not go away for the summer holiays—"Or any holidays," said Joss discontentedly—but spent long days on the beach, cnicking. "Must we?" asked Joss.

"I thought you liked it," said mother, but oss shuddered.

Our picnics were even more family ones an most; we had baskets and bags bulging ith bathing towels and vacuum flasks, and dreadful aluminum food container, brought ome by father from India, that was always oming apart in the street. We had to wear hat we called our scarecrows, old faded-out atched cottons. "I can't help it," said mother, I can't let your good clothes get covered ith salt and oil."

"We haven't any good clothes," said Joss.

Mother was gentle, but that day we went o far. I do not remember what we did, but e lost her temper. "You are abominably lfish," she said.

When she was angry she did not go white as oss did; she went pink. "You never think of nyone but yourselves."

We stared. Whom else should we think of?

"Everyone tells me you are badly brought p and it's true."

"You brought us up," said Joss.

"It's true," repeated mother.

"What are you going to do about it?" I sked as insolently as I could, and Hester ole a hand into hers.

"I shall do something."

"What?"

Mother took a deep breath. "I shall take ou to the battlefields of France."

"The battlefields of France!"

We were still speaking rudely, but it was eble, the last intermittent gunfire before surender. "Why?"

"So that you can see what other people have iven," said mother, "given for your sakes; nd what other people will do in sacrifice. erhaps that will make you ashamed and ake you think. And Saint Joan," said nother, "Saint Joan at the stake. We shall op at wherever it was and see where she was urned."

"Oh, mother! Not in the middle of the summer holidays!"

"Holidays or not," said mother, and shut er lips.

"Pooh! You haven't enough money," said oss, but she sounded a little frightened.

"I shall use the legacy."

"The legacy is for college," said Joss.

"This is college," said mother; "it is education. You need to learn . . . what I cannot each you," said mother, her voice quivering.

She did not ask Uncle William's advice. he went to Mr. Stillbotham.

Mr. Stillbotham was an elderly theosophist who spent his winters in the South of France; ve admired him for that and thought him distinguished with his silver hair, pince-nez, lue-and-white-striped shirts and bow ties. ltogether he seemed a suitable person to adise us.

"You wish to visit your dead?" he asked hen mother told him about the battlefields. They are not dead but liv——" But for the urpose of our visit mother needed them dead nd she cut him short.

"Can you tell us of a hotel, not too expenive, and near the cemeteries?" she said.

"Les Oeillets at Vieux-Moutiers." That was he first time we heard its name. "You will ind plenty of motors at the station."

Saint Joan had been burned, it seemed, at Rouen. "But you can break your journey here if you go by Newhaven-Dieppe, which will be cheaper," said Mr. Stillbotham, "or if ou preferred it, you could spend the afternoon in Paris."

Spend the afternoon in Paris! Saint Joan ad not the slightest chance after that. "I hall see the Louvre," said Joss.

"I shall see the shops," said Willmouse nd, as always when he was stirred, his face ent white.

"Do you remember those strawberry tarts, ittle strawberries in syrup, that father once rought back?" asked Vicky. "They came rom Paris," she said reverently.

Hester and I, as usual, were far more ordinary; she would be happy buying post cards nd taking snapshots with her box camera, while I, the chameleon, would be with them all in turns. We were all equally excited.

"If you listen to me ——" said Uncle William, but nobody listened.

"Very well," said Uncle William. "When you get into trouble, don't ask me for help."

"We shall not need help," said mother, dignified; but the day before we left she was bitten on the leg by a horsefly. "A little fly," said Hester, "to do all that!"

When mother took down her stocking in the train from Dieppe, the leg was swollen and the skin looked purple, green and blue. "Like a bruise," said Hester. "Did you bruise it? All over?" she finished uncertainly.

Mother shook her head. She fumbled with her handbag as if she could not control her hands and she shivered, although she was hot.

"You are ill," said Joss accusingly, and mother could not deny it.

It was altogether a disappointing as well as a dismaying day. In Paris we did not see the Louvre, nor the shops, nor eat strawberry tarts. We did not buy a single post card, nor take a photograph; we waited in the waiting room for mother to get well. "Why didn't you go to Cook's? The American Express? Any of them would have helped you." Uncle William has asked us that often, but Joss and I had then only one idea: to get mother, ourselves and our suitcases to Les Oeillets.

There was a train at seven. I remember I went to a food wagon and bought rolls and sausage. I did not know what else to buy and Joss would not go. "But you are the eldest," I said.

"You are the best at French," said Joss.

Like a herd we drew together and sniffed the sausage; we had not smelled garlic before and we gave it to the attendant; we ate the rolls.

I remember when Vicky touched mother's leg, mother gave a little scream and quickly bit her lip. "Don't worry," she said in a moment, "one is not sent anything one can't bear," but she had to bite her lip again.

I do not remember the train, only that Mr. Stillbotham had been wrong and there were no taxis at the station.

"But mother can't walk," said Hester.

"She must." A terrible hardness had come upon us. We took her by her arms. She moaned and stumbled, and Hester wept. At last we came to the gates.

As we waited after the porter rang the bell, I moved away from the others. Through the gates I could see a courtyard with gravel round a square of grass in front of the house. To the side, paths led away into the trees. I could smell a summer smell of cut grass and, near me, some flower scent that was heady and sweet; a white flower, I thought, jessamine or syringa. After the city and train my skin was cinder-dry and the air was gratefully cool against my face. I was filled with a sense of peace. This was the Hôtel des Oeillets, real, not the mirage; we had arrived.

"L'hôtel n'accepte pas les malades," said Mme. Corbet.

"Does that mean she won't take sick people?" I asked Joss.

"I think it does."

The office at Les Oeillets was off the stairs. There was just room behind the counter for a safe, a keyboard with pigeonholes for letters, and Mme. Corbet's desk with its telephone and account books. Now we—Joss, Hester, Willmouse, Vicky and I—stood in front of the grille; Willmouse's eyes were just level with the counter; only the top of Vicky's hat showed.

The staircase was paneled in pale green, riddled with curious holes, but the holes did not take away from its elegance. The hall was elegant too. The banister rail was dark polished wood, the banisters thin and white; in the wall were crystal wall lamps that matched the chandelier in the hall. We looked at that, amazed, for we had never seen a chandelier in a house. The hall had a squared marble floor; its chairs were gilt with faded brocade cushions.

In that hall our fiber suitcases looked cheap. We had other luggage even more vulgar: a basket, a brown paper parcel of the Littles' Wellington boots, an untidy heap of raincoats with their belts hanging; and we all

CONTINUED ON PAGE 62

Will you "weather the winter" in good health?

During the stormy, disagreeable winter months, the usual seasonal illnesses . . . especially colds, pneumonia and influenza . . . may strike with increasing frequency. And this winter brings another variety of influenza—"Asian flu."

The symptoms of "Asian flu" are much like those of other "grippy" colds . . . fever, marked tiredness, and aching, especially in the back and legs. Should these symptoms occur, call your doctor, go to bed . . . and stay there until he tells you that the likelihood of complications is over.

According to the Public Health Service, "Asian flu" has thus far been a relatively mild disease of short duration. Barring complications, doctors recommend home care rather than hospital treatment.

"Asian flu," like a severe cold, can lead to pneumonia. Medical science, however, has become increasingly skillful in treating pneumonia with antibiotic drugs. Today, all but a very small proportion of pneumonia cases are saved. But treatment must be started promptly by your doctor to bring pneumonia under control quickly.

How you combat any respiratory disease depends a lot on your physical condition. While it is wise to maintain your general health in every way, it is equally wise to take preventive measures which may help guard against all respiratory infections.

Keep away from crowds as much as you can.

Guard against chilling and dress warmly.

Avoid people who have respiratory disease.

Cover your coughs and sneezes with paper tissues.

Dispose of used tissues immediately.

Wash your hands thoroughly before eating.

Wash eating utensils in hot, "sudsy" water, scald them in boiling water and let them drain dry or use disposable cups and dishes.

Isolate any member of your family who has cold or flu-like symptoms.

Your doctor may also advise vaccination against "Asian flu."

Be sure to stay in bed as long as your doctor recommends. If you stay "out of circulation," others will be protected from your infection.

Since sickness may occur at any time in any family, someone in every household should know the principles of home nursing. Metropolitan's new Home Nursing Handbook explains what you can do for a sick person's comfort, contentment and recovery. Use the coupon below to get your free copy by mail.

COPYRIGHT 1957—METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company

(A MUTUAL COMPANY)

1 MADISON AVE., NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.
1 Madison Ave., N. Y. 10, N. Y.

Please mail me a free copy of your booklet "Home Nursing Handbook," 1-58-J

Name_____

Street_____

City_____ State_____

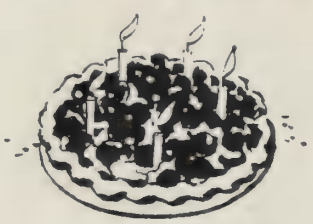
Help yourself to Betty Crocker's newest "Pull-Out" Cook Book!

28 pages of party recipes and ideas from Betty Crocker's kitchens—Betty Crocker's Bisquick Party Book.

It pulls out, easily!

A Whole Book of New Bisquick Recipes

Betty Crocker's Bisquick Party Book—28 bright pages of ideas fo entertaining . . . around the clock, around the year! Easy, gay, and good with Bisquick!



"So many of your letters ask for ideas for entertaining . . . and so many have been saying 'thank you' for our first Bisquick Cook Book . . . that here is the result!

"This gay little book brings you the newest of the new from our kitchens. It fairly bubbles with ideas for parties of all kinds and sizes, from family birthday parties to midnight company snacks.

"I think you'll enjoy using it as much as we enjoyed making it for you!"

...Betty Crocker

SPARKLING IDEAS FOR ALL KINDS OF PARTIE

It's a Birthday!
New! Birthday Party Pie! Page 18

"After the Game" Party
Try Hamburger-Onion Pie. Page 9

TV Lap Supper
The news is Biscuitburgers! Page 17

Bridge Luncheon Idea
They'll talk about Tuna Royals. Page 10

Pull it out and keep it! Betty Crocker's newest "Pull-Out"* Cook Book!

Pull it out and keep it! This newest cook book from Betty Crocker belongs with your copy of Betty Crocker's Picture Cook Book, her Bisquick Cook Book, and your copy of Good and Easy . . . all by the same famous author.

If Betty Crocker's Bisquick Party Book has been removed from the magazine, you have a right to feel left out! To get your own free copy, watch at the grocery store for special Bisquick boxes with the same cook book attached or write Betty Crocker, Department 820, 623 Marquette Avenue, Minneapolis 2, Minn.

*

HOW TO REMOVE AND TRIM THIS COOK BOOK

Grasping the entire cook book, lift it half way up from the page and pull gently. Or cut from the magazine with knife or scissors.

Trim the extra half inch with scissors, to keep the pages even.

nd Party Ideas from Betty Crocker!

The Secret of A Good Party. The secret is a calm hostess! That's why you'll find Bisquick such a grand party help. You're well started when you open the box, so you waste no energy on routine mixing, and there's time for the festive touches. Notice how many of the foods in this little book can be prepared ahead of time, so you can meet your guests calmly and assured!

Kaffee Klatch!
New! Coffee-Nut Puffs! Page 23

Refreshments at Midnight
17 new ideas on pages 14 and 15!

Teenagers' Special
The most! Pizza Boats! Page 17

"Come for Dessert!"
Glamorous and new: Josephines. Page 18

Just one look at this new Cook Book and you'll agree . . .

Bisquick's going to help you more Than any other package in the grocery store!

General Mills

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 59

carried treasures. Joss', of course, were neat, a drawing board strapped to her wooden paintbox. Hester had her camera, Willmouse his scrapbooks and workbox packed up with Miss Dawn and Dolores, while Vicky had Nebuchadnezzar in a basket. Nebuchadnezzar was a pig made out of a potato, with matchstick eyes and legs; she had made him at school and carried him about ever since, though he was beginning to shrivel a little. "When he is quite shriveled I shall eat him," said Vicky. Mother, sitting on a chair, leaned her head back and shut her eyes and her face seemed as mottled now as her leg. As for us, we were crumpled, untidy and dirty. I could see that we were not at all the kind of family that would be an ornament to any hotel.

"I expect a doctor will come and take our mother to hospital," Joss said in English.

"L'hôtel n'accepte pas les enfants seuls."

"She won't take children by themselves."

"But if we are by ourselves?" said Hester.

Mme. Corbet sat behind the grille with the hotel books spread out round her. On this hot evening she was wearing a black high-necked blouse; a black crochet shawl with bobbles was crossed on her shoulders. Her hair was in two black snakes coiled in a knot on the top of her head and she had a mustache of heavy black down on which Willmouse, straining to look over the counter, had instantly fixed his eyes. All the time we were talking I saw him examining it.

Joss was desperate. I knew that by her white face and the bigness of her eyes. "S'il vous plait, aidez-nous," she said. I knew how difficult it was for her to humble herself, but Mme. Corbet only shrugged so that the topknot and the bobbles of her shawl danced.

"Et qu'est-ce que je peux y faire, moi? Je ne suis pas la patronne. Je suis Mme. Corbet, c'est tout." She said that as if to be Mme. Corbet was something derogatory.

"If it is not your hotel, where is"—Joss consulted the paper Mr. Stillbotham had given us—"where is Mlle. de Presle?"

"Mlle. Zizi? Elle va dîner au château de Méry."

Joss and I looked at each other. Did she say going out to dinner? In Southstone we had supper at seven o'clock; now it was nearly ten.

"Au château de Méry," repeated Mme. Corbet impressively.

The maid who had helped with our luggage and who was now waiting on the stairs rolled up her eyes and crossed herself; she was pert and Mme. Corbet spoke sharply.

"Y sont des amis ——"

"Amis means friends," I told Hester. "Mlle. de Presle is going to a big house, a château, that might mean a castle, to friends."

"Des amis à Monsieur Eliot," said the maid. Why did she say "Mr. Eliot's friends" so meaningly?

Mme. Corbet ignored her. To us she said, "They say the president of the Board of Trade is to be there," and I thought, So! She can speak English.

"Then we can't see Mlle. de Presle?" asked Joss.

"Naturally not."

"But what can we do?"

Mme. Corbet shrugged. "Vous feriez bien d'aller au commissariat."

Commissariat? What was that? We looked at one another mystified. "Police," said the hotel boy Paul from his place on the landing, "go police."

Joss' face flamed as though Mme. Corbet had slapped it. "Come," she said to us.

We left the counter and followed Joss across the hall, walking round the two big Alsatian dogs that lifted their dark furred faces; one wagged its tail: it was the first sign of friendliness Les Oeillets had given us.

The porter had gone and I do not know how we should have managed, but at that moment a white door on the landing opened and Mlle. Zizi and Eliot came out.

It was the first time we had seen anyone in "tails." Uncle William had a dinner jacket, of course, but our vision had gone no further than that. I say "tails" because it was at Eliot we looked. It seems strange now that, seeing a man and a woman both in full evening dress, we looked at the man first, but there was no question about it. Hester gave a little gasp.

"Were you ever a sailor?" Joss asked Eliot afterward. I knew what she meant; he was tall and brown and lean, as were sailors in magazine pictures. His eyes even had lines at the sides as if he had wrinkled them looking at the sun. "Were you a sailor?"

"Probably," said Eliot.

"Don't you know?" asked Hester, incredulous.

"I know that I was a soldier," said Eliot. "Tinker, tailor, soldier, sailor, rich man, poor man ——" but Hester interrupted him.

"You can't have been everything," she said.

"I pretty well was," said Eliot.

We took it for granted that his eyes were blue. His hair was brown, a little grizzled. His face had curious high cheekbones. "From my Chinese grandmother," he told us solemnly. We believed him and it still seems to me now that his hands and feet were so small as to be Oriental. "I am descended from Genghis Khan," he was to tell us, and Hester asked: "Who was Genghis Khan?"

"A fearful Tartar," said Eliot, smoothing her hair.

His clothes were so impeccable—that was a word I liked and had taught to Willmouse—that they looked as if he had just bought them. He had a carnation in his buttonhole, a dark red one, and it seemed to symbolize Eliot for us. We could smell its clove scent and it was heady.

Behind him came Mlle. Zizi. When we looked at her we were struck dumb with shyness because Mlle. Zizi was . . . "bare," whispered Hester. Arms, neck and shoulders, "and back and front," said Hester reluctantly. We did not know what little puritans we were until we saw Mlle. Zizi.

Privately I thought her very beautiful with her heavy dark red hair and eyes that seemed almost too enormous—like a sunflower. They were blued—"on the lids," said Hester, surprised—and her mouth was very red. What there was of her dress was gauze, black.

They came down the steps from the landing, stopped at the sight of us, and it was then that Eliot said, "Good heavens! An orphanage!"

Joss was too angry to notice that he spoke in English.

"Don't worry," she said bitingly, "we are not staying." To us she said sharply, "Come on. We will take the luggage first and come back for mother."

She walked past Eliot to the door; she had picked up two suitcases. The rest of us followed. Paul went to open the door, but Eliot stepped forward.

"Where are you going this time of night?"

"To the police." Joss' nostrils were pinched with temper.

"The police? Why?"

"Because of you French," said Joss furiously.

"I'm not French, I'm English," said Eliot.

Mother must have heard that. She gave a moan and said, "Please."

Eliot looked past us to her, and his face changed. "Zizi," he said, "she's ill."

He went quickly to mother, bent down and took her hand, feeling it as he questioned her, but after that "Please" mother did not speak again, and her head rolled against the chair.

"She's ill, Zizi," he said. "We must help."

"But . . . our dinner." Her English was pretty and clipped.

"All the same."

"But we shall be late!"

"All the same." It sounded like a command. "Irène," he called to Mme. Corbet, "ring Doctor Giroux," and to Mauricette, "Open the rooms."

I heard Mme. Corbet pick up the telephone; the maid shrugged and went to the keyboard. Paul took the suitcases from Joss, but Mlle. Zizi stayed where she had been, at the foot of the steps, her beautiful dress held up.

To wake for the first time in a new place can be like another birth. I think that to me it was perhaps more startling than to most people because, for as long as I could remember, I had woken each morning in the same bedroom in Belmont Road, that essentially English bedroom with its wallpaper faded to a gray-blue pattern; to the same white curtains and blue linoleum, the brown rug worn in places so that the white showed through the brown; to the same white enameled iron beds.

This morning my ears were filled with a high clear sound broken into small sharp edges; it was a little while before I knew it was from birds. The room was filled with dim light; the ceiling was high and the walls far away, for it was a big room. I made out the top of a green shutter and then saw that the shutters ran from the ceiling to a floor of plain polished boards without a rug. I was in an immense bed, and beside me lay Willmouse.

I swung my legs over the edge of the bed and slipped down; the boards were cool under my feet as I walked to the window. After a few moments I found how the shutters opened and threw them back.

I was looking into the tops of the trees; at first I thought the house was ringed with them, then I saw that it was only a poplar in front of the window. I could see farther away serried rows of fruit trees, some of them heavy with fruit. Perhaps it was this first sight that made me always think of the garden at Les Oeillets as green, green and gold as was that whole countryside of the Marne where, beyond the town, the champagne vineyards stretched for miles along the river, vineyards and cherry orchards, for this was cherry country, too, famous for cherries in liqueur. Mother had been thinking of the battlefields; I am sure she had not meant to bring us to a luxury corner of France where the trees and the vines changed almost symbolically in the autumn to gold.

We were not to see that, nor did I know anything about it as I stood by the open window; yet, from the garden, I had a foretaste of that green-and-amber time and a sense of the countryside in the haze that lay around the town. I could not see the town behind the trees, only a glimpse of houses climbing a hill that had a building on it, a ruined castle or château with ramparts and a tower. The houses were yellow-white, jumbled below the ramparts. I guessed they spread down to what must be a river, for there was the chugging sound of a boat. The river, I thought, must be on the other side of the orchard.

Our rooms were on the second floor, and if I looked directly down I could see a flight of iron steps with a scrolled iron railing leading from a terrace along the house into a garden that seemed to be made of gravel and small flower beds. Beyond it a low box hedge bounded a wilderness of grass and shrubs and trees. Beyond the wilderness was what seemed to be an orchard, and in its high wall a blue door. As I looked at the door, a barge hooted from the river.

The garden was light, but it was a young light without sun, clear and stained green by the shrubs and trees. The peace I had felt at the gates of Les Oeillets filled me again and I could have whistled like the birds for well-being and joy. Then, as I stood there in my pajamas looking down, a man came down the iron steps. He was an old man with white hair and a small white beard; from above he looked nearly square. He wore blue cotton trousers, a white coat and a beret—men wearing berets still looked strange to me. He was carrying many things: something that looked like an easel with long legs, a camp stool, a case, and a bulging white cotton umbrella. He seemed in a hurry; I watched him scurry across the gravel, disappear in the wilderness. Then he was at the far blue door where he had to put everything down to open it.

"That was Monsieur Joubert," said Eliot when I asked him, "Monsieur Joubert going out to catch the first light."

"Who is Monsieur Joubert?"

"A painter."

"A very famous painter," said Mlle. Zizi. "Even an ignorant little English girl should have heard of Marc Joubert."

"He didn't look famous," I said in defense. "He was wearing funny clothes and he looked"—I tried to think how to express his scurrying haste—"anxious."

"He probably was," said Eliot. "It's only for a short while that the light stays like that. I

CONTINUED ON PAGE 64

Peach Baskets owe their glamour to gloriously juicy, tree-ripened Del Monte Peaches

All the wonderful things peaches can do to brighten any dish, DEL MONTE Peaches can do best! It just stands to reason. They're always the golden, juicy, ever-so-tender kind that has made DEL MONTE the world's best-liked peach brand.

Tree-ripening—that's one big factor. It takes Nature just so long to create the lovely color, rich flavor and fine texture you find in DEL MONTE Brand Peaches. And we never cut her short.

So serve them as you will, when you will—in desserts, salads, or just plain. DEL MONTE Peaches are sure to do right by you always.

PEACH BASKETS

1 loaf pound cake or unsliced white bread
1 can (15 oz.) sweetened condensed milk
1½ cups shredded coconut
6 DEL MONTE Peach Halves
12 gum drop leaves (if desired)

Cut 6 slices (¾-in. thick) from cake or bread. Cut off crusts to make 3-in. squares. Scoop a shallow 2-in. circle in top of each. Spread top and sides with condensed milk; dip in coconut. Bake on well-greased cooky sheet in moderately hot oven (375°F.) about 10 min. or till toasty brown. Take from pan; cool on rack. At serving time, place peach halves in hollows. (Add gum drops rolled flat between waxed paper and serve with whipped cream, if desired.) Serves 6.

Del Monte® Peaches

Halves or Sliced

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 62

have a belief," and I remember Eliot sounded defiant, as if a belief were a strange thing to have, "that as soon as a human goes out into the morning it is spoiled—except a Monsieur Joubert or," and his eyes looked at us thoughtfully, "perhaps children."

"Do you like children so much?" asked Mlle. Zizi.

"I don't know any," said Eliot.

Now I watched M. Joubert without knowing his name. The blue door shut with a distant bang and I heard another sound close beside me, in the next room, and I knew what had wakened me. It was Joss in the little room off our bedroom—she had chosen it, though they had meant it for Willmouse—the sound was Joss having an attack.

"Nerves," mother used to say of these, but Uncle William said they were bilious. Probably both were right. The attacks came at the most inconvenient times, and as I listened the day began to foreclose on me; it must, I knew, be a difficult day, and now Joss was useless. I went in, and she was as I knew I should find her, retching, her skin a curious green-yellow, her eyes looking as though they were bursting with pain. Now she would have to be in a darkened room for days, and I would have to be responsible for everything.

"Perhaps it was the soup," I said as I held her head.

"I . . . didn't . . . eat the soup."

"Shall I get mother?" I asked Joss.

"Don't be silly. There is a nun in her room."

"A nun?" Prickles of superstition swept over me. "Then . . . is she dying?"

"Don't be sil-ly," but Joss' voice was fainter. "Lots of hospital nurses are nuns—especially in France."

"How do you know?"

"The madame told me—I went in last night," but she had sunk from the washing stand onto the bed and could not talk any more. In a moment she had to struggle up again. I helped her and when it was over she lay back, her skin clammy, her eyes closed. "If you could get a basin or a bucket," Joss whispered, "I could manage in bed."

"From where?" I said, appalled.

"Downstairs. There must be one. Go and look."

"In someone else's house?"

"It isn't a house. It's a hotel."

I shrank from it, but I had to go. "What is the French for bucket?" I asked.

The stairs creaked as I came down, though I crept carefully. I remember the surprise of the bullet holes; in the daylight I saw that the pale green paint was pocked with them. "Of course," Mlle. Zizi often explained. "They machine-gunned the stairs."

"And the marks are still there!" the visitors used to say in wonder.

"As you see," and Mlle. Zizi would smile with pride.

"If it were my house," Joss said, "I should have filled them up at once."

Now I came down cautiously because of the two dogs, but when I saw them I felt a coward. They knew I had been accepted the night before and they lifted their faces and moved their tails.

I had had another timid idea that Mme. Corbet would be in the office, but the grille was locked, the counter bare, and the hall was empty. Next to it on the right was a large open room with a bar and, at the garden end, what must have been a conservatory, leading through glassed doors to the terrace. The big room had small iron tables, and chairs painted green. The bar was covered with white dust sheets. On the left of the hall were doors and a sign that said "Restaurant." At the back was a baize-covered door that must, I thought, lead to the kitchen.

When I had pushed it open I did not have far to go. At the end of a short passage was a table stacked with flower vases and bowls. I took a bowl and, almost before the door had stopped swinging, was back into the hall where I patted the dogs. I had turned upstairs when the white door on the landing opened and a man came out. He was wearing a silk patterned dressing gown—like an actor's, I thought—leather slippers, and was smoking a cigarette. It was Eliot.

We both stopped abruptly. I knew how I must look, my raincoat bundled round me, blue-and-white-striped pajamas showing, bare feet, and my hair tied back with a blue ribbon like a baby's. Then I forgot about myself, staring at him. This was another Eliot than the kind Englishman of last night; someone cold and . . . ruthless, I thought. That was a strange word to come into my head when I did not know the meaning of "ruth." "Eliot's eyes are not blue," Hester was to say. "They are green-gray, like pebbles." Now, close to him on the stairs, I saw they were gray and coldly angry. "What are you doing down here?"

I showed the bowl. "Joss, my sister, is ill."

BOTTLE

Herdsmen of ancient times developed a splendid way to store liquids. Using the whole skin of a goat, they learned a fine container could be made when it was sewn so that one open leg would serve as a spigot. Such gear was widely used in the Near East, then adopted by Greeks and Romans. Among the latter, the device took its name from that of the thick hide from which it was made. Metal and glass containers were known to Egyptians, but did not become common until modern times. As a result, any narrow-neck vessel of whatever composition is given the name of its leather ancestor and called a bottle.

WEBB B. GARRISON

"Children!" he said. He put his hand behind him and closed the door, leaning against it. Then he was more kind. "Eaten too much?"

"She is not that kind of sister," I said and went on upstairs.

It was a day or two afterward that, when for some reason we wanted Eliot, I said, "I shall fetch him," and crossed the hall to the landing and the white door.

"Where are you going?" asked Hester.

"To his room."

"That is not Eliot's room," said Hester. "That is Mlle. Zizi's."

"Who let that man into my room?" asked Joss.

It was after tea on that first strange day—"Only there wasn't any tea," said Vicky; we had not learned about the French children's goûter yet—it was what should have been after tea, that Eliot looked at us sitting forlornly round a table in the bar and asked, "Shouldn't there be one more of you?" Then he had asked me to take him to see Joss.

She lay stiff and flat in the bed while he was in the room; her hair was spread on the pillow, and in the gloom of the closed shutters her sick face looked small as a turnip goblin's. She might have been any age and he was as familiar as he would have been with someone as young as Vicky.

"Are you a better girl?"

She answered him in monosyllables. "Yes."

"Is there anything you want? You can have it, you know."

"No."

I think Eliot did not know quite what to do. "You were not worrying too much about your mother? We are taking care of her." No answer. Presently he went out and Joss reared up on her pillow.

"Who let him in?"

"I . . . did."

"How dared you?"

"But . . . he is in charge of us."

"Cha——" She looked at me in astonishment. "Who said so?"

"Mother. She asked him."

"She always was an idiot!" said Joss.

The sickness had started again. I waited while she retched miserably into the bowl by the bed. At last she lay back exhausted and, wearily accustomed, I brought her face flannel and wiped the sweat off her face and hands and dried them. As soon as she could speak she croaked, "You must . . . tell mother."

I stood by the bed holding the towel. "I can't tell mother," I said. "Joss, they—they have taken her to the hospital."

Joss had been too ill to know. As soon as I was dressed I had gone and knocked softly on mother's door. It had opened and Joss had been right, the nun was there. I had not been close to a nun before and gazed at her, startled. She put her finger to her lips and shook her head. Pinpricked all over with fear, I tiptoed away.

Then Hester and Vicky came in asking for breakfast. "There isn't any," I said, quailing, but they insisted there was plenty downstairs and in the end I had to take them and find the dining room. Willmouse had gone there already. In the big room I tried to be as traveled and self-contained as even Joss could have wished, but there were Hester's clear unabashed voice and Vicky's obstinacy about food.

"I want breakfast," she said. I gave her coffee and a croissant. "This isn't breakfast," said Vicky. "I want a negg."

"You can't have eggs for breakfast in France."

"Of course you can," Eliot was to say. "Lots of people ask for them." Vicky, as usual, got her way and I had to ask not only for an egg but for milk and jam.

It was Paul who brought them—I soon learned that Mauricette would seldom bother herself to wait on us—Paul was a tall, thin, dirty and greasy boy dressed in blue cotton trousers and a ragged shirt. He wore the white apron and the gray-white canvas shoes he had worn last night. His shirt had the sleeves rolled up. He had lank, yellow hair with a lock falling over his forehead, and his face had hollows in the cheeks. I did not know about Paul in those days, but even then, in my carelessness and ignorance, I was worried by his face. We had come to see the battlefields and, though we did not know it, this face was a part of them.

Who was Paul? Nobody knew. Paul could have been English, German, French, Austrian, Russian. His mother, Mme. Corbet said contemptuously, had "gone with the soldiers."

"Gone where?" asked Hester, but nobody answered that.

"Our father's a botanist," Hester told Paul. "What's yours?"

"Un troufion," said Paul, and when we looked mystified he pretended to march and salute.

"Oh, a soldier!" I said.

"What was his name?" asked Hester, but the father did not seem to have had a name.

Paul had been found in the American camp when it was broken up; the soldiers themselves had found him and been kind. When they went home to America he was taken to the almshouse, where they put old people waiting to die, and lunatics and badly treated children from the courts. "That doesn't sound good," said Hester doubtfully.

Mme. Corbet did not seem disturbed. "Where are they to go in a little town like this?" she asked. She added that Paul was bad and ran away, the police brought him back and "Mlle. Zizi, out of her kindness, let him work here."

It did not seem very kind. Paul worked from six in the morning—or before, if there was a party for breakfast—until midnight—or after if there were dinners. He had plenty to eat—everyone near M. Armand, the chef, had that—but Paul's sleeping place was in a cupboard under the stairs, and had not even a window; the bed was planks with a straw mattress, there were a dirty pillow and the kind of blanket given to dogs.

The first morning we knew none of this. I spread Vicky's croissant with jam and poured out her cup of milk; then, copying a big Frenchman in the corner, I dipped my own croissant in the dark bitter coffee. It tasted nasty, but at least it was French.

After breakfast I sent Hester, Willmouse and Vicky out to explore. I watched them as they scampered down the alleys of the orchard and my legs itched to run, too; still, in spite of my teens, that urge to run and scamper and roll like a colt would rise in me, but with mother and Joss ill I felt as weighted with cares as Uncle William. I went out onto the terrace and stood at the top of the iron steps, holding the rail that was already warm from the sun.

I could not feel an Uncle William for long. All around me rose the sounds of this, my first real French morning. Overhead the voices of two women talked. They were the daily maids and now they flung mattresses over the sills upstairs, shook dusters and brooms.

A typewriter clacked in the office. I looked over the garden to the green dew of the wilderness and orchard, the sun haze beyond, and I could stay in no longer; slowly I went down the steps, across the gravel and through a gap in the box hedge. Stepping in dew, my head in the sun, I walked into the orchard and, before I knew what I had done, reached up to touch a greengage. It came off, warm and smooth, into my hand. After a moment I bit into the ripe golden flesh. Then I ate another, and another, until, replete with fruit and ecstasy, I went back to my post.

There was no sign of Mlle. Zizi, but presently Eliot came out. He was aloof and unapproachable. How did I know then that he had these times? I do not know but, as if the first greengage had been an Eden apple, I was suddenly older and wiser and did not try to speak to him. He passed me as if I did not exist and went out into the sun. He was wearing linen trousers, a dark blue open-necked shirt. Mauricette ran out with a deck chair for him, but he was curt with her. How wonderful to be as curt in French as in English! The ecstasy faded. I was suddenly depressed again. How inferior we were; our family had never been anywhere at all and did not know anything.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 67

OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERNS ON PAGE 53

Vogue Design No. 9390. Coat: 10–20 (31–40). 75c.

Vogue Design No. 9391. "Easy to Make" one-piece dress; 10–20 (31–40). 75c.

Vogue Design No. 9381. Slacks suit: 10–18 (31–38). 75c.

Emotional Tensions drain your skin of beauty oils—every day

he youngsters squabble . . .

The telephone rings . . . and rings

Skin authorities say the emotional tensions of your daily life can actually drain your skin of its own beauty-giving fluids. That's why by evening, your skin looks drawn and dry.

The cereal lands on the floor!

Pond's exclusive formula replaces the beauty oils that tension drains away

Brings out the beauty that is naturally yours

Something wonderful happens as you cleanse and cream your skin with Pond's Cold Cream.

Dry tension lines disappear. Instead of that tired look, your complexion "lights up." Your skin glows!

Deep-cleanses to let beauty oils in

The secret is Pond's beauty-oil formula—a cream specially designed to replace vital oils as it deep-cleanses.

After a frantic day your thirsty skin is ready to respond . . . instantly. Every tiny pore drinks in the beauty that awaits you in this famous formula.

Suddenly you are beautiful and refreshed again. You show it and feel it. Everybody notices it.

You need never be too busy to be beautiful. Let Pond's Cold Cream work this magic for you—tonight.

Today—in 37 seconds— bring out new beauty in your skin

You need never be too busy to be beautiful

with

ROUX®

brighter, "happier" haircolor!

Do you want brighter hair? darker hair? an exciting new fashion haircolor? . . .

color that lasts? or color you can gaily rinse in, shampoo out? . . .

color for your entire head? or just to touch-up some stray gray or dull-looking strands?

Whatever you desire, Roux is your answer. For Roux is America's first family of hair colorings and lighteners, both durable and temporary. Each is created to meet a specific need. And each gives the lovelier, natural looking results that make Roux the outstanding name in haircolor beauty.

Perhaps your haircolor isn't doing all you'd like for you. If you're thinking of a quick, simple answer . . .

ask your beautician why she prefers ROUX

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 64

Then Paul came out and jerked his thumb ver his shoulder for me to go to the office. Ime. Corbet sent me to fetch our passports nd Hester bobbed up and told about Uncle Villiam.

M. William John Bullock, wrote Mlle. Zizi n a slip of paper; then she opened the grille nd the flap of the counter and came out. She an upstairs and her heels sounded very deter- ined as she crossed the landing to mother's oom. My heart sank and I pushed Hester way in disgust and went up too.

Mother was a prisoner in the bed; a cage ad been put over the bad leg and she lay on er back, her eyes looking this way and that, ast Mlle. Zizi, past the nun; then she saw me nd beckoned. I slipped past the foot of the ed and knelt down. Mother whispered, but ne whisper was so thick and blurred that I ould hardly understand it. "Get the English- an, that man who was English."

Mlle. Zizi's ears were sharp. "No! You are ot to," she cried, but I had slipped out.

When Eliot came I knew how good he was. "Not good," said Hester, who was exact. "A ood person would not have done it. Not ood—kind," which was nearer our hearts.

He came in looking tall in that room of omen.

"Mais, Eliot, je t'en prie ——"

"Wait, Zizi." He bent down and mother aught his hand. I knew how hot hers were rom when she had held me, and her eyes were ull of pain. "Is there anything I can do for ou?" asked Eliot.

"Don't let them." It was the same thick hisper. "Mr. Eliot, don't let them."

"Eliot, this is nothing to do with you."

"Please, Zizi." He bent down lower. "Don't et them what?"

Mother could look very like Hester. "Don't et them send for William."

I saw his lips twitch. "But ——"

"He will say 'I told you so,'" whispered nother.

"I see," said Eliot. "Yes. I understand."

"But she has to go to hospital," cried Mlle. Zizi. "Bon Dieu! Et si elle allait mourir?" She ent on so fast that I could not keep up, but Eliot, while the stream of French went on, ept mother's hand.

"But what can I tell Irène?" said Mlle. Zizi. I think she and Eliot spoke in English ometimes because they did not want the ervants to understand, but they mixed it: ometimes one would ask a question in Eng- ish, the other answer it in French, or the ther way round. "What can I tell Irène?"

"That you can put two into a single room nd charge for both."

"Eliot, you are laughing at me."

"Not laughing, predicting."

"But, can they pay?" asked Mlle. Zizi. "They do not look as if they had much."

"If they can't, I will."

"Have you so much money, Eliot?"

He did not tell her. "It comes and goes." Eliot said something else, something odd nd . . . not pleasant, I thought: "Those chil- dren can be useful."

"How useful?"

"Stop people talking."

"Let them talk," said Mlle. Zizi.

"Don't be silly, Zizi. This is a little town nd you have to live in it. The children will give me a reason for being here—I'm their guardian. They can be camouflage."

I did not like our being camouflage and he was right about the rooms. Hester and Vicky slept one each end of a single bed, and Joss was in our dressing room, which was not really a bedroom at all. We were not allowed to use the bathrooms and our only lavatory was the one we called the Hole, because it was in a cubbyhole opening off the stairs. Mme. Corbet charged us for towels and soap; when I went that first morning to the desk to ask for some lemon water for Joss, Mme. Corbet already had two pages on the ledger marked 15, 16 and 16A and there were several entries in her spider-fine writing. The lemon would be written in at once.

Paul kept the bar in the afternoons and Mme. Corbet called to him to get it. "Alors vous restez?" he asked, looking me over.

"Yes, we are staying," I said coldly. I added sarcastically in French—I was determined to speak French to Paul—that I hoped it would not derange him.

He shrugged, and Paul's shrug was indescribably rude. "Les enfants trouvés, y faut b'en s'en occuper, hein?" he said, and turned to take the slip for the lemon to the desk before he gave the glass to me.

I had caught "found children"; That means "strays," I thought . . . strays! and as he went he pulled my hair.

There was no one in the hall but ourselves, no one to remind me I was big, almost grown-up. Suddenly I had had enough of Paul. I ran after him and hit him as hard as I could on the jaw. He was so surprised he almost fell; the lemon water went spinning across the hall, and his apron slipped as he clutched at the newel on the steps leading to the landing; then, holding to the post, he bent forward and looked at me; the lock of hair had fallen farther over his eyes and they gleamed through it like an animal's. "So," said Paul, "so."

"Yes. So," I said.

He came at me, but I was waiting. Paul was tall, but he was gangling, while I was a Bullock and all Bullocks were solid and strong. I got one more hit in on his chest, then his arms were like a flail hitting me and he knocked me over; in a moment we were both on the ground, rolling and scratching. I remember him pounding my head on the marble, when Mme. Corbet screamed and people came running. I saw Mauricette's legs, black skirt and apron before my own blood blinded me as I dug my thumbs into Paul's throat until we were taken like kittens by the scruffs of our necks and shaken apart.

It was the chef. I could smell the grease on his white clothes and had a startling view of his fat cheeks, polished black mustache and high white cap.

Eliot's voice came. "Let them go," he said, and the chef dropped us—again like kittens—and we stood in the middle of them all, breathing hard and glaring at each other. Eliot looked at us amused and passed me his handkerchief; I was very much ashamed.

I thought he would say something about my being a girl, even a young lady, but he did not. I suppose that to him we were two young animals. "Next time," he said, "fight in the garden. This is a lady's house," and he said it in French for Paul, "Vous êtes ici chez une dame comme il faut." Paul made a rude noise. "Chez une dame comme il faut," repeated Eliot, "et vous tiendrez comme il faut."

Late that evening I met Paul again. At dusk the garden greenness took on a richer light, as if the rays of the sunset stayed there prisoned by the walls. The dogs lay out on the warm gravel, voices came more gently from the house, everything was filled with peace. I had come to find Vicky—I guessed she was with M. Armand, whom she had instantly adopted—to put her to bed.

Paul was sitting on a stone step outside the kitchen. I did not know whether to pass him or go back through the house; that would have looked a retreat and I decided to pass him, though I was trembling. As I came nearer he stood up.

All right. If you want to fight, I thought, but . . . "Please, mees," he said and pulled out a crumpled paper packet of the horrible-smelling cigarettes he smoked, and held them out to me.

I expect I blushed—no one had ever offered me a cigarette before—then I saw it was not condescension; he was offering them as to an equal. I took one. I did not know at all how I should smoke it, but was immensely flattered. Paul struck a match for me; I took my first puff and choked; he patted me on the back, and then we were sitting down together on the steps.

When I went up to Joss, she drew away across the bed and said, "Whew!"

"It's a Gauloise, a French cigarette." I tried to sound careless, but Joss' look remained cold and she said icily, "You seem to have settled in here very quickly."

We had settled. After that first disrupted day we might have been in Vieux-Moutiers all our lives. This old French town was so small that one could not get lost, though it had a maze of tiny cobbled lanes around the place where the market was held twice a week in front of the Hôtel de Ville, as we learned to call the town hall.

The Hôtel de Ville was sixteenth century and the upper town was crowned by the monastery whose ramparts I had seen from my window; besides a monastery it was a prison and held the old Donjon St. Pierre. There was a gate through which Saint Joan had ridden with Charles VII and I heard an American visitor read out from his guidebook, "'She had probably heard Mass in the chapel, and the horse block from which she mounted her horse still stands in the courtyard.'"

It was altogether a poet's town. M. Joubert made us see that; he was working on two canvases, a morning one and one that he began after four o'clock when the light turned more gold. Looking at those paintings, watching as they slowly came to life, we saw the colors of the houses along the riverbank and up the hill, the faint varyings of the shabby plaster, the pink and gray-green of the paint as it blistered on doors and shutters; I do not think there was a newly painted house in the whole town. We saw the shadows of the river, the black, white and scarlet reflections of a barge eddying in the water, reflections of houses, trees, fishermen, children.

In Vieux-Moutiers we were foreigners, which was more comfortable than being odd; the town was accustomed to tourists and nobody stared at us. We were as insignificant as grass under trees, under the light and shadow of the grownups.

We had, too, been chiefly with girls and women, and had been ruled by mother, who made a private child's world for us; now suddenly we were surrounded by a public and almost rude life. Mme. Corbet told us not to go beyond the gates at night because on the bridge into the town sometimes there were drunken men; we often heard their uncertain singing. M. Joubert was painting a picture—a picture to hang in a public gallery—of Robert's wife, suckling her baby. In the kitchen we saw Paul pull Mauricette down on his lap and then M. Armand would turn round and give Paul a box on the ear and pull Mauricette to him and kiss her himself. "With those mustaches it must prick," said Hester, which was a little girl's view, while I had become as stretched and as sensitive as an Indian with his ear to the ground, or the needle in a compass, to these doings. The sound of those loud kisses seemed to go on and on in my ears; but that was nothing to the way I watched how Mlle. Zizi would catch at Eliot as he went by, and how he would kiss her hand or her arm or her neck, sometimes her mouth. Eliot and Mlle. Zizi—and Mme. Corbet—made an intense drama for me.

It was Paul who told us about the drama. We could speak little French, he had no more than a word or two of American English and yet Paul, as he sat with us on the kitchen steps those summer evenings, was like a flood lamp, illuminating everyone at Les Oeillets in the most garish possible colors.

When I say "us" I mean Hester and me. Willmouse and Vicky had other interests. France and Mlle. Zizi had given Willmouse new ideas and he was busily making a new collection; his atelier was a grass bank in the orchard under a cherry tree. Vicky had attached herself to M. Armand, who gave her titbits from morning to night. If Joss had not still been ill we should not have seen so much of Paul—"I do not talk to kitchen boys," she said—but her bout of sickness would not stop. "It is the shock," said the doctor. It was more than shock; she had one of her womanly times; "Eve's curse" we called it. The doctor came to see her twice and talked of moving her to be with mother; in French hospitals, it seemed, there was a bed for a relation in private rooms. "But your mother is too ill," said Mme. Corbet. She added that we were all a great nuisance.

There was little we could do for Joss. I made her bed and brought her barley drinks; Toinette took her cups of thin soup called bouillon; Eliot looked in on her every night for a moment; for the rest she lay in the darkened room and told us to leave her alone. It was an odd world without Joss or mother; every day Hester and I wrote notes to mother, and the Littles collected bunches of flowers which we all carried over the bridge to the hospital, passing a café called the Giraffe where Eliot often went for a drink. I do not know if mother read our notes, but not much of ourselves went into them; it was not that we did not care—at moments every day we

WHAT HAPPENS TO YOU?

By WILLIAM E. FINK

A person who will break his stride to allow someone else to pass at right angles to him will, in driving, thrust out ahead of another car or a pedestrian in the same circumstances.

A person who is considerate of and concerned with his wife's sudden attack of dizziness at home will show no concern for her nervous tremors while she is a passenger in his speeding car.

A person who will, in the spirit of good fun, squeeze into a small space on the bench of a football stadium will park his car in the spaces provided for two cars.

He will protect his family and himself with safety devices, accident insurance, and so forth, but will risk passing a car at a blind spot going uphill.

He will step aside to allow a woman—or, for that matter, a man—to precede him through a revolving door, but he will use every means to jockey out of position a luckless motorist who finds himself in the wrong lane going around a traffic circle.

He will make a fast start to retrieve a lady's dropped purse, but will let loose a terrifying blast of his horn when the same lady is unfortunate enough to stall her car when the light turns green.

He is cautious in business expansion and installment buying for his home, but will crowd the car in front of him at a reckless rate of speed.

He will self-consciously walk on the curb side of his wife during a heavy rain to protect her from the splash of passing cars, but will drive like mad through rain-swept gutters, cascading water on the sidewalks and pedestrians alike.

cared abominably and were often frightened and lost—but mother seemed to have become remote from us. That was just as well; sometimes I was a little uneasy and thought, If mother knew what we talk about —— but she did not know and I crushed the uneasiness down.

Hester asked Paul most of the questions. "Why does Mme. Corbet hate us?"

She did hate us. She even wrote the figures into our account as if the pen could poison the paper. "Pourquoi est-ce qu'elle nous déteste?"

"Parce-que c'est Eliot qui a tout arrangé."

"Eliot?"

"Si."

"Then does she hate Eliot?"

"Si."

Paul's "Si" seemed to steal into my bones and stay there; it was sinister but exciting.

"Hates Eliot? Elle déteste Eliot?" I said while Hester's calm, little-girl voice went on, "Why does she hate Eliot?"

The answer came back, "Parce qu'elle en tient pour Mlle. Zizi," and seeing I did not understand. "She lov Mlle. Zizi."

"A lady love a lady?"

We did not believe it, but "Si" said Paul.

Every evening we sat there on the steps—Paul with his Gauloise, his thin knees pointed under his apron—and from the garden, where twilight was falling, came that flower-sweet scent.

Evening after evening Hester took up the saga. "Does Eliot love—aime—Mlle. Zizi?"

"Pas lui," said Paul and laughed. "Not him."

If his "Si" had stolen into my bones, the laughing woke them up. "They should never have let you talk to that boy!" Everyone said that afterward; it was not Paul who was at fault, but my own thoughts. I was like a young novice horse that jumps too high, while Paul had been born an imp of the world, the real world. To him all this was entirely natural. "J'avais quatorze ans quand j'ai fait l'amour la première fois," he told me. At fourteen! I looked at him suspiciously, but he was not boasting. He was far more interested in lorries. "Renault, Berliet, Willème," he said as if they were unimaginably beautiful names, and looked away across the garden, his face soft with his dream.

He could not know that when he told me, small prickles seemed to be breaking out all over me and the backs of my knees felt hot. I had to persist. "You mean . . . you made love? When you were fourteen?"

He laughed and tapped my nose as one would a little animal if it were too eager. There was no doubt about it. It was I, not Paul, who was bad.

I could not help it; it was a stain spreading through my bones. I began to wonder about bones; Vicky's, I thought, must be like a chicken's, pearly-pink and blue with a little clear red. M. Joubert's, for some reason, seemed to me the same as Vicky's—perhaps they would not take a stain. "Well, he is busy," said Joss when I expounded this to her. Paul's and Hester's seemed red, too, clean and honest; Joss I did not know about and would not have dared to inquire. I wondered guiltily about mine and passed hastily on. "Mlle. Zizi's are purple," I said.

"No, mauve," said Joss.

Mme. Corbet's bones I saw as black and green, gangrenous with wicked thoughts. "And Eliot's?" asked Joss.

We were both silent. We had not the faintest idea what Eliot's would be.

One of the oddest things about Eliot was that he had nothing that helped us to understand what kind of person he was. Everyone else had things. Mlle. Zizi had her bottles and jars, her scents and dresses; Mme. Corbet had her crucifix and beads, I had seen them on her chest of drawers; Paul had his pictures of lorries pasted up in his cupboard, just as we had our treasures. "Mais Monsieur Eliot, il n'a rien," Paul said, not even a photograph or a paper; and even in Eliot's drawers, Paul told us, were only clothes folded up.

"You mean you look in other people's drawers?" we said, shocked.

"Si," said Paul cheerfully. Eliot had nothing, nothing to tell about himself.

"He has books," I objected, "I cut them for him." I liked doing it, it was a labor of love to cut the interminable pages of those paper-bound French novels. "But when he has finished them he throws them away," I had to admit.

"I cut them too," said Hester and she added, "but he has something, his beautiful paper knife."

I had never seen a paper knife like Eliot's. We thought it was silver, but I suppose now it was steel, thin, about twelve inches long. "Thirteen," said Eliot, "my lucky number." Its blade was sharp-pointed with beveled edges. "Be careful," said Eliot when we cut the pages, "don't let the Littles have it, it's sharp." It was. I remember once I dropped it point down on the grass; it went in and stayed upright.

It had a ring at the top with strange lettering. "Chinese," said Eliot.

"Where did you get it?" asked Hester, and Eliot said dramatically, "From my ancestor, Genghis Khan."

When we were with Eliot all that Paul told us disappeared—or was confirmed, confirmed as a part of life; we no more thought and wondered about it than we should have wondered about Eliot's brushing his teeth.

POSITIVE THINKING

By SUZANNE DOUGLASS

I'm mad about injections
And beg for penicillin.
I'm cheerful in the dentist's chair,
Especially when he's drillin'.

I lick my lips for castor oil.
Think vitamins are dandy,
Enjoy the sting of iodine,
Eat vegetables like candy.

But I'm no hypochondriac,
Although the signs are ample;
I'm just a mother, martyred
To set a good example.

He had us in excellent order, even Vicky. Though we were often a chorus, following him, we kept our distance when told.

The hotel had its own bathing place, a cove in an inlet of the river made by a small island a few hundred yards along the bank; it was screened by bulrushes and hazels and shaded by big willow trees; when Eliot had lunched in the hotel he would sun-bathe in the cove afterward, lying on its sand. He would not strip but let the sun soak through his clothes, his head and eyes shielded by an old yachting cap. Then we stayed respectfully at a distance, which is what he meant us to do.

Paul gave us our food and at four o'clock had taken to coming to the kitchen door and whistling. We were beginning to eat as much as the French themselves. Paul would take one of the long thin loaves called baguettes, chop eight or ten inches off it, split that, spread the split with butter and clap in ham or jam or a slab of chocolate from the showcase in the hall.

"But won't Mme. Corbet ——"

Paul made a rude noise and pretended to write with his hand; it was true, Mme. Corbet behind the grille was entering the chocolate in the ledger.

Four o'clock was M. Armand's rest time; the lunches were finished, the kitchen was tidy and it was not time yet to begin dinners. Then he sat at the table by the window, and read the newspaper, and drank a bottle of wine. He was very comfortable, his shoes off, his cap on the dresser; Vicky sat on the table by him, and the kitchen cat, Minette, curled herself in the patch of sun at his feet. It always amused M. Armand to hear us talk—he thought English an excruciatingly funny language—and he had taken to making me, every day, translate some passage in the newspaper. I learned more French in the kitchen at Les Oeillets than even in the punishments at St. Helena's.

That kitchen was a pleasant place; its white-washed walls were made green near the window by the vine, and orange gold near the fire; the light caught reflections in the rows of copper pans that hung down the middle of the room. There was a spit over an open fire at the end of the room, a red-bricked floor, and always a good smell of cooking onions, new bread, coffee and wine. In the afternoons Toinette and Nicole would be talking gently in the scullery as they peeled potatoes or cut beans. Mauricette would wander in from the garden while Paul would pause in his work to tease her, or they would both listen gravely to my reading. I do not know what newspaper M. Armand read, but the bits he gave me were always sensational. "Que veut dire 'belle-mère'?" I would ask.

"Wife mother," said M. Armand.

"Oh, mother-in-law!" and I would read "Mother-in-law hits husband with hatchet"; or "Baby girl found dead in trunk in . . . 'grenier'; qu'est-ce que c'est?" but they could not make me understand and I had to look it up; the baby girl had been found in the attic.

M. Armand seemed to think these horrors were good for me, which was odd, because he was very particular what Paul said when we were near, and if Paul used swear words M. Armand would smack his head. But when I read, "Thieves entice young wife while accomplice takes twenty thousand francs' worth of rings and brooches," or "Soldiers tie schoolgirl on bed," he would chuckle with delight.

Sometimes we chafed because we knew when we raced back to the cove Eliot would be gone. He liked to walk along the bank undisturbed—perhaps to get away for a little while from his female admirers—sometimes he would walk downstream into the town and cross the bridge to the Giraffe. We would go back to the house and wait faithfully to see if he wanted us when he came in.

"I like that man," said Vicky, which was surprising, because Eliot never gave her anything to eat and she was allowed to trot round after M. Armand, who gave her plenty. She did not trot round after Eliot—none of us would have dared to do that—but when he noticed us, as he did quite often in an absent-minded way, she would give up the kitchen, the slivers of chicken and spoonfuls of cream, and stay where he was likely to be.

"And I like him," said Willmouse. "He is the only person I know except mother who has never laughed at me."

That was the first time I knew Willmouse minded being laughed at. Then he was brave, this odd little brother of mine; it was strange how having a stranger added to the family made one look at its members with different eyes.

Eliot treated Willmouse with particular seriousness. He would look at Miss Dawn's and Dolores' new dresses, examining them and criticizing carefully. He brought Willmouse a book from Paris, not a fashion magazine but a big book of old masters. "Study them," he told Willmouse, "especially the primitives; they will give you a sense of drapery and color."

"But books like that cost a fortune!" cried Mme. Corbet.

"Not a fortune, just a bit," said Eliot.

"But for a child!"

"This child needs it."

Hester did not say what she felt, but she had used up the last film in her camera on Eliot. Too shy to ask, she had crept up on tiptoe and taken a snapshot of him as he slept in his deck chair and spent the last of her traveling francs on having it developed. She had shown the photograph to no one, but stuck it on cardboard, with a cardboard stand, and made a frame of the dried white shells we found along the river; it stood on her chest of drawers, though she hid it while Toinette cleaned the room, and, in a chipped liqueur glass begged from Mauricette, a tiny bouquet of flowers was always put in front of it.

With Eliot, as if under a spell, we accepted everything, trusted everything, but when he went to Paris, as he often did, we became su picious and very critical indeed.

If Mlle. Zizi had known that gallery of har young eyes was watching her I wonder if sh would have been different. From morning t night at Les Oeillets we sat in judgment o her, and the judgments were severe. "Wel none of it is true," said Hester.

That was not quite fair. In everything ther was a grain of truth.

Take her name. Zizi, we knew now fror Paul, was a little girl's name. "And she is no a little girl," said Hester. She told lies abou Les Oeillets too. "It was my father's house my grandfather's and great-great-great-grand father's," Mlle. Zizi used to tell the visitors "The de Presles have lived here since 1731."

"Is it as old as that?" asked the visitors.

"It has seen ten wars," said Mlle. Zizi. I had been the headquarters of the American Army; the holes in the staircase were from machine-gun bullets; in the cupboard in my room was a stain on the floor—the stain was blood, from an American soldier who had been shot there. On our second day Rita and Rex dug up a skull in the garden.

"Poor house!" Mlle. Zizi would say pathetically. "After each war it has healed, but now I am the only one left. I never thought to see my home a hotel!"

When she said this, if Paul was near, he spat. He beckoned me and showed me a date under the wisteria above the front door. The date said 1885. "M'sieur Presle était boucher," said Paul.

"Un boucher?" I said, disappointed. It did not seem possible that Mlle. Zizi was the daughter of a butcher, but Paul went on, "The butcher bought Les Oeillets with money he got from selling bad meat to the soldiers."

The bullet holes were real, but when the staircase was painted they were not closed up but picked out again; the stain in the cupboard was made freshly every now and then by Paul with blood from the kitchen; and one day, when a charabanc party was coming, he beckoned me out into the garden and showed me what he had in his hand, the skull. It was gruesome, with its eye sockets and long cheek-bones. Paul laughed and made the broken jaw move so that it looked as if it were talking. He had to shut Rita and Rex in the kennel or they would have dug it up at once; he buried it under the urn in the middle flower bed, and with it put a piece of raw liver. "Le pourboire," he said and laughed again.

I did not laugh. I was thinking how impressed we had been the first day, how war and death had seemed so close that we had felt almost as mother had wanted us to feel—ashamed and . . . holy? I thought. Now I felt a fool and I did not like Mlle. Zizi or Mme. Corbet or Paul; they made Les Oeillets horrid, I thought; but the skull was a man's skull, probably a soldier's, that had been found in the garden. There was a grain of truth.

It was, oddly, Mme. Corbet who came out best under our scrutiny, "Because she doesn't pretend," said Hester. There was no mistaking Mme. Corbet; the sound of her voice, perpetually raised in scolding, haggling, objecting, had at least the sound of honesty; with Mlle. Zizi, even more than with the house, nothing was what it seemed.

She had a habit when Eliot was away of leaving the door of her room open and talking across the landing to Mme. Corbet in the office while she, Mlle. Zizi, was dressing. We could see in and, "Her face is mostly powder," said Hester.

"And do you know," said Vicky in astonishment, "Mlle. Zizi's eyelashes take off!" We did not believe that was possible until, spying, we saw it with our own eyes.

"She does that with bosoms too," said Willmouse. "I saw them lying across a chair." He was calm, but the rest of us were shocked.

It was all very odd; Les Oeillets was Mlle. Zizi's hotel, yet she asked Mme. Corbet for money. "Mais il faut que je m'achète une chemisière"—Hester might have pleaded like that—"une petite chemisière."

I translated that for Hester. "A little blouse."

"Pour lui." Mme. Corbet spat out the word. We had long since learned that lui was always Eliot.

dvertisement

The Picture of Health for January

by MAXINE DAVIS

Winter may be a zestful time of skis and skates for some people, but it is also sneezes and sniffles-time for colds, flu, pneumonia, and those vague virus ail-nts our parents used to call "la grippe".

Respiratory illness afflicts 83 people in each 0 in January but only 19.3 in July. How ne? Almost everybody kept well in the tarctic! Doctors agree there's nothing wrong h cold weather, and for the normal healthy son sharp changes in temperature are not rmful. Many experts believe that disease anisms live in our bodies all the time but are ublesome only when our resistance is lowered.

We're often below par when it's cold because body loses heat more quickly, burns food ter, needs more oxygen. So chilling, fatigue, t feet, etc. throw our built-in heat control of kilter. Kerchoo!

Nobody has yet developed a thermostat for human body but medical science has ved the value of good nutrition as a guard inst trouble. I've learned—the hard way, confess—to make absolutely sure that my ily takes BEXEL vitamin-minerals every y. There's a member of the BEXEL family of amins to meet the needs of every age and member of our family—all invaluable when ded as a dietary supplement in keeping children bouncing, the adults efficient and ll nourished.

One of the best insulating materials Nature vides is fat of course. That's why you have h an insistent bread and butter and pie petite now. But excess fat does more harm an good, overloading a heart already work-g to capacity. So my doctor suggested the ESSAMIN PLAN 14. Its menus are a pleasant ue-print for thinning, and KESSAMIN Tablets, ntain essential nutritional vitamins and iron well as a neutral food additive, to keep me ntented with smaller portions any season.

We all need enough of the right foods, how-er. Many people using dentures find eating fficult when their dentures slip. Well, ORAFIX lds them in place so firmly it's possible to t fried chicken or peanut brittle with ease d comfort. Afterwards, ORA will cleanse them oroughly in twenty minutes.

I'm prepared to deal with minor troubles, so ey won't become major. For in spite of all recautions, the odds are against a winter ithout a single sneeze or sniffle.

So, when my husband comes home on a old blustering evening after a long day in ne of those smoke-filled board rooms, I'm ot surprised when he croaks "Hi fellas" in dry scratchy voice. I get him a package of EO-AQUA-DRIN lozenges. We both know from xperience that they will soothe his raw irri-ated throat rapidly and he'll soon talk and eel much better.

If seven year old Jamie has a little cough and beginning cold, I give him NEO-AQUA-DRIN oo. Its mild local anesthetic eases his hurt-ng throat and its antibiotic action attacks he germs before they begin to multiply nd make real trouble. I always keep a sup-ly of NEO-AQUA-DRIN handy.

© 1958 McKesson & Robbins, Inc.

"I wonder why he chose that hotel".—Uncle William wondered that afterward—"it seems so unsuitable." Then he answered himself, "But was it? Comfortable, enough foreigners to make him inconspicuous, midway between Paris and the border, and a silly woman who would do anything for him."

"He is ruining the business." Mme. Corbet often said that to Mlle. Zizi. "Always you tell every client we are full up."

"Not always," said Mlle. Zizi.

"And this is the season. All those empty rooms!"

"I do not want to have strangers here with us."

"You are mad."

"Because I do not want to have talk?"

"Talk! The whole town is talking. In the end we shall lose our star."

I knew what star she meant, the star before Les Oeillets in the guidebook. It seemed to be very important, but Mlle. Zizi only shrugged.

"Ten years," said Mme. Corbet in a low, thick voice as if it were choked with anger. "Ten years I could have been a nun, but no, I have worked here, to get that star, to pull this hotel up, put myself aside for you. And you will not listen. You throw it all away."

Once we saw Mme. Corbet slap Mlle. Zizi. The sound of it rang across the hall. It was a slap in the face and Mlle. Zizi stumbled against the desk, holding her cheek with her hand.

It was very quiet in the hall after the slap and we held our breaths; presently there was a new sound, of sobbing, but it was not Mlle. Zizi who sobbed; it was Mme. Corbet.

Mlle. Zizi took her hand down and knelt by Mme. Corbet, holding her, rocking her. Little words, in French, broken, reached us, whispered words. "Chérie. . . . Jamais, jamais. . . . Oubliez ça. . . . N'y pensez plus. . . . Chérie——" We tiptoed away.

It was not often we went away; in fact, I do not think we should have left the house at all if we had not been turned out.

That was Eliot's doing. "It's very well for you," I heard Mlle. Zizi say to him. "You go off to Paris. I had fifty-eight people for lunch today and these children to see to as well."

"Don't see to them," said Eliot. "Give them some food and turn them out."

"Can I?"

"Of course you can. Children like picnics."

We should have liked it, even preferred it, had it not been for what we missed.

Most of the visitors were American; we became used to seeing the faraway place names in the desk book, Illinois, Wisconsin, California, but there were Canadians, Australians, people from South Africa, and some, not many, from England. In the few times we met any of them, on the landing or on the stairs, they would ask us in French the way to the lavatory; they took it for granted we were French, which flattered us.

Just when things were getting interesting—and at Les Oeillets they are interesting indeed—we were sent away. In the mornings everyone was busy. Mme. Corbet would put on a black apron; if Eliot was in Paris, Mlle. Zizi would attend to the bar, but if he was with us Mme. Corbet had to do that as well; Mauricette would be in the dining room spreading clean tablecloths, polishing glass and silver; Paul would wipe the little tables under the vine arbor outside and open the umbrellas on the terrace.

Everyone shouted. M. Armand shouted to Nicole and Toinette to hurry up and finish the rooms, Mlle. Zizi shouted to M. Armand not to shout, while Nicole and Toinette shouted downstairs that they could not do everything, that they had only two arms each and two legs. Sometimes Mauricette, if she was in a good mood, let us count out rolls or pleat napkins; but when the first people were almost due to come Mme. Corbet would march into the kitchen, come back and set out, on a table in the hall, the packages Paul had made ready. If we were not there she would send him to fetch us, and would needle looks at us if we did not collect our picnics at once and go toward the door.

It was strangely ignominious; we had to keep out of sight. "And will they remember to give Joss anything?" asked Hester. "I don't

Is this the breakthrough in your battle against minor pains of Arthritis, Rheumatism, Muscular Aches?

We live in an age of medical wonders. One by one, the dread names are disappearing—diphtheria, tuberculosis, even polio. As you read this, dedicated men and women in laboratories and clinics the nation over, are striving to conquer the dread diseases that remain. Among these is the ailment we loosely call "arthritis," but which encompasses a broad range of rheumatic and muscular afflictions.

Even though the cause and cure of arthritis still remain riddles, medical science is making triumphant progress in alleviating minor pain.

The Goal—Help at the Point of Pain

Doctors had isolated the effective pain-relieving medications. The problem still remained to bring more of the effectiveness of the pain-relieving medicines to the point of pain—and to keep pain-relieving medication working as long as possible. What was needed was a powerful vasodilator and counter-irritant—medical agents that would dilate the walls of the blood vessels and stimulate an increased flow of blood.

So a choline derivative was introduced in combination with sufficient amounts of pain-relieving methylsalicylate in an ointment that would bring medication into the skin, into the blood stream—to help alleviate the pain. Hopes were high that this would place relief in crucial areas.

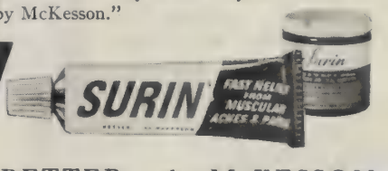
New Medication Tested Clinically

Next came exacting, clinical tests for this new ointment at a medical college in connection with a great New York hospital. The patients were those with chronic conditions of rheumatoid arthritis, osteoarthritis, and myalgia or muscular rheumatism. The ointment gave remarkable relief of minor pain to 73% of the patients, when used regularly!

It brought quick local relief. It increased circulation bringing a stepped-up flow of blood and oxygen to pain areas. It was noticed that patients could move about much more freely. Painful muscles relaxed. Patients were more comfortable. Many were able to live and sleep more comfortably once again without the use of sedatives.

Medication Carried by Blood-Stream

The reasons behind this relief were established in further tests. Blood tests showed that the medication was present in the blood stream, even locally, where the ointment was applied. Fluorescin tests showed that the ointment is slowly absorbed, not moving too fast, so as to prolong effectiveness. Urine tests proved that the medication was eventually carried throughout the body's system. There was no burning, irritation or discomfort to the skin.



Called Unexcelled for Purpose

Here was good news! The new ointment was powerfully effective to bring blessed temporary relief indirectly to the point of pain in arthritis. It could be used as often as needed, without injury to thin, tender skin, and its ingredients were not habit-forming. The ointment often made it possible to do without upsetting internal medication. It could be called unexcelled for this purpose.

Available for Use without Prescription

The name of this ointment is SURIN. You can now buy it from your own local drug store, without prescription. Surin is a product of scientific McKesson laboratory research. It's guaranteed to bring the results described here, or your money back. So try Surin at our risk. The active members of your family will also value Surin for severe muscle ache. It's a unique formula, exactly effective for its purpose, and one more product we are proud to say is "Better . . . by McKesson."

SURIN

(AVAILABLE IN CANADA)

BETTER . . . by McKESSON

want anything," Joss said each day, but I felt she should have been asked. This was the time when we missed mother most and hated Mme. Corbet, Mlle. Zizi, Les Oeillets, hated them all. "But not Eliot," said Hester.

"He does not know what it's like," I said. "He isn't here."

Though we were sore, I think now it was those hours by ourselves that kept us sane; they restored us. All the hectic kaleidoscopic bits of this new life, broken up vividly by Paul, came together again in those hours when we had, willy-nilly, to be alone.

We were told not to come back until four o'clock and the boundary we were set was the box hedge. On one side lay the house and its happenings, a shifting and changing pattern of Eliot, Mlle. Zizi, Mme. Corbet, Paul, M. Armand, Mauricette, the carloads of visitors; when we were away from it, it was as unreal as the cocktails they all drank or as the top garden with its flower beds of plants Robert brought in boxes.

On the wilderness and orchard side was an older, more truthful world; every day, as we passed into it, I caught its older, simpler scents: the smell of box, of mint, syringa, roses, dew on the grass, warm ripe fruit smells of every summer. There was peace in the overgrown grass walks and heavy bushes, in the long orchard alleys; here everything was itself, exactly as it seemed.

When we went through the blue door we were on the margin of the river and here we would sometimes encounter M. Joubert, though soon he would get up and go in to lunch because the light had grown too hard and brilliant. We went to the cove or farther along where the inlet joined the main bank by a plank bridge, and the towing path ran between the river and the fields. Skiffs were moored to poles dug in the bank and now and again there was a barge tied up. Other barges passed all through the day. When a barge passed we sat down on the bank to let the wash splash up on our bare feet and knees, wetting our scarecrows.

A simplicity had descended on us. Coming to France for only a short time, we had few clothes with us; our coats and skirts hung in the wardrobe with our more respectable dresses. We wore our scarecrows which mother had brought in case we went picnicking or on a beach and, because we could not be bothered to clean our shoes, we went barefoot.

I do not suppose it occurred to Eliot that we had no money or that we needed any. Mme. Corbet had taken mother's travelers' checks and cash and our finances had been lifted into a region far over our heads. "And you are not to bother your mother with anything," said Eliot. "Just write and send your love." Being unable to have anything, mysteriously we did not need anything except, "How I wish we could bathe at the plage," Hester said often.

The plage was the Plage des Saules between Les Oeillets and the bridge where another island made a narrow reach of water that was almost a canal.

The plage had three swimming enclosures; the green water looked cool and inviting and there were diving boards and chutes; red-and-white cabins were let for dressing rooms and there was a kiosk that sold ices and syrups. On hot thirsty days we could read the painted letters on its boards: "Glaces—Fraise, Vanille, Citron, Moka et Chocolat." "Oh, well!" said Hester.

There was nowhere else to bathe except the plage and the cove. The Marne had dangerous currents and at the cove a notice said: "Interdit aux baigneurs qui ne sont pas forts nageurs." Neither of us was the strong swimmer required and all we dared to do was undress in the hotel bathing hut, put on our salt-stained bathing dresses and lie in the shallows.

When the clock on the Hôtel de Ville struck one we would come out and open our food. It was a moment to wait for. Paul put up our picnics and he would filch things we were not supposed to have.

M. Armand told him to put aside yesterday's dinner rolls for us, last night's meat, now cold, sardines and eggs out of the hors d'oeuvres, but Paul would switch the rolls with fresh ones, and steal chicken legs, éclairs or jam tarts. To us who were used to picnics of hard-boiled eggs, potted-meat sandwiches, apples and milk chocolate, Les Oeillets' picnics were banquets.

Every day I asked Hester, "Where shall we go?"

"Nowhere," Hester would say, and we would lie in the cove or on the bank and watch the fish, the sun on our backs and heads. In this short time our hair had begun to look bleached, our scarecrows more faded. The time would pass until at last from the Hôtel de Ville the clock would strike four and we would sit up and sigh.

The odd part was that, though we chafed at being sent out, when the time came we did not want to go in. Seen at a distance and in perspective, I flinched from it. Mlle. Zizi, Mme. Corbet, Eliot, Paul, they seemed too much. But at least, I thought comfortably, they are nothing to do with us. We are just watching.

Then on the eighth day—it might have been the seventh or the ninth, I had lost count—when we went in and upstairs to see Joss, her shutters were open and she was sitting by her window dressed in a respectable cotton; she had washed her hair and was drying and brushing it over a towel in the sun.

"Are you better?"

"Quite better," said Joss. "Mauricette brought me up some lunch."

"Mauricette!"

"She is the maid, isn't she?"

We did not now think of that haughty queen, Mauricette, as a maid.

"Did you ask her?"

"I rang," said Joss simply.

We stared at our sister. Even Vicky seemed to come out of her private shell to take in Joss' unperturbed face with its cool paleness.

"You have washed your hair," I said.

"Yes." She looked at us. "You must wash yours." She did not say what she thought of

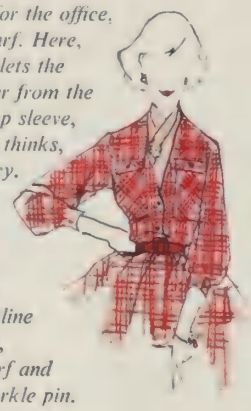
CONTINUED ON PAGE 72

Midwinter Color

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

June in January can be true (at least fashion-wise) even without a midwinter cruise. Barbara J. plans to stay right here—to capture the mood of sunshine and gaiety in spite of gray skies and the usual nine-to-five routine.

With a brand-new year and a brand-new season in view, Barbara plans her fashion strategy for the future very carefully and only thinks about her big investment of a suit or coat. Meanwhile, she dips into a few light and very bright fashion $'s and buys silk separates to wear under her red winter coat. On slightly warmer days, they will be seen under her beige spring coat from last year . . . or they can stand ever so well on their very own. The purchase, a sunny morale booster for midwinter days, is an investment with definite plans for the future as well.



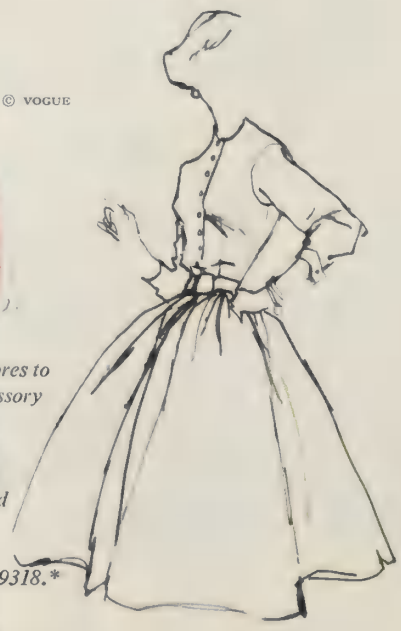
By BET HART

Barbara wears her new separates. Together they have the look of a soft one-piece dress. The blouse has three-quarter sleeves, button-down pockets and a neckline that welcomes pretty accessories. Checked in bright pinks and reds, the fabric is as practical as it is pretty. The silk is mixed with rayon to make it completely washable. Barbara wears the skirt's own bright red belt. Accents the round neckline with pearls. The price for all—less than $19.00.

Barbara likes her separates for the office, especially with her pink scarf. Here, she tucks it into the neckline, lets the ends appear two buttons lower from the front opening. The rolled-up sleeve, narrow black belt, Barbara thinks, add to its look of efficiency.

The same separates, the same pink scarf, but with a touch of after-five glamour. Barbara folds the neckline of the blouse into a deep V, fills it with the pink scarf and fastens with her brightest sparkle pin. Here she wears the red belt.

Barbara invests a few (three and ninety-five cents more, to be exact) fashion $'s in a cherry cardigan to match the red of the check. The sweater and skirt would be a gay winter twosome, but Barbara has further plans. She wears the sweater over the blouse—lets the plaid show through almost to the waistline.



Barbara also plans to wear the skirt with her white cardigan or her black pull-over from last year. A touch of color on a January evening: she wears her new skirt, white jersey wrap-around blouse from September, her bright pink cummerbund and two very real flowers. It could easily be June in January!

© VOGUE

Another one of Barbara's own "custom" additions is initials embroidered in pink on her bright cherry cardigan. This addition costs 50 cents for the pattern and the time in the making—Barbara thinks it's worth every minute of it. Vogue Design No. 9238.

*There are many similar separates in the stores to choose from where exactly the same accessory changes can be made—perhaps you will discover even more variations. If you're a sewing enthusiast (or someone who would like to sew), choose Vogue's separates and make them in the fabric of your choice. Skirt, "Very Easy to Make" Design No. 9217. Blouse, "Easy to Make," No. 9318.

*For back views, sizes and prices, see page 86.

DRAWINGS—MARIBETH
PHOTO—PRIGENT
SEPARATES—MONA ROSET

"talk about soft"

ust about the softest word in a girl's vocabulary, hat's Kotex. The new Kotex napkin has Wondersoft overing—so kind and gentle it won't rub, won't chafe. .otex won't ever fail you, either—for Kotex absorbency s both instant and complete.

And what comfort you experience with the new Kotex elt. A special kind of self-locking clasp holds the napkin ecurely, molds itself gently to your body.

No wonder more women
choose Kotex than all other brands

Mama to Mothers: Every year more than 100,000 girls begin to menstruate before they are eleven. So it's not too soon to tell your daughter at ten. Our free booklet "You're A Young Lady Now" helps give the facts she needs to know. Write Miss Jones, Kimberly-Clark Corp., Neenah, Wis.

KOTEX and WONDERSOFT are trademarks of Kimberly-Clark Corporation

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 70

our dirt and we were silent. Beside us Joss looked as delicate and fresh as a flower.

Vicky said suddenly, "Mlle. Zizi's hair isn't red. They make it red in a shop."

"I know," said Joss.

"You know?" Hester and I said that together.

"I knew the first time I saw her," said Joss, leaning forward to look at herself in the looking glass; she had moved to the dressing table.

"How did you know?"

"It was a little bit black at the roots."

"It looks like a bundle," said Vicky. I knew what she meant. Mlle. Zizi's hair looked dry and heavy.

Joss did not answer. She picked up her brush and began to brush out her own hair that was soft and impeccably its own black.

That was one of the evenings when Eliot came home. "He likes to get out of the heat and dust of Paris," said Mlle. Zizi.

"Ninety kilometers!" said Paul caustically. Ninety kilometers. Eliot had taught us to put them into miles: "Divide by eight, multiply by five." Fifty-five miles was as near as I could get and that certainly seemed a long way to come but, "He comes for her," I said.

"Quatre-vingt-dix kilomètres!" said Paul.

When Eliot came, the house was completely changed. Every evening, toward five o'clock, Mlle. Zizi dressed herself in one of her pretty dresses. She redid her hair, rouged and powdered, put her eyelashes in and blue-shadowed her eyes. "Then she takes a pencil and draws her eyebrows," said Hester. "How funny to pull them out and have pencil ones instead."

If the telephone rang Mlle. Zizi would fly into the office, but usually she would go and wait in the little salon, which was behind the bar. We were not allowed to go into it, but could look through the glass panels of its door; we admired the little room with its pale carpet that had loops of flowers, its walls that were inlaid with panels of blue brocade, and the gilt chairs with backs and seats of yellow satin arranged stiffly round the walls.

Mlle. Zizi should have been working in the bar, but she sat in the little salon, we knew, because from it she could watch the drive for the first glimpse of Eliot's car.

No one else had a car like Eliot's. It was a Rolls-Royce, old, a little battered, but its blue-and-silver length always looked handsome among the French and American cars. "Why choose one that stood out?" Uncle William asked that. "Unless he wanted to stand out," said Uncle William.

Eliot sometimes changed his plans. Then toward dinnertime—and dinner was late at Les Oeillets—Mlle. Zizi would leave the little salon and come slowly back to the bar, and presently she would follow Mme. Corbet into the dining room and to their table by the private screen. On the nights when Eliot was there he often sat at their table and then, we noticed, Mme. Corbet always ate very quickly. She would have dark spots of color in her sallow cheeks and she would always finish and get up while they were still at the second course. Eliot stood up for her as she went, but she never gave him a glance, and in a minute we would hear the typewriter keys rattling in the office.

When she and Mlle. Zizi were alone, Mme. Corbet stayed in the dining room until after everyone had finished. A quiet would be over everything. M. Armand, unless special visitors were there, left the cooking to Paul; Mauricette waited on the tables in her slippers, even the dogs stayed out in the hall, their heads on their paws; no one but Eliot dared give them scraps.

We, of course, had finished long ago; we had our dinner when the staff had theirs, but we stayed on at our table, playing cards with old packs from the bar, Racing Demon or Pelmanism or Snap, and we would watch Mlle. Zizi's head with its coils of red hair sink lower and lower as she listened to Mme. Corbet; then she would go into the bar and begin to drink.

"Oh, well. We might as well go out," said Hester.

"Out" meant hanging about in the orchard and the garden, eating greengages, until Paul was free to come out on the steps. Then we sat and smoked with him—even Hester would have a puff. Once Eliot had come home unexpectedly and found us there. We were afraid he might be cross, but he only ruffled Hester's hair and said, "You little gossips."

Usually he came for dinner. The dogs would hear his car; they knew long before we did that he was coming and they would stand up, shaking themselves and wagging their great tails. I think we did much the same thing. Hester and Vicky would rush to clasp his legs, while Willmouse stood and smiled. "You see," Mlle. Zizi said once to Mme. Corbet, "see how the children and dogs love him. That is the test of a good man." Mme. Corbet sniffed.

With a flounce of her apron, Mauricette would take Eliot's cap and gloves; M. Armand

To have a low opinion of our own merits, and to think highly of others, is an evidence of wisdom. All men are frail, but thou shouldst reckon none so frail as thyself.

THOMAS A KEMPIS

would peer through the kitchen door and start something sizzling on the spit or stove; Paul, if he was there, would mutter under his breath about the extra washing up, and in the office Mme. Corbet would be still, her topknot craned to watch Mlle. Zizi meet Eliot.

On his side there was nothing that anyone might not see. Because of the visitors, if there were any, or for us he would say something quiet, "Bonjour, mademoiselle," or "Ça va?" but she seemed not to care for anyone, the visitors, or us, or Mme. Corbet: she would run to him and hang on his arm; it was as if she could not help it, even though, I thought, it annoyed him; when she looked at him, after he had been away, her eyes were so alight with happiness that even I, silly and romantic as I was, thought it would have been better not to let us all see she loved him as much as that. Sometimes Eliot seemed extraordinarily tired; then he had a strained look on his face, a nerve twitching by his mouth. "Well, I expect," said Hester afterward, "he had often been up all night." Then Mlle. Zizi fussed. "You must have a drink," she would say, her eyes searching his face. "I will get you a drink. Have a comfortable chair; not that one. Let Mauricette get you some other shoes." Until he would say, "For heaven's sake, Zizi!" Then those wide, constantly hurt eyes would fill with tears and her face would quiver. It was surprising a grown person could be so stupid; even I knew that the best thing was to leave him alone until he had been quiet for a while, and then say something casual, even rude. That would make him smile and say, "You little tyke!"

That night of Joss' being better there were visitors: a young American with a red sunburned face, three American ladies, and a French colonel with his wife and child; before dinner we all sat at different tables in the bar.

When anyone was speaking French directly to me I could understand, but when they spoke to one another I could not be sure. Now I knew the French family were talking about us; I saw the wife gesticulate admiringly at Willmouse—women always found Willmouse charming—at Vicky's fall of flaxen hair, at Hester's eyes and curls. These were the family good points and we were used to their being noticed, but I thought I heard Eliot say something that surprised me.

"Soeur is sister, isn't it?" I asked Joss afterward. "It couldn't be anything else?"

"How could it?" asked Joss.

"Then Eliot said mother was his sister."

"He couldn't have, because she isn't."

"No, but . . . he said he was our guardian."

"I suppose for the moment he is."

"Yes, but —— He said he always took us to the seaside, but this year he had left it too late. He could not get away to see us in England and so he brought us here."

"Was this in French?" asked Joss.

"Yes."

"Then you got muddled."

I was sure I had not. Those sentences kept coming back in my mind and "They were lies," I said.

Eliot talked from our table to the French people, he did not join them. We were all round him; Hester and I were playing Racing Demon at the next table with automatic silent swiftness, our eyes and ears really on him; Willmouse was hunched up in the chair beside him, his nose in his big book. Vicky was on the floor by Eliot's feet where Nebuchadnezzar was grazing in a field fenced with Eliot's matches.

We did not usually cluster round him when he came home, but kept a respectful distance, but this evening we were on a different plane. "What is the matter with you?" he had said, looking at us. He looked more carefully and then said, "You are clean."

With Joss up, we had changed for dinner. This evening we waited for Joss. Mlle. Zizi was not there; she was in the office with Mme. Corbet waiting for a telephone call.

At that time of day, the sun sinking behind the trees struck through the landing windows and turned the staircase into a funnel of light; even the treads of the stairs seemed barred with gold, and through the round window came the sound of trills and flutings, the birds singing their evening song in the garden, before it dropped to silence. The staircase might have been Jacob's ladder, stairs to heaven.

I had been looking at it—no, not looking, almost melting into it—and had turned my eyes away because of the brightness when I became aware of Eliot's stillness.

Eliot had been going to drink, but his glass was quite still in his hand; the colonel was wrinkling up his eyes, the young American leaning forward. They were all looking.

They were looking at the staircase. Then I saw they were not, or not exactly. They were looking at Joss coming down.

As if those days of sickness and shock had made her clean and delicate, she looked pale and . . . pure, I thought, as a snowflake or white blossom, while I was my ordinary brown and pink. She had on the twin of the cotton dress I wore, but it was graceful on her; she was wearing the sandals she had bought with her birthday money, white, open-toed, while I wore our clumsy brown school sandals. She seemed to have grown more dignified, taller, and her dress was a little too tight; the shape of her bosoms—forever after I was to think of them as bosoms—showed and the sun gave points of light to the darkness of her newly washed hair.

When I was jealous of Joss, mother used to say, "Jealousy is ugly. It hurts no one but yourself. Don't be jealous," but if one is, how does one help it? It is wrong to be jealo but —— "It isn't wrong," said Eliot when afterwa I asked him this in despair.

"Not wrong to be jealous?" That w against everything I had heard.

"No," said Eliot firmly. "It's what you with jealousy that can be wrong."

I think I knew that for myself. That nigh could have said cruel, unkind things to Jos wished her any harm; the cards seemed swim in front of my eyes and I felt bitter ar angry as she came quite naturally up to u

"It's only Joss," I wanted to cry. There w a pause and it dawned upon me that Eliot d not know who she was. "It's only Joss." Th time I said it aloud and, as he still looke puzzled, "Joss, the one who was ill."

"One of you?" It was an unflattering disb lief. I had to remember he had seen her befo only as a schoolgirl in an ugly hat and, in be as a tousled sick child.

"Et c'est votre niéce, cette ravissante jeun personne?" said the colonel from the ne table. "Adorable! Adorable!" Eliot's fac looked hot with embarrassment. Did Jos know, I wondered, that she had been calle his niece? And ravishing, adorable, I thought smarting, but she did not seem to have hear and took the chair Eliot pulled out for he and sat down. As he did not speak she said "I'm better, but you must think we are a mos unhealthy family."

She spoke so calmly that, unwilling thoug I was, admiration filled me. I knew she wa shy, for there was pink now in her cheeks, an that telltale front of her dress moved quickl up and down. Eliot did not answer, which wa difficult for Joss. The pink deepened and sh tried again: "I hope the children haven't bee bothering you."

That was too much. I said loudly, "W don't bother," and Eliot started as if I had . . . wakened him up, I thought.

"Will you have a drink?" he asked Joss.

"Could I have a still lemon?"

"He never asked us to have a lemon," whispered Hester as Willmouse was told to go and order one.

It was Mlle. Zizi, her telephone call finished, who brought the drink. She was puzzled. "Eliot, Willmouse says you want a citron? Is that true?"

As she came Joss stood up. She need not have done, under the circumstances, but her schoolgirl habits were strong upon her. She stood up and Mlle. Zizi looked at her as surprised as Eliot had been . . . but, I thought, not at all in the same way.

She and Joss were standing side by side and now I saw Eliot look down; his glance stayed down for a moment as if it were arrested, and I moved my chair to see what he saw. He was looking at their feet. Mlle. Zizi was wearing sandals, too, open-toed black ones with high heels; they showed her toenails painted deep red but the toes were brown and twisted, thickened with corn marks, the big toes turned inward with an ugly bump. If I had been Mlle. Zizi I should have hidden them, and once again her stupidity gave me a pang, for beside her Joss' feet seemed to rest lightly under the white cross straps of her sandals, pretty, slim feet, straight-toed, unblemished. Mlle. Zizi had followed Eliot's eyes too. Abruptly she put the lemon down and walked round the table.

"Merci bien, mademoiselle," said Joss and hesitated. "I have to say 'good evening,' " she said uncertainly.

Mlle. Zizi did not answer at once; she only looked at Joss. Then, "I had not understood."

"Understood?" asked Joss.

"That any of you were . . . so big," said Mlle. Zizi.

(To be Continued)

THE PRECIOUS HOURS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 42

Usually, after acting something out, we discussed what could be learned from the incident which would make sense in their own lives, or at least in their own thinking. "Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength," sang the Psalmist. He should have tried small boys! Without a premonitory qualm, I asked their opinions about the Prodigal Son. In my simple ignorance I expected the usual answer. Had not our clergyman just preached the old, old sermon deducing the grandeur of a father's love despite a son's foolish ways! But not these lads, now age twelve. For two years they had been encouraged to think for themselves in what had become for me the week's most precious hour.

"I think," said Delcie, in a voice which had not yet begun to change, "that the older brother had it all wrong. His father didn't kill the fatted calf to honor the prodigal—I guess that's the right word. The father threw a big party because he was so happy his stupid son had learned something and was home to make a new start. The old man just had to cele-

ite. And besides, he thought the boy was id."

—who not only had spent my professional in the field of human relations, but had ually lost a son—I was brought up with at the Navy would call a good round turn.
As the years went along we tried to climb t of childhood's games and play-acting into ne real thinking. One result was they did t want to be called a Sunday-school class y more. They wanted to be "The Young en's Class."

Please do not protest to me that such quesns as, "What makes you think there is a od?" are too profound for a thirteen-year-
l. We have insulted the intelligence of ungsters. Delcie (affectionately known to intimates as "Drop Dead" because his inils are D. D.) usually sparked the discussion, ght-eyed and alert, but they all participated.
ey said there certainly were a lot smarter ople in the world than we, but nobody smart ough to create matter. They said that boil-g water would kill any living thing, and the rld had started as a mass of hot gases shoot-g off from the sun. When this magnificently rilized object cooled off, where did life come m? They said there was order in the motion the heavenly bodies, and order is the result intelligence, not chance. Whose intelli-nce? They said the laws of the government nature are completely consistent, and that s not just chance either.

I do not mean that these conclusions were ickly arrived at. I do mean that we took the ne to think, and to discuss, and to wonder, til they came up with some penetrating consions. As I see it, the teacher's responsibil-is not to tell them what they ought to think, t to ask thought-provoking questions about at they do think.

If there is a God, then what is God like?
ey made a little research into what the reeks, the Romans, the Norsemen and the merican Indians had thought about God—rather the gods, both good and evil. (Some them declared that if there are gods and ddesses they preferred to worship the goddesses. We laughed. I told them older men had made that same mistake.)

Finally, we discussed the amazing contribution of the Jews some three thousand years ago. With what lucid radiance and penetrating logic those extraordinary people had concluded that God is one, that God is a spirit we cannot comprehend, and that God is love. The discussion of the last point included an examination of the violence with which most animals meet their end. Is this love? What do you mean by love? Is keeping a cancer patient alive as long as possible a loving act? There was disagreement. If God is love, does it make sense to suppose we are born evil and have to suffer to achieve salvation? Does suffering build character, or does it only show whether you have character . . . is suffering the load that tests strength, or the food that builds strength?

This year, among other things, we have been discussing science and religion. Is there a conflict between them? Nine young heads nodded, "Yes." Homer (nicknamed "Homely," but with no taint of unkindness) said, "No." So we listened to his arguments. There is, he said in effect, a conflict between the scientists and the clergy, which is quite another thing. But the same Creator who devised the laws of physics, and chemistry, and astronomy, and electrical engineering (his father is a television repairman) also set up the moral law. We try to find out what these laws are, but never understand the whole thing, so of course there are conflicts in our beliefs. But if the truth in science were in conflict with the truth in religion, or vice versa, then God would be inconsistent, and Homer didn't think God is.

Shades of Albert Einstein, who said, "Science without religion is lame, and religion without science is blind."

We talked about the amazing progress science has made in their own lifetime, say nothing of mine: atomic fission, television, jet propulsion, the Salk vaccine. Did this progress mean we need a parallel and equally vigorous improvement in religion? Much disagreement on this point. Well, what do you mean by religion anyway? A system of worship? Reciting a creed? One's philosophy of living?

Whenever you find agreement in a Sunday-school class, either the subject is being taught in a wholly dogmatic way or no one is doing any thinking. Youngsters yearn to think, if we old fellows will only let them. When John (the quiet one) says, "I don't agree with you that a man's religion is really his everyday way of living," I rejoice and ask for his opinion.

We argued the point for three weeks. (Whoever conceived the idea that good teaching is covering a given area in a set period of time!) Some said that scientific progress compels religious progress. For example, the church has had to admit that the sun does not go around the earth, that the earth is not flat, and that we are not the center of the universe. But does that have anything to do with the average person's way of life? Somebody else said of course it did because to knock out any superstition is an improvement.

So we came back again to asking, "What is religion?" and that led to asking, "What is sin?" Is it disobeying the rules? Jesus broke the law. So did Washington and Lincoln. After a while Bob said that sin was doing anything against yourself. Some of the others objected that this would be selfishness. I said, "Suppose you wanted to become a musician and your father insisted on your becoming a lawyer. Would becoming a lawyer be sin if your heart and ability lay in music?" Dick thought it would make you hate your father, and that would be sin. But what about hating yourself for living an unhappy, unfulfilled life; for not doing what God intended you to do? And what about the difference between sin and making a mistake? Did they know that the old Greeks had no word for sin? Their expression was "going too far," which could be in either direction. In the end, the boys came up with something I shall always remember: "Sin is anything that makes you uncomfortable with yourself."

The following Sunday I asked them what the average person fears most. Bob did not want to express an opinion, but every one of the other nine, in his own words, said what amounted to one of two things: we fear ourselves most, or we are afraid of other people. I submit that a group of college seniors would do no better. Well, in the light of that conclusion, do we need improvement in our religion? The scientists have not changed the laws of nature, they have improved their ability to understand and to use them. Is the parallel activity necessary in religion? They were never all agreed.

This led to our discussing religion and ethics. What is the difference? After all, does a moral man who conforms to standards that are right and good need anything more? It is a point concerning which I was not too clear myself. We were floundering in our discussion when Leonard said, "Why don't we try to act this out?" My expectations were modest. What a surprise I had!

They divided into groups and went into a huddle. One group presented the difference in reaction to a cruel guard in a concentration camp of the man who is merely moral, and of the man who has an unshakable belief that there is purpose in the universe and that God is love. The first has far more difficulty realizing that a disagreeable person is only someone who has himself been abused. He was not born that way. The tyrant is to be pitied more than hated because his tyranny stems from having himself suffered from a tyrant. The second group chose a situation in which two equally capable young men were in competition for the same promotion. They acted out what they believed would be the difference in the way the successful candidate would treat his disappointed colleague.

Soon these lads will be men. Some of them will be going off to college, some to serve their hitch in the Army, some to work in the textile mill, the box shop or the match factory. But I shall stay with them as long as they will stay with me. I shall keep on loving them for the precious hours they have given me. And when at last my time is come, I want those ten to bear me to my grave. END for women only!

Always a special need...now a special laxative

Sure, gentle, more normal relief . . . even after childbirth and during menstrual periods

Constipation presents special problems to a woman.

A woman's system is complex and sensitive. It repeatedly undergoes cycles of change, during which constipation may make discomfort even more severe. So it's almost unbelievable that science never until now has developed a special laxative for woman's special needs!

But only a major medical discovery could make such a laxative possible . . . and today it's here! You can get it by asking for Correctol.

The miracle of Correctol is a new, non-laxative regulator—with a wonderful, harmless action that simply softens waste. Along with this, Correctol contains just enough mild laxative to give normal regularity a gentle start.

So Correctol acts promptly but unhurriedly. It gives the relief a woman wants and needs . . . but it's pleasant, more natural relief. And thanks to its miracle regulator, Correctol gives these results with far less laxative medicine than other preparations using the same ingredient for their effect.

You'll want to try this new feminine laxative. So get a bottle of these tiny pink tablets today, to have when you need them. See how much better you feel with Correctol . . . and how much more naturally it brings relief. 30 tablets, $1.00—any drug store.

Correctol

the first laxative especially for feminine use

ALSO AVAILABLE EVERYWHERE IN CANADA

For weight watchers... new low-calorie D-ZERTA GELATIN

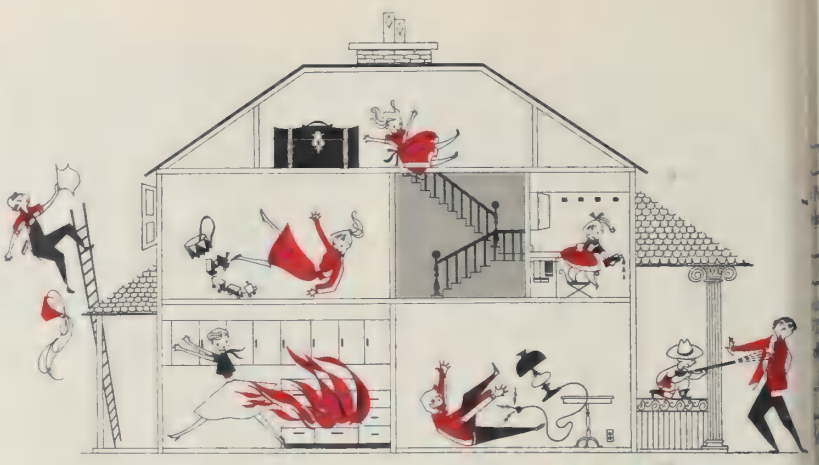
It's easier to stay on a diet when you can have a sweet dessert—and D-Zerta contains hardly enough calories to count!

This delicious gelatin is made without sugar, but it's so good the whole family will enjoy it. D-Zerta Gelatin comes in 6 flavors and costs only pennies a serving—makes bright desserts and refreshing salads.



Sweet, low-calorie D-Zerta Pudding is made without sugar, too. Try all 3 flavors: Vanilla, Chocolate and Butterscotch.

D-Zerta and Jell-O are registered trade-marks of General Foods

Compare the calories in one serving:
Rice Pudding	249
Cupcake (with white icing)	229
Orange Water Ice	177
D-Zerta Pudding (with skim milk)	54
D-Zerta Gelatin (all 6 flavors)	12

Made by the makers of JELL-O desserts...so you know it's good!

HOME SAFE HOME

By MARGARET DAVIDSON
Homemaking Edi

Home isn't necessarily safe—every house we know about can be safer.
Accident-prone people and houses usually result from some hazard or oversight that could have been corrected if only we had recognized "danger" in advance. Our check list is to help you eliminate hazards wherever you dwell.

Nationally, about 4,000,000 people are injured at home each year—three times more than in traffic accidents. An average of 27,000 die as a result.

EVERY HOME THE NEW HOME

STAIRWAYS

- ☐ Are stairs well lighted top to bottom? Would a light set into a wall or under handrail help remedy the faults?
- ☐ Is handrail firm and steady? If not, could new design be substituted?
- ☐ Do treads offer slipproof footing? Would continuous carpeting be safer?
- ☐ Are there extra phone extensions to prevent stairway racing?
- ☐ Do stairs ascend at a slope betwee 30° and 36°? Stair treads at least 1(wide? Risers no more than 7¾″ high?
- ☐ Are handrails continuous from hea to foot? Balusters no more than 4 apart to keep children from fallin through?
- ☐ Are landings wide and safe?
- ☐ If stair is 44″ or more wide, is there rail on both sides?

In many cities, home accidents of all kinds outrank every other form of fatal mishap.

FLOORS

- ☐ Have you tried nonskid waxes, nonskid paints?
- ☐ Is carpeting rubber-backed or otherwise securely installed?
- ☐ Are kitchen-laundry floors nonski tile or otherwise slipproof?
- ☐ Is basement floor outlined in contra color where last step ends?

Falls account for about 50 per cent of home accidents; burns and fires, another 30 per cent.

LIGHTS AND ELECTRICAL WORK

- ☐ Enough outlets so cords don't dangle? Would strip outlets help? (Inexpensive, they go along baseboard or over counters, give you a choice of plug-in spots.)
- ☐ Night lights provided for?
- ☐ No electric cords under rugs?
- ☐ Once-a-year check—or oftener—to replace any worn, frayed cords?
- ☐ No oversized fuses, or pennies in back of blown ones?
- ☐ Automatic circuit breakers in plac of fuse boxes?
- ☐ Are lights and switches arranged fo a path of light through house?
- ☐ Enough power to back up presen and future appliances?
- ☐ No electric outlets too near tub o basins? (Never touch anything elec trical unless you're dry!)
- ☐ Indoor outlets with safety covers Outdoor outlets waterproof?

In one study of 2000 deaths at home, 25 were caused by electric shock.

EVERY HOME THE NEW HOME

KITCHEN

- High or lockable cupboards to hold poisons out of reach of toddlers? ishes, disinfectants, detergents, metal ners can be fatal internally.)
- Do you know danger signs in gas appliances—time to call qualified serv- an? (1) When there is a smell of gas. When flame burns yellow instead of .
- Is there an outdoor place to work with dry-cleaning products if used ll?
- A smooth-cutting can opener rather than a piercing kind?
- Protective storage for knives? (Racks on walls or in drawers.)
- Polishing cloths disposable or stored clean in metal containers?

- ☐ Do gas appliances have safety lighting arrangements that turn off gas if pilot fails?
- ☐ Is cooking area free from bang-open doors, away from main path of traffic?
- ☐ Adequate lighting over stove, sink, all work counters?
- ☐ Counter on handle side of refrigerator door?
- ☐ Range top with counters on both sides? Burners away from curtains?
- ☐ Ventilated space for oil mops, cleaning tools, waxing aids?
- ☐ All appliances labeled approved by Underwriters' Laboratory or American Gas Association?

In a recent Southern survey, the kitchen rated the most dangerous room of the house. Women 35 to 64 suffered most of the injuries.

DOORS AND WINDOWS

Doors hung so their swings don't conflict as traffic moves through rooms?

Entry door chain-locked, windowed, or provided with speaking tube?

- ☐ Upper windows protected in house with children by jalousie glass or set-in guards?
- ☐ All windows easily, safely cleanable?

In 1955, 14,000 people were killed falling at home.

STORAGE FACILITIES

- ☐ Is there lock-and-key precaution wherever firearms, power tools, medi- es are kept?
- ☐ Enough closet or basement room to house toys, garden implements or other stumble hazards?

An average of 1000 people a year die by firearm accident at home—most of them 5 to 14 years old.

WALKS, DRIVEWAYS, AND OUTER AREAS

- ☐ Barbecue area lighted, free of fall or fire hazards at night?
- ☐ Porches, paths, steps illuminated for late-arrival guests?
- ☐ Safe place for trash disposal?

- ☐ Driveway large enough to turn in without backing into road?
- ☐ Walks and driveways easily clearable in winter? Electric snow-melting cables set in if needed?

Going up: deaths from burns and fires at home. In 1955, 5400 died—a steady rise since 1949.

PLUMBING

- ☐ Tub made safe with rubber mat?
- ☐ Stools or pull-out steps so children can use basins?
- ☐ Nonskid mats or rugs for floor?

- ☐ Hand grip built in near bathtub?
- ☐ Corrugated tub bottom for extra protection?
- ☐ Controls and mixers so water will not come out scalding at faucets?

Over 1000 children were poisoned fatally at home in a recent year.

FIRE PREVENTION

- ☐ Small, portable fire extinguishers on hand on all floors of the house?
- ☐ Screens for all fireplaces?

- ☐ Ceiling sprinkler system installed if desired?
- ☐ Roof fireproof? Chimney well flashed?

Dwelling fires are on the increase—have been running to 60 per cent of all fires recorded.

...and Campfire adds the crowning touch!

Ever see a more luscious looking molded dessert? Well, wait till you taste it! That crowning touch of EXTRA GOODNESS comes from CAMPFIRE Marshmallows. They're the softer, lighter, fluffier kind. Delicately flavored. Always fresh — four individually sealed Packettes in each outer-sealed pound package. See for yourself—try this new CAMPFIRE glamor dessert. Tonight, maybe?

Marcia Camp's Recipe Book has dozens of wonderful ideas. Send for FREE copy.

cherry crown dessert

1 package Cherry Jell-O*
2 tablespoons sugar
Dash of salt
1 cup hot water
1 cup cherry juice and water combined
1 tablespoon lemon juice
1 cup (17 ounces) pitted canned black cherries, drained
¼ cup whipping cream
1 cup CAMPFIRE Marshmallows, quartered—or CAMPFIRE Miniature Marshmallows

Dissolve Jell-O, sugar and salt in hot water. Add cherry juice and lemon juice. Chill until slightly thickened. Cut cherries in half and fold into one cup of the Jell-O. Pour into 1-quart mold. Chill until almost firm.

Meanwhile, place bowl of remaining Jell-O in ice and water. Whip with egg beater until fluffy and thick. Whip cream. Then fold marshmallows and whipped cream into whipped Jell-O. Spoon over layer in mold. Chill until firm. Unmold. Serve with more whipped cream. Serves 6 to 8.

*Jell-O is a registered trade-mark of General Foods Corporation.

Campfire®
The Magic Ingredient
MARSHMALLOWS

THE CRACKER JACK CO. Desk 52, 4800 W. 66th St., Chicago 38, Ill.

POTLUCK FOR GOURMETS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 54

to the stock, cover and simmer until tender (about 1 hour). Remove chicken from stock and put in a very slow—200° F.—oven to keep warm. Strain chicken stock, return to range and bring to simmering. In the stock cook 12 small peeled white onions about 45 minutes or until tender, 2 packages frozen green beans about 10 minutes, until tender. Remove vegetables from stock and keep warm in oven. In the top of a double boiler, melt 3 tablespoons butter and blend in 3 tablespoons flour. Slowly add all the chicken stock and heat over boiling water, stirring constantly, until thickened. Season with 1 teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon each rosemary and marjoram and a pinch of saffron, if available. Remove from the heat. In a small mixing bowl combine 2 egg yolks and 3 tablespoons light cream. Add a small amount of thickened stock to the eggs and blend in well. Then add eggs to stock, return to heat (over boiling water) and cook slowly, stirring constantly, for 2 to 3 minutes. Remove from heat. Add 1 teaspoon lemon juice. Arrange chicken pieces on a large platter, garnish with clusters of green beans and onions. Pour some of gravy over chicken, serve remainder separately. Makes 6 servings.

NESTEA

INSTANT TEA

Equal Parts of Tea and Carbohydrates

No other tea gives you such hearty, delicious flavor . . . with no waste—no mess!

Here's magic in a tea cup! Just put a level teaspoon of Nestea® in your cup, add boiling water, and instantly those magic grains of pre-brewed tea burst into rich, hearty flavor. With Nestea you enjoy all the flavor, because you use all the tea. Get modern Nestea, hearty every sip of the way.

One of the best things about winter is a truly superb New England boiled dinner—this one with corned beef and tender vegetables cooked together, lending their flavors to one another. A curried horse-radish sauce is magnificent with this, as you will see. And dessert almost has to be an apple pie, doesn't it?

NEW ENGLAND BOILED DINNER

Put a 6–7-pound fine-grained corned brisket of beef into a large kettle. Cover with cold water. Bring water to a boil, then drain and rinse beef. Repeat 3 times. Once more cover the corned beef with cold water. Add a piece of salt pork, 6 peppercorns and a stalk of celery. Simmer beef 3 to 4 hours or until fork-tender. Peel 8 to 10 small white potatoes and 5 carrots. Cut the carrots into chunks 1½" to 2" long. Add the potatoes and carrots to the broth. Cook until tender. About 15 minutes before serving, add 2 packages frozen Brussels sprouts to the broth. Cook until crisp-tender. Serve corned brisket on a platter garnished with potatoes, Brussels sprouts and carrots. Makes 8–10 servings.

CURRY-RADISH SAUCE

Whip ½ cup heavy cream until thick and glossy. Blend in 2 teaspoons drained prepared horse-radish, 1 tablespoon prepared mustard, 3 tablespoons chili sauce and 1 teaspoon curry powder. Crush 1 clove garlic, or use ⅛ teaspoon powdered garlic. Add this along with the juice of 1 lemon and ¼ teaspoon grated lemon rind. Season with a good dash of cayenne pepper and salt to taste. Makes 1 cup sauce.

"Bacon would improve the flavor of an angel," wrote Mark Twain. He was thinking, when he wrote, of lazy summer breakfasts cooked outdoors, but his words are no less true indoors, in January. This delicately seasoned stuffed veal roll is flavored with bacon and herbs, and simmered tenderly in chicken stock. Lima beans go in the broth, too, toward the end of cooking time. Here, though there will not be enough broth left when the meat is done to serve separately as a soup course, the delicious chicken-and-veal stock makes a wonderful base for a soup next day. Add a can of tomatoes, whatever leftover vegetables are handy—and there's a savory vegetable soup for tomorrow's lunch.

STUFFED VEAL

Buy a first cut from the top of a leg of veal. It should weigh about 3 pounds. Have your butcher leave it in one piece and pound it thin as for scallopine. In a saucepan, melt ⅓ pound butter with ½ cup water. Add 2 cups prepared packaged stuffing mix, 2 eggs, lightly beaten, ½ cup minced onion, ⅓ cup finely chopped parsley, 8 bacon slices, cooked and crumbled, 1 clove garlic, minced, ½ teaspoon salt and good pinches of dried dill and pepper. Mix well and spread over the surface of the veal, leaving about 2" of veal along each side unspread. Roll up the veal as you would a jelly roll, tucking under the ends and securing firmly with toothpicks. Wrap in several thicknesses of cheesecloth (tie together at the ends) and simmer 1 hour and 40 minutes, in a large kettle, in four 13¾-ounce cans chicken broth and 1 can water. For the last 20 minutes of cooking, add 3 packages Fordhook Lima beans. Makes 8 servings. Serve with this delicious mushroom sauce:

MUSHROOM SAUCE

In a saucepan, lightly brown 3 tablespoons butter. Add 3 tablespoons flour and few drops onion juice. Slowly add ¾ cup broth that the veal was cooked in, stirring constantly, and ¾ cup cream. Sauté ½ pound sliced mushrooms and add to the sauce. Season with 1 teaspoon each beef extract, salt and paprika.

Now for a big piece of cod, poached till the tender meat of the fish flakes off the bones practically at a glance, and served with a luscious, lemony dill sauce that you'll want to keep in mind to serve with other fish—salmon, for instance, and broiled swordfish steaks. Sweet green peas are perfect with the piquantly seasoned fish, and here's a thought for dessert: big canned peach halves, heated

TWO-O'CLOCK TALE

By CAROL L. CRANE

Up flies the window shade!
Down falls the chair!
Whoosh!—that's a Teddy bear sailing through air.
Blood-chilling shriek, then a thundering clap!—
Susan is taking her afternoon nap.

Chattering muffled behind a closed door;
Flutter of bare feet across a bare floor;
Bedsprings resisting the run-and-jump test—
Susan is settling down for a rest.

Little by little the riotings cease;
Silence attends an enveloping
peace.
For one precious hour the quiet will keep—
Susan, thank heaven, has fallen asleep.

in the oven, with a tablespoon or two of mincemeat in the hollow of each.

POACHED COD WITH DILL SAUCE

Put a 6-pound piece of cod on a rack in a large kettle. Around the fish pour 5 cups water and 1½ cups white wine vinegar. Add 1 teaspoon thyme to water. Sprinkle 1 chopped onion and 2 teaspoons salt over the fish. To the water add another chopped onion and 2 teaspoons more salt, 2 bay leaves, 1 stalk celery and 1 sprig parsley. Cover kettle and simmer the fish until tender (allow 10 to 15 minutes per pound). Baste fish occasionally with the broth. Remove fish from kettle and skin it. Top with dill sauce and serve on a platter with cooked frozen peas plus lemon wedges. Makes 10 to 12 servings.

DILL SAUCE

Melt 3 tablespoons butter in the top of a double boiler. Blend in 3 tablespoons flour and 1 teaspoon salt. Add ½ cup liquid in which the cod was poached, and 1 cup light cream. Heat, stirring constantly, until thickened. Add 1½ tablespoons dry dill or 3 tablespoons chopped fresh dill. Remove sauce from heat and cook slightly. In a separate bowl, beat 2 egg yolks. Stir yolks into sauce and return it to the heat. Stir for about a minute and cool slightly. Season with 5 tablespoons lemon juice, 1 teaspoon onion juice and ¼ teaspoon hot red pepp sauce. For prettiness, stir 1 cup of yo cooked frozen green peas into the sau before serving.

The classic boiled beef is a particular delicious case in point. A generous-sized pie of beef brisket is simmered with vegetabl and noodles cooked in the broth. A sauce serve with the hearty slices of beef might b "salsa fria," a spicy relishlike concoction chopped tomatoes, onion and hot pepper or if you can't get good fresh tomatoes this time of year, try vinaigrette sauce wit the beef—it's delicious! Noodles go with th beef, and dessert might be chilled cut-u orange and pear sections, sprinkled with little cinnamon and a touch of powdere sugar.

BOILED BEEF WITH VEGETABLES

Lightly flour a 4–5-pound piece of fres brisket of beef. In a skillet, fry a 2" piece suet, cubed, until all the fat is cooked ou Discard the suet. Brown the meat lightly all sides. Drain fat. Lay the beef in a kett and add boiling water just to cover, 1 ve knuckle, 1 tablespoon salt and 1 tablespoo gravy browner. Add the following herbs whic are tied loosely in a piece of cheesecloth: cup minced celery tops, ½ teaspoon drie thyme, 2 large sprigs parsley, ½ teaspoo dried marjoram, 10 peppercorns and 1 onio chopped. Cover, bring to a slow boil and ski once. Simmer for 3–3½ hours or until t meat is tender. The last half hour add small peeled white onions. About 12 minut before the meat is done, add 1 box wi noodles and cook until tender. Remove me and vegetables from broth. Butter noodl and add salt and pepper to taste. Serve me surrounded by the noodles and onions. Serves

SALSA FRIA

Chop very fine 4 large ripe tomatoes, medium-sized onion and ½ (4-ounce) ca peeled green chili peppers. Add 1 clove garli minced, 2 tablespoons olive oil, ¼ teaspoo ground pepper, ½ teaspoon orégano, and sal and red wine vinegar to taste. It should b fairly tart and salty. Chill for several hours

Here's the alternate, just as good and per haps more to some people's taste.

VINAIGRETTE SAUCE

Finely chop 4 tablespoons Bermuda onion, tablespoons sweet pickle, 4 tablespoons gree pepper, 3 tablespoons parsley, 2 tablespoon chives, 2 tablespoons pimiento and the whit of 1 hard-cooked egg. Add 1 cup salad oi ⅓ cup vinegar, 1½ teaspoons salt, 1½ tea spoons sugar, 1 teaspoon finely chopped fres tarragon—or ¼ teaspoon dried tarragon—½ teaspoon red pepper and few drops garli juice. Mix well and store in refrigerator.

BOILED BEEF TONGUE AND VEGETABLES

Soak a 3–4-pound smoked beef tongue in col water overnight. Put the tongue in a larg kettle. Cover it with cold water and add bouquet garni, a leek, 1 onion stuck with whole clove, 1 clove garlic, 4 peppercorns an 2 teaspoons salt. Bring to a boil and simme tongue, covered, for 2 hours. Peel 8 to 1 small whole potatoes and clean 8 small arti chokes. Cut the stem off close to the leaves If artichokes are prickly, trim them with sharp knife or with the scissors. Add the pota toes to the broth and simmer them for 1 hour The artichokes should cook in the broth fo about 30 minutes. When the tongue is tender remove it from the broth, skin it and arrang on a hot platter with boiled potatoes an artichokes. Makes 8 to 10 servings. Serv melted butter with the artichokes, and thi delicious mustard sauce with the tongue:

MUSTARD SAUCE

Mix 1 cup brown sugar, ¼ cup dry mustard 1 teaspoon flour and ¼ teaspoon salt. Dis solve 1 beef-bouillon cube in ½ cup hot water Add, with ½ cup vinegar, to dry ingredients Mix well. Add 2 beaten eggs and cook in th top of a double boiler over hot water until i is the thickness of a soft custard. Cool Serves 8.

THE ORDEAL OF LADY GODIVA

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 40

id. "You're just too ignorant to associate ith us." Missy didn't often interfere with the ildren's play, but she was sorry for Penny nd so she whispered that Jennifer didn't start ith the right letter as in Gallsworthy and roup. Penny thought again and settled on wendolyn. "It won't do," Peter said sharply. It sounds too much like Guinevere. We'd be tting all mixed up."

Poor Penny. It was a very lonely thing to e the only child who didn't go to school, aiting all day for them to come home, and hen being treated like a second-class citizen hen they did come. And so she cheated a ttle. She asked the Professor for a name that as elegant enough to go with Galahad and eoffrey and Guinevere and Genevieve. And he Professor cheated a little back. He told er, with a twinkle in his eyes and a twitching t the corner of his mouth, that he had always ancied the Lady Godiva. The Group was stounded when she brought them that name. here was no denying it was quite suitable nd it looked for a while as though they would ave to accept her until Peter said, "Let's have formal vote."

The Group retired to the second-floor play- oom and closed the door on Penny, and after lot of talking and shuffling about they called er in. They had pulled down all the shades o that the room was gloomy and shadow- illed, and they were seated on the floor in a ircle around a single flickering candle. Penny tood still just inside the door, suddenly a ittle frightened at the strangeness of the oom, at the mystery of the candle and the weird diabolic shadows it traced upon the amiliar faces. Then Peter said, in a new deep oice, "Let us vote." He stretched his left hand into the center of the ring, over the candle, although not too close, and he said, "She is too small." Terry reached out a hand and laid it over Peter's. "She is too young." Then Janet, "She cries too easy"; and Betsy, "She can't even read." There was a long pause while they all stared at her with animosity, which, with the weird shadows and the solemn ritual, made her feel quite cold, except for her eyelids, which were hot and prickling. Then Betsy put her right hand over her left and said, "The Lady Genevieve. No," and they followed in turn, the Lady Guinevere, Sir Geoffrey and Sir Galahad, all of them "No." And when they had all voted, and she still stood, rooted to the spot, they said all together, "Get lost!" and she turned and ran into her own room and threw herself upon her bed and cried.

There was no appealing the verdict of the Group. Neither the Professor nor Missy had ever encouraged the running to parents with the "Mother, make her ——" or "Daddy, make him ——" gambit of turning the parent into a cat to pull the child's chestnuts out of the fire. Child affairs were left to child government, and individuals were expected to abide by majority rule. Short of giving up her ambition to join the Group, there was nothing for Penny to do but overcome their objections. She was too small, they said, she was too young, she cried too easily, she could not read. In the night she set her little chin and determined that in a year everything would be changed. In another year she would be in school, she would be bigger and older, she would learn to read, and she would practice never, never crying again. And so she entered upon the ordeal of the Lady Godiva.

They were all hard tasks which had been set her. Although she disliked being called "the baby" or treated like the baby, there were certain prerogatives of the baby which she had enjoyed, like being fussy about her food or letting a gentle pathetic tear trickle down her cheek to get what she wanted. Now she abandoned both practices. She drank her milk at every meal and ate her vegetables, even string beans, which she detested and had used to push about her plate artfully so that they were concealed, at meal's end, under a chop bone or the silver. She gave up crying, even when the other children vexed her deliberately. One would have supposed the other children would see how improved she was and admire her, as Professor and Missy did, but not the Group. When Missy cried, "How well Penny is eating these days!" or the Professor joked, "What! The little one's getting quite big!" the Group would look at one another with compressed lips and murmur, "See Penny. Oh, oh, oh!"

The expression was a sort of secret language of the Group, an utterance which conveyed complete boredom. Sometimes it was varied to, "See Mary. Funny, funny Mary," or "See Fred. Oh, oh, oh!" but it was always delivered in a dull monotone, devoid of expression, and since the whole family, even in ordinary conversation, employed their flexible voices colorfully, this one leaden phrase had a most depressing effect upon Penny, reminding her of her many shortcomings and the long way she had to go to become eligible for the Group.

It was a hard job to give up crying, for she had a talent for tears and the forlorn child had been the one role the Group had let her play. They found it very diverting, the effect she had on visiting grownups when she let one fat tear well up in her blue eyes and course gently down her cheek. There was almost always some material evidence of sympathy slipped into her plump little hand, a reward which was divided evenly five ways at the end of the performance. But then one summer day when the Group had carefully set the scene and she was working on the college president in the hedged garden, the Professor had caught the show and that was the end of that. Penny had not liked being suddenly nobody, with her one acknowledged talent useless and no chance to develop any others, so she had turned her tears against the Group. They were not amused. Even when she really cried they said, "Faker, faker!" and left her. But now she had to give up crying altogether, even when she felt like it, and it was not easy.

But the most important thing of all, Penny realized, was learning to read. In a house that was built on books, as Faraway Hill was, where every member had his favorite reading nook for a launching field for the flying carpet of the mind, the one who could not read was a pariah. The Professor smoked his pipe and looked calm; Missy, the next page always half turned, twiddled it absently; the roof could have fallen in without disturbing Peter's concentration; Terry alternately read and dreamed with distant eyes; Janet liked to keep a pencil handy to underline things she liked; Betsy giggled or wept as though she were at a show. Penny had to content herself with sitting on the floor, looking at the colored pictures in her big books and trying to remember what the other members of the family had said the printing around the pictures meant. She lived for the day when she should go to school.

She waited through the long summer and the longer winter, through a dragging spring and a sullen summer, waited like a young squire training to be a knight, watching the older children gather in the upstairs playroom for Group meetings, and dreaming of the day when she could join them. Then had come the first day of school, a day of betrayal, for she had supposed that the moment she walked into the schoolroom the teacher would entrust her with a book, tell her the magic phrase, and she would be able to read. She had been the first one up, the first one dressed, the first one through with breakfast. As the children gathered their jackets and their lunch buckets and set off down the lane toward the country school, Peter had laughed at her. "Look at the sprout beam. How could anybody look that happy about going to school?"

Penny, who had used to be bothered by his teasing, answered serenely, "I'm going to learn to read today."

Terry said derisively, "See Mary. See Fred. Oh, oh, oh!"—the Group's pet expression of complete boredom.

Penny's face flamed. "I will so," she cried, stamping her foot in the dust. "I will so too!"

They stopped laughing then and stared at her with pity. It was Janet who told her gently, "Not today, Penny. They don't let you read for weeks and weeks." And it was true.

But now the waiting was over. The single letters of the alphabet were past, the flash cards with their single words had been drilled and put aside. Today, this very day, Miss Jones had promised, today without fail, the first grade would be given books. Today Penny would know how to read and tonight she would join the Group at last, the Lady Godiva.

At last the light crept into the house strong enough to trip the alarm clock down the hall, and Penny was on her feet at once. No need today to remind her to wash her face and straighten her socks and tie her belt. Even before Missy reached the stairhead, sleepy-eyed, clad in her long flowing housecoat, Penny was there, shining and breathless. Missy stared at her youngest child with astonishment and called the Professor, and he came running from his shaving, looking immodest in his undershirt, with his face still half frothed with lather. He felt Penny's forehead with mock alarm, and doors popped open all down the hall and small heads thrust out curiously.

"What is the matter here?" Missy puzzled. "Have I forgotten something? Is there a party today? Or is this Sunday, by some chance? Maybe the millennium has come. Maybe I'm dreaming."

Penny giggled. She would not tell them her lovely secret yet.

The boys came out into the hall in their pajamas. "She's flipped her stack," Peter said.

Janet called, "She's got a crush on some boy. Jimmy What's-his-name that threw a spitball at her yesterday."

Betsy tossed her gypsy head. "It's disgusting. She ought to be made to go back to bed till she gets over it."

Penny let them rave. She knew what the day would bring, and it was wonderful. All the way to school she hummed to herself a tune whose silent words were, Godiva, the Lady Godiva.

And so at last the moment came for Penny, the moment toward which all her life and heritage had pointed, the moment when she should be entrusted with the key to unlock all the riches of all the minds that ever were. Like the knowledge it contained, Penny's book was brand-new, and her fingers touched it reverently. She felt a promise she could not put into words: that she would always respect, always treasure this morning's revelation. And then Miss Jones was seated in her little chair and they were all opening their books together to the first reading lesson.

There was a colored picture first of a boy chasing a girl. She hardly glanced at it. She was tired of pictures. On the opposite page were the divine first words. She recognized them from flash-card practice. They were, "See Mary. See Fred. Oh, oh, oh."

Penny sat still and stared. Was this reading? Was this the door to the magic world of books? Was this what she had worked for, waited for, this leaden "See Mary. See Fred. Oh, oh, oh."?

In an instant she understood that they had always known, Peter and Terry and Janet and Betsy. They had always known that after she had struggled so hard and dreamed so much she would find only this. They had told her over and over, in their dull depressing monotones. They had told her derisively, laughing at her. Sick with disappointment, she put her head down on her desk. Dimly she heard Miss Jones talking in her bright voice, and then calling names. "Alice." Alice read, "See Mary. See Fred. Oh, oh, oh." Jane read, "See Mary. See Fred. Oh, oh, oh." Hugh read, and Freddie, and Barbara, and all their voices had the same words, the same monotonous tone. Their voices were like echoes of the voices of the Group, scorning her, laughing at her for wanting this thing so badly and finding it to be so little worth the wanting.

This was not the magic password to the Group. They would vote again. They would say, "She can't read. All she knows is 'See Mary. See Fred. Oh, oh, oh.'" They would say their names, Galahad and Geoffrey, Guinevere and Genevieve, and then they would all say together, again, "Get lost!"

Miss Jones said, "Penelope," and looked across the room at Jimmy What's-his-name, who was surreptitiously forming another spitball. Suddenly Penny flamed with anger. She would not stand for it. They could not do this to her. She would revolt against a fate so unkind, so unrewarding. Nobody in the world could make her suffer the indignity of mouthing those leaden words. She stood up. Her head turned slowly and she peered down at the floor beside her desk. "See Mary!" she whimpered.

Every head in the room lifted and thirty small necks craned to catch a glimpse of the suggested body in the aisle. Penny turned and her arm lifted toward the darkest corner of the room where shadows lingered behind the hall tree which supported Miss Jones' coat. "See Fred!" she cried, with a hint of fear in her voice. Not for nothing had she been the lackey or the scrubwoman all these years watching the Gallsworthy Group prance and mime in make-believe. Thirty first-graders rose to their feet and stared into the shadows, trembling.

Miss Jones, startled by the strange tone, abandoned the spitball and turned her attention on Penny, but too late. "Oh!" Penny gasped. "Oh!" she repeated with mounting horror. "Oh-h-h-h-h!" she screamed, her register mounting toward hysteria, and then fell across her desk in a mock faint.

Thirty first-graders, their backbones icy, abandoned their places in panic and fled like chicks threatened by a hawk to the hen teacher. Pandemonium took over.

The first grade was dismissed early, and Penny went home quietly and alone, the other children avoiding her as though she had just revealed the possession of an evil eye. She changed her clothes without being told and sat in her room, playing with a kitten, until dinnertime. She did not care any more. There was no magic key in reading. There was no wonderland in the books she could have. They were dull, dull, dull. Her disillusionment was ashes in her throat. She did not want to eat at dinner, she would not talk. She sat silent under Missy's anxious glances, not even a trace of a smile touched her lips at the Professor's teasing. She did not care if the Group looked at one another questioningly. And then the telephone rang.

Professor got up to answer and they heard his voice from the hall. "Yes, Miss Jones," and then again, "Yes, Miss Jones," his voice growing stranger and stranger. Peter and Janet exchanged looks, Terry stared at the youngest one speculatively, Missy's eyebrows went up as though she were putting out feelers to test the atmosphere. The Professor came back. His face was carefully controlled. "Penelope," he said, "Miss Jones has lodged a complaint."

Penny hung her head. "I'm sorry."

The air was charged with the electricity of curiosity. "Penelope put on a disgraceful exhibition this afternoon," the Professor explained. "She read with such fervor that she stampeded the entire room. Miss Jones was knocked down and trampled. Her feelings, and I think her back hair, suffered considerable injury."

Missy's cheeks were as gaunt as though she were sucking them in, and her eyes were wild. "What did you read?" she asked presently in a barely audible voice.

Penny's eyes were on her plate. She would have to tell them, and then they would all know the ghastly joke. "See Mary. See Fred. Oh, oh, oh," she answered in the proper monotone.

Professor cleared his throat and she could feel his eyebrows going up. "That stampeded them?"

Penny nodded and confessed, "The way I did it." Head down to hide her scarlet face, she pushed her chair back and fled, without even asking to be excused.

Nobody called after her, and nobody came near. They left her alone in her room all evening. She had disgraced the family and they were letting her know. She heard the other children go down the hall into the upstairs playroom. She heard the doorbell ring, and the voices of grown-up company in the downstairs hall. Penny was listless and tired. Her fingers were wooden as she unfastened buttons and slipped into her white night robe for bed. Turning, she caught a glimpse of herself in the mirror and thought, impersonally, she looked like a candle with her long white gown and her mop of soft apricot-colored hair, but thinking of a candle made her think of the Group, and of Lady Godiva, who —— She shut her mind and climbed into bed.

She was wakened, she did not know how much later, by the Professor's voice—"stampeded in panic and swarmed the schoolmarm under, dignity and all"—and a burst of adult laughter. Penny felt the burn of humiliation possess her. Then she shook herself fully awake. How could she hear him with the door closed as she had left it? Cautiously she raised her head and saw that the door was standing open and Betsy was tiptoeing toward her. "Get up, Penny," Betsy whispered. "Come with me."

"Don't want to," Penny answered, burrowing her head in the pillow. She had stood enough for one day. She was not going to listen to the Group go over her sins.

Betsy twitched the covers off. "Get up," she repeated, "or Peter will come."

Reluctantly Penny crawled out of bed and followed her sister down the hall. She stood dull and sleepy, watching and listening as Betsy gave the secret signal, one sharp knock, then two soft ones, upon the playroom door, and then pushed into the room. The children were seated on the floor around the candle, waiting, their faces mysterious in the upflare of yellow light.

"Who comes?" Peter challenged.

"The Lady Genevieve," Betsy answered, "and the Lady Godiva."

Penny could not believe her ears. She stood utterly astonished, unable to move.

"Has she been through the ordeal?" Terry asked.

"She has been through the ordeal this very day," Betsy answered.

Then Peter said, "Let her join our circle," and Terry and Janet nodded, smiling.

It was like a dream to Penny, being led forward, and finding the circle was large enough now for five, and she was one of the five. She knelt in their ring, trembling, her eyes enormous. Peter said, "Let us vote," and put his hand out over the candle flame. "Sir Galahad, yes." One after another, the hands moved into the center. Sir Geoffrey, yes; Lady Guinevere, yes; Lady Genevieve, yes. There was a solemn pause. Janet whispered, "Put your hands on Betsy's and say your name." Penny's plump little hands topped the heap. "Lady Godiva," she whispered wonderingly.

Betsy's right hand covered Penny's warmly. "I find her brave," she declared. Janet offered, "I find her of proper age and size." Terry said, with just a slight twinkle in his eyes, "She reads better than most."

A flower of wonder opened slowly in Penny's heart. They had accepted her, she was one of them at last. Dimly she saw that what had happened to her had happened to all of them. They, too, led by the magic which the Professor had displayed to them, had dreamed and waited for their day of revelation, only to find, as she had found, the dull monotony of the primer. They, too, had endured the ordeal, and, living through it, found their way into the magic land of reading. Warm and secure and beloved in their midst, she would someday join them in that wonderland.

Sometime, when she had grown much older, she would know this moment to be one of the great ones of her life, the moment when she recognized the common experience. All over the world it was being lived by countless dreamers like herself, the future virtuoso weeping over scales, the fledgling pilot fumbling with gears, the girl who would become a great hostess burning her first pan of biscuits, the lovers who would inspire poets blushing at their first contact, the poets who would celebrate them twisting out limping lines, the great athlete falling over his own feet, the youthful statesman trembling before a uniformed doorman. It was the moment when youth's bright reach first takes the measure of its own small grasp.

But Penny was only six and the truth still years away. It was enough for now that she had won the right to be the Lady Godiva, that they found her brave and proper in age and size, that they admired her reading. And then Peter, who was Galahad, crowned her with the greatest compliment man can pay to woman. "I wish," he said in benediction, "that I had done it myself." END

CATCH AS CATCH CAN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 36

The robe was not where it should be; it was t anywhere in the closet. And that was ange.

She looked, then, at the surprisingly few thes hanging on Joyce's side of the closet. yce had taken both her evening dresses, all summer dresses and . . . her tweed suit. Un- s the Nicholses (whoever they were) lived Maine, it was odd to lug along an autumn t. The suit hadn't gone to the cleaners, be- se it had just come back from the cleaners.

Linda shrugged slender shoulders. It was concern of hers what Joyce took for a ekend. It was her concern what had become the yellow silk robe, which she knew she d hung in its fixed place the night before. e obvious answer was that Joyce had bor- wed it, although Joyce had a really lovely usecoat of her own.

Joyce wasn't a girl to borrow things without king. And Joyce could not wear the robe if e did borrow it. Joyce was five feet nine ches tall, and weighed a hundred and thirty. autifully distributed the hundred and thirty unds were, and beautifully carried the five et nine, but they would not go into a robe ich was snug on a hundred and four pounds, st long enough for five feet two. "H'm-m," nda said, and looked in such other places as e robe might be, and did not find it, and oked under the bed—the bedroom was yce's, the day bed in the living room Linda's. e looked because of an increasing curiosity. Joyce had taken her big bag, as well as her ernight. The big bag was certainly big for a eekend. Linda stood up a little uncertainly. as it possible that Joyce had walked out on r? Left her, not with lamb chops and frozen occoli only, but with an apartment lease? I n't believe it, Linda thought. From Joyce's riting, Joyce had left in a hurry. Probably ith just time to catch a train. Joyce had cked hurriedly, had put the yellow silk robe ith her own things, by accident.

Linda put clothes on and it was a quarter of ven when she went down three flights of stairs, d through Morton Street to Sixth Avenue d up it, on the shady side, to Eighth. She uld look up Eighth and see that the movie dvertised at the Playhouse looked all right, d went on to Bigelow's, and ate a roast-beef ndwich and drank iced coffee. She was in od time for the seven-thirty showing, and if e picture was not what the critics had said it as, it was agreeable enough and now and en exciting.

She rented two books at the Washington quare Book Shop across the street. She car- ed them home to an apartment which asn't any cooler.

It was twenty minutes after eleven when the lephone rang.

"Miss Holbrook," a man's voice said, that appointment you wrote about. It's fixed r tomorrow at ——"

"Wait," Linda said. "Miss Holbrook isn't ere. This is—I share the apartment with her."

"Oh," the man said. There was, Linda ought, an odd note in his voice. "Do you appen to know where I could get in touch ith her, Miss ——"

"Parks," Linda said. "I'm afraid I don't, xactly. She's gone to the country for the eekend."

The man said "Oh" again, and she thought here was surprise, and perhaps uncertainty, n his voice. "You're quite sure?" he said then. "Because ——" She waited for a second, but e did not go on with that.

"Why," she said, "she left a note. Took her hings. Why do you ——"

"Never mind," the man said. "You don't now where?"

"All she said was somebody named Nichols," Linda told him. "But I'm afraid I don't know the Nicholses."

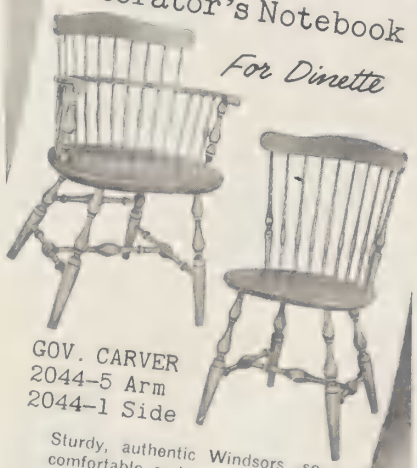
"All right," the man said. "We'll get in ouch with her later."

And then—abruptly, Linda thought—he ung up.

If the appointment Joyce was missing was bout a job—well, Joyce would shoot herself when she heard. It was all very well for the man, who might have gone to the trouble to identify himself, might have left a message, to say "they" would "get in touch with Joyce." Less than a month in New York had taught Linda several things. One of them was that "We'll get in touch with you" was to be counted among famous last words. One was there at the right time or one wasn't. It was that simple and that frustrating.

It was an odd time for somebody—talent agent? TV casting director? Advertising agency?—to call about a job. But people like that worked all hours and thought nothing of it. And, appointment "you wrote about"? That was a little odd, also. One didn't write. One went, as fast as high heels and quick legs and subways would carry one.

There was no use lying there on the day bed in the living room, book ignored in lap, and trying to work out something she didn't know anything about. On Monday, probably, it would all come out in the ——



Linda went to sleep. Sometime in the middle of the night she awakened thirsty, and got water from the tap, and went back to sleep again. But this time she dreamed.

She dreamed about meeting Joyce again; Joyce tall and slim and very blond. Joyce had run crying, "They're after me, after me, after me——" so that the words seemed to float out behind her like a veil. And Linda was running behind her, and then there was no Joyce anywhere, but Linda was the one who was running and crying, "They're after me!" and, "Of course you know the Nicholses," a sandy-haired man was saying, in a quick, clipped Eastern voice. "You've got an appointment with the Nicholses. Don't you remember?" Linda wrenched herself awake. "Remember!" the sandy-haired man said, angrily, just as she woke up.

Pages from a Decorator's Notebook

For Dinette

GOV. CARVER
2044–5 Arm
2044–1 Side

Sturdy, authentic Windsors, so comfortable and attractive, they do double duty beautifully where space is limited.

By the Fireside

SALEM ROCKER
69–6DC

Genuine Early American reproduction with high Windsor back, low seat, and all the homey charm of yesteryear.

Perfect Anywhere

JOHN HANCOCK LADDER BACK
2022–1

Authentic right to its hand woven rush seat, this faithful colonial copy adds character to any room — be it foyer, library or kitchen.

Bedroom Beauty

BAMBOO WINDSOR
2103–1D

A fine Windsor with all the traditional grace and delicacy of the New England original. Equally at home in colonial or modern decor.

1857 1957 100th ANNIVERSARY Windsor

The Home of Windsor Chairs

Nichols & Stone

Send for Booklet!

"How To Choose The Right Colonial Chair," with helpful ideas, interesting illustrations, and historical information.

NICHOLS & STONE CO.
Box 14, Gardner, Mass.

Please send me your 32-page booklet "How To Choose The Right Colonial Chair." Enclosed is 25¢ in coin.

Name_____

Street_____

City_____ Zone____ State_____

It was after eight and very hot. She remembered the dream only as an unpleasant phantasmagoria, and then, as its outlines faded farther from her mind, as merely something unpleasant in which Joyce had been afraid. And then, as she stood under the shower again—thank God for running water in heat like this!—her mind asked an unexpected question. The question seemed to come out of nowhere, and it was: Was Joyce afraid of something?

There was no ready answer. As she drank orange juice, made coffee, put bread in the toaster, Linda tried to understand why her mind had asked that question. There must have been something. A final misty exhalation from the dream, and merely that? Or was the dream itself a reflection of some unknown knowledge in her own mind?

It came back slowly as she nibbled toast and drank coffee. Had Joyce during the past few days seemed . . . wary? If "wary" was the word for it?

Linda could not be sure. "Mind taking it?" Had Joyce used those familiar words more frequently in the past few days when the telephone rang? "See who it is before you let them up, will you?" Hadn't Joyce said that several times when the door buzzer sounded? And hadn't Joyce spent an inordinate amount of time standing by the living-room windows and looking down into Morton Street, in which there was seldom much of interest to look at?

Linda thought, I'm making something out of things which were nothing. She washed her cup and saucer and juice glass resolutely, and went to the door to pick up the newspaper which ought to be outside it—and found she had forgotten to lock the door. And then she remembered quite vividly that on Tuesday night, after they had both gone to bed, Joyce had called, "Did you lock the door?" and, on getting "Sure" for an answer, had not accepted it, but come out herself to test the door.

But, when she had gone away for the weekend, Joyce had herself left the door unlocked. She had left the door unlocked, and taken a fall suit on the hottest of summer days, and a robe which did not belong to her, and had used a salutation she had never used before and mentioned—dragged in, as if it were almost certain Linda would remember it—the name of people of whom Linda was now quite certain she had never heard. Was she, Linda thought—sitting by the windows, with the newspaper on her lap—was she trying to tell me something?

But as soon as her mind reached this second specific question, her mind rejected it, almost violently. How silly can you get? Linda asked herself, and censored the answer. Mountains out of molehills, and no real molehills to start with. She turned her attention to the paper, which gave her real things to worry about.

At nine o'clock or thereabouts, Linda Parks finished dressing, having taken time about it, since how she looked was important—was one of the things she had to sell. Linda, prepared to take her wares to market—the way she looked and the way she spoke, a mobile face and one season of summer stock—stopped, for no reason at all, to look from a window down to Morton Street.

Across the street, on sandstone steps down from the entrance of an apartment house, a man was sprawled. He was rather well dressed, and rather young, and most obviously drunk. People passed him and paid no attention to him and he, apparently, paid no attention to anything. At nine o'clock in the morning, Linda thought. As she watched, the man's head fell back so that he appeared to be looking up at her. But it was evident that whatever he looked at, he was past seeing.

Linda went uptown to an advertising agency which was supposed to be seeking a girl who could dance, and sing a little, and open a refrigerator without falling into it. The agency had been, the day before, she was told. But the agency would keep Linda Parks in mind.

"Don't call you. You'll call me," Linda told the good-looking young man in the gray suit and he grinned, and said it came to that, but then, "Don't worry. You'll make it."

Since it had never occurred to Linda Parks that she would not, she said merely, "Of course," and went on to try a TV studio, and a manager's office and a talent agency. It was then after one, and she had not thought of Joyce Holbrook all morning.

She had a chicken-salad sandwich and a chocolate malted and decided to go back to the apartment. In New York in summer, Saturday afternoon often seems to begin with Friday's lunch.

But she did not hurry back. She stopped to buy stockings; to look, with longing, at pretty things which she could not afford. She rode downtown on a bus, loitered through Washington Square, where there were trees, but no coolness.

It was after three when she climbed the steps to the entrance of the apartment house in Morton Street. The man who had sprawled on the steps across the street was gone—sobered or moved on by a policeman. She climbed to the fourth floor and unlocked her door and went in, and was it hot!

I wish somebody would invite me to the country for the weekend, Linda thought. I could be sitting in a shady place, cool. In New York there is never that feeling. Of course they say the winters —— "Wait till you go through a New York winter," Joyce had told her. "The wind around the Empire State—br-r-r. Wait ——"

She had been getting ice cubes out while she let water run from the tap. She stopped suddenly, holding the tray of cubes.

But—how did Joyce know? Joyce herself had come to New York only a few weeks before Linda had come; it had been part of it that they were both new in the city, knowing nobody in the city, learning the ropes together. It had been part of it that neither had been there before, and that so they were starting even. But Joyce had talked about winter in New York as if she knew winter in New York, knew where the wind blew coldest.

Linda got cubes out of the tray and into a glass, and filled the glass with water. Carrying the glass, she walked to the living-room window. She tried to remember exactly what Joyce had said. Perhaps she had said "they say" New York freezes you in winter; that a cold gale blows around the Empire State. But she could not remember that Joyce had said it that way. Linda thought, It's another thing that doesn't fit.

She looked down into Morton Street.

The man was back. Only he wasn't sprawled on the steps now. He was standing beside them, leaning against the house itself, reading a newspaper. And he did not appear at all drunk. He looked up suddenly from the newspaper, and at her. He looked down again quickly, folded the newspaper and began to walk off, not hurrying.

It was then that the door buzzer sounded.

It was a man selling brushes. He had a salesman's smile when he reached the landing; he held a sample brush ready. He said, "Miss Holbrook?" having, of course, got t name from the mailbox in the vestibule. H face told him. "Miss Parks, then. I'm the bru man."

"I'm afraid not," she said.

"How do you know till you look?" he ask her pleasantly. "Lots of things besides brush Toiletries? Er—insect exterminators? We got a new thing for roaches."

"I'm afraid not," Linda said again. "I w just going out." Sometimes that worked.

"Miss Holbrook, then?" he said. "I take you share the apartment with her. May s[h]e'd be ——"

"She's not here," Linda said. "Away for t weekend. I'm awfully sorry. I'm reall afraid ——"

It wouldn't do any good, she thought, ev as she tried to get finality into her words. Pe sistence was the word for a brush man. S would end, probably, by buying something.

"Well," the man said, "thanks anyway."

And with that, still carrying the case of sar ples, he turned and went down the stairs. T case banged on steps as he went. She heard banging all the way to the street floor. Not very persistent brush man, she thought. didn't even try the people on the lower floors. H wouldn't sell many brushes that way.

She looked down into the street again. H was putting his sample case into the back of car. He got into the car and slammed the do and the car started up. Given up for the da she thought. I must have been the last straw.

But then she could feel herself frownir When she had last looked down at the stre the car had not been there. So he had not be canvassing the block. It was almost, s thought, as if he came here to make this o call. As if this one call were all that matter

And it was then, for no real reason, becau of an accumulation of things of no appare significance, that Linda Parks felt nerv tighten at the back of her neck. Too mar things are wrong, she thought; too many litt things. Something's happening, she though something I don't understand is happening. ought to tell somebody.

But as soon as that thought entered h mind, it seemed to shrink. Tell someboc what? What have you got to tell? Your apar ment mate goes for a weekend and leaves note; there is a drunk on the steps across th street; a brush man knocks off early; th girl you share with gets something of your mixed up with hers. It fell apart when yo touched it. The police would be tolerant an patient and, figuratively, pat her shoulder an tell her not to worry, and think she was a gi from the sticks imagining things.

If only she could talk it over with some body—somebody less official than the polic If she were at home she would go to Judg Hopkins—who wasn't a judge any longer, b the county prosecutor; who was an old frien of her father's. If only there were somebod like that, official, but at the start merely som body she could talk to.

The sandy-haired man she had met at th amorphous party and not thought of sinc but had incongruously dreamed about—h had something to do with the district attorne which was probably the same thing as th prosecuting attorney at home. He was a lon way from Judge Hopkins, but he was the nea est she could think of in this city of which sh knew so little. It was absurd to think of impos ing on him with this—this cobweb of trivia things. He would not remember her. He had square brown face and moved and spok quickly and when he looked at you he reall looked at you. His name was Bowen.

She went to the telephone and put her han on it and then took her hand away. It was to ridiculous, too embarrassing. She woul think about it for a while.

So it was not until 4:20 on the afternoon o Friday, the twenty-seventh of July, that Lind Parks dialed the office of the District Attorne of New York County and asked if she coul speak to Mr. Bowen.

At 5:04 Geoffrey Bowen, lawyer, an assist ant district attorney among many, was on hi familiar way to the 5:10 New Canaan Express He was thinking about the girl who had calle him up, and trying to place her.

IT'S ALL IN THE FAMILY

(or: Some Curious Echoes)

My daughter tells me everything.
Mother thinks I'm still a child.

My husband would never do a thing like that.
My wife lives in a dream world.

My kids think I can do anything.
I wish pop wouldn't try so hard.

My son used to be so affectionate. I wonder what's happened.
That mushy stuff is for babies. Guys don't like it.

We're staying young for the children's sake.
We don't want the folks to be fuddy-duddy, but—gosh!

PATRICIA MARTIN

Name: Linda Parks, which struck no spark. Dark and not tall, she said. But there had been half a dozen girls at the Folkeses' swarming party who had been dark and not tall. There had been one who was as lovely a little thing as he could remember having met, but the party had snatched her away from him and if she had a name he could not remember that anybody had mentioned it. There was no point in getting up his hopes that she was the girl who had called.

She had got through to him at 4:25, when he had ten minutes of cleaning up still to do, and a vacation stretching ahead. She had wanted to talk to him about something that was worrying her, something about a girl who had disappeared; something about a "lot of little things." She had not known, really, that they added to anything, but she was worried. She had to talk to somebody. If only he could give her half an hour.

It was one of those intangible things which came up every so often. People got suspicious; people got scared. People, in short, imagined things. One listened, because, too often, the things were not really imagined. But sometimes one had no time to listen. He explained that to the girl, who would not turn out to be the lovely one. (Although she had a clear and charming voice.) He explained that he lived in the country, and had a train to catch; he suggested that she let it go until Monday, and he would arrange a man for her to talk to, since he himself would be on vacation ——

And then she had said "Oh" in such a dimmed voice that Jeff Bowen's conscience made faces at him. He stared his conscience down. He said that he was being met at the other end of the train ride, in New Canaan, and this was not true. He said again that Assistant District Attorney Reggie Cunningham would be just the man for her to talk to. On Monday.

She said "Oh" again, her voice dying away. But then, in a different voice, she said, "The country? A place called New Canaan?" and, before he could respond, "Is there some sort of hotel there? Where I could stay overnight? To get away from the city?"

"Well," he said, "of course. But ——"

Then couldn't she meet him on the train? Tell him about what was worrying her, get his advice? If he would tell her what train?

He did, feeling somewhat trapped. Then, she would wear a red hat on the train and sit—where? In the last car? The smoker?

Jeff Bowen said he would look, on the 5:10, for a small dark girl wearing a red hat and that he was a middle-sized man with sandy hair.

"Oh," she said, "I remember you, Mr. Bowen." He could hear the words again, two quick strides from the open mouth of Gate 23.

"—— at Track Thirty-nine," a very different, loud and metallic voice said, in his ear—in the ears of all in the station. "Attention, please. Will Mr. Geoffrey Bowen please come to the stationmaster's office at Track Thirty-nine? Mr. Geoffrey Bowen, please. Come to the stationmaster's office."

Geoffrey Bowen stopped. His moment of indecision was brief, and then he knew he'd had it—as he had always had it since he accepted appointment as an assistant district attorney and became a sworn officer of the state. He didn't suppose that "the state" was what was having him paged. But all the same, he'd had it. And the girl wearing a red hat, waiting on the train probably, had had it too. Unless—unless it was the girl herself who had arranged the paging? To tell him she couldn't make the train? Or that the missing roommate had come home after all? Or ——

He walked fast, although there was no real use in walking fast. He could kiss the 5:10 good-by.

"Yes, sir?" a uniformed young man behind a counter in the stationmaster's office said.

Geoffrey Bowen said he was Geoffrey Bowen, and the man nodded; he said, "Yes, Mr. Bowen. Your office wants you to call. You can use that phone."

It seemed a long time before a voice said, "District attorney's office, good afternoon."

"Jeff Bowen, Sally," he said.

The girl at the switchboard in the office said, "Yes, Mr. Bowen?"

"You wanted me," he said. "Somebody did. Had me paged at Grand Central."

She said, "Paged?" as if the word were new. "I don't know, Mr. Bowen. Almost everybody's gone. I was just going."

"That was the message," Bowen said. "I was to call. The chief, Sally?"

"Gone twenty minutes ago," she said. "Nobody called through the board. But—I'll see."

He waited. He heard her try—heard humming silence, heard her clear, modulated voice. She spoke again to him. "Nobody knows anything about it, Mr. Bowen. I'm sorry."

"So am ——" Bowen said, and caught himself, and said, "Not your fault, Sally. Have a good weekend."

He was thanked for that; he was told to have a good vacation. He put the handset back in the cradle and looked at it, and walked two steps to the young man and said, "You're sure it was my office?"

"That's what they said. The district attorney's office. Something wrong?"

There was. There obscurely, but still decidedly, was. "Not your fault," Bowen said, as he had said before, and walked quickly out of the stationmaster's office. At Track 23 the gates were closed; the 5:10's announcement board was down. Two tracks away, the 5:34's board was up—"New Haven Local-Express" and, in the station strip, "Connection for New Canaan."

Linda Parks had put the telephone back in its cradle in the Morton Street apartment and had moved as fast as a nimble girl can. She tossed enough things for a night or two into a bag; ran down the three flights of stairs and trotted to the subway station. Now that she had found someone who (reluctantly, but that would be all right) would listen to and advise her, there was adventure in the rest of it. And for a night—perhaps for two nights if the hotel wasn't too expensive—she would be out of the city. New Canaan, she thought, would be a quiet, shaded town, like Centerview.

She found the 5:10 New Canaan Express and reached Gate 23 just before it opened. Now she sat, red hat and all, on the right-hand side of the last car and waited for a man named Geoffrey Bowen, the quick, sandy-haired man she was sure she would remember. She looked at her watch and saw that it was time for the train to start. A man with a brief case ran along the platform, and after that there was no one. She watched the door at the end of the car, anxiously, and when the door stayed shut she half stood and reached for her bag. But then the train started.

She sank back in the seat, and the red hat—with a feather sticking out of it—was the only gay thing left about Linda Parks. He had missed the train. Or he had never planned to catch the train. He had agreed, to get rid of her—get rid of a bothersome ninny from the country, scared out of her wits. The train began to pick up speed; then it was in a tunnel, the walls closing in.

Then the door at the forward end of the car opened, and she looked quickly. But the man was not the man she remembered; the man she had talked to; the man who had promised. The man who came into the car, and looked down it, was a big, soft man, with a round, rather friendly and red and perspiring face. He wore a tweed jacket, and he was beginning to grow bald. He came down the car looking at her, and stopped. "Miss Parks?"

She merely looked at him.

"Cunningham," he said. "Reggie Cunningham. Geoffrey Bowen got tied up at the last minute. Asked me to talk to you instead." He looked at the overnight case, and then reached down and picked it up and put it in the overhead rack. "Said to tell you he was sorry," the big man said, and sat down beside Linda. His heavy body pressed against hers, wedging her against the side of the car. "Now," he said, in a heavy, pleasant voice, "what's all this about your roommate? About Miss Holbrook?"

At first, she felt only let down—disappointed. She had time to think that odd, since all she wanted was to talk to somebody, somebody who would know what to do. Geoffrey Bowen on the telephone had said something about a Mr. Cunningham. Another assistant district attorney, she supposed.

She looked up at the big man, who smiled encouragingly.

"It's just that ——" Linda began, and stopped, her lips still parted for the next word.

Something was flashing in her mind; flashing as lights flashed in the tunnel the train sped through.

I didn't tell him her name, Linda thought. I know I didn't tell him her name. So how does this man know?

What it came to, Geoffrey Bowen decided—what it comes to, whoever called was a crank. There are plenty in town, and you can never tell what they may be up to. Three years in the district attorney's office had taught him that. The vast, uninquisitive city is a haven for cranks. Some of them liked—well, to tease the animals. Particularly the police animals, the law-enforcement animals, the district-attorney animals. "Show them how smart they are," the cranks said, and went to trouble to do it. Like calling up with a story about a disappearing roommate, arranging to be met on a train, arranging that the teased animal misses the train. Probably stood and watched, somewhere in the crowd, and laughed like crazy when Geoffrey Bowen heard his name on the station loud-speaker, and turned from the train gate to answer it.

for DEPENDABLE MOVING

CALL YOUR ALLIED MOVER

...he's the No.1 Specialist

Ask your Allied Mover for a copy of "Before You Move." See the yellow pages of your phone book, or write Allied Van Lines, Inc., Broadview, Illinois.

ALLIED VAN LINES • WORLD'S LARGEST LONG-DISTANCE MOVERS

He should have got over being surprised at what the cranks did, Bowen thought, making his quick way across the Grand Central concourse. All the same, he was surprised. She hadn't sounded like one of them. There was nothing to be done about it.

I got off easy, Geoffrey Bowen thought, making his quick way through the open gate to the 5:34. Half an hour's difference didn't matter; it wasn't as if he really had anyone meeting him at the station, or as if anybody waited impatiently in the sprawling white house. He opened a newspaper and relaxed into the normal world.

There was no change in the man when Linda abruptly stopped speaking. He looked at her and waited. After a few seconds he said, "It's just what, Miss Parks?"

Her mind hurried back. I didn't say, "My roommate, Joyce Holbrook," Linda thought. I just said, "The girl I share an apartment with." Then, how does this man know her name?

The man said, "Why don't you go on, Miss Parks? You wanted to tell us something." And, this time, his voice was changed—this time his voice seemed to press on her, as his heavy body did; seemed to push against her mind, as his body against hers.

Who is this man? she thought and then, This is another of the wrong things. And this time it is directed against me.

She tried to slow her mind, make it sensible. The sensible thing was to ask this big soft man to identify himself. He would have an official card. A badge or something? But another thought tumbled over that, because her mind would not slow. If I ask for that, and he is not what he says at all, then he'll know I know and ——

The train raced on. Lights flashed past the window and the car swayed. The air in the car seemed to thicken. I've got to get out, she thought; I've got to —— And then she thought, There's a way.

She parted her lips as if to speak again, but then, with a quick gesture, put her hand over her parted lips. She shook her head, and pressed hard against her lips. She looked up at the man, and her eyes widened; she willed sickness into her eyes, tightened the muscles around them. ("Learn to use your eyes," drama coaches had told her. "You can do a lot with eyes. Practice.")

"What's the matter now?" the man said. "Don't tell me ——"

She nodded her head. She took her fingers from her mouth, as if there were great risk in the movement. She barely opened her lips. She said, "Carsick. I'd better ——" and, convulsively, covered her mouth again. The man looked down at her. She moved, started to stand up. For an instant he hesitated, and she made her eyes command, "Hurry!"

The big man got up rather quickly, and she pushed past him, into the aisle.

"Up front," he said, and she went the short distance to the front of the coach, pressing her hand still against her mouth. She would lock herself in; somebody would come—the conductor ——

The train shot into daylight; now, as she reached for the door marked "Toilet," the train hurried on elevated tracks; ran high between tenements. The train began to slow.

She tugged at the toilet door, and it was locked. She looked back. The big man was still standing in the aisle, looking at her. She tugged at the door again, willing desperation into her movements. ("Remember," they had told her, "you'll always have to exaggerate a little.") The train went much slower. The train was stopping.

She turned quickly, pulled at the door to the vestibule. A metallic voice filled her ears—"Five-twenty express," the voice said. "Stamford the first stop."

The trainman swung off the steps to the platform. Instantly, it seemed, a crowd formed at the bottom of the steps. She moved down the steps. For a second she seemed trapped by people who surged toward her, blocked her escape from the train. She broke free and began to hurry along the platform, away from the coach in which the big man—she hoped—still awaited her return. She found a flight of stairs and ran down it, thinking, It's a miracle the train stopped so soon.

(The 5:10 out of Grand Central is the 5:20 out of 125th Street. Carrying an overnight case, a big man ran down the coach steps as the train started, and swung off to the platform.)

She ran now. She pushed through swinging doors and was on the street and there was a cab waiting. She ran to it, and tugged the door open. Inside the cab, she was for a moment too breathless to speak. The cab driver said, "Where to, lady?"

"Downtown," she said, and the city—the city she knew so little—seemed to swirl around her. She looked back through the rear window of the cab. A good many people were coming out of the station. She did not see the big man. "Grand Central Terminal," she said.

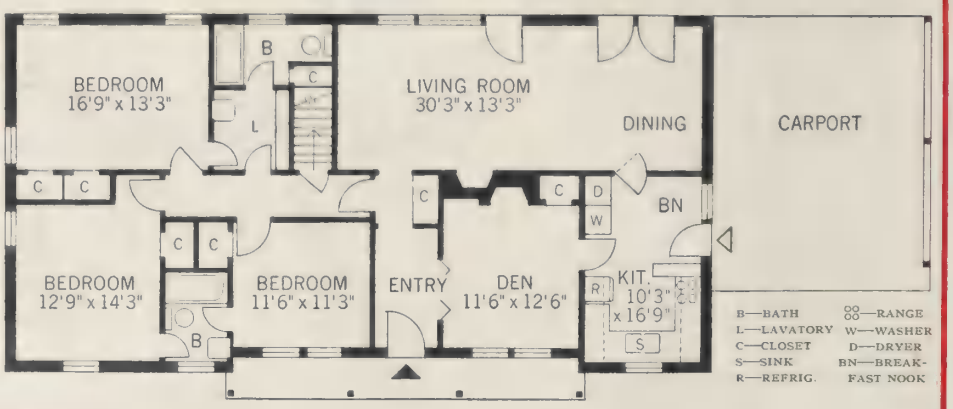
The 5:34, New Haven Local-Express, came out of the Park Avenue tunnel to the elevated right of way, and ran, slowing down, between tenements—tenements with open windows, with women leaning from windows, their elbows on pillows. As the train slowed, Geoffrey Bowen could have looked into many windows. Two months ago he had looked often, fascinated by framed vignettes of different life. He didn't any longer. The train stopped at 125th Street at 5:44. People got on it.

One of the men who got on at 125th Street, and found a seat a little behind Geoffrey Bowen, was a tall, rather heavy man, who wore a tweed jacket—who had a round, friendly face, flushed by the heat of the afternoon. He put a weekend case in the rack.

Jeff did not look at the large man with the somewhat flushed face. It would have made no difference if he had, since he had never seen the man before.

The big man lighted a cigar and leaned back in his seat, and opened a newspaper. He did not, however, become engrossed in it. There

CONTINUED ON PAGE 84



ARCHITECT: KNOX A. GRIFFIN; PHOTOGRAPHER: RODNEY McCAY MORGAN

At home IN ANY NEIGHBORHOOD

Modern planning and time-tested style are judiciously combined in a three-bedroom, one-story house

By CAROL L. CRANE

This comfortable home owes its livability to an ingenious plan, and its gracious air to early colonial forebears. See how the white-columned entry porch adds interest to a simple rectangular plan; the roof extension shades unusual floor-to-ceiling double-hung windows flanking a handsomely paneled door. Further accent is added to the entry by the sparkling white-painted vertical siding, contrasting with the pink tones of the used brick, and the crisp black of shutters and carriage lanterns.

Once inside the doorway, one sees that the house is planned for all the convenience and comfort that modern living implies. The central hallway bears the burden of through traffic, and provides an effective barrier between the living-entertaining area and the bedroom wing. The den, to the right of the entry hall, isolates children's TV viewing; it also accommodates occasional overnight guests. Ideal for grown-ups' entertaining is the really grand-scaled living room, with a portion set aside for formal dining, and access to the rear terrace from either area.

The bed-and-bath arrangement is unusual and very practical: a compartmented master bath, more likely to be tidy than the children's bath, doubles as guest powder room, and is accessible from master bedroom or hall, while the children's bath is carefully hidden from view, sandwiched between their bedrooms.

A partial basement beneath the sleeping wing is unfinished except for utility and storage rooms; future plans include a playroom which, taking advantage of the sloping site, will have direct access from out-of-doors, and windows above grade.

Construction estimates for this house range from $21,000 to $26,500, depending upon regional variations in costs of materials and labor.

Sorry, no plans available.

As modern as a new kitchen – milk in Pure-Pak!

Suddenly, as you use the convenient Pure-Pak carton, all other methods of milk packaging are outdated. Pure-Pak's the modern milk container that is so convenient, sanitary and safe—easy as a pitcher to use. Because so many of you have asked for it, dairies nearly everywhere offer this improved service.

Have you asked your milkman for milk in Pure-Pak?

Pure-Pak
YOUR PERSONAL MILK CONTAINER

25 MILLION TIMES A DAY, SOMEONE BREAKS THE SEAL ON A FRESH PURE-PAK CARTON

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 82

was no point in letting the same thing happen twice. Having let it happen once had not increased his popularity. He was a man who liked to be popular. Things were set now as far as Stamford.

In the taxicab, Linda asked herself questions. What's come over you? What on earth are you afraid of? Why are you running around like a chicken with its head cut off? And, if you must act like a hysterical ninny, why don't you just step out of it? Because nobody's after you. Why should anybody be?

These were sensible questions. But there were no sensible answers. The big soft man was probably just what he said he was, a friend of Mr. Bowen's, from the same office. You did give Joyce's name and just don't remember it. Ninny! Linda remembered very carefully, went over it very carefully. The cab went faster.

Linda was again quite sure. She had not given Joyce's name to Mr. Bowen when she talked to him on the telephone. This man who knew her name had not learned it from Bowen. Then he had not been sent by Bowen. Then—he was part of it. (Part of what?) She was frightened. And now she was frightened for herself. Now "it" had turned toward her.

"Here we are, lady," the cab driver said, and she paid him and went into the Grand Central Terminal. It was enormous and there were many people. She was safe here. Perhaps she could merely walk out of "it." It's none of my business. I can close my eyes and ears, as city people close them. I'm not in Centerview now, where anything that happens to anybody is—is part of everybody. I've stumbled into something. I can jump out of it. What's Joyce to me, really? A girl I hardly know.

But you can't walk out on people. Not if you know things—even things that form a cobweb only—which nobody else knows. And then Linda thought, He didn't miss the train on purpose. He's not like that. I'll go to this New Canaan and find him. It will be a little place—like Centerview, probably—and it will be easy to find him. She walked to the information desk and asked when the next train left for New Canaan. The man said, "Six-oh-five, Track Nineteen."

At Track 19, the gates were open. As Linda started through, a man who had been waiting to meet someone—a young man, tall and broad-shouldered, tanned and hatless—looked at his watch, and shrugged. Giving it up, the shrug said, and Linda thought, vaguely, that he gave up easily, since there were still five minutes before the train was due to leave. The man went down the ramp a few steps behind her. She went into the last car and found a seat. She was vaguely conscious that the hatless man came into the coach after her and found a seat on the other side of the aisle.

The train started. Just before it stopped at 125th Street, Linda took the red hat off and tucked it down out of sight. She also powdered her nose, keeping the hand which held the compact in front of her face. But the big man with the flushed face was not one of those who got on at 125th.

Nobody was meeting Geoffrey Bowen at the station. At the house in Pound Ridge, the hundred-and-fifty-year-old house, nobody was waiting for him. He might as well get something to eat in New Canaan. Jeff walked the length of the station yard, checking as he passed on the presence of his Volkswagen which nestled undisturbed in the small space it needed. He crossed Park Street and walked to a restaurant.

One of the fifty or so who had got off the train was a partly bald, heavy man with a red face. He walked in the direction Jeff Bowen had taken. He did not follow Bowen into the restaurant. He sauntered on, looking in the windows of attractive shops—a man with time to kill on a pleasant late afternoon in a pleasant, immaculate town.

"Change at Stamford," the conductor had said, as he punched Linda's ticket. "Stamford!" a trainman said loudly now. "Change for the New Canaan branch."

She went down steep steps to a platform and hesitated and saw a sign indicating the way to the New Canaan trains. She did not look back at the man behind her—at the tall, tanned, hatless young man, with a pleasant face and the commuter's brief case.

A train was waiting at a platform marked "Train to New Canaan." She was not the last to climb on the train.

New Canaan, she had vaguely thought, would be rather like Centerview—a little town, with quiet sun-swept streets, small enough so that she would stop in some store or other and ask where a Mr. Bowen lived—a Mr. Geoffrey Bowen. But, standing on the station platform and looking from it into the town, she realized it was not at all like Centerview. The idea that she would merely have to ask someone where Mr. Bowen lived was, at once, absurd. Nevertheless, she asked one of the taxi drivers waiting at the edge of the platform. He shook his head. He said, "Live here in town?"

"Why," she said, "I suppose so. That is—he was coming here."

The taxi driver smiled at her; most people smiled at Linda Parks, although she had never particularly noticed that herself. "You see," the taxi driver said, "people from quite a ways around use New Canaan station. Pound Ridge, over Wilton way, even come down from Lewisboro and Ridgefield. This Mr. Bowen might live anywhere around here."

She said "Oh" and the taxi driver was impelled to pat her shoulder, and resisted the impulsion. "Probably be in the telephone book," he said. "Stamford book. Divided up by places."

She went into the station, which was deserted, and found a telephone directory. She found: "Bowen, William, TrntyPass." But his first name was not William. Still ——

She dialed the listed number. The telephone rang, and rang unanswered. She went out of the station. The cab stand was empty now. Trains come; trains go back. She went to the trainman and asked about that. He looked at his watch. "Next trip in nineteen minutes."

Again, she thought, I could just step out of it, run away from it. I could get back on the train and go back to the city. I could ——

I can't, she thought. What shall I do? And then, quite prosaically, she decided she would go someplace and get a sandwich and, after allowing time enough, try again the telephone of the Bowen who lived at (or in?) something mysteriously called "TrntyPass." After she had eaten she tried the number again. And again she got no answer.

She walked back to the station; the train had gone. A taxi was backing up to the platform. The driver was the one she had talked to before; he got out of the car and came around it and smiled at her and said, "Find your party?"

"I don't know," she said. "There's a Bowen in Pound Ridge. On something called"—she tried to make it sound as it looked—"Trnty-Pass" and then spelled it. "Only it's a William Bowen. The man I want is ——"

"Wait a minute," the taxi driver said. "I've heard about that Bowen. And that's Trinity Pass. Wanders all over that neck of the woods, Trinity Pass does. Big corporation lawyer, Mr. Bowen is, only he and his wife have moved to Florida. Got the house up for sale. That's what I heard, anyway. And his son is living in it trying to sell it. Show people through it. Know what I mean? He's a lawyer too."

"Can you take me there?" Linda said, without, this time, stopping to think at all.

"We'll find it," the driver said. "Get in."

She got in.

A man who had been standing behind a car, on the other side of the station yard, watched the cab start off. He swore softly.

Jeff's dinner had taken longer than he planned. It was almost eight o'clock of the warm summer evening when he walked back toward the station. A cab from the station yard started up, turning north and climbing the hill.

The woman in the back seat of the cab wore a red hat. That was all he could see of her—a red hat. He stood for a moment looking after the cab. It went on up the hill. So—any woman could wear a red hat, if her own coloring allowed. He was done with the crank, the stirrer up of animals, the interrupter of routine. But what, he wondered, crossing the station yard, got into them? What did their disturbed minds get out of it?

The little Volkswagen, long in the sun, was now a small furnace. He opened windows, slid the roof panel back, and air came in. He backed the little car from its nest, and drove slowly across the station yard.

The heavy man with the amiable red face crossed to the platform. He still seemed in no particular hurry. As he reached the station, a tall young man, bareheaded, with a commuter's brief case tucked under arm, came around it from the far end.

"Well," the younger man said, "imagine running into you here."

The other man took off his hat and rubbed sweat from his forehead with the palm of his hand. "They gave you the girl, eh?"

"Very pretty girl," the younger man said. "Seems a waste, doesn't it? They're not too pleased with you, by the way."

"What would be a good practical pen for a small girl who will lose it within a few months?"

"So I gathered," the heavy man sai
"When I called in. One of those things, No man. She's taken off again, I gather."

"And," the young man said, "me witho my roller skates. Yours?"

"Likewise," the big man said. "Going hom probably. And she after him, wouldn't yo say? Or, do you know?"

"She made a couple of calls," the ma named Norman said. "Talked to the ta driver. Got bright-eyed, the lady did, and o they go. Yes, I suppose she went after him.

"Persistent little thing," the big man sai
"Got her wits about her too. Made me thin she was about to lose her lunch. As you say, very pretty girl. It does seem a pity. But ther it is, isn't it?"

"There it is," the younger man agreec
"You're calling in?"

"Yes." The big man was gone some te minutes. He came back mopping his fore head with a handkerchief. He said it was ho in the booth. "They'll pick us up," he said
"They know where the place is, but they'll sto by for us on the way. The restaurant down th street looks all right. Have just about time, I' think."

They went down the platform, side by side toward the center of New Canaan.

"By the way," the big man said as the waited for the light, "the other girl died."

"I thought she might," the younger mar said. "The prognosis was never good, was it Any last words?"

"Not, so far as they could find out, in th wrong places," the big man said. "Except t our little friend. A pity, as you said."

It was much cooler out of town; with th
Volkswagen opened wide, it was hardly hot a all. The little car turned contentedly left into Trinity Pass, as if of its own accord. The road curved and there, with a kind of suddenness, was the house.

It was white and had many roof levels, and from the road it did not look at all like a large house. It looked still like the nestling farmhouse it had been for its first one hundred years. There was a white slat fence in front of it. Jeff drove the Volkswagen up the steep, short drive and into the garage.

He did not go at once into the house, but walked behind it to look at the river. On this side, the house seemed to be on a hill; the wide lawn sloped down to the river, which sparkled in the slanting light. The sun was dipping below the hill beyond the river—their hill. All the hills around were theirs, and all the woods. "It's beautiful land," William Bowen had said many times. There was something over two hundred and fifty acres of Bowen land stretching around the house.

But all the same, Jeff's father and mother had decided to sell all of it.

His mother told Jeff, "We want to try something different. And you don't really want all this."

He didn't, of course. He loved it, but he didn't want it. Not to live on, to be tied to. Which was, apparently, the way his parents had decided they also felt. Well, there wasn't a man at sixty-three younger than his father, or a woman at sixty younger than his mother. Living from autumn to late spring in Florida, they could play tennis all winter.

The sun had gone behind the hill. He turned back toward the house. As he neared it, he walked between two of a row of round white stones, set into the lawn, marking the New York-Connecticut state line.

The area around New Canaan, Connecticut, and Pound Ridge, which is in New York, is rolling and wooded. Narrow blacktop roads go through the valleys and twist up the hills in all conceivable directions. The roads bear names, but often keep their names to themselves, to the confusion of strangers. But the roads are not meant for strangers, only for those who live on them in pleasant houses, some old and of clapboard, others new and largely of glass.

At 8:50, the driver of Linda's cab said, "You know, I'm afraid we missed it back there a ways," generously including his passenger in his confusion. "Could be I turned off Trinity Pass back there someplace."

Linda made a small and not very happy nd.

"Don't worry," the driver said. "We'll find Just circle back," he said, with hearty confince.

He came to a nameless fork and turned left
d to another and hesitated and turned right.
What'd I tell you? Trinity Pass."

It was Trinity Pass. A weathered road sign omised that. It was narrow and winding as roads had been for (it seemed to Linda rks) an incalculable time. They crept along e narrow road, the lights needed now; the hts picking up mailboxes, lettered with the lders' names. But none of the names was owen." They went very slowly—distant, it emed to the girl, from everywhere; lonely in e beginning night; far from the lighted city, e noisy city; farther yet—how incredibly r!—from Centerview and things that she ew.

He would read a bit, Geoffrey Bowen ought, and turn in. The doorbell rang. The an at the door was elderly, not tall, heavy.
e wore a dark gray suit. His face drooped a tle, pulled down by years. He wore rimless eglasses. He might, Jeff thought, be a pro-ssor, a doctor. He was, of course, another of ose who had lost their way; Trinity Pass was icky. A big car stood in the road, edged f it.

"Mr. Bowen?" the elderly man said, and his ice matched the dignity of his appearance.

"Yes?" Jeff said.

"Mr. Bowen," the man said, "did my ughter find you? Is she here?"

Jeff Bowen felt himself blink. He said,
Your daughter?"

"My name is Parks," the elderly man said.
Dr. Robert Parks." He paused for an instant, s if awaiting recognition of the name. "My ughter's name is Linda."

Jeff said "Oh" to that.

"Then," Doctor Parks said, and now there as regret, unhappiness, in his tone, "she did reach you. It is"—he paused and shook his dignified head—"it is distressing," he said. "To disturb a stranger. I wonder if I might come in, Mr. Bowen?"

"Why," Jeff said, "sure. Come in."

Inside, in the living room, Dr. Robert Parks seemed to hesitate—as, nerving to drink a bitter medicine, even the most resolute may hesitate.

"My daughter," he said then, and spoke slowly, as if with an effort, "my daughter left a note. At her apartment. Her . . . companion found it. It was addressed to her. It said ——" He paused and shook his head. "It is difficult to explain," he said. "My daughter is . . . disturbed, Mr. Bowen. I'm afraid that she did reach you on the telephone? As she said in the note?"

"A Miss Linda Parks called me," Bowen said. "She said that she had something to tell me."

"Yes," Doctor Parks said. He hesitated again, and said, "You may as well read it," and took a fold of gray note paper from his pocket and held it out. The handwriting was round and a woman's.

Jeff read: "I know what you are trying to do. It won't be any good. I've talked to a man at the district attorney's office, ■ Mr. Bowen. He won't let you do what you're trying." It was signed "Linda."

Jeff Bowen looked up.

"She imagines things," Doctor Parks said. "Probably you noticed it when you talked to her. She—we are very worried, Mr. Bowen. I suppose she told you—but it is really hard to guess what she might tell you. That there was a conspiracy against her? Or something of the kind? The child lives in a world of fantasy, Mr. Bowen. Even that there was a plot against her life?"

Jeff Bowen hesitated this time. And Doctor Parks nodded understandingly. He said he realized he was a stranger; that he was asking information that Mr. Bowen might not feel free to give. He said, "For what it's worth," and gave Jeff ■ card—"Robert Parks, M.D.," with a Park Avenue address. He said, "I realize this is all—I suppose you might say an impertinence. But I have to find her. What may happen if I don't ——" He did not finish.

"Your daughter is under the care of a psychiatrist?" Jeff said. "And there is a . . . companion?"

"Yes," Parks said. "A . . . roommate. A Miss Holbrook. A psychiatric nurse, although of course my daughter doesn't know that."

"On the telephone," Jeff Bowen said, "your daughter spoke of someone being missing. She wasn't explicit. Very guarded."

Doctor Parks sighed. He shook his handsome, dignified head. He did not need to put in words what the sigh, the gesture said—the sad acceptance they conveyed.

"I gathered," Jeff said, "that it was her roommate who had disappeared. I was just leaving the office. I was to have met her on the train."

"And didn't?"

"I missed the train," Jeff said. "It was arranged that I miss it." He told how. Parks sighed.

"This," he said, "is the worst thing that's happened. We've tried ——" He spread helpless hands. "I hoped that she might somehow have come here. Your office said you lived near New Canaan and I put two and two together." Once more he shook his head. "A fruitless trip," he said. "I've disturbed you to no purpose. Probably she is still in New York. I can only hope that she'll go back to the apartment. To Miss Holbrook."

"I'm sorry," Jeff said. "I'm very sorry. There was no truth in it, then? That her roommate is missing?"

"Oh," Parks said, "none, of course. She lives in a world of dreams, Mr. Bowen." He stood for a moment and looked at nothing. "I may as well go back," he said.

The doorbell rang. Jeff crossed the room, his movements quick, and opened the door.

The girl who stood at the door, the light from the room on her, was very small, and she wore ■ red hat. She was the very lovely girl of the party.

"Your father's here, Miss Parks," Bowen told her, and saw her eyes widen in sudden terror.

"My father?" she said, and in the voice which, for hours, had echoed faintly in his mind. "My father's dead."

Parks was beside Jeff Bowen then.

"My dear," he said. "Linda. Don't you ——"

The girl shrank back, turned and started to run. A large man came out of nowhere, and she ran into his hands. Jeff said, "Hey!" which meant nothing, and started out. And walked into a flash of blinding light and pain, and fell into darkness.

It had been a relief to find the name "Bowen" on a mailbox, finally, and ■ relief, too, to find the house lighted and people there—people visiting, apparently, with their car dark and empty and pulled off the road. It had been ■ relief, again, that the girl had not wanted him to wait, even until she had made sure that this was the Bowen she was looking for. Michael Peroni, taxi driver, wanted to get home and get to bed.

He had, nevertheless, waited to start up until he had been sure she was all right. He had watched her walk to the house, and wait until the door was opened by a man who looked all right, and he heard the man say, "Your father's here, Miss Parks." That cinched it. Peroni had driven off, thinking about getting home, and that the girl—Parks was her name, it turned out—was a nice kid.

A lot of people would have been sore that he had got them lost, and taken an hour and a half—more than that, really—to get to a place which was only fifteen minutes from where they had started. She might have made a fuss about it. And hadn't. Peroni put the cab in the company garage and walked home.

Question:

Why does Barbara Ann Scott crave Orange Juice after she leaves the rink?

Answer:

Her Body Wisdom tells her she needs extra Vitamin C and quick energy!

Barbara Ann Scott, star of Ice Capades, former World's Olympic Champion

If you're busy, active—on the go from morning till night, you use up Vitamin C and energy as fast as Barbara Ann Scott, or any athlete. And since Vitamin C is one vitamin your body can't store, orange juice with breakfast is not enough. You need a second glass later to replace the Vitamin C you've used up, and for a refreshing energy pickup.

Fresh-Frozen Orange Juice from Florida is the delicious and convenient way to get the orange juice you need, breakfast time and any time.

© Florida Citrus Commission, Lakeland, Florida, 1958

FRESH-FROZEN ORANGE JUICE from FLORIDA

How often should you replenish your store of Vitamin C and energy?

A special health message from the Florida Citrus Commission

THE HUMAN BODY is a remarkable mechanism—more complex than any electronic computer, more agile than any mechanical instrument and a marvel of dynamics. In addition, the body is a storehouse unlike any other in the world.

Day upon day, meal after meal, our bodies store up the things we need for vibrant good health: proteins, carbohydrates, antibodies, precious vitamins. They are all stored away until needed. But there's one element vital to good health which the body cannot store: Vitamin C. And on this score, nutritionists are taking a second look at Vitamin C and ways the body can get it.

Vitamin C from Orange Juice

Most of us know orange juice is one of nature's richest sources of Vitamin C. It provides quick energy and other health benefits. That's why so many Americans drink a glass of orange juice with breakfast to supply the minimum daily requirement of Vitamin C. But recent studies show that the minimum requirement is not enough for busy, active people. They use up their supply of Vitamin C faster. And the more active they are, the faster they use it up.

Coaches, trainers and athletes know this. But the rest of us are just learning that we, too, use up our energy and Vitamin C faster every time we tackle a tough job. This includes expectant mothers, businessmen, housewives, children . . . anyone under stress or strain.

You Need a Second Glass

These people need a second glass of orange juice during the day, in addition to a glass with breakfast. This extra orange juice not only serves to replenish the supply of Vitamin C the body has been using up, but also acts as a refreshing pickup.

How about you? Do you keep "on the go," always busy with one thing or another? Then you, too, probably have experienced that craving for ■ quick, refreshing pickup. That's your "body wisdom" telling you it's high time you replaced used-up Vitamin C and energy. So, take time out for that second glass of orange juice—at midmorning, after school, after work or just before bedtime. Let your "body wisdom" tell you when.

It was dark when Jeff Bowen woke up with his head hurting. He was on a sofa, in his own living room. After several minutes he stood up carefully and found the light switch, and the light was a sharp pain in his eyes. It was almost as if he had been struck again. But the pain lessened and he went to a downstairs bathroom and ran the water cold and soaked a cloth in it, and held the cold, wet cloth to his head. Gradually he came out of it enough to think about it.

He had been hit on the side of the head, and there was an increasing lump to show it. He went back into the living room and looked out toward the road. The big car was no longer there. He went through the house, lighting it as he went. He moved cautiously at first but then more quickly, as the conviction grew that there was no one else in the house. But he continued his search, from room to room, to the attic, finally to the shadowy reaches of the big basement, because it might be only that there was no one else in the house who was still alive. He ended quite certain that there was no one else, alive or dead.

He tried the telephone, then, and found it dead and was not surprised—was not, at any rate, more surprised by that than by everything else. That the telephone wires should be cut was logical; if he was to be left in the house certain precautions would obviously be taken to slow down his movements, to ensure more time. Time for what was anybody's guess. Probably something hindering would also have been done to the Volkswagen; the distributor head, most probably.

He got a flashlight and opened the front door, and, before he went out into the night, threw the beam of the light around the yard between house and road. He saw nothing. He went to the garage and went through the formality of making sure the Volkswagen's distributor head was missing. Whoever was doing whatever it was that was being done was following the procedure to be expected.

He walked the quarter of a mile to the nearest house, and used their telephone to call the state police. He told the desk sergeant, briefly, what the trouble was. He did not attempt to go at all thoroughly into the trouble, since what he knew of it added only to confusion. He said that he would stand by.

Geoffrey Bowen went back home to try to work things out—as an officer of the court and as a man who has been hit on the head while standing in his own front doorway, looking at a pretty—how very pretty—young woman in a red hat; a girl who had been described by her "father" (who almost certainly was not that) as "disturbed." And been thought of by a man to whom she had turned for help as "one of the cranks."

It made his head ache the worse to use the brain in it, but he tried to re-create the happenings of those few violent seconds at the doorway.

Doctor Parks—the name would have to serve for the moment—had been beside him, and a little behind him. The girl had been a step below them, on the flagged path. Her eyes had widened in fear when he had said her father was there. Or had the fear leaped in her eyes when she saw the man beside him? He had no way of knowing.

She had turned, tried to run away. A man had suddenly been there. Probably the man had been behind the pruned-down hemlock on the left of the doorway. There might have been several men.

The girl had been seized. Then—had he stepped forward, out of the doorway to the path? He thought he had. Had the girl struggled when the man grabbed her? He could not remember; probably he had been hit before he had a chance to see.

There was, Jeff's lawyer mind told him, no point in speculating as to what it was all about until he had facts to put together. Nevertheless, when he first heard a distant siren, he was speculating.

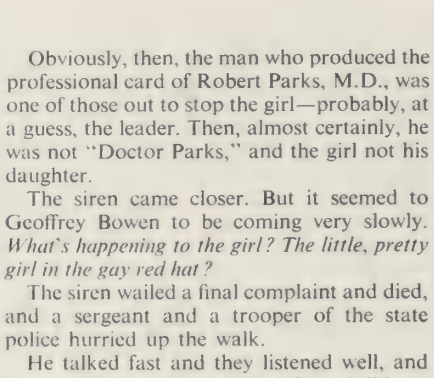
The most probable thing was that the girl did have something to tell him, and that all that had happened was made to happen so that she could not. Finally, the girl had been forcibly removed, and he had been put forcibly—if temporarily—out of action. Why temporarily? There was no use in guessing.

Obviously, then, the man who produced the professional card of Robert Parks, M.D., was one of those out to stop the girl—probably, at a guess, the leader. Then, almost certainly, he was not "Doctor Parks," and the girl not his daughter.

The siren came closer. But it seemed to Geoffrey Bowen to be coming very slowly. What's happening to the girl? The little, pretty girl in the gay red hat?

The siren wailed a final complaint and died, and a sergeant and a trooper of the state police hurried up the walk.

He talked fast and they listened well, and did not need to be told their job, and did not try to tell him his. But it took time, even so—time to say he had seen the car only as a dark shape, but thought it was a big car; to agree that the girl, since she had come later, probably had come separately and might well have come by cab; and that a place to start was with the cabs which worked the New Canaan station. It took time, too, to describe the girl as well as he could describe her: small, five two or three at a guess; a face which narrowed down from wide brow to delicate chin—heart-shaped, if they wanted to call it that; large eyes dark hair almost black; a red hat with a feather stuck in it.



OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERNS ON PAGE 70

Vogue Design No. 9318. "Easy to Make" blouse; 10–18 (31–38). 60c.

Vogue Design No. 9238. Transfer embroidery alphabets for monograms; 50c.

Vogue Design No. 9278. "Easy to Make" blouse; 10–18 (31–38). 60c.

Vogue Design No. 9217. "Very Easy to Make" skirt; 24–32 waist measure. 60c.

"You want to have a doctor look at that head of yours?" the sergeant asked, and Jeff shook the head, which didn't help it.

"I want to get back to town," he said. "Things started in town."

The man on her left in the rear seat of the big car was the man who had been on the train—the man who had said he was Cunningham, the man from whom she had fled at 125th Street. His heavy body pressed against hers now, as it had in the narrow seat of the train. He was the man who had grabbed her as she shrank back from the lie, the trap behind the lie. She had run to find a man who would help her, she had searched for him on dark roads, in strange shadows. She had found him and he had lied—had said her father was there; her father dead these ten years.

The man who had told her that—stood in the lighted doorway and told her that—was Geoffrey Bowen. There was no doubt in her mind about that.

On her other side, now, was the older man who had stood beside Geoffrey Bowen in the doorway, been part of the lie. She had thought him older, quite old enough to be, in fact, her father. He was a dignified man.

She had turned and the big man had caught her and held her while she struggled against him—struggled long enough to find out that struggling was useless. She had heard movement behind her and a strange, wordless sound as if someone had made sudden physical effort. Then she had been whirled around by the man who held her and forced down the path away from the house, into the dark car. A heavy hand had been held over her mouth, so that she could not cry out.

Three other men got into the car—a man in a chauffeur's uniform; a tall, square-shouldered, youngish man who got in beside the chauffeur; and last, the older man. The older man said, "All right, John. We'll go back now." The car started. After it had gone a quarter of a mile or so, the older man said, "Let Miss Parks breathe, Clyde." The big man took his hand away from her mouth.

She put her own hands over her face then, as if she could hide behind her hands. She could feel herself trembling, and tried to stop her body's betrayal, and could not.

"Don't be frightened, my dear," the older man said, in the soothing, quiet voice. "There are just a few questions we want to ask you. Questions I'm sure you can answer quite easily."

Grand Central Station never sleeps, but at one o'clock in the morning it may be said to doze. Most of the big trains have gone by then, tired men push big brooms across the acres of concourse flooring.

Jeff Bowen, with his head aching, started with the Manhattan telephone directory, started with Parks. There was no Robert Parks, M.D. He had not supposed there would be. There was no Parks, Linda. He looked at a list of people named Holbrook. "Doctor Parks" might have made up the name. He might not. He could, Jeff thought, spend a night waking up people named Holbrook, asking each if he knew a girl named Linda Parks—a little, dark-haired girl with large and frightened eyes.

He looked up a number he knew he would find, dialed and waited. He waited a long time. The chances were that the Folkeses were out. A voice full of fog said "Hello."

"Bernie," Jeff said, "Jeff Bowen."

Bernard Folkes said, "I was asleep! We were both asleep."

"I know," Jeff said. "I'm sorry. Bernie, I'm trying to find a girl. Her name is Linda Parks. She was at that party of yours last week. Wednesday."

"There were a dozen girls at it. Big girls, little girls. Two dozen."

"Small," Jeff said, as patient as with any discursive witness. "Dark hair. Big eyes. Pretty. This is official. Not fun and games."

"Was she with a blonde?" Folkes said. "Aspiring young actresses?"

"I don't know, Bernie. Possibly."

"Tall blonde," Folkes said. "Little dark girl. Name of dark girl, Linda Parks—hey, wait a minute. The blonde was Joyce something."

"Holbrook?"

"Could be. Friend of somebody and somebody brought her and she brought the little girl." He sighed. "Little girl was named Linda."

Jeff said, "Listen, Bernie. Where does she live?"

"Tried the phone book?" Folkes asked, and was answered by patient silence. Folkes spoke off the telephone then, to his wife. He came back on. "Myra thinks somewhere in the Village," Bernie Folkes said. "She says, something happen to the girl?"

"Yes," Bowen said. "Where in the Village?" he asked.

Bernie conferred again. "Myra says, is there a Mortimer Street?"

"Not that I ever heard of," Jeff said. "Not in the Village." He thought. He said, "Morton Street?"

Bernie conferred again. He said, "Myra says it could be. If there is one."

"Thanks," Jeff said. "Go back to sleep."

None of the Holbrooks or Parkses in the telephone directory lived on Morton Street. He turned to Information, disabused Information of the notion that it could give none without a known address; disabused a chief operator of the notion that the address listed for a new telephone could not be given out; got telephone number and street address, and rang the former, and got no answer. Then he got a cab.

There were two names in the slot next a doorbell in the dark vestibule. Jeff used a match to read them: Joyce Holbrook; Linda Parks. He pressed the doorbell and got no answer and tried the door and found it locked and went out into the street and looked up at the building. On the third floor front a light was on. He went back, worked out the probable button, and pushed it. Almost at once the lock on the door began to click angrily. Jeff pushed.

Above him, up the stair well, a man leaned on the rail and looked down.

"Forgot my key," Jeff said. "Thanks."

He was told not to mention it. He climbed stairs. The fourth floor, almost certainly.

Joyce Holbrook. Linda Parks. Neatly lettered on a card, set into a plate arranged for it.

Jeff knocked, and was unanswered. He tried the doorknob, and it turned. He said "Hello?" and nobody said anything and he went in. The light switch would be by the door. It was. He flicked it up and said "Hello?" again.

A slender blond girl, wearing a pale silk dress, was lying on her back on a day bed. She looked entirely comfortable.

She had, Jeff Bowen decided after he gently touched her bare arm, been dead for some hours.

The big car pulled up to the curb sedately, and the elderly man said, "And here we are," in a tone of satisfaction. He got out of the car and crossed the sidewalk to a narrow, three-storied house set shoulder to shoulder with other houses like it. "Come on, Miss Parks." She slid across the seat, suddenly very quick, but the broad-shouldered man who had sat beside the driver was on the sidewalk before she could reach it.

They took her into the house and the elderly man turned on lights in a room opening off the hall. "If you'll just come in here, Miss Parks." There was nothing violent in his tone, or, now, any violence in any of them. One might have thought, from their manner, that she needed only to say she would rather not go in there to have one of them say, "Whatever you'd prefer, of course." But it was not like that; not at all like that.

They had said little to her during the drive into the city. She had said, "Where are you taking me?" and had not been answered. She had said, "What did you do to Mr. Bowen?" and the older man had said, "Don't worry about him, my dear."

The older man sat down too. The tall, broad-shouldered young man (who was the man she had seen waiting at the gate when she went to get on the 6:05) stood at the door to the entrance hall. The other man—the soft man of the earlier train, the man called Clyde—stood near another door which led into another room.

"Now," the older man said, "what did Miss Holbrook tell you, Miss Parks? That you wanted to pass on to Mr. Bowen?"

"Tell me?" Linda said, and though there was fear in her mind there was, at the same time, complete bewilderment. "What do you mean?"

"About the place where she used to work," he told her.

"I don't know what you mean." Linda managed to keep her voice steady. "I don't know what you mean at all. Who are you—all of you? What do you want? Where is Joyce?"

"She's gone away," the man said. "With the Nicholses. Don't you remember?"

"You've done something to her!" Linda said and started to stand up. The soft man of the train shook his head slowly, without emphasis. She sank back into the chair.

"That's the way," the man who asked the questions said. "Now, what did she tell you that you wanted to pass on to the district attorney?"

"She didn't tell me anything," Linda said. "I don't know what you're talking about." She leaned forward. "Really I don't," she said. "Let me go. Please!"

"After all the trouble we've gone to?" the man said.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 88

New deodorant preferred by 7 out of 10 women!

ban® rolls on protection that stays on!

More effective than messy creams*, easier to apply than drippy sprays! Not a crumbly stick!

Stops odor—checks perspiration round the clock!

- ✓ Won't irritate normal skin!
- ✓ Won't harm delicate fabrics!
- ✓ No mess, no drip, no waste!
- ✓ Exclusive patented applicator can't clog or freeze!
- ✓ Rolls on just the right amount!

*IN A SURVEY AGAINST THE LEADING CREAM DEODORANT, 7 OUT OF 10 PREFERRED BAN.

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 86

There was nothing at first to make the theory of suicide untenable. The detectives from the Charles Street Station agreed to that; and the detectives from the Homicide Squad, and the assistant medical examiner. Jeff Bowen, who was official now, whatever he had been before, agreed also.

The tall blond girl, who had appeared to be so comfortable on a day bed in the Morton Street apartment, had died of an overdose of a barbiturate. A glass on the floor, within easy reach of her hand, held a swallow—a final swallow, never needed—of Coca-Cola and barbiturate. The assistant medical examiner, being careful not to touch the glass, dipped a tongue depressor in the liquid and tasted it and said absently, "Bitter enough." Dorsal lividity, checked for briefly, showed that she had lain as she was found for some hours after she had died.

The picture was obvious. Joyce Holbrook—prints of her photograph, backed with her name and address, found in a drawer of the bedroom chest, identified her beyond immediate question—had decided she wanted to die. She had poured barbiturate into a glass and filled the glass with Coke. She had lain down on the day bed and sipped death, and lost consciousness before she quite finished. She had left no note.

"They don't always, you know," the homicide man told Jeff Bowen.

She had been dead a minimum of twelve hours; perhaps a maximum of eighteen. So Joyce Holbrook—mid-twenties, blond hair—had died not later than 2:30 on the afternoon of Friday, the twenty-seventh. ("Not a real blonde," the assistant medical examiner said absently. "Redhead before she thought better of it.")

"Nothing to indicate she was moved after death?" Jeff asked. He was told that there was not. "But it's not impossible."

It was not, of course. Joyce Holbrook had lain on her back for some time after her death. Lividity showed that. She was lying on her back when Jeff found her. A question was possible; nothing raised a question.

The photographer finished and went; the fingerprint men went at it—rolled slender dead fingers on a pad and on blanks, dusted surfaces. The formalities are required, even when the facts are obvious.

"You're sure this other girl—this Linda Parks—was in the apartment when she called you?" one of the squad men asked Jeff Bowen. "Because, if she was, she was selling you a bill of goods. The girl she said had disappeared—right there she was." He pointed to the day bed, to the girl on it. "And—right dead she was."

"I'm not certain," Jeff said. "I gathered she was. I suppose she said something to make me think she was. She may have been someplace else."

"She better have been," the squad man said. He regarded Jeff Bowen. "You're pretty sure she was snatched? That it wasn't a put-up game?"

"I don't get ——" Jeff began, and then stopped, because he did get it. It would have been pretty elaborate, but—"Killed her roommate," Jeff said. "Got her to drink the stuff somehow. Called me to report the girl missing. Then showed up with some pals and got them to kidnap her, so it would look like somebody was after both of them."

"And," the squad man said, "show up later, having got away from the bad boys, and find her roommate all dead." He considered. "I don't," he said, "know that I'd buy it offhand. On the other hand, the doc's probably right about the time. So?"

Jeff Bowen thought of the girl with the light on her face—her very lovely face—and fear in her eyes as she stood just outside the door of the house in Pound Ridge. On the other hand, she was an actress. Or wanted to be. If Bernie Folkes had got it straight.

The fingerprint men were methodically at it, still. Now one of them blew powder from the glass out of which Joyce Holbrook had drunk what killed her and looked at what he had brought up. He looked casually, to confirm the obvious. And then he looked more carefully and said, "Hey!" and got the pad on which he had rolled dead fingers. He looked at it, looked back at the glass, nodded his head.

"Too many prints," he said. "Two sets of prints all over the place. The cadaver's. Another woman's. Other woman handled the glass. Before this one"—he indicated this one—"overlay in a couple of places. So?"

The squad man looked at Jeff Bowen. He said, "Well, counselor? So?"

"If the Parks girl wanted it to look like suicide," Jeff said, "why not wipe the glass? Then put the other girl's prints on it? If she fixed the drink, why leave her own prints all over the glass? And why call me about a disappearance?"

"I'm glad you asked those questions, counselor," the squad man said. "They're very fine questions. Have you got any fine answers?"

Jeff Bowen didn't have.

"So," the squad man said, "we'd better find this Miss Parks of yours, and see what fine answers she's got." He looked at Jeff, who did not seem to have heard him. "I gather she's a doll," the squad man said.

"Yes," Jeff said. "She's a doll."

IN REPLY TO YOUR QUERY, SINCERELY

By ELIZABETH GRAHAM

Do You:

1. Often tell your husband you love him?
Only when the sun or moon's above him.

2. Plan menus around his taste?
Well, in the kitchen I'm frequently embraced.

3. Have some endearing name for him?
(Don't laugh) It's "Topaz." You know—a gem.

4. Eagerly prepare for his daily home-coming?
Gaily, with a lipstick, a comb and some humming.

5. Glow inside when he praises you?
Burst with pride as the flame blazes blue.

6. Like to make him smile?
Makes my life worth while.

7. Want him always to look his best?
You mean he sometimes doesn't? (Is this one a test?)

8. Comfort him when he feels bad?
Will not answer this. It's too sad.

9. Often think how wonderful he is?
Often wonder how I managed being his.

10. Miss him when he's away on trips?
No. I go along, or else into eclipse.

11. Praise his good qualities to your friends?
If envy can be averted. I'd say it all depends.

12. Gladly try to match his moods?
Match his moods? They're all but wooed.

13. Do your best to please him?
It truly isn't hard, since he's him.

14. Feel closer to him as time passes?
Isn't it the most, how love amasses?

The search for Linda Parks would spread patiently—from trooper barracks to trooper barracks, in the city from precinct to precinct. It was out of Jeff Bowen's hands, and probably would never come back into them. If it did it would be when the glass which had held death was "State's Exhibit A."

Jeff went downstairs, said "Good night" to a patrolman in uniform at the downstairs door and said, when he was looked at curiously, "District attorney's office" to a sergeant in a prowl car. He walked down Morton Street. He was almost at the corner when a man came out of the shadows and began to walk along beside him. Jeff stopped.

The man was entirely a medium man—medium in height and weight, medium in age. He was not a man at whom one would look twice. He smiled faintly.

"Can't say I blame you," he said. "People popping out of nowhere. You'd be Bowen?"

"Well?" Jeff said.

"Same side of the street," the man told him. "Or thereabouts, anyway. Federal."

"Are you?" Jeff said. "Let's see, shall we?"

The identification card said that the medium man was Saul Stringer, and that he was Federal.

Stringer said, "The girl's dead, I take it."

"If you mean Joyce Holbrook," Jeff said. "Yes."

"They will play around about it," Saul Stringer said. "'Shall I, shan't I.' Petals off a daisy. As if they had all the time in the world. Her name wasn't Holbrook, by the way. Near enough like it—Hancock. Janice Hancock. The old initials deal." He sighed. "Probably had them on a bag or something. Buy you a drink?"

"Every place is closed," Jeff said. "Anyway ——"

"Hotel," Stringer said. "O.K.?"

"Yes," Jeff said, and Stringer said, "Fine," and started off toward Sixth. A little way from the corner, a small car was parked. Stringer led the way to it, and drove it uptown and across, to a very medium hotel. The clerk aroused himself from a doze to say, "'Evening, Mr. Seymour." They went up in a self-operated elevator and along a corridor to a medium hotel room. "The old initials deal again," Stringer said. "Samuel Seymour here. Say when."

After a proper interval, Jeff Bowen said when.

"Am I to take it," Jeff said, "that Miss Holbrook, or whatever her name was, was a beautiful blond spy?"

"If it were that easy," Stringer said. "No, a nice clean girl, Miss Holbrook. From all we hear. Only—a little indecisive. Couldn't make up her mind probably. Of course if we knew more we'd be further along."

"Couldn't make up her mind about what?" Jeff asked him.

"How much she knew," Stringer said. "Whether she really knew anything, perhaps. I suppose something came up that made her decide she did. As I say, we're not too far along. The Parks girl didn't tell you anything?"

"That her roommate had left the apartment," Jeff told him. "That there were a lot of little things which worried her."

"What were the things that worried her?"

"She didn't get to that. She was to meet me on a train. Or do you know that too?"

"What I know," Stringer said, "is what you told the state police. Why the Connecticut police, by the way? We've got you down for Pound Ridge."

"The house is in Connecticut. Most of the land is in New York. The road twists back and forth across the state line. It happened in ——" He stopped.

"Yes," Stringer said, "does make it interesting, doesn't it? Anyway, a name stuck out in the report when it came through on the Teletype. Not yours. The girl's. So. What's the setup back there? In the apartment?"

When Jeff had finished, Stringer said, "Not very clear, is it?"

"No," Jeff said. "Since we're letting hair down—your turn, isn't it? Or don't you people reciprocate?"

"We collaborate to the fullest extent with other law-enforcement agencies. End quote," Stringer said. "What do you know about espionage, counselor? Men in trench coats, with their hats pulled down? Beautiful blondes, as you mentioned? All very sinister."

"You watch TV," Jeff said. "Go to movies."

"Makes a nice change," Stringer said. "Well—last Wednesday, Miss Holbrook wrote us a letter. Call her Holbrook. Said she had some information about a company she used to work for. Something she'd 'stumbled on,' she said. Something that made her think the company had a—well, call it a secondary line. Like collecting information about things and sending it along to people who could use it. See what I mean?"

"You're indirect," Jeff said.

"So was she," Stringer told him. "Indirect and inadequate, but wanted to come in and talk to somebody. Said she had been thinking about it for weeks, not being sure she really had anything to talk about, and that something had come up in the last few days which convinced her she had." He paused, sipped from his glass. "We get a lot of letters," he said. "We pay reasonable attention. Miss Holbrook's letter we did pay attention to. For various reasons. For one thing, it more or less fitted in."

"With?" Jeff said.

"People in various places seem to be learning things they're not supposed to know. In considerable detail. Especially during the past year or so. When that happens, you look for pros. Not the little independents—people full of zeal for something or other—the pros. Not wearing trench coats or looking sinister. With good covers and . . . no prejudices, except a prejudice in favor of being paid. With these boys it's 'You pay, we find out.'"

"For anybody?"

"Anybody with a convertible currency," Stringer said. "It's just possible that Miss Holbrook, when she was still Miss Hancock, worked for the organization. In its cover aspect, if you see what I mean. Like—oh, importing watches, or fabrics or novelties or machine tools. Or selling real estate. Legitimate enterprises, and legitimate people working in them—filing, typing, running Comptometers. Eight hours a day, five days a week, humdrum and honest as you'd find.

"It occurred to us that Miss Holbrook might have been working for this organization and stumbled on something. Something that made her suspicious—suspicious enough to decide she'd get out before she found out too much. They suspected she'd stumbled on something. She changed her name and dyed her hair and tried keeping her mouth shut. But then something happened to convince her that wasn't going to be good enough. So she finally got around to writing us a letter."

Jeff said, "Probably what happened was that they found her."

"Probably," Stringer said.

"And the other girl?" Jeff found, unexpectedly, that his voice had grown tense. "Linda Parks?"

"Depends on what Miss Holbrook told her. Or on what somebody thinks Miss Holbrook told her. Always provided she isn't in it herself. Of course her fingerprints are on the glass, you say?"

"She lived there," Jeff said. "She may have had a drink out of the glass. Not got around to washing it." He looked at his own glass. "Somebody," he said, "might have found a glass that hadn't been washed. Maybe with a little of a drink still in it. Figured that if there were prints on it they'd be Linda's—Miss Parks'."

"A plant," Stringer agreed. "To suggest that Miss Parks had mixed her friend a nice drink of Coke and barbiturate. And made herself scarce."

eff said, "She'd have wiped the glass. Also, barbiturate derivatives are bitter. Coke uldn't have masked the taste."

Counsel for the defense," Stringer said. h, I agree. Provides a diversion, though, sn't it? I doubt if there's a drinking glass he world without a few prints on it. Be- se after you wipe a glass you use your fin- s to put it away wherever you keep it. y may not have thought of that."

They," Jeff Bowen said. "You think she s killed?"

Oh, yes," Stringer said. "And that Miss ks will be if they decide the Holbrook girl sed on what she knew and—that Miss ks hasn't." eff looked at his glass very thoughtfully.

If they thought Miss Parks had passed on ormation," he said. "You think then they uldn't?"

I don't know," Stringer said. "But they e to stop someplace, don't they? They're amateurs. Not likely to get emotional ut things. Vindictive. If they thought Miss ks had already talked, they might decide was pointless to eliminate her, mightn't y? Might just fold their tents. And move to other tenting ground, of course."

Look," Jeff said, "you talk as if you know o 'they' are."

If we knew, counselor," Stringer said, new and could prove, we'd move in, uldn't we? We know the last place Miss lbrook worked. When she was Miss ncock."

Mr. Stringer," Jeff said, "how did she slip ough your fingers?"

Well, we did a little checking first. Like to ow who we're talking to. Took a bit of e. When we got around to calling her, it s Thursday afternoon and nobody an- ered. We tried a few more times and got ss Parks, and she said her roommate had e away for the weekend. How we recog- ed Parks' name when it came through, identally." He said, "We were late."

What do you do now?" Jeff said.

Talk to Miss Parks, if somebody turns her "

You don't turn her up, I take it?"

We're not a missing-persons bureau. She's ng looked for. She'll be found. Dead or ve."

Jeff said, "You think if they thought— oever they are—that she had talked it uld make a difference?"

It might."

If she had talked to me, given me this in- mation, on the telephone—what would the ormation be?"

Something that would make a bright girl nk something wasn't kosher. Something e overheard. Something she read. How uld I know? As for the telephone call—I uldn't think so. Her line's tapped, of urse. They heard what she said to you. at's how they got on to her in the first ce. How else? So, if she told you anything, would have to have been later. Not on the in, because they got you off the train. In e country?"

I didn't see her until she showed up at the use. I—wait a minute. She was wearing a d hat. I saw somebody, some woman with a d hat on, going off in a cab. It probably sn't the girl because she didn't show up til a lot later. Of course she might have got st ——" His words trailed off; his thought nt on.

Stringer said, "They may have followed her. ey might get to the cab driver."

Jeff nodded.

"You'll be bait," Stringer said, after a pause. may be wrong about their knowing where stop. Knowing when it's time to fold the hts."

"Where did Miss Holbrook work last?" ff Bowen said.

Stringer told him.

"Remember her name was Hancock."

Geoffrey Bowen slept on his office couch. e had got in touch with the Homicide uad, and told them that Joyce Holbrook's me probably was Janice Hancock, and that saw no reason why, at the moment, the wspapers should be told of this. He had checked, through channels, and found out that there was a Saul Stringer, and that he was in the line of work he said he was. He had telephoned the Connecticut state police and found out that a taxi driver named Peroni had driven a girl who wore a red hat from the New Canaan railroad station to a house on Trinity Pass, and that he had got lost on the way, and that there had been a big car parked in front of the house on Trinity Pass and that he thought, from the shape of the license plate, that it was a New York car. At any rate, it was not a Connecticut car.

There was a chance, Jeff told the state police, that somebody might try to get in touch with Peroni, and get information out of him. Could Peroni be told to clam up? And could he be trusted to clam up? Particularly about having got lost?

Peroni could be told, they thought.

Now Jeff reviewed. It had been suggested that he pretend he knew something which he had been told by a girl he had been kept from talking to except over a tapped telephone. He was thus to become bait.

Could he get away with it? Would "they" (whoever they were) see through him at once? They had killed once already, if Stringer was right. Why would they hesitate to kill again? Or even, if it came to that, a third time?

What business was it of his? The search for Linda Parks was in competent hands. He had met the girl once only, and remembered her as lovely, but had not remembered her name. He had seen her a second time and there had been fear in her eyes. Even so, what am I to Linda Parks, or she to me?

He ate eggs which had been boiled too long and coffee that had stood too long at a fountain counter which needed swabbing. He got a cab uptown. He might as well see if there was any such thing as Jasper Plent Associates. Saul Stringer might have dreamed it up.

He paid off the cab in front of an office building on Fifth Avenue in the forties. It was only a little after nine, and the city seemed to still sleep. It never really wakened on summer Saturdays. The shops were closed; offices did not open. The lobby of the office building, which would bustle on other days, was almost deserted. Only a few of the numerous elevators were running.

"Plent, Jasper, Associates, Concert Bureau," on the twelfth floor, were obviously wide awake, Saturday morning or no Saturday morning. Jeff Bowen stepped through the doors into a waiting room with deep chairs around the walls, a big and expensively modern room from which success seemed to radiate. Dark hallways were the place for those involved in espionage, not such bright displays as this.

The girl at the desk smiled up at him. "Whom did you wish to see, sir?"

Jeff Bowen said he was from the district attorney's office, that he wished to talk with someone about a former employee. "Mr. Plent, perhaps?" he said. "Or one of the associates?"

"I'm afraid Mr. Plent is engaged at the moment," the girl said. "Perhaps Mr. Archibald, Mr. Bowen?" she said. "I'll see whether he is engaged."

Mr. Archibald was slight and wore rimless eyeglasses.

"Mr. Bowen?" Mr. Archibald said. "How can I help you? About a former employee of ours, I understand? But won't you sit down, sir?"

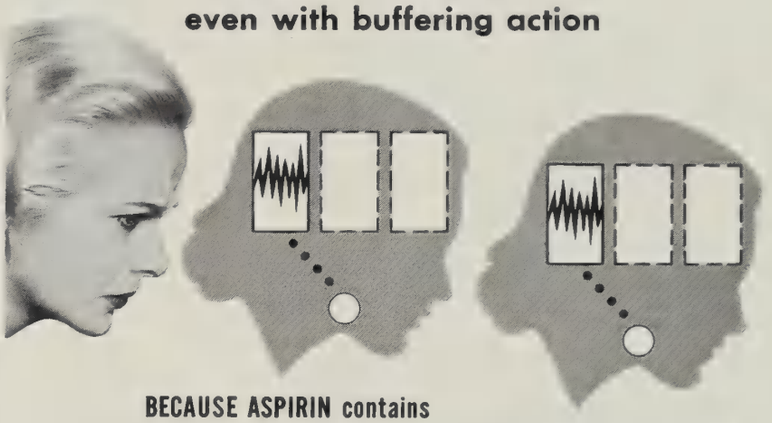
Jeff sat in a leather chair beside the desk. Mr. Archibald took his glasses off and polished them with a large handkerchief.

"About a ——" Jeff began, and for a moment the name he had been told to remember was slippery in his memory. "Janice Hancock," he said. "I understand she worked here for a time?"

Mr. Archibald put his glasses back on his nose and said "Ah." Then, after seeming to consider the matter, he said, "I understand you represent the district attorney, Mr. Bowen? And, I take it, you are here in an—ah—official capacity."

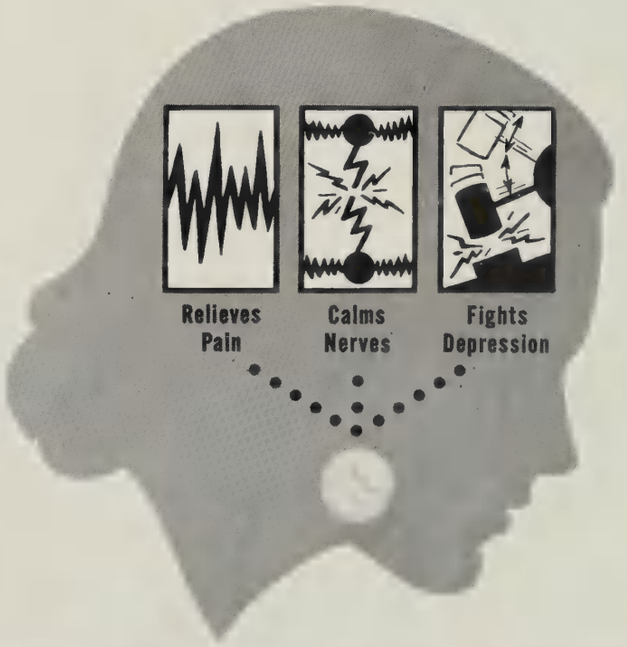
Jeff gave him a card, answering the implied question, and Mr. Archibald examined it and said "Ah" again.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 91



Here's why

ANACIN®



gives better TOTAL results in

PAIN RELIEF

better than aspirin...
even with buffering action

BECAUSE ASPIRIN contains only one pain reliever..... ADD BUFFERING ACTION and you still have only one.

BUT ANACIN relieves pain, calms nerves, fights depression.

Anacin is like a doctor's prescription. That is, Anacin contains not just one but a combination of medically proven active ingredients. Anacin (1) gives fast relief from pain of headache, neuritis and neuralgia. (2) Calms jittery nerves—leaves you comfortably relaxed. (3) Fights depression. Thus, Anacin gives you better TOTAL results in pain relief than you get from aspirin, even plus buffering action. And Anacin does not upset the stomach. Buy Anacin Tablets today.

3 out of 4 doctors recommend the ingredients of ANACIN

Naturally better on waffles

because it's blended with real maple sugar

...best of all, it's Vermont Maid Syrup

IN THE NEW NO-DRIP BOTTLE ⟩

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 89

Miss Hancock," Jeff said, "has"—he hesitated, as if rephrasing a thought, curbing a too-revealing utterance, and hoped he was playing right—"has offered us certain information. We—er—like to learn what we can about our informants. You'll understand?"

"Surely," Mr. Archibald said, "not about the Associates?"

Again Jeff made himself hesitate. Then he said, "Oh, an entirely different matter, Mr. Archibald. I'm afraid I'm not at liberty ——" He paused again, as one who leaves the obvious uncompleted.

"I quite understand," Mr. Archibald said. "Miss Hancock did work here for a time. Her duties were the general secretarial duties. I found her sufficiently competent."

"Could you describe her?" Jeff asked.

Archibald said that so many came and went in such an organization as this. He said his recollection was not, perhaps, what it had been. Tall? He thought tall. Red hair? He thought red hair. She had come to them from a secretarial agency. Perhaps there—he would be certain the name of the agency—Mr. Bowen might find the information he sought.

The idea was excellent. Mr. Archibald used the telephone and gave an address. This information Jeff dutifully noted down, for no future use he could think of. He asked if, in the organization, among the Associates, Miss Hancock had any close friends. Archibald said he doubted it. He said that Miss Hancock had been with them only briefly. "Is Miss Hancock in some difficulty?"

"Oh," Jeff said, "not personally"—and then he paused, suddenly, a too-vivid remembrance of how he had last seen the girl of whom they talked. "She has given—that is, she has offered to give us—certain information. Why did you think she might be in some difficulty?"

"Miss Hancock left us rather unexpectedly," Archibald said then thoughtfully. "She failed to arrive one morning and did not communicate with us. She did not even return to receive money due her. We tried to reach her on the telephone and were told she had moved."

"This," Jeff said, "happened recently?"

"About a month ago. Does that help?"

"It's interesting," Jeff said, putting just a little more on the words than they warranted. "She has not got in touch with you since?"

Mr. Archibald shook his head.

"The company," Jeff said. "The Associates. You are impresarios, I take it?"

"We infrequently use the word," Mr. Archibald said. "But—yes. Concert agents. And lecture agents. We even, on one occasion, brought a circus over."

"Miss Hancock was employed in that branch of your activities?"

"Branch?" Archibald said. "That is our activity, Mr. Bowen. I don't quite understand ——"

"A poor choice of terms," Jeff said. "I was thinking of its . . . international aspects. You said 'brought a circus over,' I took it you meant from abroad."

"Oh," Archibald said. "Yes. I see what you mean. Yes."

He waited then. And Jeff sat for a moment and frowned slightly, as if considering whether to continue. He nodded his head briefly with the movement (he hoped) of a man who has got what he has come to get. He stood up, quickly, like (he hoped) a man who has thought of something to do at once.

"You understand that I'm not at liberty to go into details? And that we appreciate your co-operation?"

"Ah," Mr. Archibald said, "quite," and Jeff opened the door and went down the wide corridor to the reception room. The girl looked up at him brightly and smiled, but he did not look at her.

He looked at the man who was, at that moment, going out into the building corridor. He saw only the man's back. He was a heavy man, not tall and, from his movements, rather clerly. He had a certain way of walking, as men have.

And he was, Jeff was suddenly quite certain, the "Dr. Robert Parks" of the night before.

Jeff took one quick stride to overtake the heavy man as the door closed behind him. But then he checked himself, felt in his pocket for a cigarette; found a package and took a cigarette from it and lighted the cigarette. He sought an appearance of nonchalance, and wished himself a better actor.

When "Doctor Parks" might be assumed to have a long enough start, Jeff opened one of the doors and went out. At the end of the building corridor, "Doctor Parks" moved with dignity around a corner.

Jeff went after him, not moving fast but thinking fast. Stringer had been right, then. Jasper Plent Associates was not only what it seemed. It associated with men—at least with one man—who snatched pretty, frightened girls from country doorsteps and, incidentally, hit assistant district attorneys over the head.

And, what Stringer could hardly have anticipated, coincidence had put the man into Jeff's hands. If Jeff could close his hands. He moved a little more rapidly, turned into the wider corridor banked by elevators. He got there just as the door of one of the elevators clanged shut.

He could follow the man until a policeman was near; failing a policeman, he could pick the man up himself, could put a hand on his shoulder and say, "Doctor Parks, I presume?" Or ——

He had changed that plan by the time he stepped out of the car and saw the man he was after proceeding, at a most dignified gait, toward the Fifth Avenue doors. Picked up, "Doctor Parks" might well prove stubborn; might say, in effect, "You've got me, but you haven't got the girl. You don't know where the girl is." If "Parks" were followed, not picked up, he might well lead the way to the girl.

NEXT MONTH

● When Beth accepted a job as secretary to Stanley King, she did not know that she would live in his house. Nor did she guess how deeply involved she would be with Stan, with his beautiful, unhappy wife Rika, with his child Debbie.

Now Beth was frightened. For there was fear in the house—and a mysterious danger.

THE TROUBLED HOUSE

By C. KAGE BOOTON

Condensed novel, complete in the February JOURNAL

The heavy man let an empty cab go by. He was in no hurry; was obviously without suspicion. He raised a hand to the next cab and it swooped to the curb.

Luck held. As the cab door closed on the heavy man and Jeff moved quickly to the curb, a cruising cab came up and stopped at his signal. Things could hardly be breaking more perfectly. Told to follow the cab ahead, the driver of Jeff's cab started first and said "Huh?" afterward.

"District attorney's office," Jeff said and the driver, already following, said, "O.K., Mac. I hope there isn't no shooting."

The cab ahead was red and black, and the Saturday-morning traffic was light for the city. The cab ahead proceeded at a discreet pace, engaged in no eluding maneuvers. It went up Fifth until it was midway of the park and then turned right. After it, Jeff's cab crossed Madison and Park and Lexington. In the block beyond—a block of apartments and private houses—the cab turned toward the curb.

"Pass it and pull in up the street a ways," Jeff directed, and the cab driver said "O.K., Mac," and Jeff got money ready.

The heavy man was climbing a short flight of stone steps to a door of a private house. He did not look around.

It was, Jeff thought, almost too easy. He would walk past the house and make sure of the street number. Then he would go to the nearest telephone and say that he wanted several policemen—policemen for front and rear of a three-story house, shoulder to shoulder with similar houses, at a street address verified ——

With no warning whatever there was a man on either side of him, walking in step with him. One of the men was large and soft and had a flushed, perspiring face and an entirely agreeable expression. The other was younger, as clean-cut as an advertisement.

"If it isn't Mr. Bowen!" the soft man said, in a pleased tone.

"Fancy meeting him here," the other man said.

There was no threat in either voice. There was no conventional gun pressed against ribs. It was true, however, that the clean-cut man kept a hand in his jacket pocket.

"We'll drop in here for a minute," the soft man said when they reached the steps.

"That's right," the clean-cut man said. "We've got an invitation."

They climbed the steps together, and Jeff Bowen said nothing, nothing pertinent, or useful, occurring to him.

It had been too easy, all right. But not for him.

Light slanted into the room and wakened her. It was a small, neat room on the top floor of the house. She had been asleep only an hour or so. For hours after the big heavy-boned woman had taken her to the room and said, "Sleep well, dearie," and then gone out and locked the door after her, Linda had been awake. She had clung to wakefulness with a kind of desperation; held onto consciousness so as not to waste it. But finally weariness triumphed even over fear.

Yet they had not threatened her in any specific manner. Once, indeed, the man they called Norman had said, "Maybe we could persuade her, sort of?" But the heavy, elderly man, who was called by no name at all, had frowned and shaken his head and said, "You know I won't have that," with both weariness and contempt, as if he had had to say the same thing many times. They had brought her water to drink, after they had offered anything else she might prefer and watched her merely shake her head.

It had more or less come to that, before the telephone rang—come to Linda's slow, hopeless moving of her head from side to side, in a negation which they would never accept; which she knew they would not accept.

"Be reasonable, Miss Parks," the heavy man said, toward the end of it. "Why would your friend say she had confided in you if she hadn't?"

She knew enough by then—although really she knew nothing—to answer that.

"Because you made her," she said. "Or because she thought it would help her." Then she said, "What have you done to her?"

There was no answer at all to that. It was as if she had not asked.

"You went to too much trouble," the heavy man said. "Tried too hard to talk to Mr. Bowen. Or—did you talk to him?"

She shook her head, as she had shaken it before, would shake it many times again.

"Look at it, Miss Parks," the heavy man said. "Your roommate, a girl you say you'd known only a short time, didn't feel responsible for, leaves a note saying she's going away for a weekend. Perfectly reasonable thing. But all at once you think—I don't know what you think—and call up the district attorney and say your roommate has disappeared. Do you expect us to believe that?"

She shook her head, expecting them to believe nothing.

"Why?" the heavy man said. "Was there something in the note?"

"There were little things," she said. "What difference does it make? Since I was right?"

"What did she tell you?" he said, as he had said many times. "That's all I'm asking you to tell me. And whether you told anybody else. Or wrote it down for anybody else."

"Nothing," she said. "I don't know what you're talking about. What did she have to tell?"

"That's what we'd like to know," the man they called Clyde—the big, soft man—said. "That's just what we'd ——"

"All right," the heavy man said. "You talk a lot, Clyde." He looked at the man he called Clyde with contempt. "Well, Miss Parks? You see, if it stopped with you, that's one thing. If you passed it on, that's another. It could make a great deal of difference. To you, for one thing."

Linda leaned forward in the chair. "Did it to Joyce?"

"It might have," Clyde said, "if she hadn't been so stubborn. If she'd told us about you before the stuff started to ——"

"Be quiet," the heavy man said. "We don't want her to be stubborn—too long." He looked at Linda thoughtfully, and she looked back at him, her eyes wide, and fear, new and sharper fear, piercing her mind. "I'd like to believe you, Miss Parks. But you see ——"

It was then that the telephone rang, and the sound was shrill in the comfortably furnished living room.

The elderly man nodded his head briefly in Clyde's direction. The big soft, amiable man—except that he was not really amiable at all—walked to the end of the room and picked up the telephone. He said "O.K." in a flat voice and listened. He wrote something down on a pad. He said "O.K." again, in the same expressionless voice, and walked back to the elderly man. "Your boy's bubbling with something," he said. He gave the nameless elderly man the slip on which he had written.

The elderly man looked at it. He said, "Bubbling with what?"

"How do I know?" Clyde asked, in a reasonable, pleasant voice. "He went through channels. Nothing else he could do, is there? That's the number. They say he said it's important."

The elderly man got out of his chair. He went heavily to the telephone. He dialed a number, looking at the slip as he dialed. He waited. He said, "All right. What is it?" He listened.

Now and then he spoke, spoke without any effort to make his voice inaudible in the room, inaudible to the dark-haired girl sitting tensely in a chair which might have been comfortable if her frightened body could have accepted comfort. The elderly man stood so that he could look at her.

"Why aren't they 'buying it,' as you say?" he asked and listened again. Then he said flatly "Oh," as if (Linda thought) something unexpected, perhaps even disturbing, had been said. He listened again. He said, "What's he got to do with it?" and once more listened. He said, "It doesn't matter why it's important," and, after another time of listening, "I suppose they will. Not your worry," then, with new interest and new guardedness, "What makes you think that?"

Linda could hear the hurried, rasping whisper of the voice to which the elderly man listened. She could not hear the words.

"That's got nothing to do with you," the elderly man said. "Or with me." He listened again. Then he said, "It's an idea. All right. You can do that. Or try to." Then he hung up. He stood with a hand on the telephone and looked at the two other men.

Then he looked at Linda. For a moment he seemed uncertain. But the uncertainty disappeared.

"Miss Parks really should get some sleep," he said. "Have Grace come down."

"And bring the . . . material?" Norman asked.

The elderly man looked at him reprovingly. He said, "Certainly not." He looked at Linda again. "Certainly not yet," he said.

That had been hours ago. Linda looked at her watch, in the small, locked room. It was almost ten. It had been after three when she had heard the key turn in the lock. The house was silent now.

No wonder the red-and-black cab had attempted no eluding maneuvers, Jeff thought with bitterness, even contempt, directed at himself. No wonder "Doctor Parks" had been going out of the reception room of Jasper Plent Associates at the exact moment Jeff went into it after his talk with Archibald—the man Jeff thought he had left puzzled. Puzzled indeed!

The clean-cut man opened the door. He said, "Go right in, Mr. Bowen. As I said, you're expected."

"You're very funny," Jeff said. He had been expected, all right, expected from the start. And he had done all that was expected of him. From the start ——

His mind clicked at that, clicked like a Geiger counter. Then the man who called himself Stringer ——

"Come right in, Mr. Bowen," the man who called himself Parks said from a wide doorway off the entrance hall. "Good of you to be so prompt."

Jeff said, "Where's the girl?"

"Direct type, isn't he?" the clean-cut man said.

The elderly man sighed obviously. He said, "Don't try to be funny, Norman. This is quite a serious matter. Isn't it, Mr. Bowen?"

"It will be," Jeff said. "For you. I suppose you're Jasper Plent?"

"Do you?" the elderly man said, with what seemed to be polite interest. "And you want the girl, eh? I heard you might."

"In ten minutes," Jeff said, "five, they'll ——" He stopped, in the attitude of one who listens. "Thought I heard a siren, Plent," he said.

The elderly man looked at the two who had appeared, so seemingly out of nowhere, on the sidewalk.

"Not unless he used a walkie-talkie," the soft, heavy man said. "Way it looked, he was going to check the street number. Then telephone."

"All right, Clyde," the elderly man said. "I trust you're right this time. No need to draw a map, is there, Mr. Bowen? Not that it wasn't a nice try. What did the girl tell you?"

Jeff's mind moved quickly. He would have to play it by ear. For that, he would need time.

"Why don't you ask the girl?" he said. "I suppose you've got her here?"

"Do you?" the elderly man said. "You may be right. But I'm afraid she got to bed rather late last night and ——"

"What did you do to her?"

There was hardness in Jeff's voice. The younger of the men who had brought him into the house moved beside him.

"Nothing at all," the elderly man said. "Asked her a few questions. She's perfectly all right. So far."

"If you ——" Jeff began.

But then there were melodious chimes from the hall. "See who it is, Norman," the elderly man said. And his eyes narrowed. "I hope you haven't made another mistake."

The clean-cut young man went to see who it was. From where he stood, Jeff could not see the front door. He heard Norman say, "Oh, it's you." And then, in tone which lacked certainty, "Well, you'd better come on in." Jeff had not heard the visitor speak. He watched the doorway from hall to living room.

A man neither tall nor short, nor light nor heavy—a medium man in all respects—came through the doorway ahead of Norman. Jeff looked at the man who had called himself Saul Stringer, had talked convincingly of plots and counterplots. The man smiled faintly. His brown eyes were expressionless.

"What brings you here, Seymour?" the man whose name probably was Jasper Plent said. He said it without friendliness. The tone seemed to surprise, even to hurt, the man who had said he was Saul Stringer. His eyes widened slightly as he looked at the older man.

"Why," he said, "him." He twisted a thumb to indicate Jeff Bowen. "I did what you said to do. I ——" He stopped and shook his head, and seemed bewildered. "You said to see what he did, where he went. He came here. Wasn't that what you wanted?" He was aggrieved now.

The medium man looked at Norman, at the man called Clyde, as if seeking support in their faces. He even looked at Jeff Bowen.

"Did anybody ever tell you what you are?" Jeff said. "I suppose plenty have."

Stringer—but he was really Seymour; that, like the rest of it, was turned upside down—looked away from Jeff, as if Jeff did not matter. He looked at Plent. He was a very different man now from the assured, confident man of the hotel room, the man who explained to the inexperienced Geoffrey Bowen. As I seem to be, Jeff admitted to himself, and began, as imperceptibly as he could manage, to move nearer the doorway to the hall.

"I did what you told me to do," Seymour said, and he was almost plaintive. "I wasn't trying to find out anything."

"He says his name's Stringer," Jeff said. "He's got identification as a Federal agent."

But Plent moved a hand back and forth, fanning away the irrelevant.

"I know who he is," Plent said. "And what he told you. The point is, what did the girl tell you?"

"Nothing," Jeff said. "I suppose you mean Miss Parks? You didn't give her a chance to tell me anything, did you?"

"Before that . . . incident," Plent said. "When she was at your house before."

"She wasn't," Jeff said. "Does she say she was? Or—did she say she was before ——"

"I told you," Plent said, "Miss Parks is all right, at the moment. No."

"Or, that she told me anything? Or had anything to tell?"

"What do you expect?" Plent said. "You seem to be a reasonable man."

"And," Jeff said, "gullible. First your . . . boy here." He indicated Seymour-Stringer. "Then your Mr. Archibald. Then you."

"Gullible, perhaps," Plent said. "But reasonable. Let's stick to the point. No, Miss Parks doesn't admit the other girl told her anything."

"And the other girl is dead," Jeff said.

Plent sighed. "Or," he said, "that she told you anything. Or that she was at your house earlier. But she was, wasn't she?"

Jeff shook his head.

He had moved a little closer to the doorway into the hall. Nobody seemed to have noticed it. The man called Norman no longer stood in the doorway, although he stood near it. The man called Clyde was between him and a door at the rear of the room, which probably opened into a dining room. Seymour remained standing near the hall doorway.

"She had just got there when you grabbed her," Jeff said. "You know that."

"There's a little question about time," Plent said. "She left the New Canaan station too early—much too early to have got to the house when she did. So she might have been there before, we think."

Jeff started to speak, and checked himself, and the counter clattered in his mind. Stringer had suggested "they" might cut their losses, if they were convinced they had lost. Stringer was their hired hand. But even Stringer might have stumbled into truth. You had to play it by ear.

"Well, Mr. Bowen?" Plent said, and was patient. "Did she forget something. Come back for it?"

"Her ——" Jeff began, and stopped himself. He must be a man falsely denying knowledge it would be dangerous to have. "I've told you she hadn't been there before." He spoke without conviction, and fidgeted a little, like a man caught lying.

"Her what?" Plent said. "Handbag? It's no use, is it, Mr. Bowen? What did she tell you, that her roommate had told her? Or give you that she got from her roommate?"

Jeff looked from one of the four men to another. He looked as a man might look who sought a way out. He said, "She didn't tell me anything. Didn't have a chance," in the dead voice of a man who holds to a story which is draining out like sand between his fingers. And then, as if the thought had just come to him, he said, "If she'd told me anything I'd have passed it on. Long ago."

"Perhaps," Plent said. "That's what we want to find out, Mr. Bowen. Let's suppose you passed it on, as you say. Let's suppose that Miss Hancock, or Miss Holbrook if you prefer, stumbled on something that was . . . outside her sphere, shall we say? Decided to capitalize on what she had discovered, or thought she had. Confided in her roommate. For the sake of argument, suppose that."

He stopped, seemed to give Jeff a chance to show that he followed the argument. Jeff ironed expression from his face—except that he tightened the muscles around his eyes.

"Yes," Plent said. "Now, what Miss Hancock happened on may have been something entirely trivial. On the other hand, it may have been important enough—well, to require certain steps to be taken. You see what I'm getting at, Mr. Bowen? Any—er—enterprise naturally has certain trade secrets—special methods of operation. You follow me?"

It was time to say something. "Oh, I follow you," Jeff said.

"Good." Plent nodded approvingly. "So it is necessary we determine the importance of what Miss Hancock stumbled on. As well as how—er—widely disseminated her gossip is. Which brings us to your position, doesn't it?"

Jeff said, "What is my position?"

Plent sighed. "I should think," he said, "that your position is obvious enough. If you have transmitted this information, and it was important, it is too late for us to do anything about it. Anything in relation to you, I mean. Or in relation to Miss Parks. Since—what shall we say?—vengeance would be quite childish. But if you have not, if it stops with you —— You follow me?"

"You make it clear enough," Jeff said.

"So it obviously is to your advantage to say you've passed this information along. But you can hardly ask us to take your word, can you? Turn you and the girl loose, so that you can . . . rectify your oversight? But if you tell us what information was passed on to you, we'll be in a position to evaluate its importance, won't we? If it is of considerable importance, we may decide—I say may—to assume you have passed it on. Not being able to take the chance you haven't. If it is merely a general accusation ——" He shrugged his shoulders. "Well?" he asked.

Jeff had moved a little closer to the door. He looked toward it—and the medium man was standing in the doorway. He smiled faintly. He shook his head.

"Whatever I knew before, I know too much now," Jeff said. "I'm not quite that gullible, Plent."

"A point," Plent said. "Undoubtedly a point. I don't say that you—you and Miss Parks—could walk out the door at once if you could convince us you had actually passed on anything of importance. A certain time would elapse, of course. During which we could make arrangements."

"Our disappearance might be rather difficult to explain," Jeff said. "You underestimate the police. My office. The Federal ——" He looked at Seymour-Stringer. "Perhaps not," he said. "Since Stringer is an inside man."

Plent said, ignoring the words, at which Stringer himself merely, once more, smiled faintly, "Don't you think we're wasting time, Mr. Bowen?"

You played it by ear; you played for time. But finally time ran out. Eventually, you had to come up with something you didn't have. It would be no good to repeat what Stringer had said, whether it was true or not. As, quite probably, it wasn't. "Merely a general accusation"—that wouldn't be enough. Nothing he had would be enough.

"Norman," Plent said, "Mr. Bowen seems uncertain. Have Grace bring the girl down."

It wasn't going to matter anyway, Jeff thought. It was cat and mouse; the mouse to run a little distance, thinking itself free—the cat knowing better.

They had to find out how deep the weakness ran in the fabric of their operation. That was clear. But it would make no difference, in the end, to him, to the black-haired girl with the lovely, tender face.

The man they called Norman had gone upstairs. Stringer watched him go. Stringer seemed, too, to be listening, and, with his back partly turned to the room, his left arm moved slightly, as if he were looking at a watch on his wrist.

It is strange, Jeff thought, how one notices little things—unimportant little things. That a man who is about to join in killing you looks at his watch; that a heavy, dignified man is brushing a flake of cigar ash from his vest.

Since Stringer—it was easier, still, to think of him as Stringer—had seemed to read his mind, had shaken his head to show it, Jeff had given up edging toward the doorway into the hall. The other way? The way down the long room, to the other door which led (perhaps) to a dining room? The big soft man was there. He would be armed, probably, and Clyde and Stringer. He would find out in the end. But—not yet. One clings to seconds.

Jeff moved a little so that he could see the bottom of the stairs.

A pair of white shoes, then a big-boned woman all in white, like a nurse, blocked his view. Then she reached the bottom of the stairs and turned toward the doorway and there was the girl, the black-haired lovely girl, walking quite steadily, her face white and lipstick cruelly vivid against it.

Behind the girl, Norman came down the stairs. He was some distance behind the woman, still some steps from the bottom.

Time had run out. This knowledge was not framed in his mind. It was as sudden, as compulsive yet as formless, as an electric shock through his body.

Jeff moved.

They had not expected his movement—not then, not in that instant. That was all Jeff Bowen had—that and a tableau in which, for a second, only he moved; a tableau flashing as brilliant in his mind as if, in darkness, lightning

CONTINUED ON PAGE 94

Ask any WOMAN

By Marcelene Cox

When I went to college, it was fairly easy to recognize a wolf; he was usually wearing a raccoon coat.

She had a sleek, homogenized* look.

Another eternal triangle: telephone with two extensions.

Mother about daughter's disposition: "Just another teentrum."

Comment: "She reminds me of an automobile in a used-car lot: all polished up to hide an altered mileage count."

A person usually feels better after a few compliments, if he has paid them to someone else.

In Honolulu, the black-haired daughter's expected heir was considerably overdue. Finally a wire, "Is everything all right? What does doctor say?" was answered by "Trying for ten-month world record. Doctor says hello!"

One parent to another: "The only time I question a course of discipline is when the children agree to it."

These rise quickly: righteous indignation; anyone sitting on a bee; teen-ager answering the telephone.

Taximeter: a device for showing how fast you aren't getting there.

Our neighborhood philosopher, on the subject of balancing "yes" and "no" to children: "During the first ten years of a child's life, to keep him from killing himself, say 'No!' to everything; the next ten years, to keep him from killing you, say 'Yes!' to everything."

* fat evenly distributed.

How does your cold develop?

1 SORE THROAT

2. Coughing
3. Sniffles, Sneezing, Stuffy Nose
4. Tight Chest
5. Ache All Over

1 SNEEZING, SNIFFLES, STUFFY NOSE

2. Sore Throat
3. Coughing
4. Tight Chest
5. Ache All Over

1 ACHE ALL OVER

2. Sneezing, Sniffles, Stuffy Nose
3. Sore Throat
4. Coughing
5. Tight Chest

Coldene attacks all these symptoms in any stage of the common cold

Gives feelable relief in minutes . . .
Most powerful cold medicine you can buy without a prescription

The common cold is not a simple ailment. It is a disorder which attacks various parts of your system, bringing a variety of miseries to different parts of your body as it spreads. Some sufferers seem to feel one misery more quickly, others another.

Hence, Coldene is unlike any cold-and-cough medicine ever offered over druggists' counters. For it doesn't rely on the limited powers of one or two drugs, but unites the powers of several potent ingredients . . . all in proper balance.

When you take Coldene, here are the things that happen almost at once—within minutes. First: The instant Coldene touches your raw, inflamed throat, relief begins. Second: If you've been coughing, Coldene relieves that cough spasm. Right then and there! Third: Coldene goes to work to dry up and open your nose. You get feelable relief within minutes! Fourth: If your chest is tight and breathing is difficult—you breathe again! Fifth: If you ache and feel just plain miserable—Coldene relieves the pain, even reduces fever, gives the fullest possible help.

The reason? There's a powerful, specific, correct ingredient in Coldene for each of the miseries of the common cold. That's why Coldene can catch your cold at any of its 5 stages. Now available in its original Liquid form or in the new Coldene Tablets . . . Coldene, most powerful cold medicine you can buy without a prescription.

Copyright 1957 Pharma-Craft Company, Batavia, Illinois

NEW!

Quickly relieves chest colds without grease, strong odor or tears—COLDENE STICK CHEST RUB

For fast, localized treatment of head cold distress—COLDENE ANTIBIOTIC NASAL SPRAY

$1.00 EACH

If you're taking aspirin for colds, try COLDENE TABLETS for broader relief.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 92

had flashed, fixing everything in a fragment of harsh finality.

The big woman in white shrank back, and he was in the hall, his body thinking for itself.

His left shoulder dropped and jutted forward and jarred against the body of Stringer. His body felt Stringer moving away from the impact and then Jeff was beside the girl.

In the same instant, the man who had been walking down the stairs leaped. Jeff swung to face him and knew that Stringer also moved, leaped forward.

The two hurtled toward Jeff, converging. Obviously, both Norman and Stringer had acted as Jeff had himself acted, without plan. They crashed together. Stringer's hands were inches from Jeff when the other man plunged into him.

Stringer clutched at the larger man and reeled backward. They swayed together in a grotesque dance. Then Stringer fell and pulled the other man with him.

The big soft man was behind Jeff then, coming at a run out of the living room. Jeff whirled and swung and shock jolted through his right arm. Clenched fist met bone under the softness of the man's face. The man reeled back, into the big-boned woman who had turned to face the hall. Together they half blocked the doorway.

The way to the street door was barred by the men now struggling to get back to their feet. Stringer, apparently stunned, still clung to the bigger man's right arm. The way to the living room was barred—the big woman pushed the man called Clyde away from her, as if involuntarily, and he swayed in the doorway uncertainly, one hand to his jaw.

Then the girl moved. She went into a passageway which ran beside the stairs, toward the rear of the house. It was wrong, it would get them nowhere, she should have gone ——

The girl fled down the passageway beside the stairs, and Jeff ran after her. As he ran he could feel the muscles in his back tighten, as if they could turn to steel against the crushing impact of a bullet. The passageway was narrow; Jeff's body screened the girl.

The passage ended in a door and already the black-haired girl was tugging at it. He reached around her, his body shielding hers, his hand closing over hers on the knob of the door. And the door was opening; he pushed her through.

Still there was no shot. Perhaps the angle was wrong. Perhaps ——

Then he was through the doorway, too, and had pulled the door closed behind him and found a key on that side and turned it. It might gain seconds.

They were in a pantry, a door opposite. The girl turned—turned but still retreated. Her eyes were wide and staring and she said, as he looked at her, "No, no. Don't!" But then expression came into the wide, dark eyes. She said, "Why—you're ——" Her voice was small, muted.

"Yes," he said. He reached her, put hands on her shoulders. Her body trembled under his hands. "You're all right?" he said, and knew it a ridiculous thing to say.

"All right," she said. "I tried ——"

But he turned her toward the kitchen which opened from the pantry. He took his hands away, and went on into the kitchen. The kitchen was large and dim. There was a door in the far wall and a glass panel in the door. Jeff looked out into a fenced yard. Against the far fence a man leaned and looked at the house. There was readiness about the man.

"No good," Jeff said.

He turned from the door and looked around the room, moving quickly as he looked. Linda watched.

The kitchen occupied almost the width of the house. Almost—not quite. In the far wall was another door.

He heard voices from the front of the house; heard somebody trying the door he had locked behind them. They could force it in seconds. He was beside Linda, had one of her hands in his. She looked up at him, and her eyes, frightened still, were no longer blank. Question leaped in them, and even hope.

"Come on," Jeff said. One had to keep on running, when one ran for life.

The door was not locked. It opened to a narrow, dusty cubicle. Linda went through the doorway, and Jeff after her. They could see a flight of wooden steps rising out of the cubicle. There was a key on their side of the door and Jeff turned it. One hoarded seconds. They stood close together, and Jeff could smell the fragrance of the girl, and with this, suddenly, unaccountably, sadness swept over him.

They heard feet on the linoleum floor of the kitchen. "Go first," Jeff said, and the girl went running up the stairs.

The stairway climbed between plaster walls, and as he followed the girl Jeff felt that the walls were converging as they climbed. There was no other way, only from trap to smaller trap.

The girl looked around at him as they neared the top; her face a floating pale oval in the dimness.

"We'll make it," he said.

"Come on!" the girl said, and went on.

The stairs ended at a dusty landing. There was a door on one side, a door which would give access to the second floor.

"Back stairs," the girl said. "Servants' stairs." There was no hysteria whatever in her soft, clear voice.

He tried the knob of the door. The door was locked on the other side. Then he heard someone trying the knob of the door below. The old lock wouldn't hold them long. He heard a voice—hollow and dim. A man had spoken. He had said, "Don't ——" and something after it.

Then Linda had his hand. "They go on up," she said. "See?"

She was facing away from the locked door. The stairway reversed itself, led up, narrowly, toward the floor above.

They were pounding the door below to break through a panel.

Any hole is better than no hole. The mouse knows this. A hole too small for a cat's questing paw is best. But any hole is better than no hole.

"Go on," Jeff said, and the girl went like quicksilver.

The second flight upward was like the first—narrow, between walls which seemed to converge. They might as well, Jeff thought. They might just as well narrow in until they met in the final trap. They climbed into deepening darkness. Jeff found that each breath came with greater effort. But the girl went on as if this steep climb were nothing—it was as if she danced on. Again Jeff felt the aching sadness he had felt when the scent she wore first touched him.

He stopped for a moment and listened. He heard the ragged sound of splintering wood. It wasn't taking them long at all.

Linda looked back. He motioned her forward. She went on.

The stairway ended at a landing. There was enough light for them to see another door—this time the stairs ended at the door. The door was locked, and it was a solid door.

Linda was looking upward, her head thrown back. She pointed upward. Jeff flicked his lighter and for an instant the tiny flame blinded them both. There was a trap door in the ceiling. If he jumped, Jeff could just, he thought, reach it with his finger tips. It might as well be ten feet above him.

"Your hands," the girl said. "Make a step. You know how?"

He looked down at her.

"For a lift," she said. "Don't you know? Like this. Look!"

He looked at her hands. The fingers were interlocked. She held her arms down, so that her hands, locked into a stirrup, were a little above mid-point of her thighs.

"Hurry!" she said.

He locked his hands as she had done, held them as she had held hers. She pressed back against him and stepped into his hands.

"Lift!" she said.

He lifted. She seemed to weigh nothing. Then he realized that, as he lifted, she had thrust hard from the floor with the foot still touching it.

One of her arms went around his neck. Then she was on his shoulder—sitting there.

"Hold me," she said, and he reached up, bracing her slender body. He could feel, through her thin clothing, the gliding muscles of her body. She's so little, he thought—so very little.

"Good," she said. "Don't let me fall."

It was not a plea. It was instruction. She balanced herself and raised her arms as high as she could raise them—and could push against the trap door, could feel around it.

"There'll be a catch," he said. "Thumb catch, probably. If it opens down it'll be bolted."

He held her and waited—and listened. They'd have the door open now. He would hear them on the stairs. Not running. There is no need to run to a sprung trap.

"Got it," she said. "Stiff, though." Her slender body stiffened in his hands; he could feel her muscles harden with effort. "It's . . ." she said, and now she gasped a little with the effort, ". . . going. It's ——" He could feel the change in her body as the cover went up. "It isn't the roof," she said. "It's a kind of—of place. Very low. I don't know ——"

"Can you get in?"

"Yes," she said. "I don't know whether ——"

"They're coming," he said. "Go." He lifted. She seemed to disappear from his hands.

He could look up then. She had turned and was looking down at him. "Can you?" she asked, and there was no lightness in her voice now. There was only great anxiety.

He did not answer. He crouched. He leaped and closed his fingers over the edging of the trap. He waited an instant, breathed deeply. It was quite a time since he had chinned himself, and the grip was wrong. He pulled. The final lift came only partly from his straining muscles. It came from strong hands under his arms. He got his elbows over the edging. It was easy then, with the lithe girl pulling.

Lying on his side—there was not room to sit up—he wrestled the cover back over the square aperture. He pulled himself across it.

In a second he felt the girl beside him, adding her weight to his. It wasn't much weight, but it would help. He wouldn't want to push the trap up with both of them on it.

"Well," Linda Parks said, and he could feel her breath against his ear, "here we are, aren't we? Wherever we are."

He twisted until he could reach a jacket pocket and finger the cigarette lighter out of it. He flicked the lighter on. It gave enough light so that they could see where they were.

There was also enough light so that they could see a rat, its eyes ugly red points. With the light on, the rat ran. They could hear the scrambling sound it made.

"I've heard," Linda Parks said in a little voice, "that there are more rats than people in New York. I've heard that."

Her voice was steady enough. But her body shook against his. She couldn't control that.

They were in the air space between top-floor ceiling and flat roof. The underside of the roof was three feet, or a little less, above the spaced beams of the house framing. Between the crosspieces was wooden lathing, with plaster bulging through it from below. The uprights which supported the roof itself made the space a maze. Boards laid across the beams provided narrow pathways, but paths which seemed to lead in no special directions.

"A kind of attic," the girl said, still shaking.

Jeff put out the little lighter flame. In the silence there were rustling noises about them—small, scratching sounds. The girl's body, pressed against his, trembled more at each little rustling sound.

Realization that it was not entirely dark in the atticlike space came slowly, as eyes adjusted. It could not be said there was light, but there was a certain absence of total darkness. Even without the lighter, he could make out the timber uprights. The loose flooring boards—put down by workmen, he supposed, so that they could get from point to point—were just visible.

It was strange, Jeff thought, that there was any light at all. There would be no windows in this low, uninhabitable space—this air space, this insulating buffer of air. This—he realized increasingly—hot, still place. Yet was the air still? There seemed to be a draft.

Of course, he thought. Air insulates only if it moves. So there would be a ventilating opening somewhere, two ventilating apertures, at least, so that the air could circulate between them. There was just a chance ——

He flicked the lighter again and there were two rats, quite near, looking at them through red sparks of eyes.

"I—I can't stand them," the girl said, and her body was convulsive against his. Long tremors ran through it. And now her voice shook too. "I'm sorry—I—can't we do something?" He put an arm around her shaking body. "The men would be better," she said. "But they want to kill us, don't they?" He tightened his arm about her. "Why?" she said.

"I'm not quite sure," he said. "Anyway, we won't give up yet. There's a board there. A plank. Can you slide out on it?"

She did not answer. He showed her where the plank lay. She crept out onto it, until she

CONTINUED ON PAGE 96

WE NEED YOUR HELP!

PLEASE . . . Include your city postal zone number in your address when writing us about

- ✓ your present subscription
- ✓ renewing your subscription
- ✓ ordering new subscriptions
- ✓ questions concerning any of the Curtis magazines

This will help us to handle your order or answer your question more quickly. If you have a postal zone number, use it—always!

We have pledged to the Post Office Department that we will co-operate with them to help achieve the most economical and efficient means possible of delivering your magazines to you.

In order that we may co-operate with the Post Office Department in this endeavor we must include the zone number for each subscriber's address in zoned cities.

So, help yourself to better service by always using your zone number!

The Curtis Publishing Company
Independence Square
Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania

The unchangingly lovely complexion you smooth on once—for the day—concealing blemishes and tiny lines, softening and freshening. Its secret ...petal-soft, true-to-life texture. Your secret...that you wear it. Liquid film in 5 shades. $1.25. Sheer Velvet Compact (powder plus foundation) $1.25.

For beauty the modern way

Dorothy Gray

In Canada, too.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 94

was free of the trap cover. "Wait," he said, and went out on hands and knees on the beams, moving carefully. If he slipped, put weight on the laths, he would break through the ceiling plaster. It would give them a nice target, if they were looking for a target.

He went around the girl, who was on her hands and knees on the plank, and found that a second plank, farther on, continued the narrow path. He crept on it toward light.

"A way to the roof," he said. "We'll be all right, then."

"Whatever you say," the girl said, close behind him.

A third plank continued the pathway, and a fourth. They could see the lighter rectangle of the air vent. It looked very small and appeared to be horizontally barred.

The rats were patient, too; they stopped when the man and woman stopped. Then one crept up on the board behind Linda. Jeff slapped his hand down and the rat ran.

There was just room for Jeff. It was easier for the girl—the very little girl, with a slim body made, apparently, out of steel wire. Well, he thought, not entirely, remembering the feel of her in his hands.

He went, faster now, on knees beginning to protest, along the planks toward the air vent. It did not, when he was close enough to see, look like much. The vent was louvered. In addition, there was screening inside the louvers. They crouched side by side and looked at the opening, which would have to be just below the roof. Which was just large enough to get through. Which was barred.

They had struggled to the smallest trap.

The louvers seemed to be set in a frame, Jeff thought, a frame fitted into the wall. It would be nailed, of course, but probably only lightly nailed. He hoped.

But with the screening inside, there was no way to get hands on the tightly fitting frame to provide leverage. He pushed against the frame tentatively. The feel told him what he had supposed it would. In order to remove the louvers, he would have to pull the frame toward him.

He groped awkwardly for a pocket knife—a little silver knife, an ornament to a key chain. It was, nevertheless, the only tool he had. He pulled up an inadequate blade and tried to slit the screening above one of the wooden louvers.

The screen resisted the little blade. But then the blade penetrated. And then it was absurdly easy. The screening was as old as the house, and weak with age.

He slit the screen across and put the knife back in his pocket. It was not only the only tool he had; it was the only weapon. One does not carry weapons on a bright summer day in the city of New York. There is never any need of weapons.

He hooked fingers over the louver and tugged.

"Wait," the girl said, and put slender hands through the rent screening and over the louver, and they pulled together. At first nothing happened; then the frame moved. It gave suddenly, came out, splintering. He pushed the frame aside.

They could look down—straight down and a long way down—into the fenced yard at the rear of the house.

For a moment it came as no surprise to Jeff Bowen that it was almost dark in the yard. They had been endlessly in the gloom of the attic and that, outside, it was also gloomy seemed entirely reasonable. Then he knew it was not; it could not be later than midmorning of what had been a hot and sunny day.

He twisted around and looked up at the sky, but knew what he would see before he looked. The sky was purple-black with cloud.

"It's going to storm," Linda Parks said; and then, "It's a long way down."

It was a long way down. But the edge of the roof was close above the vent. There did not seem—Jeff lay on his back and stuck his head out—to be a parapet around the roof. It ought to be easy.

He lay there looking up and the girl said, in a low, tense voice, "Oh!"

Jeff slid back in. She had turned and was looking back through the maze they had traversed. Somebody was throwing the beam of a powerful flashlight through the trap door.

Linda said, "Go ahead!"

Jeff inched himself, on his back, through the hole in the wall. "Hold ——" he said but did not need to. She held his legs. She pushed a little, carefully, helping him. He lifted his hands and felt along the edge of the roof.

"All right?" the girl said.

Jeff pulled himself slowly through the hole in the wall, took a deep breath and said "O.K." and hoped it was—it was a long way down. For a second he hung far above the paved court below, thought that now he could not go back. And then he pulled himself up and was on the roof.

He flung himself down, turned, reached down toward the opening, and already the girl was half through it, reaching her hands up. Her face was very close, and her eyes very wide. But she did not, now, seem particularly frightened. He clasped his hands around her slender wrists and braced himself and she seemed to rise without weight and then was on the roof beside him.

For a moment they lay close together, and her final scramble had brought her partly into his arms. Her body, now that it was no longer tensed by effort, was unexpectedly soft. Also, which was more to the immediate point, it was no longer trembling.

SPOON-FEEDING RHYME

By GEORGIE STARBUCK GALBRAITH

One for the baby;
Two for the floor;
Three for the high chair;
Oops! . . . dropped four.

One for his left ear;
Two for his chin;
Three for the baby . . .
I got that in!

Lightning flashed and almost instantly there was thunder, close and violent as an explosion.

"Rain," Linda said. "I've always liked storms. Out in Iowa ——"

The storm responded loudly.

"That's good," Jeff said.

She smiled suddenly. Her face lighted with the smile.

"I'm a ninny," she said. "All right. Now what?"

In one direction—toward the east—the roof was continuous. It stretched over three houses, perhaps four. There were low parapets, marking house from house. There were chimneys. Near the center of each parapet-outlined rectangle there was a shed with sloping roof, and an access door to the roof. There was such a structure in the center of their particular rectangle. At any moment the door would open and one of the men would come out of it. He would come out of it, undoubtedly, with a gun in his hand.

Hooked over the edge of the roof was the top of an iron fire-escape ladder. But the fire escape led down into the fenced yard at the rear of the house and a man waited there.

The air had been very still, and very hot. Suddenly there was a strong wind—a tearing wind. And in the same instant there was a rush of rain. Almost in that instant they were drenched. The girl's light clothing was molded to her supple body.

Jeff was on his feet, reaching toward her. But she was as quick as he—quicker.

The best chance was to run for it, get off this roof to another. Perhaps one of the access doors would be unlocked, or there would be other fire-escape ladders.

"Come on!" Jeff shouted above the wind, and reached for her hand.

The tumultuous rain, the cloud darkness shut in around them. Lightning gashed the clouds. It was hard to believe it could rain so hard, blow so hard, grow so purple-dark on a summer morning—that they, running, could see so dimly the way they ran. They ran across the first roof, and over the low parapet, and halfway across the second. Almost too far across the second, because there was a man there, in the doorway of the roof shed, waiting. He came out, blurred in rain and darkness, and yelled something at them.

They turned, as one, and started back, leaning forward against the wind. It was like running up a treadmill. But the wind was impartial; the man following them leaned against it, ran uphill against it.

They had no breath to talk, only enough to climb the endless hill of air. Jeff waited for the shot that would stop them, and tried, as well as he could, to shelter the girl's body with his own, because hers, under the drenched clothing, seemed so much more vulnerable than his.

The wind lessened suddenly. And ahead, as they looked along the roof, and the roofs beyond, the western sky was brightening. The rain stopped.

Then they could see what the storm had obscured. Ahead, the roof ended. There was a space between its edge and the next, somewhat lower, roof. They went on to the edge, and now they could hear the man yelling behind them. He yelled, "Hold it! You fools!"

The gap between the roofs was some six feet across—a long step across. A long, long step and, far below, the pavement of a passage which led between the houses.

This was the closed jaw of the trap.

Linda twisted in his arm and he let her go. She stooped and began to pull her skirt up brown legs and for an instant he only looked at her. Then he said "No!" but at the same instant she cried out, "Come on!" and ran toward the roof's edge, her freed legs flashing.

She's too little, Jeff thought. Her legs aren't ——

The thought died as for an instant choking tightness held him.

She seemed to run straight over the edge of the roof. But she rose, did not fall. She flew in the air, in the dancer's flying leap, and came down on the roof beyond, still running for a step or two before she caught herself and turned.

"It's nothing," she called to him. "Come on!"

He took a deep breath. It was nothing if you weighed nothing—could take flight like a bird. Or like a dancer. His body felt heavy, sluggish.

"Hold it!" the man coming toward him shouted, seeing Jeff draw back a little from the roof edge, gather his body together.

Jeff ran and once he moved knew he could not stop. His movements were not so perfectly timed as the girl's had been—her last running step had carried her only inches from the edge. He realized he was off stride, was too far from the edge—and had no choice. He thrust convulsively, at the last, and seemed to be falling, powerless.

He came down on the far roof, awkwardly so that he almost fell. The girl caught him, steadied him.

"You did fine," Linda Parks said approvingly.

Linda told herself carefully, I have just jumped above nothingness from one roof to another roof, and I am standing here saying "You did fine" to a man I didn't know yesterday—standing on a roof, wet to the skin and ——

She looked down at herself. The suit clung to her like her skin. She tried to pull it away from her body so that it would not cling so outrageously. She reached up and pushed her short black hair away from her forehead. She looked up at a man with sandy wet hair, and with a light suit plastered to his body as her clothing was to hers, with a white shirt wet against his chest. A man who had slapped his hand down on a board to make rats run. She shivered uncontrollably.

"You're cold," he said.

"Mr. Bowen," she said, "is this real? Is this happening? Is ——"

He put his hands on her shoulders and, gently, shook her.

"I'm sorry," Linda said. "For a moment I seemed to be a little dazed."

The man who had been following them stood on the other roof and reached toward his pocket, and then she was in Bowen's arms, was swirled so that she was partly shielded by him.

The man took a handkerchief out of his pocket and wiped his wet face with it. He said, "Stringer wants you."

Bowen said, "Why don't you come and get us?" He tensed himself. "You and Stringer?" he said.

The man looked at the gap between the roofs. He looked down into it. He turned and walked back across the roof toward the shed.

They looked after him for an instant. Then Bowen shook his head and looked the other way, across the roof they stood on and the roof of the building which adjoined it. Beyond the second roof the wall of an apartment house stood above them like a cliff. The wall was windowless, blank.

The sun came out abruptly and its heat began slowly to penetrate Linda's soaked clothing.

"Come on," Jeff said and reached for her hand. He moved off as if he knew where he was going. There was nobody in sight on the roofs behind them.

"Have they given up?" Linda said.

He shook his head quickly, said, "I doubt it."

Taking her hand again, Bowen led the way to another roof shed, like the ones on the roofs behind. It had a door facing toward the street side. Bowen took hold of the knob and started to turn it, and Linda could see it move. But then he took his hand off the knob and put his ear against the door. He listened for a moment and then moved away from the door, with an obvious effort to make no noise.

"Somebody behind it," he said, speaking very softly, bending down to her. "Waiting for us to walk into the parlor."

"There must be a lot of them," she said. "I still don't know what it's all ——"

"Did she tell you anything?" Bowen asked. "Your roommate?"

"They kept asking that over and over," Linda said. "She didn't tell me anything. She just disappeared."

"She's dead," Bowen said. "Did they tell you that?"

"Not quite," she said. "But—they killed her, didn't they? Why?"

"She knew something," Jeff said. "And they think we know it too. That's about as far as I've got. Stringer gave me a song and ——" He shook his head abruptly. He looked down at her, and unexpectedly smiled. "How are you on ladders?" he said. "As good as at jumping?"

"No," she said. "But—all right, I guess." She looked up at him. "There was an adagio class at school," she said. It was an absurd thing to say, but at the same time it was a satisfying thing to say. It somehow pulled the past, which was reasonable and sure, up to and into the present, which was neither.

He nodded. "Because," he said, "each door will be locked. Or unlocked with one of them waiting behind it. As you say, there seem to be a lot of them. But ——" He pointed. A fire-escape ladder hooked up over the roof edge. "They won't cover everything, maybe," he said. "All we need is two minutes on a telephone. O.K.?"

"Of course," she said.

"I'll go first," he said, at the ladder, and then looked down into the fenced yard below. There did not seem to be anybody in it.

He swung around and began to back down the iron ladder. Linda looked down, and then resolutely did not look down. She gave him start enough, and began to go down after him.

But the ladder stopped just below the top-floor windows. It stopped at the iron grilling of a platform. Iron stairs, with a railing, ran down from the platform, zigzagging to the ground.

Bowen waited until she was on the platform. He said, "Good girl," and turned and started down the iron stairs. He had taken only a few steps down when Linda said "Wait!" in a breathless voice, and then pointed down. A man had come out from close to the house, or from the house. He looked up at them. Bowen stopped.

"The brush man," Linda told him. "The same man."

She crouched on the platform, holding to the railing. The sandy-haired man looked at her, unbelievingly, as if she had said the wrong words.

"One of them," she said, keeping her voice low.

Bowen still looked at her strangely. Worry showed in his face.

"He came to the apartment," she said. "Listen. Just to the one apartment. Nowhere else. It was—he was one of the wrong things that I wanted to tell you about. Tell you —— Look!"

The man below was staring up at them. He seemed about to shout to them, but then, instead, seized the handrail of the fire escape and started up.

Jeff Bowen was back on the platform. He turned to the window which opened on the fire-escape platform, put his hands under the frame, and lifted. The window shot up.

Linda went through the window, dropped to the floor inside. Instantly he was beside her. They were in a corridor with closed doors on either side. There were numbers on the doors. A flight of stairs led down beside it.

Bowen went down the stairs. At the second floor they came into another corridor. Bowen stopped in front of one of the doors. Abruptly he began knocking on it. He said, "Find a phone," in a quick low voice.

The door opened—partly opened and then a safety chain held it. A woman looked out at them. Then her eyes widened and her mouth began to open.

"Wait!" Bowen said. "Have you got a telephone? We want ——"

"Go away," the woman said loudly. "Go away!"

"Listen," Bowen said. "I want to call the ——"

She slammed the door. They could hear the lock snap home. Jeff Bowen looked at the door blankly.

"We look like—heaven knows what we look like," Linda said. "Look at me." He did. Although now the thin material of her blouse had dried somewhat, did not cling quite so resolutely, Linda Parks discovered herself blushing. "You're just as bad," she said. "You can't blame the ——"

She stopped. They both heard the sound of someone walking cautiously along the hallway of the floor above.

Jeff Bowen started on along the corridor. She followed him to the head of the last flight of stairs. The flight was empty; the first-floor hall into which it led was empty. There was nobody in the vestibule beyond.

"Come on," Jeff Bowen said, and went down the stairs fast, and she went after him. Bowen was almost at the bottom of the flight when a man came into the vestibule.

The man who called himself Stringer had a rather tired smile on his medium face. He looked up at them and shook his head. "You two've led us quite a chase. A very impetuous ——"

Something in Jeff Bowen's face made him stop.

"Don't be a fool," Stringer said sharply. "Listen to me!"

Jeff did not stop. He went on, slowly, down the stair flight. He wasn't listening. He had listened too long the night before to the man who called himself Stringer; who was working both sides against the middle. He watched Stringer now, but he did not listen. He watched for Stringer to pull a gun, and went down the stairs toward him slowly. He saw Stringer's eyes narrow; saw him move his head a little from side to side, as if he did not like what was happening.

Jeff did not jump the last three steps. He had seen, at the other house, what that came to—had seen the man they called Norman lose balance as he landed, careen into Stringer. Stringer had been awkward enough then, physically ineffective enough. Stringer wasn't a big man. It was a break that he was the one to block this last outlet from the trap. Norman would have been tougher. If there wasn't a gun to deal with ——

Jeff jumped just as his feet reached the level of the floor, leaped with his fists ready, leaped swinging. He did not even touch Stringer. Stringer had merely moved aside. Jeff closed in, swinging. This time he hit something—his fist slapped into the palm of Stringer's hand and the hand gave with it and Jeff's whole body swung toward Stringer. He wrenched his hand free, stabbed his left forward at the jaw which seemed only inches from it.

It was, for a fleeting instant, as if Jeff had rammed a wall with his chin. Blackness was shot with jagged light. Then there wasn't anything at all. . . .

Linda did not really see what was happening, what happened; it was too sudden, too confused. She saw Jeff Bowen's first rush. Then, instead of going forward, Jeff Bowen was reeling backward, falling to the floor. And Stringer was shaking his head a little sadly.

Stringer said, in an almost gentle voice, "You're willing, Mr. Bowen. I'll give you that," and took a step toward the man on the floor. He turned after the one step and looked back at Linda and said, "He'll be all right. He'll ——" and then, more loudly, in a different voice, "Wait!"

She did not wait. She jumped the remaining steps, swung on the newel post and fled down the hallway toward the rear of the house. And now she fled for both of them—for Bowen and herself. She had to reach a telephone, call for help. Stringer yelled something at her. There was not time to listen.

There was another flight of stairs near the door—a steeper flight than the others, with, halfway down, a single dangling light bulb. Beyond that there was grayness. She ran down the stairs to the basement of the house. There would be a door there—there had to be a door there. She had seen hundreds of houses like this since she had been in New York. A basement door under the main entrance. If she could reach ——

Overhead she heard someone walking, hurriedly, heavily, along the hallway she had fled through. The basement door was in sight now, sunlight coming through its glass panel.

"Miss Parks!" a man shouted from the staircase behind her.

There wasn't time for anything. She turned to the street door and clutched at it. As it opened, she heard from the street the wail of a siren.

"Thank God, thank God, thank God!" Linda Parks, without knowing, said aloud, in a breathless voice.

She was in the areaway, separated from the sidewalk by an iron fence. There was a gate in the fence and she went toward it. She looked through the fence and saw a police car at the curb, with a uniformed policeman standing beside it. It would be all right now.

She pushed the gate open and then stopped. She could see the stone steps to the main door of the house now, and Stringer was sitting comfortably on the second step. He got up and came toward her.

"Here she is now," he said to the policeman. "Come on, Miss Parks."

Linda said, "No! No!" and started toward the uniformed man. "Don't let him! He's ——" She stopped. The policeman was nodding understandingly toward Stringer.

"Excited," Stringer said, as if Linda had said nothing. "I told you how it was."

"Yes," the policeman said. "I can see she is." And then, to Linda, "You're all right now, miss. No reason to be upset."

It was a kind of nightmare—a nightmare in which she tried to speak, to call for help—in which she cried out, and still was soundless. She was in the middle of New York and all around her were people—all kinds of people. It was a sunny Saturday morning in the city.

Stringer came to her, smiling. He took her arm. The man who had said he was selling brushes came up behind Linda. He took her other arm.

"See you got her all right," he said.

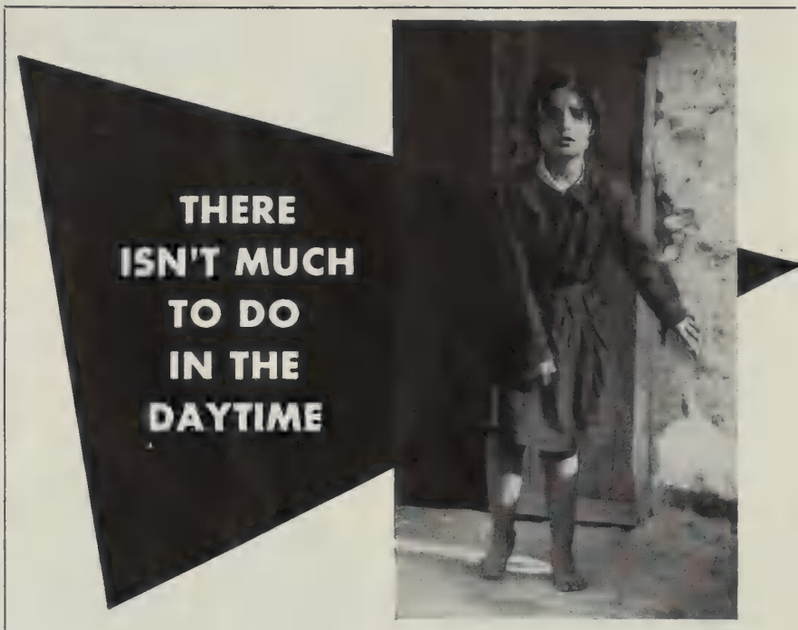
"Oh, yes," Stringer said. "Both of them."

"You don't need us, then," the policeman said.

"No," Stringer said. "We don't need you."

They reached the steps of the house into which she had been walked the night before—walked between two men, as she was walked now. She went numbly where their hands directed, walking powerless in a nightmare. They led her back up the steps, into the house.

Jeff Bowen opened his eyes. He was lying on his back on a sofa and there were people in the room. A good many people.



Somebody said, "He'll be all right."

He was lying on a sofa in the house to which a man named Plent had led him, into which two other men had forced him. He was back where he had started—where they had started. He and the black-haired girl with the wide dark eyes and the lovely, tender face. Linda. Where was ——

He was quite conscious now.

"Feeling better, Mr. Bowen?" a quiet voice said, and then it all came back. It was very considerate of the man who called himself Stringer to inquire how he was feeling.

Jeff turned his head so he could see around the room. He had been right in thinking there were a good many people in it. Slowly Jeff swung his legs to the floor and sat on the sofa, and looked at them. For a moment more they seemed to sway around him, to advance and recede. Then he could see them clearly. The girl was there. She was leaning forward in a chair, looking at him, her eyes large with alarm.

This is Georgia Melisova. The hovel before which she is standing is her Athenian home in Greece. Her mother occasionally works at straw chair weaving but is never able to find permanent employment. Her father just disappeared. She has four younger brothers. Georgia is amazingly intelligent for a ten-year-old child who hasn't had a dozen weeks in school. She should be given an education as she has great charm and potentialities. As it is, she hardly gets enough to eat.

There is severe unemployment and heart breaking, harsh poverty in Greece. Even many of the children who are helped have only one meal a day and go to bed hungry every night. The bed is some old rags on the dirt floor of a bleak shanty. There isn't much to do in the daytime except to sit and think how hungry they are. There's no use going through the garbage cans, for too many are doing that. And for lack of funds, the relief agency doesn't serve any meals at all on Saturdays and Sundays.

Children like Georgia can be "adopted" and properly fed, clothed and educated in Greece and all of the countries listed below. The cost to the contributor is the same in all—$10 a month. The child's name, address, picture and story is furnished the donor. The donor also can correspond with the "adopted" child.

For Information Write:
Dr. J. Calvitt Clarke
CHRISTIAN CHILDREN'S FUND, INC.
Richmond 4, Virginia

I wish to "adopt" a boy.....girl..... for one year in.....
(Name Country)
I will pay $10 a month ($120 a year).
Enclosed is payment for the full year .....first month..... Please send me the child's name, story, address and picture. I understand that I can correspond with the child. Also, that there is no obligation to continue the adoption.
I cannot "adopt" a child but want to help by giving $.....
Please send me further information.

Name.....
Address.....
City.....Zone.....
State.....

Gifts of any amount are welcome.
Gifts are deductible from income tax.

Christian Children's Fund, incorporated in 1938, with its 231 affiliated orphanage-schools in 34 countries is the largest Protestant orphanage organization in the world. It serves 22,000,000 meals a year. It is registered with the Advisory Committee on Voluntary Foreign Aid of the International Cooperation Administration of the U. S. Government. It is experienced, economical and conscientious.

COUNTRIES:

Austria, Belgium, Borneo, Brazil, Burma, Finland, France, Free China, Greece, Hong Kong, India, Indochina, Indonesia, Iran, Italy, Jamaica, Japan, Jordan, Korea, Lapland, Lebanon, Macao, Malaya, Mexico, Okinawa, Pakistan, Philippines, Puerto Rico, Syria, United States, Western Germany. —American Indians.

"I'm sorry," Jeff said to Linda Parks, who was the only one in the room who mattered. "I didn't do very well, did I?"

"Just so you're all right," she said. "It took so long for you —— It's all right now."

And it did seem, now that he was looking at her and speaking to her, that the alarm went out of her big, dark eyes. She was quite a girl, to worry about him in the face of—in the face of everything.

They were all there, all of "them." The heavy, dignified Jasper Plent sat on a sofa and the man called Norman sat on one side of Plent and the man called Clyde sat on the other. Plent looked at Jeff Bowen with no expression on his heavy face. None of the three moved. Jeff looked around the room.

They were all there. The man who had said he was Saul Stringer stood near the door which led into the entrance foyer of the house. The man who had been in the yard below, and had climbed toward them—Linda's brush man—stood near him. Both of them were relaxed and casual. There was, behind them in the foyer, another man, and still another was at the far end of the long room, near the door which led to the dining room. They weren't taking any chances this time.

Stringer said, "You moved into that punch. And I was lucky, of course."

Jeff looked at him. Stringer-Seymour was still a very medium man, with a medium expression and an unemphatic voice.

"You were not," Jeff said. "But, before, you fell all over yourself."

"The circumstances were somewhat different," Stringer said. "Well, now that our friend's all right—Miss Parks, you're quite sure? For the record?"

"They are the ones who grabbed me at Mr. Bowen's house," Linda said, speaking slowly and distinctly. "They forced me into a car and brought me here."

It did not make any sense. It did not make any sense at all. If I were interviewing a witness, Jeff thought, if I wanted to make quite sure what he would say on the stand, I might put it to a witness as he is putting it to her.

"Mr. Bowen," Stringer said, "these are the men?"

Jeff said, "You know well enough. Who better?"

"Wait," Stringer said. "Can you identify these men"—he indicated the three sitting side by side on the sofa—"as the ones who kidnaped Miss Parks from your house in Connecticut and brought her here to New York?"

"You," Jeff said, "are a very funny man, Stringer. Or whatever you call yourself. Very funny."

Stringer's voice was tolerant and a little tired. "Can you?"

"All right," Jeff said. "The man in the middle—Plent—came to my house in Connecticut pretending to be Miss Parks' father. The others I can't identify as having been there—not positively. Somebody knocked me out." He paused. "I seem very easy to knock out," he said.

Stringer smiled faintly. "There are tricks in all trades, Mr. Bowen. Nobody can be expected to know all of them. Well."

The last word had a certain, in the circumstances, ridiculous sound. It was as if, with it, Stringer were winding things up.

Probably he was. Probably this was, finally, it. Here the jaws of the trap snapped. There wasn't much use in anything. But there wasn't any use in taking it sitting down. Jeff started to get to his feet. He half stood, facing Plent, who was the man to face. Not Stringer. Stringer did what he was told to do. That was all there was to Stringer. The others were —— Then, quite slowly and carefully, Jeff Bowen sat down again. He still looked at the three men sitting on the sofa.

They were sitting stiffly, awkwardly. This was because they were handcuffed together. A row of handcuffed men. Jeff looked at Stringer.

"Of course," Stringer said. "Taking a kidnaped person across a state line. Federal offense. Very serious Federal offense, fortunately. But you're a lawyer, Mr. Bowen. You picked it up quickly enough earlier. Mr. Plent was a little slower. But then he thought your house was in New York, of course. An easy mistake to make."

Plent merely looked at him.

"All right, Charley," Stringer said. "May as well take them along, don't you think?"

"What it comes to," Geoffrey Bowen said at twenty minutes after two on the afternoon of Saturday, the twenty-eighth of July, while looking morosely at a half-empty coffee cup—"what it comes to is that all the time we were running—crawling around on boards and leaping like gazelles over rooftops—it was your people chasing us. Not the others. So that we could make positive identification, justifying charges of kidnaping, in violation of the appropriate Federal statutes. I just want to get it clear."

They were finishing lunch in the Pierre Grill. Linda Parks wore a crisp cotton dress of palest yellow; Jeff Bowen a borrowed suit, which fitted none too well. Saul Stringer wore, among other things, his accustomed half-smile.

"Not all the time," Stringer said. "For a few minutes, Plent and company were doing the chasing. Then my associates arrived. After that—yes, you fled from friends."

Reflectively, Jeff Bowen rubbed his jaw.

"You didn't, you know, wait for an explanation," Stringer said.

"Would you have?" Jeff asked him. "Considering everything? When you couldn't tell who was running with the hounds?"

"Probably not," Stringer said. "I had to stall for time. To give the boys a chance to get set after Plent led you to the house, and you led me. You see—I was not as completely in their confidence as I would have liked."

"I suppose," Jeff said, "you tipped them off I was going to the office this morning? After you had suggested I should?"

"Yes," Stringer said. "It seemed an idea to find Miss Parks as soon as possible. Before they . . . took steps."

"Mr. Stringer," Linda said, "what did Joyce find out? That made them—I suppose they did kill her?"

"I haven't the least idea," Stringer said. "I don't think they have. As to killing her—I don't doubt they did. Took her down to the apartment and set the suicide."

"But she did find something?" Jeff asked.

"Oh," Stringer said, "obviously. Something important enough to endanger the whole operation. Which, incidentally, was more than I'd managed to turn up." He sipped coffee. He looked at Linda, whose eyes were large again, but not with fear. "What is it you'd like to know?" he said, as if she had asked a question.

"Everything," Linda said, with simplicity. "They were spies. You are FBI. Or something?"

"That's good enough," Stringer said. "They collected information, yes. Offered it for sale. I tried to explain to Mr. Bowen last night. Spies—the word is a little dramatic for their operation. They're businessmen. Or were. Operated a kind of clearinghouse."

"For Russia?"

Stringer's smile became patient. He said that it was always comfortable to have everything in black and white. The Soviets and company? He didn't doubt it. But also for others who could pay for information. "They're professionals." He paused. He let it lie there.

When it was apparent that he planned to, Jeff said, "But they must have been after some special thing that Miss Holbrook found out about?"

"Counselor," Stringer said, and was again patient, "we have an atomic submarine cruising the world. How fast will it go? Not merely 'pretty fast.' Nor merely 'faster than most.' How fast? In knots, to the decimal point. I don't know. But somebody does. Others would like to. A while back there was talk about a new antisubmarine weapon. What is this weapon, except they call it 'Lulu'? What will it do—precisely? I don't know. A lot of people all over the world would like to know. The Jasper Plent Associates, and their like, try to satisfy curiosity. Maybe Miss Holbrook found she was filing specifications of 'Lulu' and was bright enough to think that odd."

"You really don't know what it was?"

"If I did, counselor, I wouldn't spread it around," Stringer said. "Would I, now?"

"They came to the apartment," Linda said. "Forced her to go with them. Forced her to write a note to me. She tried to—to do little things wrong. Things they wouldn't notice and I might. Like the wrong robe. Like taking a heavy suit."

Stringer nodded.

"If I had moved faster ——" Linda said, and her eyes clouded.

"If you could see through stone walls," Stringer said. "Leap over mountains. If I could—anybody could." He finished his coffee and looked into the empty cup. "We didn't do too well ourselves."

He had been, he said, on it for months. It had taken a long time to persuade the Plent Associates he was an inside man who could be helpful. They were always, of course, looking for people on the insides of things. He had done a few small jobs. But he had not uncovered anything they could go to court on. He had not known anything about Joyce until her letter came through channels. That Linda Parks had been kidnaped he knew only when the police bulletin came through.

"The man who came around pretending to sell brushes," Linda said. "The drunken man across the street. They were working for you?"

"With me," Stringer said. "That is—Charley was. The brush man. Just making sure your roommate hadn't come back. And to see what sort of people she associated with."

"Me," Linda said.

"Yes," Stringer said. "A voice on the telephone. Very charming voice, Miss Parks, but we like to look. As for this drunken man—keeping an eye on things for Plent, I suppose."

"Since you don't know what Miss Holbrook found," Jeff said, slowly and carefully, "and hadn't found anything yourself you can make a charge on, you don't get them on espionage, do you?"

"Unless we turn something up," Stringer said. "No, counselor."

"And," Jeff said, "if my house didn't happen to stand a hundred feet inside Connecticut, there wouldn't be a Federal charge of any kind, would there?"

"No, counselor," Stringer said and smiled pleasantly. "Fortunate turn of events, isn't it? You might call it . . . catch as catch can." He stood up. "I'm going downtown. Can I drop you anywhere?"

Linda and Jeff said, "Thanks. No." They went with the medium man—who had, it was now evident, some quite unmedium accomplishments—up the stairs and out onto Fifth Avenue, which was bright with sunlight.

Stringer hailed a cab and said, "Be seeing you," and was driven briskly off.

They stood side by side, near the curb.

And it was strange, Linda thought, how abruptly everything seemed to have stopped. It was like a sudden, heavy silence after great noise. And—it was disappointing. That was the most remarkable thing: it was disappointing. When I should, she thought, be feeling only the relief one feels on wakening from a nightmare. Because a nightmare was surely what it had been, with the violence and final incongruity of a nightmare. Now it was over. And now it was empty.

"Can I drop you somewhere?" Jeff Bowen said, and she thought that was precisely the right phrase for it, represented precisely the way this sandy-haired man must be feeling. Since, after all, I got him into it. To be dropped—that was what came next.

"Oh," Linda said, "you needn't. I'll just get a cab and ——" But she stopped at that. And what? Go back to the apartment and pack her clothes, because she wasn't going to live there any more? (She'd had enough of that.) And then go out on a Saturday afternoon, in a city grown dull, no longer exciting, and try to find another place to live?

God knows I can't blame her, Jeff Bowen thought. If I were in her place I'd feel exactly the same way—the quicker I get away from this man, this Jonah, this incompetent, the better off I'll be. This blundering one I went to for help. This oaf who incompetently got himself knocked out when I needed him most, who ran from the wrong people, who had to be told how to jump across a little gap between roofs, who finished it all off neatly by getting knocked out again by a man half his size.

"Can't say I ——" he said gloomily.

"Unless you want to ——" she said, and thought, How can you, Linda Parks? After what you've put him through?

Since they had spoken at the same time, they now stopped at the same time, and looked at each other. "I'm sorry," Jeff said, and she said, "It wasn't any ——" and again they spoke together, which was ridiculous. And then a cab stopped and looked at them inquiringly.

She's the loveliest thing that ever happened, Jeff thought morosely. Lovely and quicksilver in motion and, in addition, most kind of heart.

He reached for the cab's door handle, stood back to let Linda get in, got in after her.

"Mr. Bowen," Linda said, "I just want to say—I don't know how to say it."

(He could think of a way. "Get out of here, you goof. Go away and leave me alone, you bungling ——")

"It sounds so silly," she said. "'Thank you very much for saving my life.' It does sound silly, doesn't it? Because ——"

"Mister," the cab driver said, "you want I should take you somewhere?"

"For ——" Jeff said dimly. "What?"

"For saving ——" Linda said.

"People get in taxicabs," the cabbie said reasonably, "mostly they want to go somewhere. Right?"

"Start," Jeff said. "We'll think of something."

The driver started.

"Go on," Jeff said. "What did you say?"

"If you hadn't found me," Linda said. "Got me away when they were going to ——"

"Linda," Jeff said, and spoke very carefully, as if words were breakable, "when you called me at the office yesterday ——" He stopped. "Only yesterday?" he said.

"I know," she said. "Yes. Go on, Mr. Bowen."

"You said something about staying in the country overnight. Asked about a hotel. There's a very good hotel and —— It's much cooler in the country and ——"

"You mustn't think," Linda said, "that you've got to take me on for keeps just because ——" She stopped, hearing her own words. "Oh!" she said, and color swarmed up into her face. "I didn't mean ——"

"I'll rent a car," Jeff said, and found he was talking very rapidly. "Have to anyway because mine is—oh, well. We can drive up in an hour or so. There's a do at the club might be —— What did you say? Just now?"

"Oh," Linda Parks said, "nothing really. Not really anything at all, Mr. ——" It was obviously absurd, under the rather peculiar circumstances, to continue to call this man "Mr. Bowen." What was his given name? It came to her suddenly. "Geoffrey." She said it aloud. "It would be fine to be in the country. Just for a night, of course. Because I have ——"

She stopped, since she was no longer being listened to.

"Grand Central," Jeff said to the driver, and then, to Linda, "There's a car-rental place there."

The cabbie did not say anything. But he took them to Grand Central, where a man can rent a car to drive a girl into the country on a sunny summer afternoon. END with the doctor, a pure, unalloyed emotion thrust sharply upward out of the welter of his inner dullness. Poignantly and imperiously he knew regret. The feeling was stark in its completeness. He knew achingly, vividly and simply that he was soon to go and that he would leave no single act of heroism or daring for his only son to remember.

A THING TO REMEMBER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 45

Soon, for Frank, his father would be a memory. And what was there for him to remember? What thing that would be meaningful to a boy in his mid teens? Ellen, from the vantage point of maturity, would have at least the memory of steadfastness and sincere, if unimaginative, dedication to a great calling. For her there would be the recollection of shared intimacies and private jokes, of a quieter, unspectacular courage of a sort; but what for Frank? What single act to which he could point, in conversation with his contemporaries, and say, "Hey—my dad—— Let me tell you, he was a character. Talk about guts. Why, one time when we were——"

No, nothing like that. Doctor White was amazed that so irrational a thing could be so important and that a sedentary, mild man such as himself could understand it so clearly. And yet he remembered stories his mother had told about his own father. About his utter fearlessness when he was angry, his unswerving determination to be and act as he believed proper. He recalled with what relish he had retold, as a boy, an incident involving a man who had made an improper remark about his mother. His father had heard of it and had been on his way to work when he had next encountered the man. He had pulled his big gold watch from his pocket and looked at the time. Then he had handed the watch to his wife and said, "I've got to whip this fellow sometime, and I've just about got time before I go to work."

Doctor White recalled with a shock what pleasure he had had in telling the story and finishing it with a flourish, "And that's just what he did. Right there on the sidewalk. And then he dusted his hands and took his watch back and said, 'Come on, dear. We'll have to step along now or I'll be late.'"

Doctor White reached the parked auto and drove slowly toward home, still amazed at the raw urgency of his regret that he had no such memory to leave with his son. Yet he accepted the validity of the feeling completely. He told himself that it need not have been an act involving physical violence. Any single thing that could have excited the imagination and admiration of youth would have sufficed. Anything that could have brought a light into the boy's eyes and made them shine as he began, "I remember once when my dad was——" But there were only humility and persistence in an unspectacular kind of work that could have little meaning to a boy until he had grown into manhood. A boy to whom, by that time, the memory of a father would have grown dim and unimportant with the passage of time. Suddenly Doctor White's thin body sagged and it was a real physical effort to operate the car.

He parked a careful six inches from the curb in front of the parsonage and sat for a moment praying quietly for self-control. Then he stepped from the car and squared his narrow shoulders. He forced a jaunty whistle to his lips as he walked up the path to the front door. Tonight. He would tell Ellen tonight, and together they would decide how best to break the news to Frank.

He was barely inside the door when he knew. Frank was sitting in the chair next the front window. The evening paper, open to the sports page, lay limp in his lap. He stared at his father with bewildered, frightened eyes. He made a little movement with his lips, but no words came out.

For an instant Doctor White stared back at him, caught in a paralysis of comprehension. Finally he spoke and his voice sounded almost harsh in his ears.

"You know . . . how did you know?"

The boy's lips barely moved. "They phoned from the clinic. They wanted the name of our family doctor. I guess they thought they were talking to you."

Doctor White stepped to his son's side. He searched desperately for words. He lifted his hand to stroke the boy's hair, then pulled it back in a curiously awkward gesture. He patted his son's shoulder twice.

"Where's mother?"

"At church. Sewing for Korea."

"Oh, yes. I'd forgotten. This is Thursday, isn't it?"

He looked down at his son helplessly. The boy's eyes were on the floor, his thin body tense. Doctor White wanted terribly to take his son in his arms, to hold and comfort him. Instead, he remained standing, unsure.

"Well," he said. "Well." Then, "I'm sorry, Frank. Awfully sorry you had to hear about it this way. I'd wanted——"

His voice trailed away. There came a sound then from the boy in the chair. It was a tearing, frightening sound, midway between a sob and a scream. Suddenly Frank rose and in one movement threw himself at his father. His knobby, boy's arms clutched convulsively at his father's shoulders and his body shook with crying. Doctor White stood very still and held him. His arms knew a satisfaction they had not known since his son was seven.

After a long time Frank straightened and wiped the tears away. He looked up at his father as though he were seeing him for the first time. When he spoke, his voice was reedy with effort but controlled.

"You're really something," he said, and his eyes were shining. "You've got more guts than anyone I'll ever know."

Doctor White's surprised eyes asked their question and the boy answered simply.

"You whistled!" he said. "I was watching when you drove up. I saw you pucker up and come in whistling."

A feeling of fulfillment that was more than peace and more than faith came to Doctor White. There was no doubt now. When there was validity in such little things there must be great truth in the bigger ones.

END

I SCARCELY SEE BUT FEEL YOU NOW AT FIRST

By POLLY TOLAND

I scarcely see but feel you now at first,
As when the unroused dawn
disturbs the night;
Listen! I hear the thin uncertain burst
Of spirit-bird songs,
prophesying light.
And if you speak, I hardly hear your words,
—What do we talk of . . . war,
or work, or play?—
Ah, I am deaf but to those ruffled birds
That in the darkness have high hopes of day.
Brittle, the music splinters in my mind,
As between light and flowers I come to dance,
Still I remain to outer image blind,
Save that I lie within your arms by chance.
Now, lest they wake me, you shall tell me plain,
How to restore so sweet this dream again.

WEATHER and WORK...

DRY OUT YOUR HANDS . . . leave them so sore-looking, red and rough.

SOFSKIN HELPS HEAL, SOOTHE . . . even the driest, roughest hands.

SPECIAL OFFER
NOW 79¢
Reg. 98¢ plus tax

Here's why 2 Sofskin Formulas

Sofskin Moisture Magic, with increased moisturizing qualities, is especially made for very dry, rough skin.

Sofskin plus Lanolin has the correct moisturizing qualities for normal to dry skin.

Sofskin
HAND CREAM

Corn, Callous, Bunion Pain Eased The Minute You Do This!

And Corns, Callouses Removed the Quickest Way Ever Discovered!

No waiting minutes for action when you use soft, soothing, cushioning, protective Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads. They give fast nerve-deep relief from corns, callouses, bunions, sore toes . . . ease new or tight shoes . . . stop corns, callouses before they can develop . . . remove corns, callouses one of the quickest ways known to medical science. No other method does all this. Get a box today! At Drug, Shoe, Department, 5-10c Stores everywhere.

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

HOT, TENDER FEET?
Dr. Scholl's Foot Powder quickly relieves hot, tired, tender, perspiring, odorous feet. Eases new or tight shoes. Get a can today.
Dr Scholl's FOOT POWDER

What's Your Travel I.Q.?

Have you ever visited Miami? If so, have you seen all the immeasurable wonders it has to offer? Do you know the aspects of rare interest about this Magic City which many visitors miss? Do you know the reasons why it offers a golden opportunity for every member of your family? Unless you can answer "yes" to all these questions, let us send you—free—a lavish full-color booklet with 1001 facts about Miami and You and the Sun.

The City of MIAMI

Young or old . . . wage earner or executive—Miami spells vacation magic to millions. And Miami can spell VACATION magic for you!

"Miami Invitation," Dept. 51
320 N.E. 5th St., Miami, Florida

Name.....

Address.....

City..... State.....

Kraft gives you the HANDY SLICES with really rich cheese flavor!

Why do Kraft De Luxe Slices taste so much better than others you may find in the grocer's dairy case? . . . It's simple.

Kraft cheesemakers are very fussy about the natural cheeses from which they make these handy pasteurized process cheese slices.

For example, it takes fine natural cheddar cheese to give such flavor as you get in Old English brand. And only truly nut-sweet natural Swiss can make the Kraft De Luxe Swiss slices so good! That's why they are called Kraft De Luxe Slices.

That's why your cheese sandwiches taste extra good when you use the handy slices marked Kraft. Try 'em all: American, Pimento, Old English brand, Swiss, Brick, and Muenster.

EIGHT GENEROUS SLICES
EIGHT FULL OUNCES

By night: the Rickers, of Midland, Texas, dine and dance and talk oil business.

By day: laundry for four small children.

Rich one year... Poor another!

HOW AMERICA LIVES

By ELIZABETH LAND
PHOTOGRAPHS by JOSEPH DI PIETRO

Over a washing machine in Midland, Texas, hangs a diploma. It comes from Bryn Mawr, of all places, an Eastern college for girls of intellectual bent. How did higher education get mixed up in the fight against tattletale gray? That has to do with a day in July, 1948, and a town named Winnemucca, Nevada.

It was a hot summer afternoon when a young woman named Priscilla Gross and a young man named Paul Ricker were introduced to Winnemucca as well as to each other.

A sudden roadside sign flashed: "Stop at the Sonoma Inn, Winnemucca. Café, Bar, SWIMMING POOL!" The words lit up in Priscilla's brain like neon. It must have been 110° in the shade and she was tired and dusty and parboiled after a drive in from Reno. She and her mother and a friend of her mother's were on their way back to Maryland. The water would be heaven!

A young man from Texas sat at the wheel of his mother's car and barreled in her direction. They were on their way to California to visit his sister, and Paul was feeling as crusty and baked as Priscilla. "Winnemucca," he murmured as a sign whizzed past.

A half hour later, both parties arrived.

"How's the water?"

Priscilla looked up from where she stood by the side of the pool with her mother. She was trim in her close-clinging bathing suit and she was cool, already having had her plunge.

The young man was blond and brown and every muscle was exactly where it should have been. Even so, that one about "How's the water?" was a little too time-honored.

"Delightful," she said. She even smiled.

The muscles in the young man's legs tensed. The young body poised. A quick spring and he was in the water.

There was a strangling sound, and when he surfaced his face was blue. He looked at the woman beside Priscilla, caught the similarity of features. "Does your daughter," he questioned, "always lie like that?"

Priscilla had known, of course. The water was like something drained off the Baltic. But then he'd had it coming. So breezy. So sure of himself. She went over and sat down on a chaise longue.

The Rickers spend $100 a month for a combination maid and baby sitter. So, once Michael is fed, Priscilla can go out, stays rested enough for impromptu partying.

"Let's face it, 'front' is important in our business . . .

"How about a Coke?" He had recovered and stood beside her, briskly scouring himself with a towel.

She started to answer. Then she realized the question had been directed at her mother. She leaned back on the chaise longue feeling slightly piqued.

"Coke?" This time he nodded in her direction.

She looked at him. There was a good twenty-second pause. And in the space of it she knew, with that little extra something that ticks inside every woman, that the answer to that question was important.

"Yes," she said finally. "I'd like a Coke."

The little ticking thing was right. Five months and three days later she was Mrs. Paul Ricker!

Reminiscing about it, Priscilla is sure it was the bathing suit that did the trick, but Paul has a different opinion. "It was the freckles," he says, "on her knee."

Nobody believes this. But Paul pulls up the leg of Priscilla's pedal pushers. "See?" he says. And there, sure enough, they are. A little round patch of them like cinnamon on a bun. "I had never seen a girl with freckles on her knee," he says. "I was fascinated."

"Oh, he's sly." Priscilla says. "He was from the first. The way he handled my mother, for instance. With a hunter's sure instinct he knew that if you want the cub what you do is pick off the lioness. Mother never had a chance. She said to me later, 'Priscilla, if you tell him, I'll kill you, but he's the cutest thing I ever saw in my life.' She went down before I did!"

"Nice woman," Paul says. "We get along." He shakes his head. "But I'll admit that the prospects of her being my mother-in-law seemed awfully remote at the time. Still, I just kind of went ahead and made my plans. Priscilla and I had dinner together and ——"

"And," interrupts Priscilla, "he played the guitar."

"Never go anyplace without my guitar," Paul says.

"He," Priscilla continues, "took me out beside the pool after dinner. 'Wait here,' he said. 'I have something to show you.' In a few minutes he was back. 'Now,' he said, 'listen.' And he hauled the guitar out from behind him and proceeded to play and sing the loveliest ballads I had ever heard."

"Had a contest with a man once," Paul muses. "He bet me I couldn't sing all the way to the next town seventy miles away without repeating myself. I won."

"I was captivated," Priscilla says. "Nobody had ever serenaded me before."

Their new house is ideal for entertaining—one wing for bedrooms and baths, the other for living-cooking-dining.

First month in the house, they had 18 parties. Paul and Priscilla tend up on the cooking, usually wind up the evening dancing to the record player.

Whether the menu is hamburger or oysters Rockefeller, there's singing later. Few guests can match Paul's repertoire: cowboy ballads, Mexican folk songs, rock 'n' roll.

Patti may rest on the sofa between dances. Bill is free to gallop home in a dust cloud. The house is decorated in earth colors, best camouflage for the red sand of Midland.

. but not so vital our home and children don't come first."

Half in love, the couple parted, but Priscilla was no sooner home than roses, phone calls and letters deluged her from Texas. "I want," Paul wrote, "to come to Baltimore. To see the races."

"Fine," she replied. "I'm sure the horses will love you."

He wanted to marry her, and he was going to. Only thing was—well, only thing was money. Every month he managed to pay his hotel-room rent in Big Spring, Texas, where he had been operating as an oil-lease broker for about a year. (Only twenty-one years old, he was "in business for himself.") But a trip to Baltimore? That was something else again. Especially since it had to be done in style.

"Paul believes," Priscilla says, "if you can't go Pullman you should ride the rails. There is no middle class for him. He decided he would fly."

"For a while," Paul says, "it looked like I might have to grow my own wings."

Three years now out of high school—a year and a half at Texas A. & M., a year wrangling dudes in Tucson and Texas—he had not yet had time to accrue any kind of substantial backlog in the lease-broker business, but he had always been blessed with friends. A banker acquaintance in Big Spring bought a half interest in a couple of wildcat leases Paul's father had deeded him, an oil friend in Midland lent another thousand.

"I knew," Priscilla says, "I guess I'd known all along I would marry Paul. But I was never one for deciding things on a moment's notice and this was the next thing to that. It was one thing for Paul to be so certain of what he wanted. He'd been making his own decisions for a long time. But it was another thing for me.

"I was only twenty-one, I argued—silently of course!—and I wanted to be a writer. I lived in a world of words, of my own creation and of other people's, and when I went to Bryn Mawr College I took all the writing courses I could. At the time Paul put in his appearance I had just graduated and had a television job brewing, one that might lead to something big. I wasn't actually career-minded, but I did want to try my wings. And so I told myself, 'Go slow. Go slow, Priscilla.'

HOW AMERICA LIVES

When Michael's due for a bottle or a bath, Patti and Jenni quit their make-believe games, Bill puts down his cowboy pistols, and they all swarm around to help.

Midland's skyscrapers have so far failed to citify the area. Paul looks forward to getting ponies for the children—eventually.

The Rickers keep their boat 112 miles from home, in the lake at San Angelo. Moored to an offshore dock, they invite other boatmen aboard their upper deck for refreshments, singing.

Go boating? The very idea drew a big West Texas laugh until the Rickers started houseboat weekends.

Their boat boasts wheels on the bottom: it's really a houseboat-trailer, which takes to the road when hunting season comes around. (He hunts; they both shoot.)

"But I was losing ground fast!" she goes on. "From the first there had been something about Paul's timing that I found hard to resist. As my feelings evolved he seemed to sense each one of them—ahead of me!—and was ready with the right words, the right actions. He never, for instance, actually proposed. Instead he wrote a letter saying, 'I saw a Chinese-red stove today. We'll have to have it when we're married.'

"The closest that he ever came to anything really bona fide along that line was the day I took him to Annapolis to show him the grounds. A profound sight-seer hater, he suddenly turned me to him—right in the middle of my pointing out Tecumseh—and said, 'There's just one thing you'd better get straight. I didn't come all this way to pussyfoot around Annapolis. I came to get engaged.'"

That did it. Priscilla capitulated.

The wedding plans made, Paul went back to Texas and then returned a month later with his mother—and a beautiful sapphire ring which had been hers—for the December wedding. Three bridesmaids, the ceremony in the Church of the Redeemer, and Priscilla was on her way to Texas.

At marriage, the Rickers not only owed $2000, but by the time they got back to Midland they had exactly $18.46 in cold hard cash! The only material asset they owned outright was a car.

In the nine years since that time, however, things have changed considerably. They now have four children, a new house and a houseboat. The only things that have not changed are the facts that Paul is still blessed with a multitude of friends who believe in him and that he is still in business for himself buying up oil leases.

The oil business is not what it was in the "good old days." At one time major oil companies let independent brokers like Paul handle almost all their leasing work. They now employ more and more salaried men of their own to lease up land from ranchers and farmers in areas that look as if they might produce oil. But when Paul knows more about a particular area, can handle himself better, and has personal contacts which make it easier for him to buy up the land than a company man, he may still come up with the job. When this happens, he may make a substantial sum of money. One day a few years back he came home to

CONTINUED ON PAGE 106

HOW AMERICA LIVES

Lipton Soup gives you FRESH HOME-COOKED FLAVOR

...wholesome, hearty nourishment in every bowl

Just dip your spoon into a steaming bowl of Lipton Soup—and you'll see. It has the wonderful slow-simmered taste and heartiness you expect only in home-cooked soup.

Lipton puts into their soups the kind of good ingredients you would use in homemade soup. So they're really nourishing the way you want soup to be.

Aren't you glad it's so easy to serve Lipton Soups? Try all 5 varieties!

Delicious, oldtime fill-'em-up soup—that's Lipton Chicken Noodle. Notice the rich chicken broth, the nourishing egg noodles. So tempting you'll want it often!

Wholesome garden vegetables like you'd pick yourself—in a savory beef-flavored broth. Lipton Beef Vegetable is a home-style treat your family will down with gusto!

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

CHICKEN NOODLE
GREEN PEA · ONION
TOMATO VEGETABLE
BEEF VEGETABLE

There's so much good in LIPTON SOUP MIXES

... body-building proteins, carbohydrates for energy, minerals and vitamins essential to good nutrition.

MRS. A. R. ALLURED, Chicago, says:

"On my doctor's advice I give only St. Joseph Aspirin For Children"

St. Joseph Aspirin For Children is approved by more doctors for pain and fever than any other medication for children. Mothers trust its accurate dosage. Children like its orange flavor. Buy the best for your child.

World's Largest Selling Aspirin For Children

"...for adult needs, I insist on St. Joseph Aspirin"

200 Tablets 79c • 100 Tablets 49c • 12 Tablets 12c

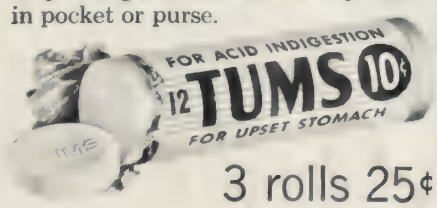
CORNS

also Calluses. Quick, easy, and economical. Just rub on. Invisible. Jars, 35¢, 60¢. At your druggist. Money refunded if not satisfied. Moss Co., Rochester, N. Y.

removed by MOSCO

Now Many Wear

FALSE TEETH



With More Comfort

FASTEETH, a pleasant alkaline (non-acid) powder, holds false teeth more firmly. To eat and talk in more comfort, just sprinkle a little FASTEETH on your plates. No gummy, gooey, pasty taste or feeling. Checks "plate odor" (denture breath). Get FASTEETH at drug counters everywhere.

HEART

burn?

During pregnancy, heartburn and acid indigestion are often a problem. Tums gives total relief from excess stomach acids in just 4 seconds—and they're high in calcium. Carry Tums in pocket or purse.

3 rolls 25¢

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 104

Priscilla with a check for $25,000. That was the year they made $36,000. Another year they lost $4000.

Whatever Paul makes (or doesn't make), the Rickers count on an outlay of $12,000 a year.

"Having a nice home, furnishing Paul a decent car and entertaining well," says Priscilla, "are vital to Paul's business. Entertaining is particularly important. We had been in our new house exactly four weeks when I counted up and realized we had not only had overnight guests three times during those weeks, but we had also had eighteen parties!"

The term "party" includes everything from one more person than Paul and Priscilla to twenty more persons than Paul and Priscilla. Yet the bold, cold statistics are that they had had better than half their evenings taken up with people in their home. A staggering figure even to them!

It isn't an artificial cultivation of people for purposes of "getting ahead." It's a matter of making friends and being with them because they like them. "Contacts will always be important," Paul says. "They are in any business. But when my livelihood depends on having people in my home simply for business reasons, I'll have to find some other way of making a living."

Still, entertaining is important and that's why the Rickers have their houseboat.

Guests looking at the bald prairie that stretches out beyond the Ricker house, and indeed for miles and miles around Midland, think they haven't heard quite right when Paul suggests a trip on a houseboat. Priscilla rescues them: "We keep it on the lake at San Angelo."

"We had been looking almost desperately," she says, "for a means of entertaining that would do away with things like football weekends in Dallas which had proved very expensive in the past. Also, we wanted something different. In a place where there are no rivers, no parks, no country cottages, entertaining can be quite a trick unless you belong to the country club, which we can't afford.

"The lake at San Angelo had been filling up in the last two or three years. Wouldn't it be fun to have a boat for parties over there!

"Then we saw it. Twenty-eight feet long and eight feet wide with its own little kitchen, plenty of storage space, sleeping accommodations for three (more if we had air mattresses) and, well, we couldn't resist. Especially when a lawyer friend of Paul's, Durward Goolesby, decided he'd like to go in on it and help us split the expense of buying it. For only $300 cash (to us) and our monthly payments of $70 we now have a way of entertaining that simply can't be beat." They have found that they can entertain some twenty guests on and off over a weekend when people either drift by in their own boats, or meet them there for a regular planned party, for about $50. "Once we're on the boat and have food, all the entertainment is free. We make our own music, our own fun."

It's 112 miles over there but so far nobody has objected. No genuine West Texan thinks anything of driving 250 miles for a real outing.

Priscilla's only objection to the purchase was that she wanted a he[illegible] a house*boat*.

"Ever since Mike came (our fourth baby) we had been terribly crowded. There was no place for the playpen in our small living-dining room. No area really large enough for comfortable eating when there were six places to be got around. Not only that, but we were tired of pouring money into houses that weren't ours. We had owned two previous ones, but had had to sell them in order to put the money back into Paul's business.

"We shopped around, but the down payments on anything big enough made the purchase impossible. I had given up in despair. Then one day Paul came home at noon.

"'Come on, Priscilla,' he said. 'I want to show you something.'

"I was wary. 'What?' I said.

"'Never mind. Come on.'

"I got in the car.

"'It's only a couple of Shetland ponies,' he said a few blocks later. 'I thought the kids would enjoy them.'

"'Shetland ponies!' I shrieked.

"'What's the matter, Priscilla?' Paul looked stern. 'Don't you like Shetland ponies?'"

Black looks and a brooding silence prevailed in answer to the question. Then they pulled up in front of a house.

"It was set on a hill. It was new. It was exactly the kind of house I would have built if I could have afforded to build it. It had a 'For Sale' sign on it. And there was nothing that said anything about Shetland ponies.

"Stunned, I turned to Paul.

"'It's yours,' he said, 'if you like it.'"

Like it? It was a dream! She walked through the four bedrooms, three bathrooms, living room and enormous den-kitchen-dining room. She touched the handsome cabinetwork, tapped a toe on the quarry-tile floor. It was everything she'd ever wanted.

It didn't come in the end, however, without her own personal measure of sacrifice. Paul had, as oil luck would have it, made some extra money, but not quite enough for the cash down payment. Priscilla's station wagon had to be signed over in the trade. Still, the house was—always had been—the most important thing and she hasn't regretted the choice. When Paul is in town she has the use of his '56 Chevrolet for shopping, trips to the doctor, her turn in the school car pool, the ride to church (she has a Sunday-school class of three-to-four-year-olds), and her own activities. So the family isn't entirely afoot.

They bought no new furniture, but they did buy one new appliance. It is a handsome combination washer-dryer and it stands in the small utility room which adjoins the kitchen. It is here that the Bryn Mawr diploma has come to rest.

She can't give you a "why." "I don't really know. It just seems right there somehow. Heaven knows I see it oftener there than I would anywhere else! And then, too, it reminds me of what my mother said to a stricken friend of hers when the friend heard I was getting married. 'Oh, Geraldine,' the friend gasped, 'all that expensive education wasted!'

"'At least,' my mother replied coolly, 'it provided her with the good sense to choose the right man.'"

Priscilla's high-school grades were the highest in her class, and she graduated cum laude from Bryn Mawr. She was offered a scholarship in Latin from another college, but chose Bryn Mawr because its scholastic standards were higher. Fortunately, she also got a scholarship there, for the student body includes girls from many of America's richest families. She wore $16 evening dresses to parties where other girls sported Hattie Carnegie creations. Her father was (and is) a Baltimore lawyer. Respected, comfortable, but not rich.

Though in his earliest childhood Paul's family had had a great deal of money, Paul was too young when it went to remember except dimly the five servants in the San Angelo house where he lived with his father, mother and sister, before his parents' divorce. He had spent the greater part of his life, therefore, living in modest circumstances, just as had Priscilla.

So their present standard of living is carefully calculated. Priscilla says, "We live on hamburger, but we have a maid to fix it."

They estimate a $12,000-a-year budget. When times are bad and business slow, the $1000 a month may have to be whacked down to about $700. At such times they are unable to have Molly three days a week, to send Jennifer to kindergarten, to buy clothes, or to save anything at all.

When things loosen up they make up for lost time by saving everything over $1000 a month in order to provide for taxes and emergency business expenses plus an occasional luxury item. As a result of such a fluctuating income, the Rickers quite often operate on a dual budget, one labeled "Dismal" and one labeled "Fat," and they have learned to jump from one to the other as nimbly as acrobats.

They keep a diary with an almost religious fervor, add it up every December.

"Twenty cents—coffee for Bob and me; a dollar seventy-five—typewriter ribbon; fifty cents—stamps; twenty dollars—map for Scurry County. All down to the last penny," Priscilla groans. "But it's good business."

Two items loom conspicuously large on their budget for actual living expenses: house payments and allied costs, $200. "A lot, but it gives us a place to entertain," the Rickers conclude. And $100 per month in maid and baby-sitting charges. Molly comes three days out of each week, sometimes baby-sits at night or on weekends when Paul and Priscilla are at the lake. They feel the youngsters are still too small to risk the lake's sixty-foot depths.

This help, though admittedly not vital, is worth it, they feel, for several good reasons, the biggest one being simply that Molly "takes the load off." Priscilla can be ready to entertain on fifteen minutes' notice if she has to, which is likely in view of the fact that Paul may affably invite a whole family to stay to dinner on the spur of the moment.

"Also," says Priscilla, "like most men who are in business for themselves, Paul worries a lot. Will it be feast or famine? He depends on me to stay on an even keel. This isn't the job it might be if I were worn and harassed by a flurry of ironing, child tending and scrubbing.

HOW THE RICKERS SPEND THEIR MONEY EACH MONTH

They count on $12,000 a year. In good times they operate on a "Fat" budget of $1000 a month, with money to spare beyond that for taxes. In bad periods they cut down to a "Dismal" budget.

DISMAL		FAT
Business:		Business:
Office	$ 75	Office	$ 75
Telephone	120	Telephone	120
Car expense	50	Car expense	50
Boat	70	Boat	70
Elks' Club dues	5	Elks' Club dues	5
Entertaining	very little	Savings—for taxes and emergency business	120
		Entertaining	as much as we can
Household:		Household:
House payments	200	House payments	200
Utilities	35	Utilities	35
Insurance	10	Insurance	10
*Groceries and milk	100	Groceries and milk	150
Maid and baby-sitting	32	Maid and baby-sitting	100
Doctor	10	Doctor	10
Dry cleaning	2	Dry cleaning, laundry	11
Church	5	Church	5
		Clothes	20
		Kindergarten	18
Total	$714	Total	$999

*Supplemented by canned and frozen foods bought and stored in "fat" times.

can keep the children away from him in the evenings until he has had a chance to unwind, and I really enjoy telling him the funny little things that have happened during the day. Molly is a luxury, yes. And we think of her that way. When we must retrench in order to get by, I will take over as I have done in the past."

In direct contrast to these two bulging items is the one labeled "groceries."

"I'm stingier than anybody I know. I buy margarine. I buy eggs and cheese at the store because they're cheaper there than from the milkman. I try to shop very carefully, and do my food planning to avoid waste. I'm not always successful, but, gee, I try."

Clothing, too, is a small budget item, although Priscilla owns some expensive suits and cocktail dresses. These she buys on rare splurges, for partying or travel. "I don't buy anything until I have to have it, and then I try to be sure. If my clothes turn out to be poor choices, that's just too bad, because I must make them last four or five years." Fortunately, too, both Mrs. Ricker and Mrs. Gross provide the children and Priscilla with some clothing.

There is rarely any money left for any long-range plans to get ahead. "Our daily living expenses come from my lease work," says Paul, "but if I ever make any real money it will come by investing in royalty purchases. What I've always wanted to do is form a small company for purchasing wildcat royalty and small leases. Even a man with only a few thousand dollars to invest stands a chance of making real money if he can afford to let go of it long enough to put it to work for him. When I hear about a deal that really looks good, I take whatever backlog we have been able to collect and put it into the project in the hope it will pay off. But most of the time I have to let such deals go by. We have the children to think of first."

Patti, the leader and the eldest of the Ricker brood, is a stemmy six-year-old. She, of all the children, is the only one who faintly resembles Priscilla. She has the oval face, the keen brown eyes. And lashes she must have stolen from a colt. They are black and soft and completely lovely.

Jenni, her sister's five-year-old cohort and constant supporter in any enterprise, is her father's daughter. Blond, blue-eyed with his Bob Hope-ish nose and her own charming touch of shyness.

Bill, four, blue-eyed and brunet, is a stunner who knows how to twist everyone—young, old and in between—around his little finger.

Mike, the baby, is still a grinning, burping unknown quantity at age six months—"but oh, so good!"

That might be said for all the Ricker children. Priscilla and Paul are both strict disciplinarians and they believe it is most important for their disciplinary measures to jibe. "Nothing is more confusing to a child than to be told one thing by one parent and another thing by the other. We agree beforehand how a particular situation is to be handled and we stick to it. No fence walking for us. Paul's parents, although divorced, were amazingly consistent in their children's discipline and Paul and I are trying to follow their example in this respect."

In so far as methods are concerned, Priscilla considers herself one of those belonging to the old-fashioned school. The one in which children were seen and not heard. "I can honestly say I never had a crying baby. They just seemed to sense it wouldn't do them any good." Now that they are older, the same approach is adhered to. The newest rule at the Ricker house is that there is to be no aimless child chatter at the dinner table. "If the children have something to say that adds to the conversation, fine. If it's nothing but nonsense—and believe me, they know the difference!—they're not allowed to open their mouths except to shovel the food in."

They are also allotted simple household duties. Bill helps clear dishes from the table after every meal. Patti crumbs it behind him and Jenni swabs after her with a damp cloth at strayed globs of peanut butter.

In the financial department, they are given a small weekly allowance of twenty-five cents. A nickel for saving, a nickel for Sunday school, a nickel for gum, and ten cents to squander. With this the children purchase their own toys. "We seldom buy them any except at Christmas. Children should learn to be creative enough to devise their own methods of play."

Perhaps because of their mother's insistence on such inner personality development, perhaps because it is inherent in them, the older three live in a world made up almost entirely of make-believe. Witness Peedie and Sheedie, two playmates who have been around the house for about a year now. A friend, wondering at the constant reference to the two, wants to know if the girls are talking about their dolls.

The Haraydas, of North Brunswick, N.J.

A California trip for the kids . . .
Time to write a novel . . .
Kitchen paneling . . .
Wall-to-wall carpeting . . .

Marel and Johnnie have countless ideas, only $4500 a year to make them come true.

HOW AMERICA LIVES

MORE DREAMS THAN MONEY

By BETTY HANNAH HOFFMAN

IN THE FEBRUARY JOURNAL

"Dolls!" Patti is shocked. "Oh, no. Peedie and Sheedie are the smart babies."

"Smart babies?"

"Yes. They live inside me." She comes close and looks up out of the brown eyes with the superb lashes. "They live inside me and inside Jenni. But"—she casts a baleful glance at her brother—"we're not going to let them get inside Bill!"

Bill looks disdainful, pretends not to hear, and whacks a small rubber doll named Jeanette.

"The smart babies," Patti declares, disregarding his antics, "are small. About as little as a little finger." She demonstrates. "But strong. So strong they can hold up the world. And it's not magic. They're just strong." Her eyes widen. "Sometimes they put on their 'miserables' and get invisible and then they catch giants and nail their feet to the floor. The giants say, 'Fee fi fo fum—ouch!'"

The visitor is entranced.

"You know flies?" Patti continues in a half whisper.

"Flies?"

"Yes. The kind that come in from outside. Well, they're really the smart babies. All dressed up in fly costumes," she finishes in hollow tones. ("It does make it hard," Priscilla says. "Swat a fly and I've killed a smart baby!")

The entire time this performance is taking place, Jenni sits on the edge of the bed, a myriad of expressions flitting over her small face. From time to time she presses a hand to her mouth in a delighted giggle, or her toes curl when something is said that is almost too much fun to bear. But she doesn't say a word. Jenni, whose idea the whole thing was in the first place.

"Don't let her fool you," Priscilla says. "She's the quiet type, but she's the really creative one. Patti is the interpreter. The actress."

As if to verify these words the children, who have been talking among themselves, suddenly race around getting Patti ready to bop. Almost immediately she is draped in an old knit shawl which she uses for a skirt, and red leather house shoes somewhat the worse for wear. A few minutes later she is moving in perfect Elvis Presley rhythm to the moan and groan of Hound Dog, which Bill has thoughtfully set in motion on the record player. This accomplished, he quickly whips out a pistol from one of the two enormous holsters which sag at his small waist, dispatches both Patti and Jenni to eternity, and gallops away.

Priscilla says, "I want my children to be themselves, not copying everybody else. I don't want them to grow up saying, 'My mother greases the skin of baking potatoes first, so I do.' It will be wonderful if they don't."

All the Rickers are individualists.

Paul is proud of Priscilla and her diploma, but he isn't shattered by the lack of one of his own. "It would be fine," he says, "if I had one to hang up beside Priscilla's. (Maybe she'd give me the space over the refrigerator.) But I have the profoundest convictions about kids and college. Far too many of them are going these days whether they are suited for it or not. There is a 'college snobbery' in our present-day society and it's always seemed silly to me. Say a guy can run a real fine barbecue stand. Make himself a good living. What do his folks do? They pry him loose from the catchup bottle and ship him off to college. What's the matter with barbecue, for Pete's sake?

"I went for a year and a half and I'm glad I had that much, but it has never been one of the sorrows of my life that I didn't finish. I was one of those fellows that learned what they liked and left the rest of the stuff pretty much alone. My freshman year, for instance, I made a B plus in business law, by reputation one of the toughest courses on the freshman roster. But I busted horticulture. I am," he says tonelessly, "one of the few people in the history of Texas A. & M. who have busted horticulture. So you see I wasn't really the college type.

"It's my earnest belief that if all children were required—I said required, you understand—to lay out of school from one to two years after they finish high school, not half so many 'misfits' would go, and those that did go would get about twelve times as much out of it. A boy or girl that young simply doesn't know what he or she wants or what is best for them. They just go and as a result the colleges graduate an awful lot of people who never had any business going in the first place."

"I think ——" Priscilla breaks in gently.

"I'm not through. What's even worse, in these days of widespread prosperity, many parents hand their children their lives on a silver platter, and by so doing cheat them out of the greatest thing there is: the feeling that they have succeeded through their own efforts. Real self-confidence comes from doing things unassisted. I hear people say, 'If I have anything to do with it, my children aren't going to have to work the way I did'—which is ridiculous. If those people would just stop and think, they'd realize the only thing that made life worth living and success worth having was the work that went into it. My father is a great believer in this."

"Paul ——"

"Just a minute, Priscilla. Like I say, my father believes this, so do I, and my children are going to learn it. Even if I'm sloughing around in money hip-deep by the time my boys are teen-agers—well, let's say especially if I'm sloughing around in money hip-deep when my boys are teen-agers—I'm going to take them out Phoenix way one day and I'm going to drop them off and say, 'See you fellows in about six months.' And when I drive away I'm not leaving them with any more in their pockets than was there when I stopped the car. The girls? The girls may be harder because you have to protect them, I guess, but this much I know: they're not going to complain to the cook about the biscuits unless they know how to make decent biscuits themselves.

"If that sounds tough, I'm sorry, but my children are going to learn independence. The American people are losing their individuality by wanting everything guaranteed them. They've forgotten to simply ask for a chance." A pause. "All right, Priscilla. What was it you wanted to say?"

"Nothing, honey," she sighs. "You've already said it." END

THE PEERAGE GAME

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 46

giving every evidence of having a perfectly splendid time. Houses that are lived in have a much warmer, more informal atmosphere than those preserved by the government or the National Trust as museums, full of "Do Not Touch" signs and rope barriers. Some flower beds and owners were flattened, but the gate money surpassed all expectations: $2000 here, $2400 there. When the first shock had worn off it did not take long for the owners to realize that curiosity, not culture, draws the average tourist, who willingly skips all the Gainsboroughs and Lawrences for one glimpse of m'lady's bedroom. Overnight a new industry was born. The word went round and the race was on.

Leading the Stately Homes Stakes at the moment is the thirteenth Duke of Bedford, Marquess of Tavistock, Earl of Bedford, Baron Russell of Thornhaugh and Baron Howland, whose family have lived at Woburn Abbey for four centuries. The present owner is affectionately dubbed "The Duke of Juke" by the grateful British press, for whom he has provided an endless stream of sensational copy.

When Bedford, whose family motto is suitably "What will be, will be," opened up vast Woburn Abbey, he innocently expected that the public would come to see his unique collection of rare animals—including a herd of American buffalo—in the seven-mile zoopark.

That was in his freshman year.

Today, visitors who look forward to a quiet afternoon browsing among Woburn's antiquities are in for a rude surprise. For when Bedford caught on to the fact that gimmicks were needed to "sell" his ancestral home to the public, gimmicks were provided—in quantity. As a result, Woburn now offers milk bars and self-service cafeterias; a trained staff looks after children in a special amusement park; local coach companies are "tied in"; parking is free and well organized. On a recent peak day 13,000 persons roamed through Woburn.

The duke, whose name is John Robert Russell, is full of miscellaneous information concerning his distinguished forebears. His irreverent commentary on their portraits has been quoted in newspapers: "That white-bearded fellow is the first Earl of Bedford—he was a kind of high-class smuggler. . . . That's the second earl, supposed to be the ugliest man in Europe. . . . There's my old great-aunt, who used to talk to herself. When the family came for a weekend visit, she'd say, 'Thank God, another four days and they'll be gone!' . . . That's my grandmother; learned to fly at sixty-one, set the record to the Cape and to India."

When rock 'n' roll hit Britain, the duke drew local teen-agers by installing jukeboxes to relay the voice of Elvis Presley through the marble halls. Last year he and the pretty duchess cornered the older age-group by personally selling post cards and guidebooks in the hall. And this year the Bedfords are piling Pelion on Ossa, for they have hired a flock of glamorous starlets as guides, and a convention of nudists will share a secluded corner of the Great Park with the zoo.

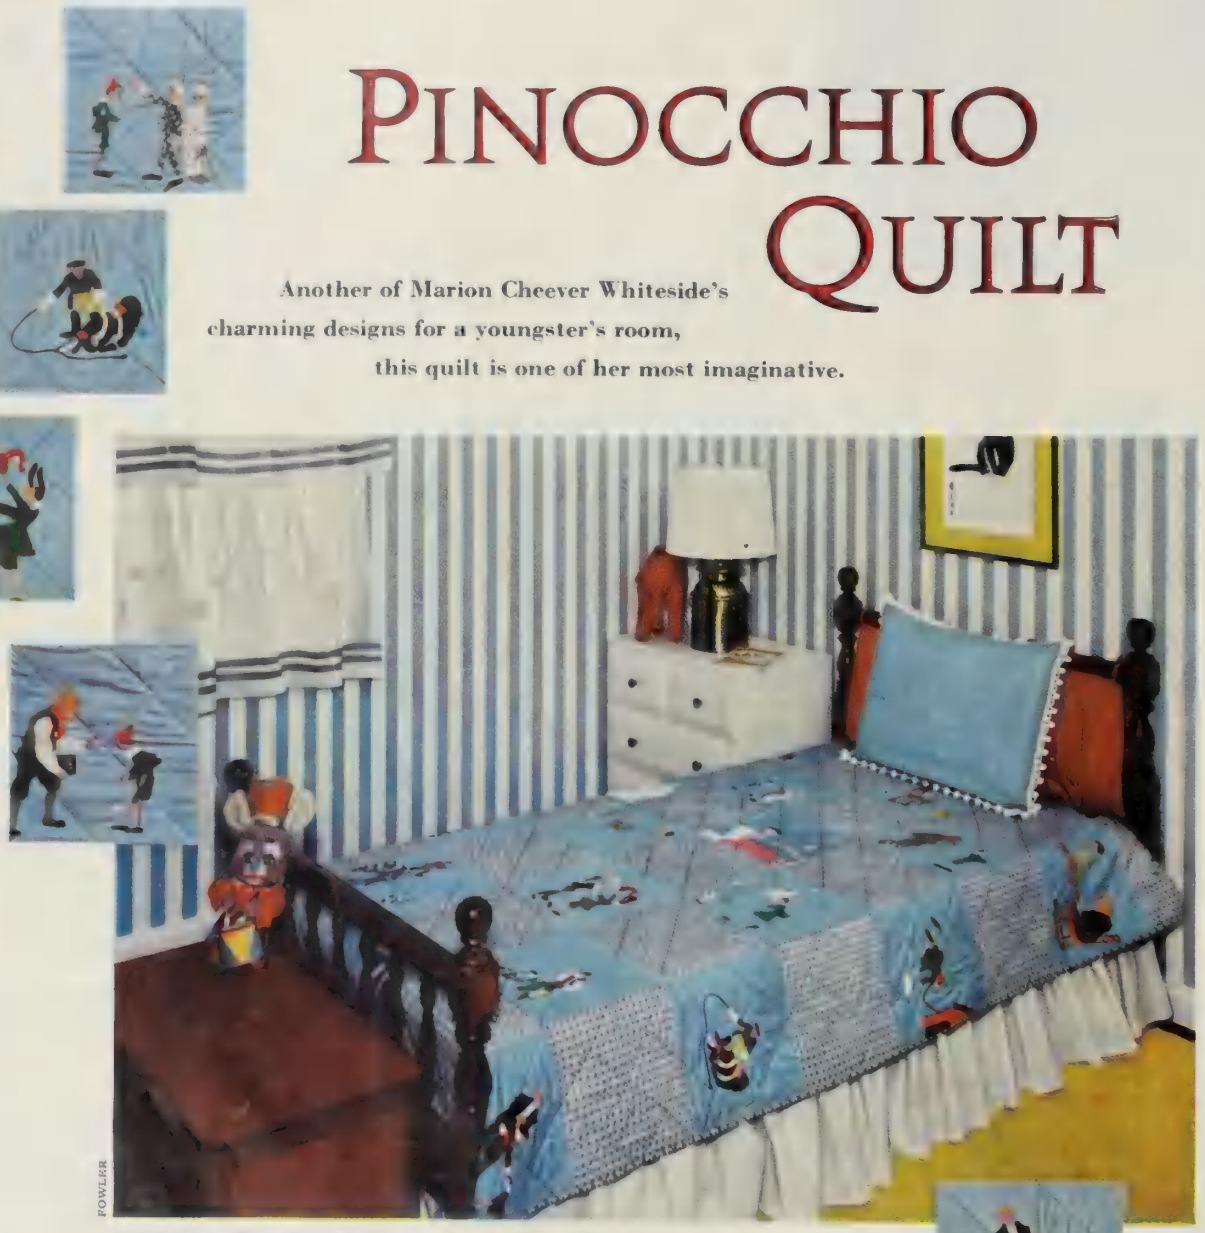
"Anything is better than Elvis Presley," said the duchess, when questioned on this startling new attraction.

The Duke of Bedford is by no means the only peer-turned-huckster. Many of his colleagues have also rolled up their ermine sleeves and plunged into the fray.

Beaulieu Abbey, in Hampshire, originally a Cistercian monastery founded in 1204, caters to the current veteran-car craze by offering a superb car-and-motorcycle museum to young people who would not walk a step to see the abbey ruins. Where the monks once chanted, and Ethelred the Unready rested from hunting in the nearby New Forest, the air is now thick with technical jargon about magnetos, side spins and speed sways. Last year a series of open-air jazz concerts shattered the quiet of a thousand years; this year the owner, Lord Montagu, plans a three-day Newport-style jazz festival. Like the Duke of Bedford, he uses every conceivable publicity gimmick to bring his home to public attention, including a press agent who holds news conferences at the beginning of each summer season.

Even the surrounding countryside, which Montagu owns as Lord of the Manor Rolls, has been pressed into service. The old shipyards where men-o'-war were built for Nelson's fleet have been ruthlessly restored to their original state, and the village of Buckler's Hard has been "Williamsburged" to within an inch of its life, with hollyhocks nodding against leaded windows, and apple-cheeked old women bobbing curtsies in all directions. Squeezing the last drop of income from the estate, his Lordship even went so far as to convert his home, Palace House, into apartments, which were instantly snapped up by local residents eager to share a peer's address.

For members of the peerage who are not so happily at home in the headlines, adjustment to this new way of life has offered many new problems. They have to endure the constant gibes of the press, who find their plight excruciatingly funny. Caricatures of peers in ermined robes holding out their caps for largess have immense appeal. The fact that the money collected is not for personal use but a gallant effort to repoint chimneys, repair roofs and preserve what is left of England's heritage is conveniently overlooked in the irresistible joke of Nobles on the Dole.



It is easy to understand why they might not like it. It must be rather trying to come home after a grueling week in Town to find your garden full of perfect strangers who have a perfect right to be there. But, as a nursemaid at one of the Stately Homes remarked when it burst into flames, "It certainly makes a change!"

Lord Salisbury, distinguished head of the House of Cecil, has kept up his family's home, Hatfield House, as well as the family reputation for brilliance and political influence. Robert Cecil, the first Earl of Salisbury, had been Queen Elizabeth's secretary of state and tradition says he built Hatfield House, in 1611, in the shape of an E as a graceful tribute to Elizabeth. Aside from minor alterations, it is much the same today with its galleries and state rooms, its elaborate gardens with their

CONTINUED ON PAGE 110

PINOCCHIO QUILT

Another of Marion Cheever Whiteside's charming designs for a youngster's room, this quilt is one of her most imaginative.

FOWLER

Quilt is set off against a wide-striped washable wallpaper and brilliant yellow cotton rug. Dust ruffle with the look of pleats is on a stretch band, fits almost any size bed, needs no ironing.

The color scheme for a child's room is inspired by bright colors of a quilt featuring some of that colorful character Pinocchio's adventures. The making of this quilt should be especially rewarding for anyone who likes experimenting and inventing. You really make your own pictures in choosing just the right scrap of material for Pinocchio's hat or the donkey's saddle, or old Geppetto's jacket. Such a quilt delights the child who knows the story. And of course the whole scheme can be changed to fit in with your child's bedroom by picking backgrounds to go with what you already have.

By CYNTHIA McADOO WHEATLAND
Interior Decoration Editor

Order PINOCCHIO QUILT, No. 2913, from the Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania. Send 35c for the pattern. Pennsylvania residents please add sales tax.

When you can't take time out...take BUFFERIN®

BUFFERIN acts twice as fast as aspirin to relieve pain

Won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does

1. Medical science knows that a pain reliever must get into the blood stream to relieve pain.

2. Bufferin combines aspirin with two antacid ingredients. These speed the pain reliever out of the stomach and into the blood stream twice as fast as aspirin. So . . .

3. Bufferin acts twice as fast as aspirin to relieve pain. And it won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does.

When pain makes you feel that you can't possibly go on, remember this:

Bufferin acts twice as fast as aspirin . . . to relieve headaches, painful cold miseries, muscular pains and other discomforts. (Diagram, left, shows why.)

What's more, Bufferin won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does. You can even take it in the large, continuous doses often needed for temporary relief of minor arthritic pain with no ill effects.

Ask your physician about faster, safer Bufferin for your aches and pains. Many doctors recommend it.

If you suffer from the pain of arthritis or rheumatism, ask your physician about Bufferin.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 108

pleached walks and vineyards, and the gardens where Pepys walked and marveled at the size of the gooseberries, "As big as nutmegs!" A great deal of the house was astonishingly open to the weather—the carved gates at the foot of the staircases were not to keep the children in but to keep the hounds from hunting in the state rooms. And it must have been perishingly cold.

Queen Elizabeth I spent considerable time at Hatfield. On display are letters written in her own hand, which have a signature remarkably like that of the present Elizabeth. The early Elizabeth seems to have been a poor packer, for she left behind her a pair of snappy silk stockings with frills on top, a pair of yellow gloves, and a garden hat which could be worn today without exciting comment. All these forgotten trifles may be seen in a glass case in the Long Gallery. There is the cradle King Charles slept in, and the little stool his mother used when she nursed him. There are the letters and seals of long-dead kings and queens. Banners of old and forgotten wars hang moldering in the great hall, above the armor of long-dead knights.

In contrast to the grandeur of these royal mementos, souvenirs are for sale in the old kitchen below—leather matchboxes and hairpin cases with the Salisbury coat of arms, reproductions of the portraits in the rooms upstairs. No means of turning an honest penny is neglected.

In most of the homes open to the public, the whole family pitches in to launch the tourist season. When the Earl of Leicester (motto: "He is prudent who is patient") opened Holkham Hall, one daughter, Lady Anne, sold teas; another, Lady Elizabeth, sold souvenirs; the earl himself was on the gate, while his countess did a roaring trade in Holkham Studio pottery, a local craft which the Leicesters revived. The historic halls resounded with the tramp of tourists' feet and the jingle of the cash register; it was all as merry as a marriage bell, and the nationwide publicity kept the turnstiles spinning like clockwork.

The attractions offered as "come-ons" differ among the various Stately Homes, but all are effective. Several peers and peeresses have displayed their coronation robes and jewels on dummies; and there have even been rumors that certain peers have allowed themselves to be glimpsed by wide-eyed tourists strolling casually about the storied halls complete in coronation robes and coronet. These rumors, however, are denied.

An association of owners of historic homes has been organized, with Sir Harold Wernher, owner of Luton Hoo, as the founder. Members call themselves the "Trades Union," and agree on various general rules of procedure, such as the admission price—now generally standard at two shillings and sixpence (35 cents). And heaven help the unwise peer who tries to top it. There was a good deal of aristocratic giggling when the Duke of Marlborough's "Connoisseurs' Day," at 70 cents admission, was a flop. However, the Marlboroughs have now come into line; this season their home, Blenheim Palace, birthplace of Sir Winston Churchill, offers American-style sodas and milk shakes. The duke caused another small flurry when he complained of vandalism at Blenheim. But other peers quickly rallied to the defense of the "extraordinary good manners and neatness" of their visitors.

Recently there have been ominous signs of that postwar invention, the price war, for some newcomers to the game are undercutting the Trades Union by opening up at two shillings, or even one and sixpence. This is considered very non-U by the original pioneer peers.

Due to the low admission prices, incomes from the Stately Homes are enormous, but upkeep is also high, and in most cases gross profits are still at break-even level. Lord Warwick remarked at a meeting of the owners that "receipts just cover costs." Exact figures are jealously guarded, but Chatsworth, home of the Duke of Devonshire, was rumored to have taken in over £260,000 in the last year. However, the rumor also added that it cost the Devonshires an estimated £250,000 to keep the house in repair and the grounds in order. A house like Chatsworth—if such a fairy-tale palace can be described as a house—has endless liabilities. Behind the shimmering lakes, the landscaped gardens and the classical façade an intricate network of machinery has to be kept in repair. The roof alone will have several acres of lead and tiles to keep in watertight condition. Delicate stone balustrades have to be mended; ornamental canals cleared of weeds; fountains repaired; temples, follies and grottoes kept up; to say nothing of the skilled cleaning of priceless two-hundred-year-old brocades, Savonnerie carpets and gilt boiseries. The wage bill is also huge—when help can be found. It is not unusual for a Stately Home to need twelve gardeners, two full-time estate carpenters, five or six gamekeepers, and an army of cleaning women from the village. With the perpetual shortage of servants, getting them is quite another matter. And no one can afford the full staffs these big houses demand. When these liabilities have been met there is always the tax man from the Inland Revenue waiting for his cut.

The physical complications of running such a palace under modern conditions are enormous, especially in view of the shortage of help. A British woman who has visited as a guest in some of these homes says, "The peeresses who run these houses are often as skilled in the household arts as any pioneer woman. Many of them are combinations of cook, gardener, sempstress, housemaid, florist and house painter, and have learned to turn their hand to any other job which needs doing. I remember a peer with a big, unwieldy house who married a charming girl from a small suburban home. A cousin shook her head and said, 'I wish he had married a poor duke's daughter,' implying that a girl brought up in a big house on a small income would know how to make one shilling do the work of two. Another aspect of the case is that most Stately Homes are so dreadfully uncomfortable that only those who love them or who are used to living in drafty magnificence can bear it. One beautiful William and Mary period house I know, which has about thirty-five bedrooms, has an 1880 heating system which provides exactly two hot baths a night—and then only when there are house guests—because the owners can no longer afford (or obtain) six tons of coal a week to feed it!"

It is hardly surprising that competition among the Trades Union is stiff, and that their unofficial rating system means as much to them as Trendex does to N.B.C. At the last count the Big Nine came out in this order:

1. Chatsworth (Duke of Devonshire)
2. Woburn Abbey (Duke of Bedford)
3. Blenheim Palace (Duke of Marlborough)
4. Warwick Castle (Earl of Warwick)
5. Longleat House (Marquess of Bath)
6. Hatfield House (Marquess of Salisbury)
7. Beaulieu Abbey (Lord Montagu of Beaulieu)
8. Penshurst Place (Lord de l'Isle and Dudley)
9. Wilton House (Earl of Pembroke)

As one might expect, many of the Statelies are registered as limited companies. Apart from the gate and souvenir money, additional revenue is obtained from the farm produce and game. Since it is not unusual for a good day's shooting to yield 400 brace of pheasants during the season, a brisk trade is done with the local stores, or with markets in London. Whereas formerly the bearer of some illustrious title would visit Fortnum and Mason (London's most exclusive grocer) only to buy caviar and pâté de foie gras, he will now be found shrewdly haggling with the flower or game buyer. Constance Spry's Mayfair store is almost entirely supplied from upper-class greenhouses, and the proud gentleman-gardeners can be heard any day of the week boasting of their sales of gladioli or peonies as they sip their vintage port at Boodles or Whites. At audit time figures are carefully juggled in the estate offices of England.

"You can't really blame us," said a viscount recently. "Now if we were Austrian, the government would pay us to live in our historic homes," he added wistfully.

The Trades Union and the British Travel Association naturally work hand in glove with each other, for Britain has recognized that her Stately Homes are major tourist draws, especially for Anglophile Americans. Americans form a major part of the total influx and they are very welcome visitors. Says one host, "The Americans come far better prepared as to historical and artistic background than the average Briton, who is notoriously indifferent to his history. The American who goes abroad usually does some serious study in advance, often with a view to visiting a place which had some special historical connection with his country or his family."

Great excitement can be created in any sleepy rural hamlet by the arrival of the B.T.A. photographers, for the villagers, apart from loyalty to their titled landlords, are also smart enough to realize that next season's bread and butter may depend upon an American ad. The local pub rises to the occasion with a tempting culinary display that native Englishmen pine for but seldom see except in a color spread in some U.S. publication; TV aerials are removed from gabled roofs; cars and motorcycles are whisked out of sight and replaced with well-groomed cart horses; and the Oldest Inhabitants are hustled out of bed and into camera.

The tourist trade has also done more to revive local arts, crafts and customs than anything else since the war. Long-forgotten morris dances and rustic festivals are resurrected by experts from London, and slightly bewildered but willing villagers find themselves bowling cheeses downhill, or hopping sheepishly about the market square in ribbons and masks while the Leicas click and the movie cameras whir. At the end of the day, of course, the Lord of the Manor and his Lady pose on the battlements with all the assurance of veteran stars.

Weekending in the private wing of a Stately Home is likely to shatter your preconceived ideas of aristocratic life.

You will be lucky if you see your host and hostess, except when they dart in to snatch a sandwich in the kitchen, for from dawn to dusk they are conducting tourist parties, manning the tea urn, or walking about the gardens to give the sight-seers their money's worth.

"There they are, Elsie. Got your camera, duck?"

Meanwhile you and the other house guests are pressed firmly into service to head nosy tourists off from the private rooms, or to prevent "shoplifting" of snuffboxes and other small objets d'art from the public apartments. In your spare time you may of course get a quick look at the Sunday papers, but you will have to do so on the floor behind the drawing-room sofa, unless you are sufficiently hard-boiled to ignore the plebeian eyes peering in at the windows. At the end of a grueling day, when you begin to think longingly of cold drinks, everyone rushes to the cash register. "How did we do?"

As you leave on Monday morning the last sound in your ears will be the roar of the vacuum cleaners as they prepare for next week's onslaught.

So much for the Stately Homes. What of the "Suburban Peers," as their luckier colleagues rather unkindly call those who have sold the ancestral homes long ago, and

NEXT MONTH

HOW TO TAKE CARE OF LITTLE CHILDREN AND REMAIN A HUMAN BEING

Dr. Benjamin Spock considers some of the problems of mothers—isolation from adult companionship, fun and stimulation. He says it wasn't always so and calls for "a bold new experiment."

WHAT DO YOU SAY WHEN YOU BREAK A DISH?

Can you take a social emergency in stride, turn embarrassment into ease for everyone around you? Dawn Crowell Norman tells how to rate yourself—and others—for tactfulness and how you can develop it. "Keep Your Beauty in Tact."

THE WHOLE TOWN WHISPERED ABOUT THE SECOND MRS. STANLEY KING

. . . so young, with her golden-tanned beauty and exquisite figure, and so scandalously neglected by her celebrated husband. Beth, Stanley King's new secretary, agreed with them until the first of the accidents. "The Troubled House" is a new novel of emotional conflict and tensions simmering to explosion. By C. Kage Booton, condensed and complete in this issue.

"MY HUSBAND NEEDS A JOB WITH MORE PAY"

He is a schoolteacher. She used to run a shop, but—with three children and a home to care for—she wrote, "I'm only 30 and keep asking myself, Will I ever see 40?" Marel and Johnnie Harayda, of North Brunswick, N.J., are living the pros and cons of career vs. home for a wife. Next installment of "How America Lives."

TWENTY-SIX WAYS TO COOK AN EGG

The basic recipe, as the French do it, for a puffy omelet and then the sauces and seasonings that make it a breakfast treat, a luncheon or supper party dish—or a dessert. Also the way to prepare the very best scrambled eggs. They're all in "Collector's Items."

"WE WENT TO CAROL'S APARTMENT . . . YOU CAN PROBABLY FILL IN THE REST"

Tod, married five years, asked Julie to divorce him (they have three sons) because the "irregular relationship" was unfair to the other woman, eight years older and a business associate. Julie persuaded him to talk to the marriage counselor. "Can This Marriage be Saved?"

Also eight pages of fashion news and photographs in full color, menus and recipes for a Church Supper, news and advice for the gardener and many more practical helps for homemakers, all coming now live in London, or in small country houses?

IN THE FEBRUARY JOURNAL

There are several choices open to them, but advertising endorsements are the easiest and most profitable prop to these failing family fortunes. In Britain, a title's glamour far outshines that of the most famous movie star. (Even the exceptions prove this rule; Sir Laurence Olivier moves more merchandise than Miss Diana Dors.)

As one might expect, peers and peeresses usually endorse the social commodities: liquor, tea, wines, coffee, cosmetics and furniture. A famous cold cream used to base its entire campaign on photographs of pretty peeresses, but the supply eventually ran out—to the off-the-record relief of the executives who handled the campaign. It seems that far from being difficult to persuade, peeresses of unsuitable age, shape and size besieged the reception room, clamoring to be included in the campaign.

Agencies pay on a sliding scale according to the endorser's rank in Debrett: £250 for a duchess, down to £50 for an honorable (younger son or daughter of a peer).

"We have to haggle with them," a harassed advertising executive claimed recently.

There is a definite snobbery in the choice of products to be endorsed. Recently an expensive brand of tea ran a successful campaign featuring some imposing marchionesses and viscountesses. It was noticed that the rival tea-bag campaign had had to be content with the ladies of mere barons and knights.

This sort of advertising is so effective that it is causing headaches for agency men in London. The problem is, with only a few hundred old titles to choose from (and of these the Old Guard are still resisting endorsements), admen are having to turn more and more to the relatives of titled people. However, "Cousin of Lord So-and-so" is quite enough to titillate the excitement of the British housewife, especially when the endorser is photographed in his or her own home, another of the new agency gimmicks. There are many eager applicants in this rich new field.

Television has created several titled stars in the last two or three years, and they are very much aware of their power. Last year the ratings of a popular BBC-TV panel show sagged when one of its brightest members, a titled lady, transferred to the higher-paid ITA-TV commercial network.

Lady Boyle, an Italian and a most beautiful one, is another popular TV star who used the panel show as her steppingstone to fame and fortune; she has recently made two motion pictures.

If these stars ever lose their popularity—and there is no reason why they should, for their success does not primarily depend on glamour—there are plenty of pretty peeresses ready to step into their shoes. This trend is an interesting switch on the not-so-distant days when actresses were scandalizing the old families by becoming peeresses.

Other members of the aristocracy use their titles to promote their various careers.

Deniza, Lady Newborough, is ■ Yugoslav who was formerly married to a peer. She has lived up to her former husband's family motto—"Gentle in manner, vigorous in action"—by painting her full title over her chic and successful hat shop in Mayfair; it is registered as "The Lady Newborough, Ltd." As ■ side line she has recently launched ■ new perfume called Denisa Number One.

"Jolly sexy, don't you think?" she asked, as she sprayed it lavishly around her salon. It was, jolly.

In contrast, some talented Englishwomen who have titles do not use them professionally. Some of the best known are Lady Browning (Daphne du Maurier), Lady Jones (Enid Bagnold), and Lady Cunynghame, a well-known actress under her maiden name, Pamela Stanley.

The eighth Baron Foley, pop pianist and composer, insists on being billed as Lord Foley. His major worry is how to make his title distinct from Duke Ellington and Count Basie.

The list is almost endless. The Viscountess Tarbat has set up the successful "Knightsbridge Academy of Social Graces," a charm school for fledgling debutantes. She charges 25 guineas for a three-week course.

Lord Kilbracken, as John Godley, the journalist, writes about royalty and his fellow peers. Since he is an honest writer, this is not always too popular with his colleagues, who claim that "The Professional Peer" often "lets the side down" by quoting them in print. There is much edging away from, or making up to, Lord Kilbracken at parties, depending upon whether the other guests want to get or avoid publicity.

And in the personal column of the staid London Times the following ad (and others like it) appears in the spring:

"PEERESS would like to chaperon debutante for the London season. Write Box No.: ----" A mother writes, a check changes hands, a debutante is launched.

The latest addition to the Peerage Game ranks is the Duke of Argyll, Earl of Argyll, Marquess of Kintyre and Lorne, Viscount Lochow and Glenisla, Earl Campbell, Baron Lorne, Baron Inverary, Mull, Morvern and Tiry, Baron Sundridge and Baron Hamilton. The owner of these resounding Scottish titles is endorsing Argyll socks.

But the latest report on the British aristocrats' successful struggle for survival in this mundane age has caused much nervous muttering in the titled ranks. For—horrors!—a commoner has stolen a march on his peers, and scooped the front pages of Britain's press with a brilliant publicity gimmick. Maj. Alexander Greaves Beattie (with never ■ title to his name), launching the opening of his home, Thoresby Hall in Sherwood Forest, hired Sabrina, chesty blond star of British TV (her measurements are the same as Jayne Mansfield's) to stay the night in his home, which gives him the right to use as his season's slogan "Sabrina Slept Here"—the most effective answer to Queen Elizabeth I anyone has thought of yet.

And so, when you visit England, and see the crested banners still floating defiantly over the battlements, you can reflect on this ironical addition to mid-twentieth-century philosophy:

Kind hearts may be all right for the rest of the world, but in Britain it is coronets that bring home the bacon! END

"Now your father has disappeared again. Go back and look for him among the pickles and potato chips."

Get the full treatment

See softer, smoother skin within 5 days . . . or money back

It's so rewarding to have radiantly lovely skin. And Cuticura gives it to you. For sensational results get the full treatment.

1. Get mild, superemollient Cuticura Soap for your daily lather-massage. No other soap contains its remarkable skin-softening, skin-smoothing ingredients that do so much, much more for you.

2. Get creamy Cuticura Ointment to use nightly, to soften and gently stimulate as it eliminates blackheads, helps relieve dryness and pimples.

3. Get greaseless, fast-acting Cuticura Medicated Liquid for daytime use on trouble spots. It cleanses antiseptically, removes excess oiliness, checks blemish-spreading bacteria, speeds healing, cools and refreshes. At leading drug counters.

Send 25¢ (no stamps) for trial treatment Good Looks kit. Write Cuticura, Dept. LH-81, Malden 48, Mass.

Available in Canada

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Cuticura

Wishing won't help your skin — Cuticura will!

TODAY IT COULD BE YOUR DAUGHTER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 43

considering marriage or the possibility that a baby may result. To salvage some self-respect, they set up a rather pitiful code of faithfulness for themselves while demanding nothing of the boys.

I am thinking of a sixteen-year-old over whose birth I presided, and whom I had treated for severe menstrual difficulties. She told me candidly that she had left school against her parents' wishes and had been living for six weeks with a boy of seventeen.

"Is he in love with you?"

"I think so, but I'm not sure."

"Are you using protection of any sort?"

"No, his religion forbids it."

"Does he intend to marry you?"

"I should certainly hope so! He's helping to pay for my car!"

We doctors know that World War II accentuated and accelerated the normal timetable of sex among teen-agers. Because of the emotional quality of the times, youthful marriages were accepted. The situation has not returned to normal. Perhaps today's teen-agers assume that if they get into trouble they can get married; what they do not realize is how often a forced marriage spoils the chance for a really happy union based on mutual love and respect.

Another aspect of the problem is poor home environment. Three out of five intrinsically decent teen-agers who make tragic mistakes come from families in which there is little affection. I learn, in strictest confidence, that they have failed to find at home the love which is their birthright. Adolescents need tender, sympathetic understanding. They must have an outlet for their thoughts and emotions, answers for their questions. If these benign influences are lacking, teen-agers are apt to fall into false relationships which seem to promise what they seek; to flee from a loveless home into confused, precocious romances.

In some teen-aged girls, the need for love takes the form of a passionate desire to have a baby. Love, marriage, the relationship with the father—all seem unimportant compared with the delight of showering love on an infant who will surely give back a love no one can take away! One of my young patients virtually seduced a pleasant though somewhat weak young man who was still in high school. She got a job, set up an apartment, bought a bassinet and baby clothes—and proceeded to get herself pregnant.

She was living in a dream world and it was quickly shattered. The boy's irate parents shipped him off to a private school. The girl had her baby bravely and alone. But she soon discovered that a girl not yet eighteen can hardly support and care for a baby. Her suffering at having to give up the child was eased somewhat by the realization that she had given great joy to the adoptive parents—she was that sort of girl. But it was a harrowing experience, I assure you.

Even worse than the homes characterized by lack of love and interest from parents too busy with their own affairs are those homes disrupted by bickering and fights, by drinking and other excesses. These things happen too often in the areas we think of as privileged. Children forced to live in such unpleasant surroundings are apt to drift away in distaste or disgust, seeking tranquillity elsewhere; thinking they can create a better milieu for themselves before they are mature enough to do so.

Sally was a sensitive girl of seventeen, whom I had delivered into what seemed a stable and harmonious family. But gradually that harmony turned to discord. To get away from the constant friction between her parents, Sally enrolled in a college in another city. There she did good work and made pleasant friends. When she had to quit college because of financial reasons, she got a job as waitress rather than return to her unhappy home. Deprived of her college friends, lonely and discouraged, she fell victim to the "love" line of one of the college Casanovas. As soon as the boy learned that she was pregnant, he threatened to produce witnesses to swear she had been intimate with several of his gang—although she decidedly had not. Here was a basically fine girl who had simply been subjected to too many pressures and obstacles.

Radio and television sets are poor substitutes for a real family life. This is particularly true when children are given carte blanche to all the "privileges" we grant teen-agers today: less supervision, more avenues to seclusion, more spending money, automobiles, liquor, beer and pep-pill parties. Must we not expect a breakdown in moral restraints? More precocious sex and sex excesses? More young lives in chaos?

In so far as the teen-agers themselves are to be held accountable when they get into difficulties with sex, who is more to blame, the girl or the boy? My sources are girls, and mostly girls in trouble, so I may be prejudiced. But I would say that in 80 per cent of the cases the boys are responsible. Of course there are designing young girls today, at ages which would amaze you; girls who have learned their unwholesome lessons well from the many sources available to them. I am told that certain groups of girls organize for the special purpose of making fools of boys. They deliberately build up a boy's libidinous expectations, then escape to expose him to the derision of the group.

VOLUNTEER NURSE

By JANE MERCHANT

She was a woman
Common as daylight.
She never asked
Were you "raised" or "reared."

To get her to help you
You'd just to need her.
She'd save your life
And she'd comb your beard.

The candlelight ladies
Spoke of her lightly—
Till the candles flickered
And she appeared.

But for every girl who enters such an episode mischievously for amusement, or shrewdly for personal gain, I believe there are twenty who are frightened and miserable. It is the continuing insistence, the relentless masculine pressure, which eventually overcomes the natural hesitation and unwillingness of the girl. In the end, it is the girl's feminine instinct to please that makes her yield.

There is also the natural desire of a young girl to be popular; a desire in many cases stimulated by mothers whose own egos demand that their daughters shall be much sought after. A number yield out of fear that they will be blackballed by the boys, will get no more dates or invitations, if they continue to deny sexual favors. One sixteen-year-old held out for eighteen months against the importunings of her boy friend. She gave in finally because she thought she would be dropped from her crowd if she didn't.

It is easy to get very indignant with many of today's young males—especially when one is a father of girls as well as a doctor. Unquestionably boys are much more aggressive sexually, much less inhibited than they used to be, at least toward "nice" girls. Too many boys regard sexual episodes as sport—trophies, you might say, of their masculine prowess. In my own college days there was none of this "scalps for boasting" attitude, and certainly none of the ruthless gang influence which often begins today at high-school and prep-school levels. I don't maintain that all the young men of my generation were saints; we did have, however, certain standards—a sort of discipline of good taste and controlled behavior.

Yet I must also reflect that boys of my generation were more firmly controlled by their parents. More had the benefit of love in the family background. There was less money for play, less opportunity to get off to secluded spots. Surely no one will deny that girls of my day had less freedom and were more carefully chaperoned; they were better disciplined, less independent, more "morally inclined" than girls of today. Perhaps from a Freudian standpoint, they were overly prim. But when it came to intimacies they held the upper hand, and as a rule they exercised it firmly.

I have talked many times with the boys who have got my patients in trouble, as well as with those who conduct themselves decently—there are many who do. Apparently the reckless boys pursue girls for sex alone in the same rebellious spirit which leads them to drive cars too fast. Such daring is admired within the gang. What concerns one most is their total disregard for consequences.

Yet, to be fair, we must admit that boys today are subjected to the same unhealthy pressures as are the girls. How can we fail to recognize the effect of our national preoccupation with sex upon the highly inflammable, easily aroused senses of the adolescent, especially the male adolescent? Kirkendall has recently verified Kinsey's conclusion that the sex drive is greatest in males during the teen years. To this normal drive is added the continuous erotic stimulation of the suggestive song, the torrid movie, the shocking magazine. We may blame these boys for their heedlessness; we must also acknowledge that they are victims of their surroundings.

And quite often these boys prove honorable when confronted with sex consequences. In my files are heartening stories of boys who have shouldered responsibility manfully, or at least have been willing to. Unfortunately, when a boy is still in high-school or early college years, there is usually little he can do. Too often, in addition, the boy's parents insist on "saving" him from the consequences of his act by damaging the character of a fifteen- or sixteen-year-old girl. Sometimes the boy himself, by the same method, tries to escape responsibility. In my experience, the new sex freedom granted our adolescents usually works out the same old way: the girl, with or without her parents' help, must see her ordeal through alone.

I am not condoning wrongdoing when I say that in cases like these, we physicians make very special efforts. These are very young girls I am speaking of. Even though they knew they were breaking a moral and religious law, few teen-age girls are aware of the grave and compelling reasons for the law—until they find themselves illicitly pregnant. Then the pregnancy is punishment enough. One objective must always be kept in sight—that the girl's life shall not be ruined; and that she shall emerge wiser, stronger, better able to cope with future temptations. Fortunately, more and more often the attitude of the girl's parents is one of sympathy and assistance. This is a good trend, although it does not make up for previous parental remissness.

The doctor's first task is skillfully to guide the girl, and often her parents as well, between Scylla and Charybdis: on the one hand the thought of seeking an abortion, in which of course a reputable physician can have no part; on the other, an incompatible forced marriage. To a confused, frightened girl and her equally confused and frightened parents, these alternatives often appear the only ones.

I believe, therefore, the public should know that when a girl bears her baby, even though it is impossible or inadvisable for her to marry its father, the results are not what one might suppose. In my thirty years of experience with unmarried girls who bore their babies, I have seen few lives ruined or permanently damaged; yet I can cite neuroses, suicides and frustrated later lives for those who elected criminal abortion, with its subsequent physical and spiritual penalties. It seems almost as though having the baby erases the bitterness, teaches a valuable lesson about life and its responsibilities.

It is true that the girl goes through another agonizing experience if she must give up her baby for adoption, as often seems to be best. This is in most cases the worst punishment of all. But the doctor can stress a philosophy of compensation. The young mother can be shown that to bring into the world a life she has started into being builds her own character, is educational in a good sense; that to give a child-hungry couple the infant nature has denied them, to insure a loving, secure home for the baby, is in itself a form of reward as well as of atonement.

One good aspect of our times is the increasing availability of excellent practical and psychological assistance for the teen-ager who must go through a pregnancy. I personally question the wisdom of having the girl live with her own family, no matter what their attitude. But this does not imply that institutional care is best. The atmosphere in the "home for unfortunate girls" has improved greatly within my experience, but unavoidable disadvantages remain. The problems of an unmarried girl who is pregnant are essentially personal; she does not need contact with girls in similar difficulties; and in homes where out-and-out delinquents are mixed with the merely unfortunate, the influence is particularly bad.

Nowadays, wholesome, well-regulated families frequently take unfortunate girls in as boarders or as household helpers during their pregnancy. Some doctors do this, others make it their business to find such homes, and social-welfare agencies are turning more and more toward foster-home care. The family inviting a girl on this temporary basis should be prepared to accept her without reservation, to let her share fully in the healthy environment. The girls I am speaking of are at first crushed, without confidence, feeling keenly the concern they have caused their families. They must leave their school and friends, get out of sight. Undergoing pregnancy in this state of mind, they profit more from kindness and a good example than they would from constant reminders of their own errors in judgment. I have heard some old-fashioned people exclaim in horror at the thought of exposing children in a foster home to a "fallen woman." For myself, I have seen it act repeatedly as a wholesome and enlightening experience to the foster family as well as to the girl they have temporarily made one of them.

The girl who is given a wholesome environment, guidance and understanding emerges from childbirth equipped to make a new and better life for herself. Nine out of ten of these girls marry, and happily. Most of them have other children. The experience has indeed been hard—but less damaging, certainly, than the physical and psychic stigma of abortion, which often leaves a girl cynical, inclined to reject motherhood, and in too many cases incapable of becoming a mother.

Further proof of the innate decency of many modern young men is the fact that, more commonly than you might think, a husband adopts the child his wife has previously borne out of wedlock. This is usually possible only if the child has not been placed for adoption, but maintained by a welfare agency—and it is not invariably a solution to all problems. But I can cite a number of happy families where the husband has accepted the responsibility for another man's illegitimate child, and shows it the same loving, fatherly care he shows his own children.

Yet, no matter how decently the matter is conducted and concluded, there is stark tragedy in the plight of a teen-age girl bearing a child out of wedlock. It is not puritanical to speak out against the sex exaggeration which surrounds our children today, nor to feel disgust at the cold-blooded use of sex symbols for financial gain. If responsible adults will only think about the inevitable effect upon our youngsters, there will be a broadening wave of disapproval which will eventually destroy the practice of using sex as a money-making device.

Parents must realize, however, that while the exaggeration persists, they have an extra duty to counteract it. Boys and girls should not be allowed to get all their ideas about adult sex from trashy literature. They should know that men and women of character do not fall into bed immediately with every attractive person of the opposite sex who happens along; that only an uncivilized male or a very immature one will take advantage of a young girl; that sex without love inescapably degrades both the men and the women who engage in it. You and I know these things to be true. Our children need to know as well.

I believe all parties throughout the high-school years should be chaperoned by responsible adults; that parents should know where young daughter is whenever she goes out at ht; that they should make it clear to her rts that she is to be delivered home at a lated hour, and treated in a gentlemanly Can it be that the contempt for feminine so many of our boys exhibit today rises he fact that so many parents don't seem t what happens to a daughter—until they rn she is pregnant? I think this may very well be true.

The best counteracting influence of all, and perhaps the only really effective one, is a harmonious, loving family group. Children do not depart from the "family ethics" so much because they are dazzled and attracted by other ways of thinking and acting, but because they are disillusioned at home.

I'm not suggesting that parents moralize heavily, or consciously parade their righteousness. But they should be willing to face the facts of life frankly, and to explain their viewpoint in an easy, even a whimsical way. Intelligent teen-agers can see the absurdity of the sex nonsense about them as clearly as intelligent adults—if it is placed in its true perspective by understanding parents.

Finally, do our own lives present an example of wholesome attitudes toward sex; of love, consideration and loyalty? If not, we can at least be truthful. Youngsters are quick to detect deceit and lies, and hypocrisy is the adult trait most revolting to adolescents. They can understand, too, better than you might suppose, and will make allowances when a parent is honest—even honestly mistaken.

I am far from pessimistic about our teen-agers when the total picture is taken into consideration, though I sit in the hard seat of the doctor, forced daily to witness the pathos and tragedy which enter so many young lives today. I have seen many young girls suffer desperately through illicit pregnancies, yet with a gallantry that would break the heart. I have seen many teen-agers of both sexes build good lives on the lessons they have learned from early mistakes.

But is it right that children should have to undergo this pathos and this tragedy? Isn't it time we adults put a stop at least to our own contributory negligence? END

Two teachers—one Australian, one American—who last year exchanged jobs under the exchange-teacher plan tell what they have observed concerning the problem of

TEEN-AGERS AND SEX IN AUSTRALIA

● Australia has a juvenile-delinquency rate of only .5 per cent; marriages of youngsters still in high school are a rarity; illicit pregnancies among school girls are almost unknown. How do they do it?

"By avoiding the problem of sex craziness in the schools as much as we can," says Dr. Leonard H. Watts, a teacher at the Melbourne Technical Teachers' College, and exchange professor last year at Southern Oregon College of Education, Ashland, Ore. "Some of the ways we avoid it are:

1. We do not give it any great publicity or otherwise encourage youngsters to think about it.

2. In the cities, boys and girls usually attend separate secondary schools.

3. Students wear school uniforms and are generally forbidden to decorate or adorn themselves unduly while at school. Most schools forbid girls to use cosmetics.

4. In schools where coeducation exists, boys and girls are sometimes prevented from fraternizing at school and invariably forbidden to show public displays of affection.

5. Extracurricular activities are incidental to the main business of academic education. Little or no time is devoted to studying such things as 'dating,' 'social ritual.' No textbooks on such subjects are used in schools.

6. The large amount of home study required during the last three years of high school tends to discourage excessive social engagements between students.

7. Great emphasis is placed on pupil participation in sports, and this tends to restrain boy-girl activities to some extent.

8. Sex education, despite great controversy about the matter, is considered to be the prerogative of the home rather than the school. Most teachers adopt the attitude that they will answer any questions naturally, as they arise, but that they will not deliberately raise questions themselves.

9. Schools implant the belief that marriage is unwise before the age of twenty-one, at least.

"On the other hand, teachers, generally, do not adopt a prudish attitude. They recognize boy-girl relationships as natural and inevitable but consider that school is not primarily the place to nurture them, and teach that restraint is sometimes a virtue."

● Dr. J. M. McAulay, of Southern Oregon College, who took Doctor Watts' place in Australia during the exchange year, noted the following differences between Australian and American ways in the Melbourne Technical Teachers' College magazine, Synthesis:

1. American newspapers tend to highlight the difficulties of adolescents and disregard their positive achievements and the situations where they display good sense.

2. The Australian adolescent has a greater opportunity for venting his energy and emotions through participation in games and sports. The American youngster is more of a sports spectator.

3. The Australian youngster is generally more disciplined by the authority of the school, home and community than is his American cousin, and thus has more restraint on his activities. Too, he is less addicted to the motorcar, which allows the American adolescent to escape from parental and local authority.

4. The Australian home seems to be more solid and unified, more lived-in, than the American home. This serves as a stabilizer and works against undesirable outside influences.

He said: "Pardonnez-moi de vous quitter si vite." ("Alas Cherie, forgive me for leaving so quickly.")

He meant: "L'atmosphere est insupportable ici." ("Sacre Bleu! The atmosphere here is unbearable.")

She Must Have Used An Ordinary "Cover-Up" Deodorizer!

This couldn't have happened with air-wick

Did you know that America's leading home deodorizer is the world's leader, too? The popularity of Air-Wick has spread all over the world—to France, Italy, Japan... sixty-two countries in all!

People of all nationalities depend on Air-Wick because it has been proven 3 times as effective... faster... more pleasant to use.

Use handy wick or speedy spray... deodorize the Air-Wick way!

SPLITTING NAILS

DRINK KNOX Gelatine

Each day one 5¢ envelope (115-120 grains) of Knox Gelatine. Makes most brittle nails lovely and pliant within 90 days. Ask your doctor.

AT YOUR GROCER'S

©1958 Knox Gelatine Co.

TO DOCTORS: For reprints of clinical reports published in medical journals, write Knox Gelatine, Johnstown, N. Y.

Learn ALL about Mobile Living
Subscribe to
TRAILER TOPICS MAGAZINE

6-month trial subscription $1.00

Find the answers to all your questions before you buy a mobile-home. Get complete descriptions and photo of all the latest models. Only $3.00 for two full years

TRAILER TOPICS MAGAZINE

Suite 1590 ■ East Jackson Blvd., Chicago 4, Illinois

MORE PEOPLE USE Sugarine

SWEETER THAN SUGAR YET NO FOOD VALUE

Doctors recommend Sugarine for diabetics, overweights, lo-calorie diets. Pure, Harmless, Economical.

GUARANTEED NON-FATTENING 4 OZ.—75¢

AT FOOD STORES EVERYWHERE

Look How Easily You Can Make $75 with "SPECIAL DELUXE" EVERYDAY CARDS

You make 75c on each $1.25 Special Deluxe assortment of 21 large, SLIM, 25c quality cards for all occasions. No experience needed to earn $75.00 on 100 in spare time. 153 newest $1 and $1.25 assortments, Studio-style and Religious greetings, new Note-Velopes, clever Gifts double your earnings. Bonus Gifts worth $10-$100 besides. Write for FREE Stationery samples, others on approval. Act fast, get $1.25 Gift Set on FREE offer.

$1.25 Gift Offered FREE

CREATIVE CARD CO., 4401 Cermak, Dept. 139-H, Chicago 23, Ill.

Learn FLOWER ARRANGEMENT

FOR PLEASURE—please your friends and family with professional corsages, arrangements and floral designs.
FOR PROFIT—Prepare for tremendous money-making opportunities in the Floral Field full or part time. Or start your own profitable business.
Study and earn your diploma at home. Write today for FREE Book "Opportunities in Floristry."

National Landscape Institute
11826 San Vicente Boulevard
Studio L-18, Los Angeles 49, Calif.

Imported SPANISH GREEN OLIVES
add dash to any dish!

When You Shop For Food

Cooking for a Crowd

Five superlative recipes for guest "cheaper by the dozen."

BY PRISCILLA

I've learned a lot about cooking since I married Paul nine years ago. I had to, because we do so much entertaining for business and pleasure.

Paul was the one who taught me. He can start from nothing and make something delicious. Like the other night—we decided to have fish and he said, "Let's do it this way, flounder in the sack." That's all there was to it.

But you should have seen our company eat! And you should have seen the number of times I wrote out his recipe for Flounder in the Sack.

FLOUNDER IN THE SACK: Heat ¼ cup salad oil in a large skillet. Sauté 1 cup chopped onions, ⅓ cup chopped green pepper and 2 cloves garlic, crushed, until tender. Add 1 tablespoon flour and blend in until smooth. Add ½ cup each clam juice and tomato juice, 2 dashes hot red pepper sauce and 1 teaspoon Worcestershire sauce. Simmer for about 5 minutes. Turn the heat down and add 3 tablespoons capers, 1½ teaspoons salt and 1 teaspoon pepper. Lay 6 flounder fillets on generous squares of heavy-duty freezer foil. Turn up the edges. Spoon sauce over the fish. Wrap each fillet, using the drugstore wrap (pull up the two edges of foil and fold them down together until the foil fits loosely around the fish; fold the two ends under). Put wrapped fish in a pan and bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 45 minutes. Makes 6 servings. Serve fish in foil packages so that everyone will have plenty of sauce.

We don't do all our entertaining at home. In fact, we like to take couples up to San Angelo to a lake where we have our houseboat moored. Taking people out on the water for a weekend is a wonderful way to entertain, especially in the middle of Texas where there is so much land—and so little water!

We try to keep the parties small, but it's impossible. Big parties are more fun, but harder to plan for. You just can't cook for 18 to 20 people on a 28′ boat. The ideal thing, we've found, is to cook here in our air-conditioned kitchen and take the food up to the boat. A real favorite is the big, savory beef roast Paul cooks, served sliced onto plates or into sandwiches.

DI PIETRO

PAUL'S ROAST: Rub a 10-pound beef rump roast well with salt and pepper. With a knife, make pockets deep into the lean. Push a garlic clove and a little oregano into each pocket (allow 3 pockets for the roast). Roast, covered, in a slow oven, 300° F., until well done. (Allow about 30 minutes per pound.) From the drippings, make a thin gravy by blending ¼ cup flour with ½ cup milk. Mix into the drippings and heat, stirring, until thickened. Makes 20 to 25 servings.

Perfect for a big party: Paul's big, savory roast.

Another favorite of ours—and a mighty good filler—is baked potatoes. I can't serve baked potatoes with just butter. I had to do something different. So I arranged the potatoes on a big platter with three different sauces. This way every guest can fix his own potato the way he wants it. The potatoes look so unique—and they certainly make a hit at a party.

STUART

Always a party success: Paul Ricker's Flounder in the Sack.

PRISCILLA'S BAKED POTATOES: Scrub 6 to 8 baking potatoes well to be sure the jackets are very clean. Then bake in a hot oven, 400° F., about 45 minutes or until tender. Serve with one or all of the following sauces:

Sauce I: Cut 5 strips bacon into small pieces with the scissors. Sauté until crisp and then drain on paper toweling. Mix bacon with ⅓ cup chopped dill pickle and ⅓ cup melted butter.

Sauce II: Mix 1 cup sour cream with ½ teaspoon each Worcestershire sauce and prepared mustard. Fold in ½ cup grated American cheese.

Sauce III: Mix together 1 cup sour cream, ⅓ cup finely chopped onion and ¼ cup cooked, crumbled bacon. Serves 6 to 8.

I make different combinations, arrange the potatoes on a big platter and surround them with the various dips—sort of like a curry platter.

Paul does most of the cooking when we entertain, which is often. Lots of times we do things on the spur of the moment. Paul may bring someone home. Or someone may be passing through town. Or we may just decide to have friends over.

For some parties, we order fresh shrimp from Corpus Christi. Paul says they're like no other. He does different things with the shrimp, but his best recipe is this one for Spaghetti with Shrimp.

SPAGHETTI WITH SHRIMP: In a large skillet, warm ½ cup olive oil (Paul says this recipe really should be made with olive oil) and sauté 1 cup chopped onion and 2 cloves garlic, crushed, until tender. Add a 6-ounce can tomato paste and 2 No. 2 cans tomatoes. Let simmer for 30 minutes. Cut 2 pounds cooked, deveined shrimp in half and chop ½ cup anchovy fillets. Thinly slice 6 large mushrooms. Add the shrimp, mushroom slices and anchovies to the simmering sauce. Season with 2 teaspoons salt, 1 teaspoon pepper and ½ teaspoon orégano. Cook 1 pound spaghetti according to package directions. Drain. Toss lightly with 2 tablespoons butter. Arrange on a large platter and top with shrimp sauce. Makes 6 servings. Serve with a tossed salad and toasted French bread.

Paul's real specialty, though, is a soup that takes two whole days to make.

TWO-DAY SOUP: Into a 3-gallon kettle put 1 large soupbone, a 1½-pound chuck slice of beef, a cleaned 3-pound stewing hen, ½ pound salt pork, 1 bay leaf, 5 black peppercorns, 1 teaspoon garlic salt and enough water to cover. Simmer slowly for 1½ hours. Remove chicken. Cool, cut the meat off the bones and refrigerate. Meanwhile, continue simmering broth, salt pork and beef 1½ hours more. Cool soup and allow to stand overnight in the refrigerator with the beef in it. In the morning, lift off the layer of fat. Return soup to the range. Add 2 No. 2 cans tomatoes, 2 large onions, sliced, 1 stalk celery, 1 bunch of carrots, sliced, ⅜ cup barley or rice, 1 tablespoon salt and ½ tablespoon Worcestershire sauce. Simmer for 1 hour. Just before serving, add chicken meat. Simmer 10 minutes and serve. Makes about 1 gallon (32 servings).

Dress it up with cling peaches!

Light as a bubble!

So fluffy—bubbly light, with creamy goodness that always satisfies. Easy to digest—never heavy.

So festive—for a delightful dessert, fold in cling peaches from California. Fun to make!

Good for you—full of fresh egg-'n-milk nourishment, but not loaded with calories. New quick-and-easy recipe on box.

TODAY'S QUICK-AND-EASY

MINUTE TAPIOCA DESSERTS

A fine product of General Foods

flavor fillip

for Holiday left-overs!

HERB-OX CHICKEN BOUILLON CUBES

Scalloped Turkey and Mushrooms

Arrange in alternate layers in greased baking dish: ½ c. sautéed mushrooms, several slices cooked turkey, 1 c. cooked macaroni, salt, pepper; any left-over peas, beans, carrots, etc. Blend 4 tbs. flour, 4 tbs. fat; add 2 Herb-Ox Chicken Bouillon Cubes melted in 2 c. boiling water; stir over low heat till thickened; pour over turkey mixture. Top with 1 c. buttered crumbs; brown in 400° oven. Serves 4.

For other holiday taste treats! Use Herb-Ox Chicken Bouillon Cubes to pep up turkey hash; add flavor to delicious gravies; enrich turkey soup, etc.

FREE! Money-Saving Recipe Booklet!
Write: The Pure Food Company, Dept. L-1, Mamaroneck, N. Y.

Herb-Ox

BOUILLON CUBES

LOW IN CALORIES, HIGH IN FLAVOR

MONEY...

in Your Spare Time

Write us for details and supplies.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
278 Independence Square Philadelphia 5, Pa.

ENJOY "Constant Comment" TEA

fine Ceylon tea with bits of oranges and sweet spice added. "Constant Comment" is the richest, liviest, most deliciously different tea you've ever tasted. With your family, — your friends — enjoy "Constant Comment" daily.

At Food Gift & Dept. Stores

BOTH LOOSE TEA AND TEA BAGS

Free 6 cup sample. Send 10c to R. C. Bigelow, Inc., Mfrs. 15L Merwin St., Dept. L-1 Norwalk, Conn.

TOGETHER

EVERY DAY IS DOLLAR DAY With CARDINAL'S New Tall-Occasion GREETING CARDS

BIG VARIETY of $1 SELLERS!

21-Card $1 Assortments

$1 GIFTS

$1 STATIONERY

$1 Sellers Make Extra Money Easily
Show friends dozens of brand new greeting card assortments and gift items that sell fast at the magic low price of only $1. New TALL Cards at 21 for $1, Religious Assortments, Ensembles, Comics, Salt & Pepper Sets—over 100 fast-sellers pay up to 60c profit per box plus CASH BONUS.

SEE SAMPLES AT NO COST!
No experience needed. Just mail coupon. We'll send sample outfit on approval and EXCLUSIVE Stationery FREE. Charming $1 "Lil' Washer" Salt & Pepper Set offered FREE for prompt action. Act NOW!

CARDINAL CRAFTSMEN, Dept. 37-H, 1400 State Ave., Cincinnati 14, Ohio
Please send samples on approval. Include $1 Gift.

Name _____
Address _____
City & State _____

$1 GIFT FOR YOU! MAIL COUPON!

HUSBANDS ARE TO LOVE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 39

happened? Are you all right? What's the matter?"

"Gregory and I are getting a divorce, that's all."

"Oh, no, Connie!" She screamed so madly I had to hold the receiver away from my ear. "Whatever for?"

Her horrible screaming had unnerved me. While long distance simply ticked off dollar bills, I stood with the telephone in my hand as if my mind had atrophied and my face had frozen loosely, for my lips were trembling and I couldn't speak.

"Connie, darling, are you there? Are you all right? Darling, what is it? Speak to me!"

Finally I was able to. "Muriel, do you remember Mrs. Cutler?"

"Who?"

"Never mind. It's just that I wondered —— I mean —— Muriel, I know this will sound silly to you, but you do agree with me, don't you, that love is more important in marriage than roast beef with brown gravy?"

Muriel was always unpredictable. "Oh, my great Aunt Harriet!" she screamed with laughter. "You and that plain mind of yours! Oh, darling, I can just see you!" She laughed madly.

"Muriel, shut up."

"Look, darling," she said, "you're just upset. We all go through these silly times. Calm down and stop worrying and don't do anything."

"I'm not worrying," I said. "It's just that I have ideals and I intend to live up to them no matter who else has lost hers."

She laughed with more of her impossible laughter. "Connie, I love you," she said.

"Good-by, Muriel," I said.

"Good-by, Connie," she said. "Thanks for calling, dear, and keep in touch. And you know as well as I do that you aren't going to divorce any man, let alone that wonderful Gregory, over something as silly as brown gravy. Oh, Connie! Brown gravy! Darling, why don't you try split-pea soup?"

I hung up. I would have liked to have hit her. I was utterly confused. I simply couldn't think.

But I did know how I felt. I felt like getting a divorce and at once. Let them all eat, I thought. Let them eat their way right through life. Let them settle for it, if they want to. What I wanted was love. I wanted love with all my heart and soul. If it took a divorce to show Gregory that I would not accept domesticity as a substitute for it, then we would just have to be divorced.

The only trouble was, I had no idea how to go about getting a divorce. All sorts of books are written on how to get married and where to stand and what to say and whom to ask, but nothing seems to be written on how to get unmarried. I had no idea if I should see about getting my job back first, or engage a lawyer, or go to Reno, or just wait.

If I'd had a mother to go home to, I would have. As it was, I wandered through my house as forlorn as I could be, not knowing what to do, and then I thought of Mrs. Mullany.

For some reason that I don't quite understand, Mrs. Mullany is a woman I treasure. She lives in the only house in our neighborhood that is old, three-storied and has a front porch.

Inside it is carpeted with flowered wool. Over the carpet little rugs are thrown this way and that way against the trailing flowers.

The windows are thick with white nylon and brocaded draperies. The whole place bubbles with knickknacks.

Also, Mrs. Mullany is the only fat woman in our neighborhood. She wears cotton house dresses and white powder and nice black oxfords.

She is nothing at all like Mrs. Cutler, and nothing, thank heaven, like Muriel, but I knew I had to see her.

I practically ran out of my ranch house, down our winding street of ranch houses, all low and picture-windowed and religiously modern. I walked past all the little square green lawns with the pointed arborvitae at the corners of the houses and the daffodils in borders under the picture windows.

I went to Mrs. Mullany's house with the sprawling lawn with the old trees and the spiraea bushes and the forsythia.

I pounded on Mrs. Mullany's kitchen door, and shivered in the cold spring weather. At first I thought she wasn't there, and then I heard her coming and she opened the door to me.

"Ah, Connie, so it's you," she said. "Where's your coat? You youngsters haven't the brains of magpies. Winter still in the air and you run about in those dabs of cloth."

She reached out and pulled me into her warm kitchen that smelled of vanilla and coffee and was painted yellow. Practically nothing was built in, but it was wonderfully cozy and comfortable.

"Come out to the breakfast room, Constance. You can sit and talk while I iron." She didn't look at my eyes, swollen from crying.

"Sit here at the table," she said, patting me down into one of her chintz-covered chairs. Then she set in front of me a cup of real coffee thick with cream, and a piece of nutcake with orange filling and orange-butter icing. A million calories, at least.

LINES TO FOUR SMALL CHILDREN

By JANET HENRY

I often am inclined to think
That it would be much wiser
To give myself the vitamins
And you the tranquilizer.

I certainly wasn't hungry, but for some reason I drank the hot creamy coffee and ate the cool creamy cake.

"And what's on your mind today, Connie?" she said softly, as she ironed a green apron which was embroidered all over with a cross-stitch village.

"Oh, Mrs. Mullany, I'm going to divorce Gregory."

"Are you, darling?" she said, and she didn't even look up from her ironing, as if she had known from the beginning that Gregory and I could never last.

"I have to, Mrs. Mullany," I said, and I almost cried, but with my mouth feeling so good from the cake, I didn't. I drank some coffee. "Gregory hates me," I said, swallowing. "He swims in hatred. His idea of a wife is some sort of slave. If he wanted a housekeeper and a cook, why didn't he marry one?" I began to shake.

Mrs. Mullany chugged over to a closet, disappeared inside and came out with a thick red sweater. She helped me into it.

"You're thin, Constance." She cocked her head on one side and looked at me searchingly. Then, as if dismissing my thinness, she heaved her great bosom and went back to her ironing board.

"I've been a widow for three years now," she said. "I don't like living alone. I don't think you'd like it, Connie."

"I'd rather live alone forever than live one more second with that—that—that ——"

"Gregory is a very handsome young man," she said. She hung the apron over the back of a chair, unrolled a yellow tablecloth and spread it out on the ironing board.

"Mrs. Mullany, Gregory dumped me into the bathtub last night in my nightgown and before I could get out he turned on the cold shower and drenched me and nearly killed me with shock. And all for no reason whatsoever except that he thought he was hungry, which he wasn't."

She paused with her iron in mid-air. "Oh, my dear, how lovely it must have been for you!" She smiled at me, then went back to her ironing. "I remember one night," she said, "Charles walked me home from a dance five miles through a horrible rainstorm, because he refused to ride home with the couple we had gone with. During the evening the man had acted a little foolish about me and Charles lost his temper. Ah, I hated Charles for weeks. It's lovely to be intense about someone, isn't it?"

I choked on a mouthful of coffee. "I think one should love one's husband, Mrs. Mullany," I whispered hoarsely. "Anger is a dreadful emotion. It is very bad for one's complexion and some people even think it brings on dreadful illnesses."

"Yes," she said, "yes, Charles could make me very ill. Why, I remember one time—it was just before Martha Jane was born, and Anne and Chuck were still little children. Charles became so difficult to live with that I became upset and was ordered to bed by the doctor. It cost Charles so much to take care of me that he couldn't buy the touring car he had set his heart on. He became despondent and had shingles. I felt so sorry for him that I recovered fast from having Martha Jane and began to pet and pamper Charles until he became sweet as a lamb again. It was then that he bought me my emerald lavaliere."

"It is a beautiful lavaliere," I said.

"Yes, we had a long spell of being happy after that. Of course there were always days when we were edgy and short with each other and glowered. That was good, too, as I look back on it. All those days run together into a happy time—the big warm years. Ah, I suppose there's something nice about being a widow, but I haven't caught on to it yet."

She looked up at me with the quick look of a bird. "Connie, you should put on some weight."

"Oh, Mrs. Mullany, I don't dare be fat."

"Why not?"

"Why . . . why, being fat is a mortal sin."

Mrs. Mullany put down her iron and folded her arms across her chest and regarded me levelly.

"Oh, I didn't mean you, Mrs. Mullany. I think you are beautiful. It's a pleasure to see you. I love just to think of you living here in this neighborhood. You are the only woman I know who makes cake, Mrs. Mullany. I dearly love cake, for all I'm determined never to make it and never to eat it except most occasionally."

Mrs. Mullany unplugged her iron, poured herself a cup of coffee and sat down opposite me. She helped herself absently to sugar and stirred her coffee slowly and thoughtfully. Her round arms were pink beneath the generous sleeves of her pretty dress.

"You young people," she said, "seem to think that being thin is what life is for."

"Well," I said, "well, I suppose in a way you're right. We absolutely have to be thin. That I know. We have to be thin."

Mrs. Mullany sighed. "Sometimes I wonder if it isn't because you've thrown all other virtues to the wind—or what we used to refer to as virtues, at least. You have to stand for something, so you stand for thinness."

"Oh, we aren't that bad!"

"No, dear. You're just human beings. Not easy, is it?" She smiled at me.

"Mrs. Mullany," I said, "what shall I do about Gregory?"

"I'd love him if I were you, dear."

"Oh, but he's the one. He doesn't love me. Why, last night he—he suddenly turned into . . . why, he reverted. He changed into his father, his grandfather."

"Poor soul," Mrs. Mullany said.

"Mrs. Mullany," I pleaded with her, "I've really tried. I was a fashion model when Gregory married me. I gave up my job because he asked me to. I keep our house perfectly clean. It would be ridiculous for me to cook great gobs of food which we shouldn't eat. Besides, I can buy lovely meals in those nice little frozen packages."

"It is a difficult way to tell a man that you care for him, though, isn't it—opening a package?"

"I think it's horrible for him to care about such things. Life should be gay and lovely. Like last night. When Greg came home from work, I was bathed and dressed in a little pale yellow dinner dress. The house was charming. I had three daffodils and some green branches in a low vase and the hi-fi playing.

"The minute Gregory walked in the door I knew he was going to be difficult. Lately he's been in these strange moods. He actually looks taller, and his dark hair seems darker and his eyes look sunk in his head, and he is remote and superior and he acts fifty years older than he is. He didn't even take his topcoat off, or his hat. He just threw his brief case down on the table in our little hallway and walked into the living room and took one superior look at me and everything. He said, 'Ah, my beauty!'

"I pretended not to notice and was as sweet as I could be to him. I told him to take a quick shower while I put dinner in the oven.

"He just slunk down in a chair and said for me to go put my little ready-mixes in the oven and then I could just ready-mix my ready-mix self out in the kitchen and eat them all by myself.

" 'And when you're through,' he said, 'cook me a knuckle of meat and bake me a potato, and beat up some rutabaga or something that has a taste to it, and why not bake a cherry pie, my beauty!'

"I just stood there looking at him, trying to think where the Greg I had married had gone to. He used to fly in the door, put his long, strong, wonderful arms around me and whirl me around, and he'd say, 'Connie, Connie, Connie,' as if I were the sun, the moon and the stars. Then almost overnight he'd turned into this awful old man.

"Well, I was seething, but I tried to pretend that he was just talking. I poured him a drink and gave it to him and even smiled at him. So he took it, and drank it, and began to act a little more rational, like himself—decent.

"We had dinner and . . . it wasn't very good, but it was easy. And then he got worse and worse and began pounding the table and bossing me and demanding and ordering.

"So I just left him and undressed and was sitting at my dressing table doing my nails when he walked in like some great lord, picked me up and dumped me in the tub. You can see, I have to have a divorce. I'm going back to work. I can get my old job back any time."

"Don't you like the job you have?" Mrs. Mullany asked me.

It struck me as a very odd question; and even odder, I began to cry.

"Don't you know how to cook, dear?" Mrs. Mullany said.

"Of course I do," I said, weeping horribly by then. "And what does cooking have to do with it? I married Gregory because I was in love with him, not because I wanted to be his cook."

Mrs. Mullany reached across the table and patted the top of my head. "There, there," she said, "there, there. Let me show you how to make a lemon pie."

For some unknown reason I stopped crying and for an even more unknown reason I let her show me.

Two hours later, I walked out of her house with a lemon-meringue pie safely tucked into a covered dish so that none of the lovely amber peaks of egg white would be dented. In my head I had a menu for dinner and a set of directions as to how to proceed.

I went home, then to the market, then home again and I proceeded. I worked all day and had to call Mrs. Mullany only five or six times for advice.

By six o'clock I had the table set with candles in our amber candleholders and as much of our wedding silver as two people could possibly use, and the daffodils. But that was only the most minor part.

Out in the kitchen in our built-in oven there were potatoes that I had baked, cut in half, scooped out, mashed with loads of butter and salt and hot milk and a little pepper, then put back like adorable puffs into their shells and sprinkled with chives. In the oven also was a roast of veal that I had cooked with loving care. I had sprinkled it with garlic powder and salt and marjoram and some green dill. My house smelled like a little French place Greg and I used to eat in when we were in New York.

I had Roquefort cheese and pear salad with sherry dressing, and little new beets cooked with their greens, à la Mrs. Mullany, pumpernickel bread. A bottle of good sherry. The pie. Coffee.

I had been so busy doing all this that I hadn't had time to think. Suddenly I was in a panic.

Besides, I looked a mess. Always before, by the time Greg came home, I had spent all afternoon on myself and my clothes. And there I was in a complete state. I had flour across the stomach of my orange pants, mashed baked potato in my hair, lemon-pie filling on my jersey, a strange feeling of elation about the dinner, and a dim pit of dismay about everything else.

I heard the car rush up the driveway, the car door slap, Greg's steps on the walk. He was at the house. I stood frozen, rooted to the kitchen floor.

Everything I had ever thought about love ran into my mind at once, all the articles I'd read on marriage, everything Mrs. Mullany had said. Nothing made any sense at all.

I knew it mattered to me what Gregory would be like, but what I wanted him to be like I didn't know.

He opened the front door of our house and walked into our little pocket-sized hallway. I came to life and rushed into the living room.

Gregory swung the door shut behind him with a wide gesture and he grinned at me as if we had never quarreled at all. "Hi, doll!" he said.

I just stood there looking at him as hard as I could. I saw his dear dark head and his strong mouth, but I saw something else that must have been there before but I didn't see it before—the look of work. He looked as if he'd worked hard all day in a hard, gritty world. He looked as if he needed a wife not to be pretty and witty so much as warm and comforting and with sweet gentle ways.

I remembered Mrs. Mullany saying, "Don't you like the job you have?"

I love the job I have.

I ran to Gregory. He held out his long, strong, wonderful arms and hugged me close to him. "Connie, Connie, Connie," he said, as if I were warmth, as if I were comfort, as if I were love.

"SPEAKING OF OPERATIONS—"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 12

Moving and resettling means leg work. Lists and lists of things to be shopped for: drawer pulls, hardware of all sorts, hooks of all sorts, shoe racks, door stops, curtain rods, kitchen equipment, shower curtains; errands from one end of the city to another after things neither costly nor interesting but essential.

And meanwhile I had my real work to do. I was writing a triweekly newspaper column and had moved into my club, midway between the house and the apartment, where I took all my meals and enjoyed the amenities of a well-conducted private house. But I had to change long-established habits of working hours. I began my professional working day before 6 A.M. in order to be "free" by noon. I could do it because by 9 P.M. I was ready for bed, after an Epsom-salts bath for my aching limbs. Normally I am a late getter-up and a late sitter-up at night, but I found those early unaccustomed hours extraordinarily conducive to concentrated thought—and there was much to think of: the heartbreaking situation in Little Rock; the first earth satellite; new tensions in the Middle East. In those hours, when one has awakened from a sleep of sheer exhaustion, and not a creature is stirring, one has a sense of distance, of intellectual participation without emotional involvement, which surely has some value. I did not find it hard to work under those conditions; it became hard later, when with everything "practically finished" something was perpetually being delivered, some minor things installed, and, not living alone, I could not set aside consecutive hours to concentrate only on writing. But in those days when I led a dual life, half impersonal, half intensely personal, if they clashed, the results were slightly maniacal.

Weeks before the "operation" I had agreed to lecture in Oklahoma City and prepared the talk in advance and in calm. But the date fell on the first of the two moving days, and the trip absorbed the next one too. As I arose to speak (on the responsibilities and difficulties of a great power) I thought of the Epstein, and for a few seconds completely dried. Coughing, I could hardly emit a word.

The Epstein is a powerful bronze sculpture that I had purchased in Jacob Epstein's London studio years ago. She had stood on a heavy walnut mantelpiece and I had left instructions for her to be transferred to an exact spot on a bookshelf in the living room. Now, the sculptured lady is a good hundred pounds in weight, and suddenly I knew that the painted, soft wood shelf, unless strongly fortified, would never support her. In my imagination I saw her crashing down, and right through the floor, possibly upon someone underneath. And there was nothing I could do about it now. In New York it was nearly midnight. No one was yet sleeping in the apartment. Whatever the damage might be was already committed.

Sure enough, when I returned my secretary greeted me with, "I'm sorry, I'm afraid I have bad news."

"I know," I said. "The Epstein."

"The shelf is sagging, ever so little, away from the wall."

No catastrophe. The shelf was fortified; a bit of repainting, and the enigmatic figure is back among other familiar things.

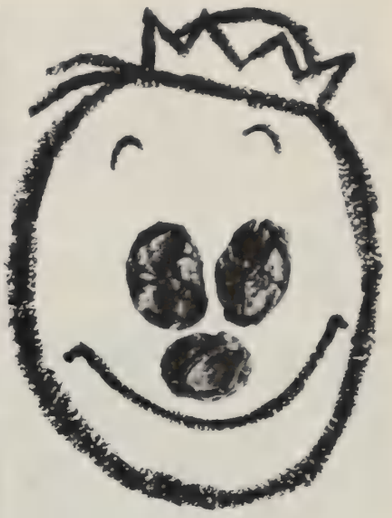
It was the herb-and-spice cabinet that threatened to break up our marriage. We like savory food, and in the spacious cabinets of the house was every condiment of Orient and Occident. My husband, with our brand-new maid, was arranging "his" kitchen.

"Do you need four cans of powdered cinnamon?" he growled, most unjustly because I had not purchased them. "And marjoram and basil—I hate them!"

"A pinch of marjoram is good in lamb stew," I volunteered. "And I like basil in tomato salad."

"The only herbs for lamb stew are garlic, parsley and bay leaf," he contradicted. "And no herbs should go into tomato salad. Basil tastes like licorice. Horrid."

"Well," I said, "there are also two jars of your pet orégano."



He stalked into his new room, as bare as a monk's cell, for "All I want," he had said when we started to move, "is my crucifix, drawing board, easel, modeling stand, and a chest of drawers and a chair. Shades to regulate the light. No carpet. No curtains. And the right to make a mess."

He returned conciliatory, for his tempers are short-lived. I handed him the most useful thing in moving—a large garbage can.

No more breakfasts in bed—another habit of years. But my bedroom is western, while, in the morning, the sun streams into the living room from the east, a lighthouse, if it is early, still twinkles, and the boats, early about their business, evoke the romance of this strangely romantic metropolis. There, sitting in easy chairs, with a tea table between us, is obviously the place for breakfast.

When one moves, one changes one's habits, and that is one good reason to move.

I am tired, but I feel lighter—younger—in the knowledge that life can always begin again, at any age. I like it here. The operation was successful; the patient even lived, and a new year begins—happy, I hope, for us, and for you too. END

School or workday LUNCHES are extra inviting when you pack in a handful of... raisins the taste surprise fruit

CALIFORNIA RAISIN ADVISORY BOARD
FRESNO, CALIFORNIA

You'll LOVE My FUDGE!

Lynne White
fluff's Home Economist

Smooth, delicious — easy to make! See my simple recipe on Fluff label! Send for my FREE Dessert Recipe Book in full color.

Lynne White, Dept. L1, Box 470, Lynn, Mass.

COMMENDED PARENTS' MAGAZINE U
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
MARSHMALLOW fluff

Earliest TOMATO

HENRY FIELD'S FAMOUS SPECIAL!
Full Family-Size Packet only 10¢ PPD

Delicious, smooth, it's ideal for slicing, canning. From plant to table only 63 days. Plenty all season for the whole family. Send only 10c today to cover handling. New, colorful catalog will be sent you free.

HENRY FIELD Seed & Nursery Co.
1051 Oak St., Shenandoah, Iowa
"For Over 60 Years!"

200 SEEDS "EARLY RED BIRD"

$50 to $250 EXTRA MONEY
Show Modern Studio GREETING CARDS
Make $50 to $250 in spare time showing friends, neighbors, "newest of the new", sensational, exclusive Modern Design and Studio-Style Greeting Cards for all occasions: birthdays, anniversaries, get-well, friendship, etc. Everybody orders. Send no money, but rush your name today for 2 beautiful assortments, on approval.
WALLACE BROWN, 11 E. 26th St., Dept. A-9, New York 10, N. Y.

An information-packed article about your baby's care, feeding, growth and fun.

Care And Feeding Of Your Baby's Hair

You say your baby hasn't any hair? Well, he will have—sooner or later! Babies born with a lot of hair often lose it, and grow more—of an entirely different color. Babies with curly hair sometimes go straight; baldies may keep the family guessing for months. In the meantime, a once-or-twice weekly shampoo keeps your little one's scalp in good growing condition.

● For happier shampoos, lather baby's head while he's lying on your lap or the bath table. Then hold his head over the tub in a downward tilt, so no soap or rinse water gets in his eyes. Don't worry about the "soft spot" on baby's head. Its covering is plenty tough enough to take gentle rubbing and rinsing, and brushing with a soft-bristled brush.

● Know the newest in baby feeding? Heinz' High-Meat Dinners—nutritious "main dishes" that give your baby over 3 times more meat than he gets in the usual meat-and-vegetable combinations. These tasty well-balanced dinners are full of high quality meat proteins, blood-enriching iron and important vitamins. Heinz' delicious High-Meat Dinners come in these varieties—Beef with Vegetables, Chicken with Vegetables, and Veal with Vegetables—and in both Strained and Junior versions.

● Healthy hair needs good nourishing food just as much as a healthy body does! You can give your baby a well-balanced diet of good food so easily—Heinz Baby Foods offer more than 90 delicious varieties. Special Heinz baby-food kitchens are located in the nation's garden spots where the finest fruits and vegetables grow. Our baby-food experts select the pick of each crop and pack it at flavor peak—to insure better flavor, color and texture.

● Sleepytime is most of the time for your newborn! A big yawn and he's off—if his tummy is comfortably full. A little baby sleeps lightly, not soundly. He breathes slowly, then fast; he snuffles and snorts and can scare you – unless you know these noises are normal. Your baby may snooze 20 hours out of 24, off and on. As he grows bigger and can hold more food, he'll sleep longer at a stretch—maybe 6 hours or so, by the time he's a month old.

● Word to the budget-wise: All Heinz Cereals give your baby more servings per boxful than other brands do! Because of Heinz Cereals' special consistency, you need less—mixed with milk or formula—to make the smooth, easy-to-swallow texture babies like. So Heinz Pre-Cooked Cereals last longer (and taste better, too!). Has your baby tried Heinz new High-Protein Cereal? This popular flavor contains twice as much protein as ordinary baby cereals. Its pleasant taste and fluffy texture make a big hit with little beginners. And it's fortified with active iron.

● Do you talk baby-talk to your baby? If you don't, every so often, you're exceptional! But remember: baby learns to speak as he's spoken to. Hearing only baby-talk makes his job harder.

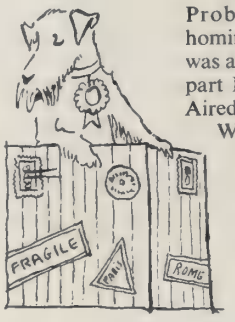
● Toddler's Treat: Butterscotch Milk Shake. Combine 2 cups cold milk, 1 cup vanilla ice cream, ½ cup Heinz Junior Butterscotch Pudding. Mix. It makes a delicious drink; serves 3.

● What's the most practical size garment for baby's layette—and how many of each will you really need? Would you like to have help in naming your new baby? You'll find hundreds of interesting names and hundreds of answers to your questions in Heinz' new book, "The ABC's of Prenatal Care." To get a copy of this authoritative, easy-to-read book free—write to Heinz Baby Foods, Box 28, D-23, Pittsburgh 30, Pennsylvania.

Over 90 Better-Tasting

- Strained Egg Yolks
- Strained Orange Juice
- Pre-Cooked Cereals
- Strained and Junior Meats

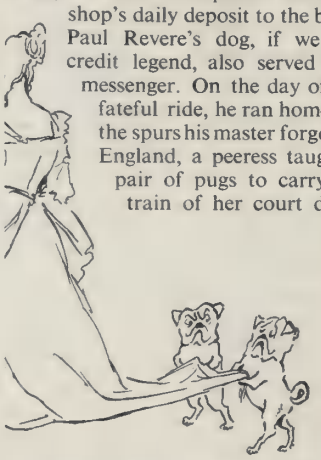


HEINZ
Baby Foods

- Strained Baby Foods
- Junior Baby Foods
- Teething Biscuits

DOGS AND

By GEORGE and HELEN PAPASHVILY



Probably the greatest homing dog of all time was a terrier, part Scotch, part Irish with a dash of Airedale, named Owney. Wandering into the post office in Albany, New York, as a puppy, he was adopted by the mail clerks and presented with a collar bearing his name and address. His pleasure in riding the post-office trucks to the depots soon extended to round-trip excursions on the mail cars. Eventually he visited every state in the Union, Mexico and Canada. On August 12, 1895, his Albany friends packed a light bag for him with his brush, comb and blanket and a letter of introduction to postal authorities everywhere, and the little dog went to Tacoma, then via the SS Victoria to Japan, where he was greeted with all honors by a representative of the mikado and presented with a special seal. From Japan he sailed to Shanghai, changed ships again at Singapore and Port Said, and after a trip through the Suez Canal, a visit to Gibraltar and the Azores, Owney docked in New York, caught the first express north and trotted into the Albany post office on December 23, having circled the globe in 132 days. Owney, like all travelers, acquired so many souvenirs, medals, coins and trinkets in his wanderings that the Postmaster General ordered a special harness constructed for the dog. It was a considerate though unnecessary gift, for among his other tricks Owney had learned to slip his collar off and rest between stations, and then with his paws pull his decorations on again to make public appearances.

If only all lost dogs might follow the example of a pair of Airedales, one of whom belonged to Hugh Kahler and the other to Booth Jameson, the young nephew of Booth Tarkington. Jameson attended Princeton, and since dormitory regulations forbade pets, he left his Airedale with the Kahlers, who lived about a mile from the campus. Young Jameson visited his dog frequently and sometimes took him and the Kahlers' Airedale into town. On one such occasion, being late for classes and realizing he had no time to walk the dogs home, young Jameson bundled them into a taxi, gave the driver the Kahlers' address and the necessary fare. The Airedales, with all the sound common sense of the breed, wandered where they pleased thereafter, strolled through the town, called at the dormitory, and when they did not find their friend to escort them home, jumped into the familiar cab and were driven back to the Kahlers', their fare charged to the Jameson account.

●

Before the development of electric motors, many household appliances were dog-powered. Within living memory, Shellbark, a poodle, ground the coffee in a Doylestown, Pennsylvania, grocery. A canine corps kept the tracks clear of sheep and pedestrians for the Great Western Railroad; another group detects and indicates gas leaks for a utility company. In Allentown, Pennsylvania, a German shepherd carried a shop's daily deposit to the bank. Paul Revere's dog, if we can credit legend, also served as a messenger. On the day of the fateful ride, he ran home for the spurs his master forgot. In England, a peeress taught a pair of pugs to carry the train of her court dress.

A friend of ours has four boys; and as often happens in large happy families, the boys soon collected an assortment of hamsters, mice, parakeets and three dogs—a great Dane, a dachshund and a collie. The care of this menagerie was not always combined successfully with a busy schedule of Scout meetings, Christmas pageants, basketball games, music lessons, school exams, ice skating and several hobbies. One stormy afternoon last winter, the boys' mother had perforce to clean the parakeets' cage, feed the mice, round up and count the hamsters and then take three bounding dogs out for some overdue exercise. As she danced a kind of Maypole through the park, winding and unwinding leashes in and out, over and around trees and posts, her temper was not improved when, passing two men, she heard one say to the other, "Isn't it a pity to see a woman lavish her attention on dogs instead of little helpless children?"

●

There is a dog in Allentown, Pennsylvania, who likes above everything else to play pinball. He spends most of his time in a little candy store barking frantically for somebody to put another nickel in the machine so he can jump up on a stool, pull the plunger with his teeth and watch the ball fly, the bells ring and the lights flash. (A picture of a Texas dog with similar tastes appeared in a magazine a year or so ago. It is to be hoped these cases are mere coincidences and do not constitute a trend!)

We knew a Dalmatian (a mere acquaintance, of course) who drank a bucket of beer every morning of his life. He was fourteen at the time we met him, so presumably he derived no harm from the habit. The only noticeable effect was a quality of elevation it gave him. With the precision and control of a ballet dancer he could leap straight into the air from a standing stop. Reversing the traditional custom, this Dalmatian never touched a drop after twelve noon.

PEOPLE

●

A gold medal went to Peter, a German shepherd, for pulling his friend Don, a cocker spaniel, off a busy highway after the latter was struck down by a hit-and-run driver. Fritz, a mixed bull and Scotch terrier, earned a silver medal for bringing help to a puppy who had fallen from a schooner's deck and was drowning. And there was the story of Duke, who was missing for over a week. A neighbor of his owner noted his own dog, Skeezix, carrying portions of his meals away from the house. He followed and found Skeezix taking the food to Duke, caught in a fox trap in the woods.

●

The little spaniel who came on the Mayflower's historic first voyage fared poorly in the wilderness. Wolves chased her home, says an old account, and were driven off only when her master threw a sickle at them. The colonists soon ordered more and larger dogs from England.

●

The first dog show in America was held in Virginia in 1698. Indian neighbors wanted, in exchange for their furs, food and tobacco, not guns or fire water but five English dogs.

People who have never owned a dog apparently think that all within a breed not only look and act alike, but that there is a connection between the two factors. In reality, there are probably just as many jovial St. Bernards as tired terriers, and we personally know three German shepherds who were constantly chased by a sheep, one that hid behind a door to bark, and another that spent a large part of his life dressed in doll clothes attending cambric-tea parties with a young friend.

Many breeds owe their rise and fall in popularity to identification with an important person or caste. King Charles brought his spaniels to England; William and Mary introduced the pug from Holland; the Dalmatian's real popularity began after Queen Alexandra appeared with them.

DRAWINGS: MAURICE SONDEK

WHAT MY DOG MEANS TO ME
by John Morrison, age 8 (1947)
My dog means somebody nice and quiet to be with. He does not say "Do!" like my mother, or "Don't!" like my father, or "Stop!" like my brother. My dog, Spot, and I sit together quietly and I like him and he likes me. The end.

●

Columbus when he discovered America discovered also that the inhabitants possessed small hounds as well as a larger breed. Both were barkless, and Columbus noted rather peevishly that his European dogs from continued association seemed inclined to adopt the same habit.

●

Fr. Cuvier, the French naturalist, believed the dog to be an absolute necessity for the establishment of a civilized society. It is perhaps only a coincidence, but the Tasmanians, the only people who did not possess the dog, never progressed beyond the Stone Age.

●

The very first dog names we know are those an Egyptian king gave his four dogs almost 5000 years ago: Gazelle, Greyhound, Black and Firepot.

●

In 1952 the dog population in the United States was almost 23,000,000. They were increasing at the rate of 1,000,000 a year and were the second most popular subject for calendar art.

●

Helen Keller said: "Were my Maker to grant me but a single glance through these sightless eyes of mine, I would without question choose to see first a child—then a dog."

●

What purpose did they serve, all the good dogs that once ran through the world and wait now in the shadowy quiet of the past?

They lightened our burdens and drove away our enemies and stayed when others left us. They gave aid and comfort, protection and security. They held a mirror wherein we might see ourselves as we long to be. They gave us a glimpse of the world beyond the narrow confines of our own species.

Although we make dull students, slowly they help us learn how to command and to protect with wisdom and justice and imagination.

They taught and still teach us the joy of giving generosity and kindness and love—without thought of gainful return.

All the fleet hounds, the stanch mastiffs, the loyal shepherds, the dancing toys, the fumbling puppies, pets on silk pillows, workers plodding at their tasks, the special ones you loved best, those of our own we still miss—all the good dogs, we thank them. END

© 1954 by George and Helen Papashvily
This is an excerpt from the book
DOGS AND PEOPLE
published by J. B. Lippincott Co.

However you "cream" your coffee —

You'll love the fresh taste and the convenience of PREAM!

You'll love new instant Pream, the delicious coffee "creamer." It's made entirely from fresh sweet cream and other milk products, by the exclusive Pream process.

Get Pream* in the Regular jar or New Economy Size that "creams" up to 70 cups of coffee. It never spills or spoils . . . stays fresh tasting in daily use! If you like it "with," you'll love it with Pream!

new recipe! BEST PEA SOUP EVER—

Combine canned pea soup and water as directed on label. Add 3 tbsp. Pream to 10½- or 11-ounce can; stir to blend. Heat and serve . . . and enjoy!

FREE RECIPE FOLDER! Write Sally Ross, Pream Test Kitchen, Box 447, Columbus 16, Ohio.

© 1957, H. C. MOORES CO., COLUMBUS 16, OHIO

A CHILD MUST FEEL HE BELONGS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 16

were discharged as soon as the diagnosis was made. The services had nowhere near the number of highly trained personnel that would have been necessary to attempt rehabilitation, even if there had been no war to carry on. The situation is not much better in civilian life. There is the same shortage of psychiatrists, social workers and psychologists, and they have their hands full with cases which are much more promising and co-operative. The confirmed psychopath rarely sees that it is he who is making the trouble around him, and even if he did see this he wouldn't have the determination to stick to the long, hard treatment. Two things can be said on the brighter side. Many psychopaths, especially the borderline cases, show some tendency to settle down and become more responsible as they outgrow the impetuousness of youth. This improvement may be seen when the psychopath has the good fortune to marry a person who is more stable and more loving than he. In a sense, his spouse and children give him, belatedly, the love which he never had in childhood. The other more hopeful aspect is the possibility of prevention or amelioration during the childhood years. There are some important lessons we can learn—as citizens and parents and child-care workers—from the sad fate of psychopaths.

The most critical time for character formation is the first few years of life, and the most essential requirement is that a child feel that he belongs to his parents (or parent substitutes) and is loved by them. This statement is too generalized to mean much without some explanation. Being loved by parents or parent substitutes means more than being protected, provided for and kissed. Good parents, in addition, will care how the child behaves and require that he be considerate of them and the rest of society. A child learns a little about what is expected of him in his second year, a little more in the third, a lot between three and six, many more detailed rules after that. But all the teaching of parents and others is relatively useless unless he first gets the feeling of being cherished, and develops, in response, a deep attachment to and a desire to please those who are so important to him. The most crucial time for this foundation to be laid is the first year of life. If it isn't laid down then, it's very difficult to make up for the omission later. Psychopaths don't grow up only in obviously broken or deprived or indifferent homes. Occasionally the parents are responsible, or even prominent, citizens who have apparently provided their child with everything that society considers right. But careful investigation always shows that they did not love him at all, and, unconsciously at least, did not expect anything good from him.

There are a number of very practical applications of this general proposition which I shall have to list in a brief and arbitrary manner. Babies who are up for adoption should not remain in institutions for long periods, but should be placed with the adopting parents at the earliest possible moment so that they can get their roots down. State laws should facilitate this aim. Child-placing agencies should be well supported and well staffed so that they can help all natural mothers to reach the right decision by the time their babies are born and so that they can select the most promising adopting homes.

Babies and very young children should be hospitalized for long periods only if that is essential. (The same is true, of course, for short hospitalization, even though the deprivation is quite different.) The mother should visit as often and as long as possible and participate in the care of the child, if that can be arranged. Each child should have a nurse or aide or volunteer especially designated to mother him.

Mothers who have been widowed or otherwise left without adequate support should receive a sufficiently ample welfare allowance so that they are never forced to leave young children with unsatisfactory substitutes in order to earn a living. Anything else is false economy.

Family and children's social agencies almost everywhere need more funds and more staff to counsel parents who are having domestic problems, so that marriages can either be saved and strengthened or, if that is not possible, the best provision may be made for the children's care.

Young children who cannot be cared for by their parent or adopted should be placed with carefully selected and supervised foster parents. There is desperate need for more good foster parents in every part of the United States. (If you have any inclination to consider caring for a foster child, you can get in touch with the right agency through your Community Chest.)

A teacher, no matter how skilled, cannot help the children with borderline adjustment if she has forty—and sometimes even more—children in the class. We need more and better teachers, more and better schools. It is a disgrace that in the richest country in the world, at the time of its greatest prosperity, so many children are being deprived of adequate schooling.

In most parts of this country, a great deal more could be done to screen properly the adolescents who are having their first brush with the law, to keep at home and supervise those who will probably need no further correction, and to provide much, much better rehabilitation programs for those who must be institutionalized.

SCHOOLS, COLLEGES AND CAMPS

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND BULLETINS AND ARRANGE PERSONAL INTERVIEWS. IN WRITING, MENTION YOUR REQUIREMENTS

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 555 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Junior Colleges

SULLINS
Distinguished Junior College for Young Women
Accredited. All major liberal arts and career courses. Outstanding social program. All sports. Own stable. Lake. Indoor pool. Golf. Est. 1870. Catalog.
Wm. T. Martin, Pres., Box J, Bristol, Va.

Marjorie Webster Junior College
Accredited. 2-yr. terminal and transfer courses. A.A. degree. Lib. Arts; Phys. Ed.; Kindergarten; Secretarial; Med. Secretarial; Speech; Dramatics, Radio, TV; Music; Art; Merchandising. Pool, gym. Suburban Campus. Catalog.
Box H, Rock Creek Park Estates, Washington 12, D. C.

Co-educational, Campus College
Associate In Arts Degree
Terminal and Transfer Courses. Small, friendly, co-ed college near Boston. Athletics. Swimming pool.
W. L. Garner, Pres.
Dean JUNIOR COLLEGE
Franklin Mass.

Vermont College A two-year college for 300 women. Terminal, transfer courses. Associate degrees. Liberal arts, pre-professional, home ec., art, nursery teaching, secretarial, medical sec'l, medical tech., general. Spacious hilltop campus in Vermont's winter recreational area. 16 bldgs. Glee Club, choir. Est. 1834. Catalog. R. H. Noble, Pres., Montpelier, Vt.

GREENBRIER FOR GIRLS
Junior College & 2 yrs. High School. In healthful Alleghenies. 146th year. Liberal Arts and Career Courses. Personal guidance. Outstanding social, sports programs. Fireproof suites. Addah B. McClaskey, Dir. of Admissions, Box L, Lewisburg, W. Va.

Cazenovia Junior College Awards A.A. and A.A.S. degrees. Liberal arts, science, merchandising, nursery school, medical illustration; chemical, foreign, legal, medical and general secretarial; physical education, music, art. Year 'round sports. In lakes region near Syracuse. Founded 1824. Catalog. Director of Admissions, Box A, Cazenovia, N. Y.

Nichols Junior College For Men, Executive Courses in Business Administration, leading to degree. Conservation & Forestry Courses. 1500-acre forest. An investment in Education. Unexcelled location. 200-acre country campus. Modern dorms. All sports. Limited enrollment. James L. Conrad, Pres., Nichols Junior College, Dudley 6, Mass.

Averett College
For girls, fully accredited. Transfer, terminal. Liberal Arts. Pre-professional courses. Merchandising, home ec., secretarial, med. sec'l. Music, art, drama. Individual attention, small classes. Sports, pool, gym. Endowed. 99th yr. Catalog.
Curtis Bishop, President, 424 W. Main St., Danville, Va.

Virginia Intermont Fully accredited Junior College for women. Liberal Arts and Career Courses. Music, Art, Drama, Radio, Journalism, 2-year Nursing, Home Economics, Physical Education, Retailing, Secretarial. Elevation 2000 feet. Sports, riding, gym, pool. Est. 1884. Inclusive rate $1250. Catalog. Dir. Adm., Intermont, Box 102, Bristol, Va.

Gulf Park By The Sea Fully accredited. Jr. College, 2 yrs. H.S. Strong Liberal Arts program prepares young women for college entrance or transfer. High academic standards. National patronage. Music, art, dance, home economics, secretarial, speech. Water sports on Gulf of Mexico. Trips. Catalog.
William G. Dwyer, Ed. D., Box J, Gulfport, Mississippi

Linden Hall
Junior College and School for Girls. Cultural and Vocational. Music, Home Economics, Secretarial Studies. Fine and Commercial Art. Dramatic Art. Preparatory and General Courses. All sports. Riding. Swimming Pool. Moderate tuition. Address: Byron K. Horne, D.D., Box 71, Lititz, Pa.

College

Emerson College Specialization in radio, television, drama, speech, speech and hearing therapy within a broad liberal arts program. B.A., B.S., M.A., M.S. degrees. Coed. College owned theatre, radio station and completely up-to-date electronic TV production studio. Dormitories. 78th yr. Catalog.
Admissions Dean, 126 Beacon St., Boston 16, Mass.

Girls' Camps

Tegawitha on the sunny top of the Poconos. A Catholic camp for girls. 800 acres on private lake. All land sports. Swimming, riding, dancing, dramatics, crafts. Junior and Senior groups. Private chapel on grounds. 41st year.
Director: Mrs. W. M. Lynch.
Catalog: Camp Tegawitha, Box L, Tobyhanna, Pa.

Kiniya On a Bay of Lake Champlain in Vermont. Girls 6–17. 40th Season. Riding for every girl every day—wonderful trails—own stable. Sailing, swimming, canoeing, water skiing, tennis, archery, riflery, crafts, dramatics, dance. Separate division for girls under 10. Give age. Booklet.
Mr. & Mrs. John S. Williams, 70 Park St., Canton, N. Y.

Les Chalets Français On Maine Coast at Deer Isle.
The unique camp with an original, imaginative, informal program. Girls 5–18 learn fluent French the easy conversational way. Live in Swiss chalets. Riding, sailing, swimming, tennis. Music, art, ballet, dramatics. Skilled staff. Catalog.
Mrs. Elsa L. James, 1024 Westview Avenue, Phila. 19, Pa.

Coed Camp

Dartmuthe—Cape Cod Theatre—Art Dance—Music
Coeds 12-20 share artistic interests in relaxed, congenial group; give weekly stage and dance performances, art exhibits, concerts. Beginners and advanced. Professional staff make learning fun. Swimming, tennis. (Boston, NYC interviews. Mrs. C. C. Crocker, Box 22, East Brewster, Mass.

Girls' School Switzerland

La Chatelainie St. Blaise, Neuchatel French Switzerland
Preparatory & Finishing school for girls 13–21. College Board preparation in English. Languages, home economics, secretarial courses. Optional winter & summer at Gstaad. Tours to Italy, France. Established 1880. Summer Session June—September. Dr. A. L. Jobin, Principal

Girls' Schools

Kent Place
A SCHOOL FOR GIRLS · SUMMIT NEW JERSEY
Since 1894 a school of distinctive purpose—to graduate alert, poised girls, well-trained in every respect for college life. Spacious dorm on extensive campus 20 miles from NYC—country and cosmopolitan living. Music, art, dramatics, sports, riding, all activities. Catalog.
Miss Florence A. Wolfe, B.A., M.A., Headmistress

Cathedral School of St. Mary
An accredited Episcopal school for girls. Near New York City. Boarding fifth grade to college. Strong college preparatory course. Music, Dramatics, Art, Modern Dance. Excellent sports program. Riding. 81st year. Catalog.
Address Registrar, Box J, Garden City, Long Island, N.Y.

Penn Hall Junior College
192 acres in Blue Ridge Mts. Terminal or transfer courses. Lib. Arts, Home Ec., Music, Art, Merchandising, Radio, Sec'l. Lab. Tech., Med. Sec'l. Also Prep School Division. Modern buildings. Pool, riding, golf on campus. Trips.
Dr. C. Gordon Frantz, Pres., Box W, Chambersburg, Pa.

The Grier School In the Alleghenies. For Girls, grades 9–12. Accredited College Preparation and General Courses. Home atmosphere. Music, Art, Dramatics, Typing. Exceptional riding. Winter, team sports. 1000 acres. Gym and pool. 106th year. Accessible Chicago, Washington, New York. Catalog.
Mr. & Mrs. Thomas C. Grier, Co-Heads, Box 111, Tyrone, Pa.

Chapel Hill
Carefully supervised college preparatory and general courses for girls. Grades 7–12. Small classes. Moderate rate. Music, art, drama. Typewriting. Social, athletic, creative activities.
Wilfred C. Clark, 327 Lexington St., Waltham, Mass.

Hewlett School
On Long Island. Girls 8–18. Established 1915. Accredited by N.Y. Bd. Regents. College prep & general courses. Music, Art. Small friendly classes. Field trips. Full sports program. Riding, tennis. Shore-front campus. 50 mi. N.Y.C.
Jeanette J. Sullivan, Headmistress, East Islip, L.I., N.Y.

Mary A. Burnham School For Girls. 81st year. Graduates are mature, poised, thoroughly prepared for college. Fully accredited. Music, art emphasized. Traditional campus life. National enrollment. Riding, skiing, swimming, all sports. Summer School. Newport, R.I. Catalogs. Mrs. George Waldo Emerson, Box 43-X, Northampton, Mass.

Howard Accredited college preparation for girls. 83rd yr. Grades 8–12 and P.G. Art, music, speech, dramatics. Typing, shorthand. Small classes, friendly atmosphere. Supervised study, personalized guidance. New gym and auditorium. All sports. Riding. 40 min. from Boston.
Mrs. Vida A. Clough, Box 22, West Bridgewater, Mass.

Stuart Hall
In Virginia's Shenandoah Valley. An Episcopal girls' school. Fully accredited. Grades 9–12. Notable college entrance record. Music and art. Charming atmosphere. Attractive campus. All sports. Gymnasium. Indoor swimming pool.
Martha Dabney Jones, M.A., Box L, Staunton, Virginia

Boys' Schools

PEEKSKILL MILITARY ACADEMY
125th year. Successful College preparation. High Achievement records in College and Life. Non profit. Small classes. Personal interest in each boy. Athletic teams for all, intramural & varsity. Expert coaching. Rifle & Swim Teams. Swimming pool, Band, Glee club, Camera club, etc. Grades 7–12. Summer session. For illustrated catalog write:
Headmaster, Box 401, Peekskill-on-Hudson 4, N.Y.

Tilton School Thorough college preparation, Grades 8–12. Builds character, responsibility, leadership. Small classes, understanding masters, stimulating instruction. Large gym. Extensive sports program for all. Outing Club, Glee Club, Debating. Mod. tuition. Est. 1845. Early application advised. Catalog.
J. Gordon Jeffries, Dean, Box D, Tilton, N. H.

St. John's College Preparation only. Boys Grades 9–12
Fully accredited Catholic school. Directed by Xaverian Bros. Outstanding college record. Openings in 9th grade only for '58. Interscholastic sports plus tennis, golf, skiing, hockey. Clubs. 200 acres near Boston. 52nd year.
Brother Gilroy, C.F.X., Headmaster, Box L, Danvers, Mass.

Peddie New term Feb. 3. A college preparatory school with a tradition of outstanding success preparing boys for college and for life. Grades 7–12. Endowed; fully accredited. Guidance; developmental reading, public speaking required. Separate Jr. School. All sports, golf, swimming. 280 acres. Summer session. 93rd yr. Catalog.
Dr. C. O. Morong, Headmaster, Box 1-M, Hightstown, N.J.

Worcester Academy Boys prepared for increasingly difficult college entrance exams. Graduates in engineering, scientific schools. Grades 8–12. Preference given younger boys as college pressure requires thorough prep. Only few 1-yr. boys accepted. Nat'l. enrlmt. Est. 1834. Sports. Headmaster.
William S. Piper, Jr., 105 Providence St., Worcester, Mass.

Carson Long
Military School. Educates the whole boy—physically, mentally, spiritually. How to learn, how to labor, how to live. Prepares for college and life. Grades 6–12. 122nd yr. of character building. Rate $1275.00.
Box 10, New Bloomfield, Pa.

Cornwall Academy In The Berkshires. Boys 12–18 College preparation with special emphasis on learning to study intelligently. Remedial instruction in English, reading, math. Daily counseling. Small classes. Full sports program, hobbies. 50 acres. Also Summer Session.
John J. Moran, Headmaster, Great Barrington, Mass.

New York Military Academy
Develops today's Youth for tomorrow's world by building mind, body, character, leadership. R.O.T.C. Graduates all colleges. Infantry, Cavalry, Artillery. Band scholarships. Grades 1–12. Catalog.
17 Academy Ave., Cornwall-on-Hudson, N. Y.

Northwestern Military & Naval Academy College prep. Est. 1888. Accredited. 75 mi. to Chicago, 55 to Milwaukee. Avg. class 10. Fireproof buildings. Modern facilities. 85 acres on lake. Sr. ROTC Basic. All sports; sailing. Summer Camp. Write for catalogs. 81 So. Lake Shore Rd., Lake Geneva, Wis.

Kemper Military School Rounded educational, military, recreational program. Century-old tradition; modern methods. Accredited. Small classes. 8th Grade, H. S. and Jr. College. All sports, pool; flying. 114th yr. Limited number of vacancies for January 5 or 19, 1958. Catalog.
Director of Admissions, 1618 Third St., Boonville, Mo.

Howe Military School Thorough academic training in spiritual environment. Accredited preparatory, business courses. Potential Achievement Rating gives each boy individual goal. Small classes. Jr. School, Senior ROTC. Sports. Activities. New dorms, pool. Episcopal. Est. 1884. Catalog.
Burrett B. Bouton, M.A., 1718 Academy Pl., Howe, Indiana

Ohio Military Institute Ohio's only military academy. Brings out the best in your boy. Large faculty—small classes. Upper school certifies to colleges. Lower school for boys 7–11. High, healthful, wooded 52-acre campus. Est. 1832. Sports, music, rifle club. Moderate tuition. Catalog, write: 5571 Belmont Avenue, College Hill, Cincinnati 24, O.

Missouri Military Academy and Separate Junior School. 69th year. Grades 5–12. Fully accredited. Essentially College Preparatory. Senior ROTC. Friendly and inspiring teachers. Small classes. Strong guidance program. All sports. Riding. Golf. 5 athletic fields. 226 acre campus. Catalog.
Col. C. R. Stribling, 118 Main Street, Mexico, Missouri

St. John's Military Academy Where boys become self-confident men. Accredited college preparation under the famous St. John's System. Grades 7–12. Inspired teaching. Small classes, individual attention. Reading Clinic. ROTC. Fireproof dorms. All sports. Summer Camp. 74th year. Catalog. Dir. of Admissions, Box 318, Delafield, Wis.

Western Military Academy
Emphasis on self-confidence, self-direction, how-to-study. Small classes, guidance. Grades 7–12. Career analysis. Jr.-Sr. R.O.T.C. All athletics: riding, pool. 80th yr. Near St. Louis. Enroll now for January classes. Catalog:
Col. Ralph B. Jackson, Supt., Box L-1, Alton, Illinois

Needless to say, we also should have ten times as many child psychiatrists and guidance clinics as we have today, but here the problem is as much dearth of personnel and training facilities as it is lack of funds.

Many legislators and citizens cry out that we can't afford such services. But studies have shown that society pays much more in the end for the lack of them than it would pay to have them. And the figures show that we are spending enormous sums for the things we've decided we do need: more for liquor, for instance, than for public education.

Before I close, I'd better caution you about making the diagnosis of psychopath yourself. In describing this type of personality I have mentioned a lot of symptoms such as tenseness, selfishness, demandingness, restlessness, inattentiveness, poor schoolwork, friendlessness, poor work record, irresponsibility, which, together, are apt to make up the total picture. But it might be a great mistake and cause needless anguish if you decided that someone you know showed two or three of these symptoms and you then concluded that he was a psychopath and had not been loved as a baby. Each of these symptoms can be caused by factors other than neglect.

I want to remind you, too, if you are starting to worry about having been a bit neglectful on a couple of occasions or having left your child with an unsatisfactory substitute at times, that it usually takes not only a long separation from parents but considerable indifference to make a psychopath. A child can put up with a lot of deprivation if he knows there is a devoted parent who is with him whenever it's possible. Most psychopaths, like my sailors, have not only been separated from parents but have known sooner or later that the parents didn't try too hard to find a better solution and didn't bother to visit them.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest. ED.

NO LONGER "THE TOWN WITHOUT A DOCTOR"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 25

for them. One who was both right and enthusiastic brought his wife to Payson with him on a second trip. Later he told the board (wistfully, they felt—"He'd been asking about housing and about the hunting and fishing up under the Rim"), "I'm sorry. My wife just doesn't feel that a small-town life is right for us."

Another, Dr. David Gilbert, loved the town on sight but still had six months of internship to complete. "He wanted us to hold the place for him. He wanted it a lot. We liked him a lot too. But we felt we had to try getting someone right away. Six months seemed like such a long time."

As the weeks went by and the clinic they had worked so hard to build remained empty and unused, a note of bitterness crept into the comments of Payson's people. "We built the clinic. We all worked hard. It's costing us close to $250 a month to pay for it. Everyone who sees it says it's perfect. We'll give it to our doctor rent-free for the first year to give him time to get established—even provide volunteer workers to help. Why can't we get a doctor when we need one so badly?"

Word of this reached two of the busy doctors who had attended the clinic's dedication ceremonies and who felt personally interested in the project's future. "I'm not sure that the people of Payson really understood all the complications involved in getting a permanent, approved doctor for their clinic under present circumstances," one of these men says. "But you couldn't stand by and watch all that fine community spirit dwindle away into disillusionment."

The two doctors did what they could. Each volunteered to give the Payson Clinic one day a week. Neither had a day to give except his own day off. They worked out a schedule. After that, on Wednesdays and Fridays, the pine-paneled reception room of the Payson Clinic was crowded, voices murmured, lights blinked on, buzzers sounded, the door marked "Doctor's Office" swung open and closed through busy clinic hours.

The doctors—one a general practitioner, the other a flight surgeon at a Phoenix air base—were both pilots and they flew in to Payson when the weather permitted. As a further aid to the clinic, the flying club from which their small planes were rented charged its fee of $7 an hour only for actual flying time (ordinarily "standby" time is charged for as well and represents a large part of the expense). When the weather was bad for flying or the airstrip was mudded in, the doctors had to drive. Bad weather can—and does—wash out those sections of the road still under construction. At times Payson is cut off.

Paysonites were fervent in their appreciation. Juniors worked Tuesdays and Thursdays getting the clinic and its equipment spotlessly clean for the doctors, tidied up afterward.

Both doctors had promised to fly in as quickly as possible any time an emergency arose. That emergency struck one Saturday morning. Keith Owens, owner of Payson's largest industry, a lumber company, was helping load logs for the sawmill when he accidentally touched a 12,000-volt power line. For two frantic hours—while both doctors were flying in to help—friends and co-workers applied artificial respiration. But when the doctors did arrive there was nothing they could do for forty-four-year-old Keith Owens.

To shocked Payson, the tragedy pointed up once more the great need for a full-time doctor of their own. Time had passed. The six months that once seemed too long a time to wait for the young doctor who was finishing his internship—Dr. David Gilbert, who loved Payson and wanted to make it his home—"Well, it wasn't as long as we thought." One day the door marked "Doctor's Office" read instead, "Doctor Gilbert." The sign that read "Office Hours Wednesday and Friday" announced instead "Office Hours Daily." And now, if another emergency strikes—as it has so often in the past—everyone in Payson knows just where and how to get in touch with their friend and neighbor, "Doctor Dave." END

SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND BULLETINS AND ARRANGE PERSONAL INTERVIEWS. IN WRITING, MENTION YOUR REQUIREMENTS

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 555 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Boys' Schools

The Baylor School for Boys
January entrance. College prep. Accredited scholarship. Boys 12–18. Semi-military. Endowed awards. Ideal location. Modern facilities. New gym. Championship athletics. Non-sectarian religious guidance. Summer camp, boys 8–15. Catalog. 129 Cherokee Road, Chattanooga, Tennessee Randolph-Macon Academy Military. Accredited. 66th yr. Near Skyline Drive. Prepares for college through intensive study methods. Fireproof dormitory includes class rooms, swimming pool. Superior equipment. 70 miles from Washington, D.C. Write for catalog and "Your Boy." Col. John C. Boggs, President, Box H, Front Royal, Va.

Greenbrier Military School
146th yr. The School of Achievement. 7th & 8th grades & H.S. and P.G. Dept. ROTC. 2300 ft. elev. White Sulphur Springs' golf & swim pool. Modern gym & new Rifle range. Athletics. Band, Glee Club. Summer Camp. For Catalog write D. T. Moore, Box J-601, Lewisburg 6, W. Va.

Hargrave Military Academy Fully accredited. College preparatory, general courses. Grades 5–12. How-to-study training; remedial reading; individual guidance. Wholesome Christian influences. Separate Junior School. All sports. Summer School. Founded 1909. Catalog:
Col. Joseph H. Cosby, Pres., Box L, Chatham, Virginia

Augusta Military Academy
"The Friendly School." Distinguished ROTC school in Shenandoah Valley. Jr. & Sr. Divisions. Boys 8–20. Accredited; graduates in leading colleges. All sports—pool, gym. 1400 acres. Family owned since 1742. Rate $1200. Catalog. Col. Charles S. Roller, Box J, Ft. Defiance, Va.

STAUNTON MILITARY ACADEMY
In Beautiful Shenandoah Valley. Thorough college preparation; fully accredited. Individual guidance. Band. All sports. 2 gyms. Pool. Fine health record. Fireproof buildings. Separate Junior School. Illus. Catalog write Supt. S.M.A. Box J1, Staunton, Va.
BASIC COURSE R.O.T.C. BY U. S. ARMY INSTRUCTORS. Founded 1860

FORK UNION MILITARY ACADEMY
★ Our ONE SUBJECT PLAN of study in Upper School (grades 9–12) has increased honor roll 50%. Develops concentration. Fully accredited. ROTC highest rating. 17 modern buildings, 2 completely equipped gyms, 2 indoor pools. Splendid environment, excellent health record. Junior School (grades 4–8) has separate buildings, gym. Housemothers. 60th year. For ONE SUBJECT PLAN booklet and catalog write:
Dr. J. C. Wicker, Box 861, Fork Union, Va.
★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★ ★

McDonogh A leading preparatory school for boys. Grades 1–12. Accredited. Prepares for all colleges, service academies. Small classes. Individual guidance. Music. Dairy and animal husbandry. Semi-military. Sports. 80 horses; 2 gyms, indoor pool. 835-acre country campus near Baltimore. Est. 1873. Catalog.
Robert L. Lamborn, Ed. D., Box 117, McDonogh, Maryland

Fishburne Military School
A distinguished military school for the young man seriously concerned with making adequate preparation for college entrance. Accredited since 1897. Grades 9–12. Highest ROTC rating. Summer School. Write for catalog.
Colonel E. P. Childs, Jr., Box E, Waynesboro, Virginia

Massanutten Military Academy
59th yr. Accredited. New Dorm & classrooms. Small classes. College Preparatory. Supervised study. ROTC. Band, Rifle team, Riding, Tennis, Football, Basketball, Baseball. Athletics for all. Gym, Pool. Grades 6–12. Catalog. Col. R. J. Benchoff, Hdmr., Woodstock 4, Va. (Shenandoah Val.)

The Sewanee Military Academy
Division Univ. of the South. Fully accredited. Grades 8–12. Small classes. Individual attention. Boys Taught to Study. ROTC Highest Rating. All sports; gym, indoor pool. 10,000-acre mountain domain. Episcopal. 91st year. Catalog.
Col. Craig Alderman, Supt., Box L, Sewanee, Tennessee

The Miller School of Albemarle
Military. Grades 5–12. College preparatory plus industrial arts, iron & wood working, auto mechanics, machine shop & electricity. Endowed. Inclusive rate $1200. Sports. New gym. 1500 acres. Near Charlottesville. 80th year. Catalog.
Col. W. Hugh Flannagan, Dept. L, Miller School P.O., Va.

Business & Secretarial

BRYANT COLLEGE B. S. DEGREE IN 2 or 3 YEARS
Business Administration: majors in Accounting, Management, Marketing. Executive Secretarial: majors in Administrative, Legal, Accounting, Medical. Business Teacher-Education: 4 years. Also 1-year Secretarial Diploma. Coed. Campus life in attractive environment. 25 buildings. Dorms. Veteran approved. 95th year. Limited enrollment. Register early. Sept. and Feb. entrance. Catalog Ruth West.
Professional training for business leadership
BRYANT COLLEGE, PROVIDENCE 6, RHODE ISLAND

Wood Secretarial School
Courses for H.S., Private School grads and College women. Air-conditioned. Accredited by State Educ. Dept. Guidance, placement service. Dorm. 79th year. Enroll now for Feb., July or Sept. Catalog. Enrollment Sec'y, 125 Park Ave., (100 E. 42 St., opp. Grand Central), N. Y. 17. OX 7-1290 katharine gibbs secretarial

BOSTON 16, 21 Marlborough St.
NEW YORK 17, 230 Park Ave.
MONTCLAIR, N.J., 33 Plymouth St.
PROVIDENCE 6, 155 Angell St.
Outstanding training. Three practical courses.
One-Year Secretarial
Liberal Arts-Secretarial (two years)
Special Course for College Women
Catalog: ADMISSIONS DEAN

Chandler School For women. Professional secretarial training combined with advantages of living-in-Boston available to H. S. graduates. 2-yr. Medical, Legal, Executive courses. 1-yr. skills course. Resident facilities with cultural, social program at Franklin Square House. Catalog. Dr. George I. Rohrbough, President, 440 Beacon St., Boston 15, Mass.

Home Study Schools

Calvert School You can educate your child at home with famous Calvert School-At-Home Courses. Kindergarten—9th grade. Accredited. Easy-to-follow teaching manual; lessons, books, supplies. No experience needed. Guidance by Calvert teachers. Start any time. 52nd year. Catalog. Give age, school grade.
Calvert School, 851 E. Tuscany Rd., Baltimore 10, Md.

HIGH SCHOOL at HOME
You can still finish High School—at home, in your spare time. No interference with job, or social life. Win more pay, a better job, social recognition. Take only the subjects you need. Complete lesson and answer service. Personalized instruction. Low cost. Diploma to graduates.
I.C.S. is oldest and largest (257 courses). Write today for 3 free books: (1) 36-page "How to Succeed," (2) sample lesson (Math), (3) Career Catalogue—indicate course desired.
INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS SCRANTON 15, PENNA. DEPT. 39112M

ACCOUNTANT BECOME AN EXPERT
TO THE WOMAN WHO WANTS TO ENJOY AN ACCOUNTING CAREER
FREE SAMPLE LESSON
Thousands of firms need women accountants. We train you thoroly at home in spare time for well paying accounting positions. Previous experience unnecessary. Personal training under supervision of staff of CPAs and expert accountants. Placement counsel. Write for sample lesson and illustrated free book, "Opportunities in Accounting" which describes the opportunities for women in this profitable field.
LASALLE Extension University, 417 So. Dearborn St. Correspondence Institution, Dept. H 913 Chicago 5, Ill.

Medical Technology

Northwest Institute of Medical Laboratory Technique Founded 1918. M. D. Faculty. Courses to 12 mos. in clinical laboratory, X-ray and EKG. Free placement service. Coed classes start Jan., Apr., July, Oct. G. I. approved. Catalog.
3418 E. Lake Street, Minneapolis 6, Minn.

Many of these schools and colleges accept new students for the second semester, beginning in January or February. Applications for the fall term are being considered now, too, and it is advisable to begin your investigations early. You are invited to write to the schools and camps on these pages for descriptive booklets.
School and Camp Advertising, 555 Fifth Ave., New York 17, N.Y.

Coeducational Schools

Solebury School College Preparatory School in Bucks County, Pa. Near Phila. and New York City. Separate campus for girls. Experienced faculty. Strong science, languages (Greek, Latin, French, German). Interscholastic sports. '58 vacancies grades 9 and 10 only. ETS Admission Tests required.
William P. Orrick, Headmaster, Box J, New Hope, Pa.

Oakwood School An accredited coeducational Friends Boarding School. Grades 9-12. Strong college preparation. Religion, art, music; shop, typing. Guidance. Work program. Sports. Social activities. Country campus 75 miles from New York City. Founded 1796. Catalog: C. J. Hutton, Principal, Poughkeepsie, New York. GLobe 4-9400

Judson School In Arizona. A coed ranch school. Grades 1 to 12. College Preparatory. Beautiful location in Paradise Valley. Healthful, warm climate. Small classes. Accredited. Riding & polo included in tuition. Tennis, swimming, pack trips, fishing, rodeos, riflery, roping, music. 30th year. Catalog.
H. J. Wick & D. M. Ashley, Dirs., Scottsdale, Arizona

Wayland Academy Near Milwaukee, Chicago. Coed. College prep. Grades 9–12. Fully accredited. Limited enrollment, individual attention. Christian environment. Graduates in leading colleges. Drama, music, speech. Athletics for all. 2 gyms, pool. Winter sports. Ice Carnival. Dorms. Est. 1855. Catalog. R. A. Patterson, Hdm., Box 87, Beaver Dam, Wisc.

Retailing

School of Retailing
NEW YORK UNIVERSITY
Washington Square, New York 3, N. Y.
Retailing graduates have a choice of well-paying executive careers. Key positions in buying, advertising, fashion, personnel, management. One-year graduate program leads to Master's degree. Co-educational.
Supervised experience—with pay—in leading New York stores. Market contacts. Programs also for undergraduates and special students in day, evening, and summer divisions.
Write for Booklet "R"

Fine & Applied Arts

Ray-Vogue Schools
Commercial Art, Photography, Interior Decoration, Dress Design. Fashion Merchandising with Modeling. Fashion Illustration. Coed. Attractive residence for girls. Enter Jan. 6; Feb. 3. Specify course. Write Registrar, Room 706, Ray-Vogue Schools, 706 N. Michigan Ave., Chicago 11

New York School of Interior Design
Four Months' Practical Training Course starts February 3rd. Faculty of leading N. Y. decorators. Period and modern styles, color schemes, all fundamentals. Send for Catalog 7R. Home Study Course for those who cannot come to N.Y. Starts at once. Catalog 7C. 29 East 72nd St., N. Y. 21

Home Study Schools

American School High School at Home. Many Finish in 2 Years. Go as rapidly as your time and abilities permit. Prepares for college entrance exams. Standard H.S. texts supplied. Diploma awarded. Credit for H.S. subjects already completed. Single subjects if desired. Free Bulletin.
American School, Dept. H13, Drexel at 58th, Chicago 37

National School of Dress Design
Approved supervised home study training. Fine starting point for career. No classes. No wasted time. Text and work kit furnished. Diploma awarded. Low tuition and payments. Send for free booklet.
835 Diversey Parkway, Dept. 1371, Chicago 14, Ill.

Chicago School of Interior Decoration
Home study training. Approved and supervised. Fine starting point for career. No classes. No wasted time. Text and work kit furnished. Diploma awarded. Send for free booklet. Chicago School of Interior Decoration, 835 Diversey Pkwy., Dept. 1371, Chicago 14.

Play Right Away!
ANY INSTRUMENT
Now it's EASY to learn ANY INSTRUMENT—even if you don't know a single note now. No boring exercises. You play delightful pieces RIGHT AWAY—from very first lesson! Properly—by note. Simple as A-B-C. You make amazing progress—at home, in spare time, without teacher. Only few cents per lesson. 900,000 STUDENTS!
FREE BOOK Shows how easy it is to learn music this modern way. Write for it. No obligation; no salesman will call upon you.
U.S. School of Music, Studio 631, Port Washington, N.Y. (60th year).

"We're looking for people who like to draw"

BY ALBERT DORNE
Famous Magazine Illustrator

IF YOU LIKE TO DRAW—America's 12 Most Famous Artists want you to test your art talent. We want to find out if you can be trained to be a successful, money-making artist.

This offer is part of a program we began ten years ago. We found that many men and women who should have become artists—didn't. Most of them hesitated to find out how much hidden art talent they had. Others who knew they had talent simply never had the opportunity to get topnotch professional training.

My colleagues and I decided to do something about this. Taking time off from our busy art careers, we pooled the extensive knowledge of art, the professional know-how, and the priceless trade secrets which we ourselves were able to learn only through long, successful experience.

We illustrated this knowledge with 5,000 special drawings; then organized it into a series of lessons covering every aspect of drawing and painting . . . lessons that anyone could take right in their own homes and in their spare time. Finally—after much testing—we perfected what is probably the most personal and effective method of criticizing a student's drawings and paintings that the field of art teaching has ever known.

Our program of art training is now well known and respected all over America. During the past ten years, we have helped thousands of people find success in art. Here are just a few:

Don Smith lives in New Orleans. Three years ago Don knew nothing about art—even doubted he had talent. Today, he is an illustrator with a leading advertising agency in the South—and has a future as big as he wants to make it.

Harriet Kuzniewski was bored with an "ordinary" job when she sent for our talent test. Once convinced that she had the makings of an artist—she started to study art at home. Soon she was offered a job as a fashion artist. A year later, she became assistant art director of a big buying office.

Pipe-fitter to Artist

John Busketta is another. He was a pipefitter's helper with a big gas company—until he decided to do something about his urge to draw. He still works for the same company—but as an artist in the advertising department. At a big increase in pay!

Eric Ericson used to be a clerk in an auto parts department. Thanks to our training, he is now an art director at seven times the salary he was making when he enrolled.

Salesgirl, Clerk, and Father of Three Win New Careers

A West Virginia salesgirl studied with us, got a job as an artist, later became advertising manager of the best store in Charleston.

John Whitaker of Memphis, Tenn., was an airline clerk when he began studying with us. Two years later, he won a national cartooning contest. Recently, a huge syndicate signed him to do a daily comic strip.

Stanley Bowen—a married man with three children, unhappy in a dead-end job—took our training and switched to a great new career in art. Now he's one of the happiest men you'll ever meet!

Profitable Hobby—at 72

A great-grandmother in Newark, Ohio, decided to use her spare time to study painting. Recently, she had her first local "one man" show—where she sold thirty-two water colors and five oil paintings.

Cowboy Starts Art Business

Donald Kern—a cowboy from Miles City, Montana—studied art with us. Now he paints portraits, sells them for $250 each, and gets all the business he can handle.

Elizabeth Merriss—busy New York mother—now adds to her family income by designing gift wrappings and greeting cards and illustrating children's books.

Gertrude Vander Poel had never drawn a thing until she started studying with us. Now a swank New York gallery exhibits her paintings for sale.

Free Art Talent Test

To find other men and women with talent worth developing, we have created a special 12-page art talent test. Thousands of people formerly paid $1 for this test. But now our School offers it free and will grade it free. People who reveal talent through this test are eligible for professional training by the School . . . right in their own homes.

If you like to draw and want to know if you have talent worth developing—mail the coupon today. The test will be mailed to you without cost or obligation.

America's 12 Most Famous Artists

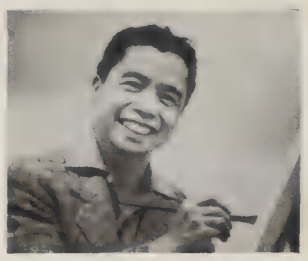
ALBERT DORNE

NORMAN ROCKWELL

AL PARKER

JON WHITCOMB

HAROLD VON SCHMIDT



STEVAN DOHANOS

FRED LUDEKENS

PETER HELCK

ROBERT FAWCETT

BEN STAHL

DONG KINGMAN

AUSTIN BRIGGS

FAMOUS ARTISTS SCHOOLS
Studio 529, Westport, Conn.
Send me, without obligation, your Famous Artist Talent Test.

Mr.
Mrs. _____ Age____
Miss (PLEASE PRINT)
Address _____
City _____ Zone____
County _____ State____

Ladies' Home

JOURNAL

February
1958~35

The Magazine Women Believe In

WHICH IS YOUR PROBLEM?

We Can't Live on $25,000 a Year". . ."We Do Fine on $8,400"

COMPLETE NOVEL THE TROUBLED HOUSE CONDENSED IN THIS ISSUE

How Can Mothers of Small Children Keep From Being Driven Crazy?—DR. SPOCK ANSWERS

"WE WENT TO CAROL'S APARTMENT," HE ADMITTED—Can This [illegible] Be [illegible]ed?

ything
g a new ier for himself.
nd I've got to have a new kitchen!"
eck before, one of the men neighborhood tackled me while pulling into my driveway to say:
ookit, George. That confounded nator model kitchen display down-has sold Jane on an all-new what chance have I got

When you can't take time out...take BUFFERIN®

Bufferin relieves pain twice as fast as aspirin!

1. Medical science knows that a pain reliever must get into the blood stream to relieve pain.

2. Bufferin combines aspirin with Di-Alminate (antacid ingredients). These speed the pain reliever out of the stomach and into the blood stream twice as fast as aspirin. So...

3. Bufferin acts twice as fast as aspirin to relieve pain. And it won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does.

Won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does!

When pain makes you feel that you can't possibly go on, remember this:

Bufferin acts twice as fast as aspirin . . . to relieve headaches, painful cold miseries, muscular pains and other discomforts. (Diagram, left, shows why.)

Bufferin acts amazingly fast to relieve your pain. Only Bufferin adds to aspirin an exclusive compound of two special antacid ingredients called Di-Alminate. Result: Bufferin acts twice as fast as aspirin—won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does.

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

If you suffer from the pain of arthritis or rheumatism, ask your physician about Bufferin.

FREE BULBS from GOLD MEDAL

FREE! Rare Imported AFRICAN WONDER FLOWERS

Wonder Flower (Chincherinchee) bulbs come potted—ready to grow!

- Bulbs are imported from Africa for Gold Medal!
- Bulbs will grow and bloom this summer!
- ...lb yields two or more spectacular blooming ...ious clusters, each with dozens
- ...how" in your neighborhood— ...w thrilling Wonder Flowers.
- Dramatic and exotic in gardens and floral arrangements—clusters continue to bloom in water for 2 or 3 weeks after cutting!
- Easy planting and growing instructions are packed with each bulb.
- Get yours NOW...sensationally popular in Europe. Wonder Flower bulb supply limited. Offer good only while current supplies last!

Gold Medal makes a "flower" of a treat!

In the same sack with your free "Wonder Flower" coupon you'll find the new, quick 'n easy recipe for Betty Crocker's delicious Streamlined Bread! Real old-fashioned, homemade-good bread—now streamlined for moderns! Mix in minutes, no kneading or shaping...foolproof with dependable Gold Medal "Kitchen-tested" Flour. It's the "flower" of the wheat—the very finest part of the wheat—better for everything you bake!

Bake it Better with Gold Medal

– the "flower" of the wheat!

FREE BULBS
for certificates inside 5-lb. or larger specially marked Gold Medal sacks.

General Mills

Ladies' Home Journal

CONTENTS

VOL. LXXV NO. 2

February, 1958

JOURNALITIES

Kage Booton

"I often tell myself, 'You can't have everything,'" KAGE BOOTON reports, "but that day I heard the JOURNAL was taking my book I did have everything. We were in the process of moving twenty miles up the Mohawk from Amsterdam to Canajoharie—'we' being my husband, an industrial engineer, two daughters, Donna and Susan, our cocker spaniel, Candy (the model for the dog in my book, having produced seven puppies which had to be brought up on formula and baby food), and a cat that looks like a dust mop. I enjoy reading, writing, golfing, probably take bridge too seriously, collecting and refinishing antique furniture. The people in The Troubled House (page 44) were 'born' while I was doing over an old square grand piano last year."

Mel Heimer

If you ask us, I Think I Love You, the title of MEL HEIMER's story on page 42, is something nobody ought to say to anybody. Just leave that "think" out of it—and that's the story. The author says, "I'm one of the only two people, apparently, who were born in Hoboken; Frank Sinatra was the other. I grew up in Westchester County, wearied of its drugstore cowboys and Wednesday-night bridge dates when I was twenty-four and came to Manhattan to live. I like gaudy clothes and wear blue eyeglasses; I'm trying to revive the wonderful custom of New York newspapermen's carrying walking sticks. I play poker incessantly and was knocked down and almost killed by an auto at Fifth Avenue and 42nd Street a couple of years ago when I paused dreamily to meditate the first royal flush I ever had drawn."

Helen Rittell

Though HELEN RITTELL has published much poetry, A Day of Rest, page 50, is her first published short story. She is, she reports, "a native Syracusan, the mother of three—two daughters, aged twenty and fourteen, and a son, twelve. With children these ages, a mother can begin to get some writing done. We have a parakeet named Mr. or Mrs. Peepers (we're not sure which) and it seems we seldom have a meal without guests, which suits us fine. My writing career has not been of long duration, but now I think it will be." (Since this was written, the JOURNAL has bought a second story from Mrs. Rittell —ED.)

Condensed Novel Complete in This Issue

THE TROUBLED HOUSE, C. Kage Booton . 44

Stories

I THINK I LOVE YOU, Mel Heimer . 42
THE GREENGAGE SUMMER (Second part of three), Rumer Godden . 46
A DAY OF REST, Helen Rittell . 50

Special Features

DO AMERICAN EDUCATORS KNOW WHAT THEY ARE UP TO?, Dorothy Thompson . 11
CONGRESS MUST ACT ON FOOD ADDITIVES . 11
MOTHERS NEED A BREAK, Benjamin Spock, M.D. . 20
WHEN DISASTER STRIKES, You are There—With the American Red Cross . 25
VOLUNTEERS AT WORK, Margaret Hickey . 25
"WE CAN'T LIVE ON $25,000 A YEAR," as told to Betty Hannah Hoffman . 48
"WE'RE DOING FINE ON $8,400 A YEAR," Nelle Keys Perry . 49
THE WEEK MOTHER WAS SICK, Ted Key . 51
CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?, Dorothy Cameron Disney . 59
HOW AMERICA LIVES: MORE DREAMS THAN MONEY, Betty Hannah Hoffman . 121
THE DISAPPEARING DOLLAR, by Margaret Davidson . 148

General Features

OUR READERS WRITE US . 4
UNDER COVER, Bernardine Kielty . 34
MAKING MARRIAGE WORK, Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D. . 36
THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE, Harlan Miller . 38
FIFTY YEARS AGO ▪ JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN . 41
THIS IS A KATCHOOER, Munro Leaf . 84
ASK ANY WOMAN, Marcelene Cox . 91
REFERENCE LIBRARY . 114

Fashion and Beauty

FIRST STEP INTO SPRING, Wilhela Cushman . 52
THE JOURNAL'S GEM OF A WARDROBE, Nora O'Leary . 56
KEEP YOUR BEAUTY IN TACT, Dawn Crowell Norman . 60
BRIGHT IDEAS FOR MOTHER AND DAUGHTER, Nora O'Leary . 80
HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING!, Bet Hart . 108

Food

APPLEYARD CHURCH SUPPER, Elizabeth Kent Gay . 62
COLLECTOR'S ITEMS . 64
CONVERSATION PIECE, Ruth Mills Teague . 86
MRS. WIZARD, THAT'S YOU, Mary Jane Engel . 136

Gardening and Interior Decoration

A GARDEN IS AN OPEN-AIR ROOM, Richard Pratt . 58
DOUBLE FEATURE DINING ROOM, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland . 145

Poems

THERE ARE OTHER LANDS, Barbara Shook . 28
TOILERS, Archibald Rutledge . 72
NECESSARY EVIL, Janet Henry . 83
IT'S LATER THAN I THINK, Alberte Wright . 96
FULFILLMENT, Florence B. Jacobs . 118
A PHILOSOPHIC THOUGHT BASED ON INCOME, LACK OF, Elizabeth Graham . 131
WHERE THOUGHT LEAPS ON, May Sarton . 140
A SERMON, John Ciardi . 154

Cover: Mark Shaw, Photographer
Tina S. Fredericks, Picture Editor

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

At least 30 days before a change is to take effect please send your complete name, new address and a mailing label from a recent issue. If this is not possible, write with your old address and send it with the new one, including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent.

Ladies' Home Journal, © 1958 The Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Friday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office at Philadelphia, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada.

The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence.

Subscription Prices: U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; 4 Yrs., $11. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 Yr., $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U. S. payable in U. S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice.

Unconditional Guaranty. We agree upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

The Curtis Publishing Company. Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cary W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Benjamin Allen, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Donald M. Hobart, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C. Von Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary; Richard Ziesing, Jr., Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, and Holiday.

HIS new car? OR HER new kitchen?

There really is a way to have both without wrecking the family budget

by George Romney

President, American Motors Corporation

A few weeks ago, when we had several friends in for the evening, one of the wives cornered me. "George Romney,

I'm downright mad at you!" she declared. "Since you let John drive your Rambler, he can't think of anything but getting a new Rambler for himself. And I've got to have a new kitchen!"

Hardly a week before, one of the men in our neighborhood tackled me while I was pulling into my driveway to say:

"Lookit, George. That confounded Kelvinator model kitchen display downtown has sold Jane on an all-new kitchen. So . . . what chance have I got of getting a new car?"

(You see, at American Motors, we make both Rambler and Ambassador cars and Kelvinator home appliances!)

Here's what I told both John's wife . . . and Jane's husband:

You can afford both

I know it's true that many women long for a new kitchen, only to find the new car costs so much to buy (and so much more to run) that the budget can't cover both.

With Rambler, we've done something to solve that problem.

It is the new, modern type of automobile that saves so much both on first cost and upkeep that it practically makes the appliance payments out of savings.

In another way, too, we had women very much in mind in designing this smart new low-cost, economical Rambler. We made it the easiest of all American cars to drive, to turn, to park, to get in and out of the garage.

And Rambler gives you plenty of room. It's the only car that gives you both American big car room and comfort plus European small car economy and handling ease.

I hope you and your husband will soon visit your Rambler dealer and drive a new '58 Rambler.

George Romney

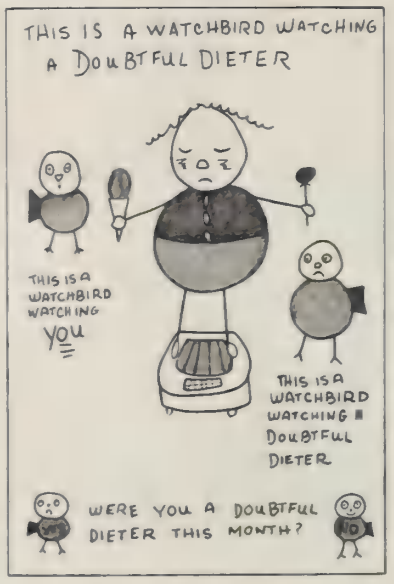
Only Beauty Tone bulbs give you

GLAMOUR

Soft tinted light...not harsh gaudy color!

Now you can bathe your home in beauty without drowning it in colored light. Westinghouse Beauty Tone™ bulbs have a flattering light that comes from a coating within the bulb, not from harsh outside paints. You get a soft, subtle tint that calls attention to you and your rooms, not to the light. The color can't scratch or chip off: the light is soft enough to cut glare, bright enough for restful reading. Look for softer Westinghouse Beauty Tone . . . the tinted bulbs that flatter you! In 60, 75, 100, 150 watts and 3-way sizes.

YOU CAN BE SURE...IF IT'S Westinghouse



BEAUTY TONE BULBS

OUR READERS WRITE US

Look Who's Watching You!

New York City

Dear Sirs: Last week I jumped on the "Energy Diet" bandwagon; and my son

Robert, plagiarizing your Munro Leaf, drew the enclosed "Watchbird" as a reminder for me.

Thanks for the help you've given me in the past. Yours truly,

MRS. TERRY MARCHANT

American Bride in Moscow

Moscow, U.S.S.R.

Dear Mr. and Mrs. Gould: Your article "We Saw How Russians Live" gave me a good idea of what to expect to see when I came to Russia. I arrived in Moscow a short time ago as the bride of a radio-TV correspondent. I wanted to send you this note to thank you for the "briefing."

Irving and I live just across the street from the Kremlin, in two rooms of the National Hotel—a shrine to Victorian decoration, complete with tasseled lamp shades and green velvet drapes and upholstery. Every floor landing has large portraits of Lenin and Stalin, who seem to examine everyone who gets off the little elevator—and, incidentally, you're supposed to use it only for going up; you're expected to walk down. When we have visitors, they always ask, first of all, whether the rooms are tapped for the Russians to listen. We have no way of knowing the answer to this, but the possibility of it was inhibiting to adjust to at first. Now I scarcely ever think of it.

When we order meals from the hotel restaurant, we never need the menu, because it's the same all year; and anyway, 70 per cent of the dishes listed are not available. The beef stroganoff is very good, and so is the tea, served in glasses with silver-handled holders. The borsch was a big disappointment, though, because I had always known borsch to be a clear red beet soup. Here it's made from cabbages and other vegetable leftovers, with bits of sausages floating around. And not a beet in sight. It's not even red.

Every Thursday a tiny Russian man comes in to polish the wood floors. It was surprising the first time to see that his only equipment was a small rag with a strap on it. He coolly sat down and took off his shoe and sock, slipped the strap over his bare foot, and began hopping and dancing about the edges of the rug until the wood gleamed. I understood why this accepted Soviet way of polishing floors made him so thin. It's a real workout.

My workout comes at the outdoor market twice a week. There's much pushing and elbowing in the waiting lines, and none of the goods are wrapped. The first time I bought berries I learned the hard way, as they were dumped from the scales right into my hands. Now, preparation for an excursion to the market is a ritual of collecting jars, plastic bags and the ubiquitous string-net carryall that is as much a part of a Russian woman as her brown woolen stockings. In the cheese-and-cream department, every customer is invited to taste from the vats of sour cream and yoghurt with a common spoon, then drop it back in for the next customer.

Recognizing me as a foreigner, friendly Russians jostle one another for the chance to help me with prices and to find goods. But you can't always tell just how a Russian will act. An annoying type is the self-appointed "Keep Moscow cultured-looking" individual. Usually women, they never hesitate to step up and tell you what they disapprove of. One very warm day last summer I went out in low-heeled shoes without stockings. I had hardly walked to the corner before a woman was after me, pointing to my legs, shaking her finger, and shouting "Nie Kulturny." She followed me for quite a while, scolding loudly and angrily.

This sort of experience makes you wary of what you wear. I have a hat that I love beyond reason. It's a floppy straw that falls limply down to the shoulder line practically three quarters of the way around, and in New York it got some pretty fancy comments from passers-by and taxi drivers. I couldn't bear to leave it home, and here in Moscow one day decided to wear it to a party. Irving was horrified at the prospect of Russians' reactions. He finally agreed that I wear it only if I would walk quite a distance ahead of him, so that he wouldn't be tormented along with me. I started out rather nervously, but determined I walked one block, two blocks, three—and not one head turned. We were mystified. Later we learned, to our delight, that there is an almost identical peasant hat made in an area near Moscow, and that this style of hat is seen fairly often as a result. I have renewed respect for Lilly Dache now. Do you suppose she does her hat research in far-off Russia too?

Nancy and hat.

Again, thank you for your article on Russia. One of the things I miss most about the United States here in Moscow is your fine magazine. Sincerely,

NANCY JONES LEVINE

Those "Why I Love" Letters

St. Petersburg, Florida

Four years ago I lost the dearest person here on earth, my husband. Ever since my life has been empty, shattered and without much meaning. Try as I might, I could not understand the "why" of it all. Then remembers you with a lovely gift!

CONTINUED ON PAGE 6

IVORY

FREE TUSSY "Beauty Touch" Compact (85¢ size)

complete with pressed cake powder

Just send in special wrappers from 4 large or 6 medium Ivory Soap now at your dealer's

99 44/100% pure®
...it floats

That Ivory Look is a gift in itself—a sparkling clear, silken look your complexion can have through the magic of mildness! Simply start using Ivory Soap regularly. Soon this soap that's gentle enough for a baby's skin will smooth and freshen your complexion. You'll have That Ivory Look!

And as a bonus gift—a lovely pink and gold Tussy Beauty Touch compact, an 85¢ value! This delicate blend of pressed powder and foundation base stays color "true," won't cake or streak. To get yours free, send in special wrappers from 4 Large or 6 Medium Ivory. And on the certificate check your skin tone to receive the right shade of powder. Better hurry—supplies are limited.

Procter & Gamble
Department J, Box 3, Cincinnati 99, Ohio

For each free Tussy Beauty Touch compact, I enclose special wrappers from 4 Large____, or 6 Medium____ Ivory. My skin tone is Light__, Medium__, Dark__.

NAME_____

ADDRESS_____

CITY_____ ZONE____ STATE_____

Offer good only in continental U.S.A., including Alaska and Hawaii. Offer expires July 31, 1958. Allow 3 weeks for delivery.

The Most Crowded Classroom can find space for germs!

Wise mothers have their children gargle Listerine before and after school

The common cold is much too common among school children. Before and after school, have your youngsters gargle Listerine. Listerine Antiseptic kills germs by millions.

Tests over 12 years proved that those who gargled Listerine twice every day had fewer and milder colds than those who did not.

Start your whole family gargling Listerine Antiseptic full-strength today!

Reach for Listerine

. . . your No. 1 protection against infection

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 4

my November JOURNAL came, and I think I have found the answer. My thanks for the help your "Why I Love" letters have given me.

DOROTHEA SCOTT SCHWARTZ

Columbus Grove, Ohio

Why not compile a book of all those "Why I Love" letters? They are, as my sixteen-year-old daughter would say, "the most"—a real bit of the heart of our men and women. MRS. KEN VOLKMER

New York City

I am here awaiting the birth of my first child—normally a happy time, but not for me, as I'm not married. Believe me, I was bitter at first; but I'm writing now to thank you for publishing the "Why I Love" letters at a time when I needed help in dispelling the last traces of cynicism toward men and marriage. To love is a wonderful thing, even if it's been foolish and misplaced, and to have your love cherished and returned must be uncountably so. Name withheld

Slingerlands, New York

Your "Why I Love My Husband . . . My Wife" is the kind of thing we need more of, rather than so much emphasis on "Why is my marriage failing?" In fact, I think so much of this article I would like to have reprint copies to mail to members of my parish. Congratulations on such a fine piece of work.

JAMES R. RHODES, Pastor
Community Methodist Church

Younger Generation

Madera, California

Dear Editors: While listening to the news, I suddenly remembered this picture which was taken when we were in the Air Force in England. If our leaders and we parents, too, could forget our prejudices, our next generation would have none of these racial problems. Sincerely,

Air Force children

MARGIE DECESARI

Should Women Vote?

Trenton, New Jersey

Dear Editors: Since Carrie Chapman Catt's crusade gave women the vote, no political soothsayer has been safe. Election "upsets" have been laid at the feet of labor, the farmers and the "unpredictability of public opinion." But are any of these responsible? Or is it the unpredictability of women's votes?

Until recently, I was a "first-name-on-the-ballot-straight-down-the-line voter." Heeding the admonition that "our vote is our most precious heritage—use it," I did. But only history will tell the havoc I wrought with my neatly spaced X's.

Wedded to a man who was prone to remark about my voting habits in the same tone of voice he used when I overdrew my bank account, I considered his just one man's opinion. Until, at a dinner party, I found myself sandwiched between two male guests.

"The trouble with this country started when the women got the vote," one said.

"That's true," concurred the second. "Just look at Switzerland. No women voting, no income taxes and no foreign entanglements."

"Well, I can't take my business to Switzerland," glumly responded the first. "So where do we go from here?"

"Home," I muttered weakly. Any inclination to bluff my way through this male chatter was stifled by the gleam in my spouse's eye. He knew, only too well, that if he threw a few facts and figures my way, I would collapse into a hysterical mass of contradictions, exaggerations and ridiculous statements.

Suddenly it seemed I had only to request the salt of a dinner partner to become embroiled in a lively discussion on income taxes and the budget of Outer Mongolia. I could drive my daughters to dancing school blindfolded, but hadn't the slightest notion whether Afghanistan sat atop Mt. Everest or in the middle of the Sahara Desert. And it was a precarious perch for one who yearned to meet today's demands that a wife be a well-informed, scintillating helpmate to the up-and-coming young husband. Even my children, thanks to Current Events and Social Studies, were better informed than I. (I lost this last vestige of pride when they caught me sneaking into the kitchen with their Weekly Reader hidden beneath my apron—trying to find the answer to their questions.)

Then I was asked to a luncheon honoring the wives of two departing U.N. staff members. All went well until one of the visitors asked me:

"What do you Americans have against the McCarran-Walter Act?"

"Why, I really don't know," I gulped, racking my brain for an intelligent answer. "I suppose it's because it's so unjust."

"Why do you say that?" she persisted.

Naturally I hadn't the slightest idea and sought escape by putting the question to the other ladies present. Without hesitating, each and every one agreed: "I don't know what it is, but I'm against it."

When two Westerners, two Southerners and three Easterners gave such unequivocal opinions about a subject they obviously knew so little about, I faced the bitter truth. Not only was I unqualified to vote, but I had too much company. I decided then and there not to air another political opinion, enter another discussion or cast another vote until I was better informed.

Seeking a source of education, I was amazed to find many opportunities, even in a small community. In addition to adult-education classes held weekly at the high school, there was scarcely a women's organization which didn't offer discussion groups. The League of Women Voters offered ably led courses; and I found discussions in two churches, three reading groups and a garden club. The problem was poor attendance. And inquiries into the causes of absences brought out the inevitable refrain of the four S's—sick children, school-bus schedules, sitter's fees and sheer exhaustion.

In woman-to-woman chats, I found two other categories besides my "first name straight down the line." There was the "I like his looks" (usually because the candidate reminded them of a favorite uncle or their first beau) and the "His name sounded familiar" schools of thought. A friend of my sister's even went so far as to admit that she changed her mind about a candidate the day before elections because he wore a wine-red tie with a pink-striped shirt. Another chose a certain candidate in a bitterly contested race because "he was an Eagle Scout and so was my brother." And one said that regardless of qualifications, she was always for "the underdog."

And we wonder why politicians are always kissing babies! Even Khrushchev knows he can melt a million mothers' hearts by accepting flowers from some curlyheaded little darling. But is this fair to the candidate with true ability but little or no flair for cozy pictures? Is it right to pick a candidate as you would a race horse—because you like his looks or because the odds are eighteen to one against him?

All this boils down to my right—yes, my right—to influence the course of events in my community (or my country) with an X based on anything but knowledge. If I find myself in the majority merely by happenstance, I have not only elected a candidate but I have also shaped policy. For they have only my ballot to go by. Should I, or any woman, use the right to vote because it's part of a heritage? Wouldn't I do a better service if I didn't vote unless I could vote wisely?

Sincerely,

ANN MACLEOD

Doubleday DOLLAR BOOK CLUB

offers this amazing Book Bargain

ANY 3 FOR $1

Best-Sellers! De Luxe Books! Illustrated Volumes!

to new members who agree to take as few as 6 best-selling novels out of the 24 to be offered within a year

$10.40 to $34.75 Value

(in Publishers' Editions) for only $1—a Bargain You Mustn't Miss!

THE famous Dollar Book Club invites you to join now—and receive the biggest introductory bargain the Club has ever offered to new members.

Select any 3 of the full-size, hard-bound books on this page for only $1. Choose from best-sellers by top authors . . beautiful library volumes . . big, lavishly illustrated books — even 2-volume sets! Think of it — a value of $10.40 to $34.75 in publishers' editions—yours for just $1, when you join.

You Save up to 75% on the New Best-Sellers!

Imagine—best-seller selections costing up to $3.95 in publishers' editions come to Club members for only $1 each! Over the years the biggest hits by top authors like Ernest Hemingway, W. Somerset Maugham, Daphne du Maurier, Thomas B. Costain, Frank Yerby and others, have come to Club members at this low $1 price. Occasionally, extra-value selections are offered at somewhat higher prices. All are new, full-size, hard-bound books. An exciting new bonus plan offers other big savings too. But you buy only the books you want — and you don't have to take one every month. You may take as few as six $1 selections a year!

Send No Money Now — Just Mail the Coupon!

Receive any 3 books on this page for only $1, plus a small shipping charge. Two books are your gift for joining, and one is your first selection. Thereafter, you will receive the Club's Bulletin, which describes forthcoming $1 selections and other book bargains.

No-Risk Guarantee: If not delighted with your introductory Three-Book bargain package, return all books and membership will be cancelled. Send no money — just mail the coupon now!

DOUBLEDAY ONE DOLLAR BOOK CLUB, GARDEN CITY, N. Y.

SEND NO MONEY—MAIL THIS COUPON. CHOOSE ANY 3 BOOKS FOR ONLY $1

☐ AROUND THE WORLD IN 2,000 PICTURES. New two-volumes-in-one! Sail the Seven Seas—view the wonders of 84 lands—including our own country—in 832 pages of vivid photos, informative text! (67)

☐ BLUE CAMELLIA — Frances Parkinson Keyes' best-seller! Lovely Lavinia Winslow lived in two worlds—as mistress of a Louisiana plantation — and as a woman with a secret love affair! (79)

☐ COLUMBIA - VIKING DESK ENCYCLOPEDIA Two volumes — 1,440 pages, 31,000 articles, 1,250,000 words. Up-to-date information in every field of knowledge. Illustrated. (61)

☐ FAIROAKS — Frank Yerby's newest! Dashing Guy Falks won a fortune in the African slave trade and found love among many women—from a beautiful half-breed to a glamorous opera star! (136)

☐ FAVORITE STORIES OLD AND NEW. Giant 512-page treasury of reading for children! 121 never-to-be forgotten fairy tales. Bible stories, legends, make-believe and animal stories. (13)

☐ FESTIVAL OF OPERA Henry W. Simon. New illustrated guide to 129 best-loved operas and their stories—from "Figaro" to "Porgy and Bess." 718 pages! (135)

☐ HAMMOND - DOUBLEDAY WORLD ATLAS New edition! Big 9⅝" by 12¼" book, 143 maps and insets—88 in full color! 155 photos, plus useful information on world's peoples, resources, etc. (63)

☐ HANDY HOME MEDICAL ADVISER. (Combined with "Good Housekeeping's" Pocket Medical Encyclopedia)—Edited by Dr. Morris Fishbein. Includes latest information on heart, diet, new drugs, etc. 413 pages, illus. (75)

☐ JAMES HILTON'S 3 FAMOUS NOVELS in one book: "Lost Horizon," the original Shangri-La novel of romance, adventure in Tibet; plus "Goodbye, Mr. Chips" and "Random Harvest." (77)

☐ Ladies' Home Journal BOOK OF INTERIOR DECORATION. New edition! Big volume contains 293 lavish illustrations—144 in full color! Information on furniture, fabrics, color, lighting, etc. (138)

☐ MARJORIE MORNINGSTAR — Herman Wouk tops "The Caine Mutiny" with this modern best-seller about a "nice girl" who mixes her dream of fame with a love affair that blazes from New York to the left bank of Paris! (83)

☐ MODERN FAMILY COOK BOOK — Meta Given. Brand new edition! 1,250 delicious recipes, 252 tempting, easy - to - prepare menus. Up - to - date freezing section, over 600 pages. (74)

☐ OUTLINE OF HISTORY H. G. Wells. 2-volume edition. 1,024 pages, 200 maps, pictures. Whole history of mankind from earliest times to the present. One of the great works of our century! (62)

☐ THE SCAPEGOAT — Daphne du Maurier. Biggest hit in years by the author of "Rebecca". Suspense-packed story of a man living a masquerade — with another man's wife and mistress! (143)

☐ SECRET OF HAPPINESS & PEACE WITH GOD—Billy Graham. Two great best-sellers by world-famed inspirational figure to help you find new meaning in life. (206)

Doubleday One Dollar Book Club
Dept. 2-LHJ, Garden City, New York

Send me at once the 3 books checked at the left and bill me only $1 FOR ALL 3, plus a small shipping charge. Also enroll me as a Dollar Book Club member.

Include my first issue of The Bulletin describing the new forthcoming one-dollar selections and other bargains for members. I may notify you in advance if I do not wish the following month's selections. I do not have to accept a book every month — only six a year. I pay nothing except $1 for each selection I accept (plus a small shipping charge) unless I choose an extra-value selection at a somewhat higher price.

NO-RISK GUARANTEE: If not delighted, return all books in 7 days, and membership will be cancelled.

Mr.
Mrs. ..... Please Print
Miss

Address .....

City
Zone ..... State .....

TO RESIDENTS OF CANADA: Selection price $1.10 plus shipping. Address Doubleday Book Club, 105 Bond Street, Toronto 2. Offer good in U.S.A. and Canada only.

D-302

Why women born before 1930 need Lanolin Plus Liquid for their skin

Jewels by Harry Winston

Exclusive formula, one-third of it 100% pure, natural lanolin, begins where nature leaves off, to help skin stay gloriously young looking

To look young and radiant your skin needs a steady supply of vital oils. But, as skin matures, nature often fails to replenish these oils. Dryness invites coarseness, loss of firmness . . . lines and, finally, wrinkles.

That's when you need LANOLIN PLUS LIQUID. For its exclusive patented formula restores to dry skin the closest duplication of your own skin oils. Feel its gentle beautifying action. At its touch, your skin becomes petal soft . . . so fresh, so smooth, so wonderfully younger looking.

Use LANOLIN PLUS LIQUID
(1) as a Cleanser!
(2) as a Make-up Base!
(3) as a Night Conditioner!

Yes, 24-hours a day you need golden LANOLIN PLUS LIQUID and other Beauty Aids by LANOLIN PLUS, to bring a fresher, more vital loveliness to your face, hands, and hair. Try them today, won't you? At cosmetic counters, everywhere.

Lanolin Plus Lipstick '35'; also . . . Lanolin Plus Cleansing Cream for Dry Skin; Lanolin Plus All Over Body Lotion; Lanolin Plus Hand Cream; Lanolin Plus Creme Rinse; $1.00 and up.

Lanolin Plus®

Also available in Canada

Imagine "Touring" ITALY for only 10¢

THE AMERICAN GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY invites you to accept this "sample" of its Around The World Program

Plus* A GIANT FULL-COLOR WALL MAP OF THE WORLD

A $3.00 Value for only 10¢

To Introduce You and Your Children to a Wonderful New Way to Learn About . . .

Our Fascinating World

YES, JUST ONE DIME, takes you on a "magic carpet" tour of Italy. Without stirring from your home you skim along the Grand Canal in Venice . . . stand at the foot of the Tower of Pisa . . . roam through the wondrous Colosseum in Rome and the ruins of Pompeii . . . see the Opera at La Scala and the beautiful blue waters of Capri. You will get to know more about the people, customs, art, and culture of Italy than many tourists who actually visit there in person.

Your host, THE AMERICAN GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY, makes this generous offer to acquaint you with a new kind of home education hobby which you and your family can now enjoy. It is called The Around the World Program — an exciting way for young and old to learn about the many people and lands of our wonderful world.

How You "Visit" a Different Land Each Month

Each month you will receive a set of full-color photographs and an informative illustrative guidebook album with spaces for mounting the color prints. By means of these prints and albums, prepared under the guidance of American Geographical Society experts, you and your family "visit" a different country every month. You explore the country's famous landmarks and natural wonders. You go sightseeing in the strange cities. In quaint little villages you stop to observe native costumes, customs, and crafts. An expert on the history of the region spins stories of the great battles, the national heroes, the ancient legends. You pore over maps showing the principal cities, rivers, mountains.

Helps Children in Later Life, Too!

Here is an educational hobby for the whole family. It will give your children a tremendous advantage not only in school but in later life, as they grow up in a world where other countries are only hours away by air. And you, yourself, will find this an enjoyable way of planning trips—or re-living them.

Mail Coupon With Only Ten Cents

To acquaint yourself with this new project, accept the offer described below. There is no obligation — this is merely a "demonstration" offer. If, however, you are delighted with your trial package and do wish to continue on your "trip around the world," you pay only $1 for each monthly tour thereafter. And you may cancel at any time. Mail the coupon now! —

AMERICAN GEOGRAPHICAL SOCIETY'S Around the World Program, Dept. LHJ-2, Garden City, N. Y.

In color reproductions you see fascinating sights in Sunny Italy. For example, as shown here: Leaning Tower, Pisa; Painting Pottery, Amalfi; Procession in Florence; Colosseum, Rome; Grand Canal, Venice.

Here's What You Get for Only A Dime:

(Total Value $3.00)

1. 25 breathtaking FULL-COLOR prints of Italy's most fascinating sights.
2. The authoritative album on Italy in which to mount your pictures, plus informative text on Italy's history, customs, arts, legends, famous landmarks, natural wonders, geography, etc.
3. A giant MAP OF THE WORLD, in beautiful full color, prepared especially by leading geographical experts for this program. Opens up to 3½ feet wide! A magnificent wall or blackboard decoration, invaluable guide for students or armchair explorers. Retail value $2.00.

In addition, if you decide to continue, you will receive as a free bonus, a beautiful green-and-copper colored album case (pictured above) large enough to hold a number of albums.

Yes, all this (total value $3.00) is yours for ONLY ONE DIME to introduce you to the Around the World Program.

THIS COUPON WORTH $2.90

American Geographical Society's
Around the World Program
Dept. LHJ-2, Garden City, N. Y.

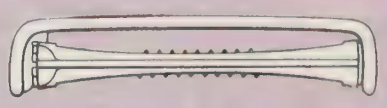
I enclose ten cents. Please send me at once my introductory package consisting of (1) the informative "guidebook album" on ITALY, (2) twenty-five beautiful full-color reproductions to mount in the albums, and (3) the giant 3½ ft. wide full-color Map of the World.

I understand you plan to issue an "Around the World Program" guidebook album complete with a set of color-prints each month for only $1 plus shipping. After examining my introductory package, I'll notify you if I do not wish to continue. I am not obligated to take any minimum number of albums and I am free to resign at any time.

Name .....
(PLEASE PRINT)

Address .....

City ..... Zone..... State.....



Same Offer in Canada. Address 105 Bond St., Toronto 2.
(Offer good only in U. S. A. and Canada) W17

DISCOVERED BY PROCTER & GAMBLE

First and only permanent with pin curl ease, rod curl strength

Pin curls for the crown. "Top hair" needs this softer wave... and Lotion plus new Liquifix give longer lasting quality to these pin curls.

Rod curlers for sides, back, top front give added curl-strength to harder-working areas... now doubly reinforced by Lotion and new Liquifix.

Wonderful new soft waves that last and last! A wonderful new method, wonderful new Liquifix. It's here! The first, the only all-over permanent with the ease and the lasting quality you've asked for . . . yet it's so unbelievably soft and natural. That's because new PIN-IT gives the right kind of waves for the different areas of your hair . . . then locks in your permanent with special lotion and new Liquifix neutralizer. Best of all, this new Twice-a-Year PIN-IT keeps your hair just the way you like it, from the first day to months later.

new twice-a-year Pin-it

Pin-it

©P&G

Apply Lotion and Liquifix with New Target-Point Squeeze Bottle

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
BRUCE GOULD
BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD
EDITORS

Congress Must Act on Food Additives

In recent years many hundreds of chemical substances have been developed and added to various processed foods to enhance or conserve color, flavor, texture or nutritive quality. The Food and Drug Administration considers most of these additives harmless, or beneficial, to the consumer. Another hundred or so are considered harmless and safe in the amounts now being used.

But about one hundred and fifty other additives to the food we eat are in the "doubtful" class. No one knows their long-range effects on the human body.

There is a law that any drug to be placed on the market must first be tested to the satisfaction of a group of doctors, pharmacologists and chemists on the staff of the Food and Drug Administration. There is no law that additives to food must be tested and found safe before they are included in foods and sold. Existing laws are not preventive—they are merely punitive, empowering penalties if any additives that have been proved harmful to humans are used. The Food and Drug Administration lacks the facilities to test adequately the additives that are now being used in the food we eat. To create such a staff would require luring many scientists away from private industry, at great expense to taxpayers.

The Harris Bill, introduced in the last session of Congress, is the most recent legislative attempt to control the use of food additives. Among other provisions, the proposed law would shift to the manufacturer the burden of proving, before marketing, that any substance added to foods is harmless and safe for human consumption. Some substances which appear to be harmless when taken into the body over a short period of time may conceivably cause disease, or death, if consumed even in small amounts over a long period.

The Harris Bill received support from such sources as the Executive Committee of the American Cancer Society and a group of Federal judges. However, other bills were introduced countering several of its provisions. As has happened in every session since the danger was called to congressional attention in 1950, definite action was forestalled.

The JOURNAL, historically an early supporter of the nation's pure food and drug laws, does not claim that the Harris Bill cannot be improved. It does maintain that the American people must not be used like experimental animals. The public has been informed of the possible connection between lung cancer and cigarette smoking. As American Cancer Society officers have said, if individuals choose to take the risk, it is their privilege to do so. But we are given no such choice if possibly harmful substances are added to commonly eaten foods.

Congress should no longer delay passing a bill governing the use of chemical additives in food. Hearings on such a bill are to be resumed before the House Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee. We urge our readers to follow these hearings closely. The bill, as finally drawn, might well be a subject of study by women's groups and all others interested in the public welfare. It should offer no loopholes for carelessness or exploitation.

COLIN SIMKIN COLLECTION

AMERICAN FARM SCENE NO. 4. One of a set of four scenes drawn in 1853 by Fanny Palmer, staff artist for the famous firm of lithographers headed by Nathaniel Currier. The chores which she has portrayed—drawing water, plucking geese and carrying milk to market—dispel any belief that the farmer led a leisurely life in the winter months.

Do American Educators Know What They are Up To?

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

Two years have passed since there appeared in this space an article entitled The Soviet School Child, reporting on primary and secondary education in the Soviet Union. and venturing the thought that unless American education was made much more demanding than it is the Russians would outstrip us in a generation.

Others, thereafter, called attention to the fact that Russia was annually graduating from higher institutions of learning many thousands more scientists, technicians and masters of other disciplines requiring high intellectual capacities than we. But, in general, these revelations had very limited repercussions.

When, however, Russia launched the first and then the second sputnik, a veritable uproar ensued. It was instantly recognized—not only in America but throughout the world—that in scientific achievement Russia had leaped out in front of the United States in precisely the technological field where America had believed herself to be preeminent. The unheralded demonstration that a nation whose population forty years ago was 70 per cent illiterate could thus catch up with and surpass the most technologically advanced societies in a specific field, with all the implications of probable military superiority in the field of intercontinental guided missiles, spoke more loudly than all the propaganda "Voices." The achievement was called "a worse blow to America than Pearl Harbor."

In the ensuing reaction and the attempts to explain why we had failed to be the first in the field, charges and countercharges were made in a mood of hysterical exaggeration that did little credit to the American mentality. But the issue of the condition of American education could no longer be avoided. It was right there in the middle of everything—and properly so. College presidents and others pointed out that the American people have been spending more on tobacco and alcohol, or more on new and used cars, or more on recreation than on all forms of education combined, implying that all problems could be solved by a more appropriate apportionment of funds.

But more mature-minded critics also realized that the mere upping of school appropriations and teachers' salaries would not, of itself, answer the $64 question of what American education was up to—and why. The question has been asked, and will go on being asked. Anyone, including this layman, who has followed the educational journals and the writings and speeches of professional educators cannot fail to conclude that there is no clear and comprehensible consensus regarding educational purpose.

The Office of Education in the Federal Government has issued a report on Russian education. Belated as we consider it to be, it is well compiled, precise, and finds no difficulty in correctly defining the purpose of Russian education: to train the child and youth to be an obedient, industrious, enthusiastic and highly competent servant of the state, thoroughly prepared to perform the functions required by a state bent on stepping forward as the premier industrial and military power of the world.

One can vehemently disagree—as this writer does—that this ought to be the purpose CONTINUED ON PAGE 14

Executive Editor: Mary Bass Special Projects Editor: Laura Lou Brookman
Associate Editors: Hugh MacNair Kahler, Wilhela Cushman, William E. Fink, Louella G. Shouer, Mary Lea Page, Dawn Crowell Norman, Margaret Davidson, Nora O'Leary, Glenn Matthew White, Donald Stuart, Tina S. Fredericks, Helen Everitt, Peter Briggs, Anne Einselen, Margaret Parton, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland, Geraldine Rhoads
Contributing Editors: Richard Pratt, Bernardine Kielty, Gladys Denny Shultz, Margaret Hickey, Ruth Mills Teague, Barbara Benson
Assistant to the Editor: Nelle Keys Perry
Editorial Associates: John Werner, Ruth Mary Packard, Ruth Shapley Matthews, Alice Conkling, Joseph Di Pietro, Elizabeth Goetsch, Nancy Crawford Wood, Jean Todd Freeman, Eileen Sharpe, Betty Coe Spicer, Virginia Price, Joyce Posson, Neal Gilkyson Stuart, Elizabeth Hart
Assistant Editors: Victoria Harris, Alice Kastberg, Dorothy Anne Robinson, Albert Serwazi, June Schwartz, Liane Waite, Ruth Imler, Elizabeth McFarland, Alberte Wright, Corinna Wildman, Abbot Mills
Editorial Assistants: Lee Stowell Cullen, Patricia Martin, Flora Kerestedjian, Simone Smith, Hazel Owen, Isabel Blythe, Helen Olchvary, Olivia Donovan, Sally Platt, Marley Marseilles, Dorothy Markinko, Mary Jane Engel, Jean Anderson, Joan Cornog, Jean Hartman Culp, Grant Harris, Mary Tinker Hatch, Mary Duncan Wright

Do have a piece of

Black Wal

The newest Betty Crocker mix to make

Only Betty Crocker has this fascinating new flavor! Make it your "specialty"!

New Black Walnut!

It's a country-kitchen kind of cake—mellow with the flavor of black walnuts! And, m-m-m, that aroma in your kitchen!—a happy promise all the while your cake is baking! You just add eggs and water—and bake up a moist, tender, homemade cake Grandmother would have been proud to serve! Why not make it your "specialty"? Your family and friends will love it!

Betty Crocker has a whole parade of "your specialty" cakes!

HERE ARE JUST A FEW!

Chocolate Malt
—milk-chocolate-mild, with real malted milk right in the mix!

Peanut Delight
—a delicate peanut flavor—a high, light, luscious cake!

Confetti Angel
—a fabulous party cake, with festive-bright bits of candy!

Lemon Custard Angel
—new moist texture, . . . tangy with lemon, rich with custard!

"I guarantee a perfect* cake—homemade perfect—cake . . . after cake . . . after cake!" Betty Crocker

* Yes, every mix we make for you is guaranteed to come out perfect, or send the box top to Betty Crocker, Box 200, Minneapolis, Minn., and General Mills will send your money back.

General Mills

A BEAR ON DIRT

—the detergent specially designed to clean FLOORS, WALLS, WOODWORK

Soilax goes right after dirt . . . actually picks up and holds all the dirt from your floors! They gleam . . . without scrubbing! And because Soilax absorbs the dirt, there's never a sudsy scum or dulling film to rinse away.

Let Soilax do the job on your floors. Use it on walls, woodwork, too! Works in half the time . . . with half the work! Now in 1 lb. and economical 3 lb. packages.

Another Famous Product of ECONOMICS LABORATORY, Inc.

He said: "La Señora perdonará mi temprana partida." ("The lady will please forgive my early departure.")

He meant: "El aire aquiesta cargado, tengo que salir!" ("Caramba! The air in here is foul! I must leave.")

She must have used an ordinary "Cover-Up" deodorizer!

This couldn't have happened with air-wick

Did you know that America's leading home deodorizer is the world's leader, too? The popularity of Air-Wick has spread all over the world—to Spain, Italy, Japan . . . sixty-two countries in all!

People of all nationalities depend on Air-Wick because it has been proven 3 times as effective . . . faster . . . more pleasant to use.

Use handy wick or speedy spray . . . deodorize the Air-Wick way!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 11

of education. But Russian education is goal-conscious. Because it is goal-conscious, it is succeeding in realizing its aims.

The Office of Education cannot define the purpose of American education in any concrete terms at all. Its purpose, says the report, is "freedom, peace and the fullest development of the individual." One's mind immediately asks, Whose freedom? What peace? Is the individual something in and of himself? How, via education, does one attain this so abstractly defined goal? And is it, in fact, the goal?

Two generations ago, it was not difficult to define the purpose of American primary, secondary and university education. That goal was to create a patriotic, responsible American citizen, an industrious, self-reliant and independent person, equipped with the knowledges and skills essential to making his own way in the world at whatever level of activity his talents permitted, and with a character imbued with the Christian virtues.

Whatever the teaching methods left to be desired, the goal was clear and there was consensus regarding the means of reaching it: strict discipline and hard work, stimulated by aspiration, inspiration, and concrete and rugged ideas about right and wrong.

Contrary to what most people appear to believe today, this education was not brain stuffing. At the higher levels, the great teachers of that epoch taught largely by the ancient Socratic (or dialectic) method, which consisted of a debate between teacher and student, with the purpose of encouraging the student to think about the correctness or incorrectness of an answer, and to defend his position. To do so he had to be, of course, in possession of indisputable facts. But he was not encouraged to draw pat and foregone conclusions from them.

There is no point high enough that one can say "This is the peak."
JASCHA HEIFETZ

Such education, for the intellectually virile and alert, was an extraordinarily pleasurable mental exercise. And it was open only to the mentally alert. It created a real elite of brains and virtue as leaders of this democracy.

A defect of this education was that it was practically (though by no means wholly) closed to young men without economic means. Yet the biographies of great Americans record repeated instances of farm boys and poor people's children who worked their way through secondary schools and "academies," studying at night, saving enough to keep them in the university for a year, leaving and returning again, until finally, equipped with a large experience of life, they graduated "with the highest honors."

And if poverty kept out of the universities all too many eager minds, the curricula and standards also kept out the lazy and mediocre offspring of the rich. It was very hard to enter any first-rate university.

A Bachelor of Arts degree from any reputable college was a testimony that its holder had demonstrated his proficiency in at least one ancient and one modern language, in mathematics through higher algebra and trigonometry, was familiar with the great works of English literature, comprehended the fundamentals of physics and chemistry, could give a reasonably coherent account of the history of Western man, and that he could be counted on to behave as a gentleman.

The basis for this was laid in the primary and secondary schools, which were engaged not in developing "the individual"—whatever that may mean—but in producing morally and mentally capable young men and women.

I am not here advocating a complete restoration of curriculum. But it should be obvious that any education must be coherent to a coherent aim, and that its curricula must be such as to cultivate and improve the thinking processes and its standards such as to improve public and private morality and decorum.

Today a B.A. degree from thousands of colleges is no reliable testimony that its holder commands a vocabulary enabling him to read with comprehension the great literary works in his own language, can correctly spell words in common usage, has any familiarity with higher mathematics or the exact sciences, is in possession of any unified body of knowledge whatever, or has ever learned to think logically about anything. Nor is it any testimony of character. It is increasingly impossible even to describe an educated man or woman.

The same—and worse—can be said of the holder of a high-school diploma. Dr. Alfred Whitney Griswold, president of Yale, reports in a recent book, In the University Tradition, on a student seeking entrance to Yale, that of the twelve junior and senior courses the boy had taken in high school, two were in English, one in American history, and the others were typing, speech, chorus, physical education, journalism, personality problems, and marriage and family—an incoherent mishmash. This youth could not get into Yale, but other "colleges" would, no doubt, receive him.

So what becomes of the "fully developed individual"?

But it is challengeable whether the development of the individual person is even the aim of American primary and secondary education. A child may enter most primary schools at an age rigidly set by the calendar, without relation to his actual state of development. He is then dog-tagged by the I.Q. test.

Now, I.Q. gradings are very imprecise measures of native ability. They establish a statistically based norm of what a child should be able to do at a certain age, and devise questions to test whether his capacities are under or above that norm. His ability to give correct answers depends partly on native intelligence, partly on acquired knowledge, and partly on nervous and emotional disposition.

These tests can fairly well establish a rating for children mentally deficient on all counts. But they can be dangerous guides in assessing children with outstanding gifts in one direction and a lack of them in others, a phenomenon that often accompanies genius. The twelve-year-old son of a friend was graded 112 ("high average") by a teacher who told his mother, "In some respects your boy has a mental age of five. In others, he has the mental age of a mature man. On balance he is a little brighter than average." Obviously there was nothing "average" about this boy at all. Today, at twenty-two, he is a highly important research worker in an atomic-energy project.

And these I.Q.'s do not register character at all. Yet parents of several children have often experienced that though Mary is obviously brighter than John—reads earlier and more fluently, and does her homework with greater ease—John has qualities that sooner or later have helped him to catch up with and even surpass his sister, to whom everything has come so easily.

The fable of the hare and the tortoise is not fabulous.

Educators have always, hitherto, recognized the value of character building, not only as a good in itself but as indispensable for mental development. Nothing of value is accomplished without effort, and the will to effort is sparked by character. But some of our educators today are positively undermining character in children. The "group" idea rules, and the morality of the group is the standard norm. If the sexual standard of the group is loose, then that is "normal" and acceptable, and adolescents who have inhibitions against it are even reprimanded by educational sociologists—see the Purdue University report, already reviewed here, on the American teenager.

If the standards of the group are rudeness to teachers and parents, sloppiness of dress, resistance to even the most reasonable disciplines, then these are accepted as "normal."

But "groups" do not possess a character. They have characteristics, or "behavior patterns," which are very different from character. Character is decided by inner will and personal conviction. The pressure of the group (like that of all collectives) is to conform—and

CONTINUED ON PAGE 16

New BRILLO soap pads shine aluminum fast—give you more free time!

Speed through pot and pan clean-ups, get into the family picture faster

For faster cleaning, instant shine... there's special soap with Jeweler's Polish in every pad!

No other cleaning product lifts off burned-on grease and scorchy stains faster. And only Brillo contains special soap with Jeweler's Polish . . . to bring back like-new shine at the same time! Results are guaranteed. You get a new utensil free if Brillo fails to clean! Nothing cleans and shines aluminum like New Brillo Soap Pads.

Brillo Soap Pads (red box) . . . soap-filled metal fiber pads
Brillo Cleanser (green box) . . . pads plus cake of soap

Note to husbands

Brillo does your clean-up jobs faster!

EXTRA VALUE! EXTRA PADS!
Only BRILLO gives you Jeweler's Polish and extra pads in every box

Big 5, 12 & 20 pad boxes Brillo Mfg. Co., Inc., Brooklyn, N.Y.

Dromedary Gingerbread

Invites you to celebrate its SILVER ANNIVERSARY with this Valuable Gift Offer!

For 25 years, Dromedary Gingerbread has been the world's most famous recipe.

In celebration of its Silver Anniversary, Dromedary Gingerbread Mix offers you this truly magnificent F. B. Rogers Silver-on-copper service—at truly sensational savings!

Here's how to get your Dromedary Silver Anniversary Service. For each piece—Sugar Bowl, Creamer or Engraved Tray—simply write a note stating which piece or pieces you wish to order together with your name and address. Then mail with one Dromedary Gingerbread Mix box top and only $2.00 for each piece to: The Dromedary Company, Box 7198, Chicago 8, Illinois.

Bonus Gift Certificate! With each piece you order, you will receive, absolutely FREE, a valuable Bonus Gift Certificate. When you have three (3) of these Gift Certificates mail them with one Dromedary Gingerbread Mix box top and we will send you an exquisite matching Silver-on-copper Sugar Serving Spoon as a special bonus gift!

Hurry! Send box tops and money (no stamps), with your name and address, to: The Dromedary Company, P. O. Box 7198, Chicago 8, Illinois. Offer limited! Order now! Offer good only in Continental U. S. A. Void wherever taxed, prohibited or otherwise restricted.

Only Dromedary Gingerbread is inspired by the private recipe of Mary, George Washington's Mother!

★ ★ ★

Dromedary received the rights to this recipe in return for contributions to the Washington-Lewis Chapter, D.A.R., and the Kenmore Association, Inc.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 14

to conform without reason. Strong characters and independent minds always resist such conformity. It is the "tyranny of the crowd"—the tyranny of the mass—that repeatedly, through history, has ended in the tyranny of one man, or a party, leading the strongest crowd and thereafter imposing by force its own "behavior pattern." And it is rife today in many of our public and even private schools.

Against it parents are increasingly helpless. If the "behavior pattern," the "norm," permits sixteen-year-old Mary to go out unchaperoned to an unknown rendezvous, with an adolescent youth her parents have never met, Mary's mother, sleepless until her daughter's return at three A.M., risks her daughter's "isolation" from the group if she "puts her foot down." What mother has not heard the impatient reply "But all the kids do it"?

Nothing has had a more horrible effect upon the upbringing of youth than the idea, promulgated by influential schools of psychiatrists, that inhibitions create "traumas." It needs to be said over and over again that all civilization rests on the cultivation of inhibitions. All else is savagery. And only in civilization is anyone safe or secure.

Our children and youth do not feel safe or secure because all too often the behavior pattern of the group conflicts with their home and religious training and their individual consciences. The youngster "running with the crowd" knows, or feels, that the crowd behavior is often silly, indecent, ugly, amoral. The very thing the psychoanalysts aim to overcome, the "guilt complex," flourishes, because of this dichotomy.

And if "the group" does not have a character but only character*istics*, neither does it have a mind. Again, it has a "norm," set by the average, which by a law that appears to regulate all collectivities tends to become subaverage. The mentally and morally superior do not leaven the mass, but are absorbed by it. As in Gresham's Law of currency, bad money drives out good, so does bad behavior drive out decorum.

I rise early because no day is long enough for a day's work. JUSTICE BRANDEIS

The mind of the child, furthermore, is put into a strait jacket by the prevailing concept that he must be held with his "age group." Again, an arbitrary or statistically founded "norm" establishes what should be his abilities at seven, nine or twelve, and he is then cut down to this level. If, at the age of seven or eight, he is able to read books with a vocabulary of three thousand words or more, he is, in many schools, positively discouraged from doing so—and his parents reprimanded for giving him such books. Writers of school readers and other texts are confronted by "the list"—the age-group vocabulary to which they must confine their works. Doctor Seuss, writer of many best sellers for children, recently reported in the New York Times his struggle with "the list" in attempting to write a nature book that little Orlo might read in the first grade. He originally wanted to write about a rhinoceros, but the rhino wasn't in "the list." He switched to birds, but no birdie was there, either, only bunnies—though "fly" and "wing" were. He decided to call the bird a wing-thing, but found he couldn't get it off the ground and into the sky, neither "ground" nor "sky" being within Orlo's prescribed vocabulary! The account of his attempt would be uproariously funny if the implications were not so grim. "The reason Orlo says 'nuts to books,'" he remarks soberly, "is that practically every book he is able to read is far beneath his intellectual capacity."

This is absolutely true. No other educational system—a bad word to describe anything so unsystematic—takes so pessimistic a view of the child as the American. (The Russian takes a perhaps exaggeratedly optimistic one, but it recognizes, as does every other real system, that bringing up a child is preferable to holding him down.)

In the more "modern" schools, children are not encouraged or allowed to skip grades. Striving for good marks is discouraged as "antisocial." The superior child gives his contemporaries "inferiority complexes," they argue, and the desire to excel should not be encouraged.

What are these theorists talking about?

Is the desire to achieve excellence, to be perfect, due only, as they seem to think, to a wish to lord it over one's fellows? It is, in fact, one of the highest human motives. Without this passion for excellence no great book, or work of art, or scientific discovery, or religious insight would ever come to life. And who can best serve and lead this democracy but the excellent?

They also argue that acceleration is bad physiologically. "It has almost completely fallen from grace," an educational journal reports, "because it fails to consider the whole child." "The child cannot," it is argued, "be moved ahead of a grade without losing social status and reduction of opportunity to develop physical and other skills. It makes the accelerated into snobs . . . it is an experience of defeat for others." But does acceleration of children according to their demonstrated abilities produce these evil effects?

The article I have just quoted from, after setting forth the prevailing theory, denies that there is any serious evidence to support it. The Brookline, Massachusetts, public schools admit all educable children to kindergarten at four years and nine months, and younger ones after physical and psychological examination, and thereafter permit them to advance according to their abilities. In comparing these younger, "accelerated" children with others, it has found that "underage" boys excelled the others by a 2-to-1 ratio and girls by a 5-to-3 in academic achievement. But they also excelled in sports and extracurricular activities. They were popular. The picture of the little "egghead," of overgrown cranium and feeble limbs, is just not true. The child of superior brain is usually taller, stronger and handsomer than the average. The view of the superior child as a "snob" is inverted snobbery of the worst kind. If it is an injury to a child to demand of him what is beyond his mental and physical powers, it is a double injury, to the child and society, to diminish his powers and demean him for possessing them. It is a crime against nature—perhaps the worst crime—for which this nation and society will, if it goes on, inevitably pay—not only with its "world leadership," but eventually with its liberties. Don't even educators (or education*ists*) know anything of human history?

But if the little Orlos can't read beyond a pitiful vocabulary, if even "average" children are kept below their powers, what are we to think of the views of another educator, Dr. A. J. Stoddard?

In a speech before the Kansas State Teachers' Association in November he was reported as saying:

"The teaching of reading should be revised. It is necessary to teach the child to read entire sentences or even paragraphs at a single glance. We no longer have time to spend hours reading."

So now, suddenly, little Orlo must be taught to read whole paragraphs at a glance! I would like to know how he is to be taught an accomplishment that comes only as the result of much reading, consuming much time. Little Orlo has been "taught" to recognize single words at a glance without reference to their letters or sound. So he can't spell. What little Orlo needs is more respect for his mental capacities, a more thorough initial training, and a stimulation of his desire to read by literature worth reading. No child can read a paragraph at a glance, and few adults can do so and know what they are reading.

I have been an omnivorous reader since the age of seven, and am a rapid reader, at some levels, and of matter—such as newspaper reports—with which I am already familiar. Headlines, the opening word of a paragraph, will suggest a content that I already anticipate. But if I am reading a closely argued book, introducing me to new knowledges and ideas,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 139

Cold tomorrow?

© 1958, THE CREAM OF WHEAT CORP.

That's "Cream of Wheat" weather.

Guard your family with hot "Cream of Wheat"

A nourishing hot cereal containing protective vitamins and minerals

They were locked in the scientists' safe—and not until the testing was over was their meaning revealed

The Secret Codes That Held The Key To Fewer Cavities

BY MARGUERITE HIGGINS
Noted Journalist and Pulitzer Prize Winner

PEOPLE in Bloomington, Indiana, are still talking about the recent series of toothpaste tests held there—and the air of mystery which surrounded them.

Thousands of grownups and children brushed with one of two unknown toothpastes, marked solely with code letters such as "B" and "C." Not even the scientists running the tests knew the secret of the codes. For the codes were locked in a safe—not to be opened until the tests were over.

Over a 4-year period, the townspeople brushed away—and at regular intervals, the scientists examined their teeth for new cavities, and recorded the results.

When the tests were over, the safe was opened. Here are the exciting facts the codes revealed:

One of the toothpastes was ordinary toothpaste. But the other was a new stannous fluoride toothpaste—now called Crest.

And for grownups and children both, Crest prevented almost half of all new decay, on the average, compared with ordinary toothpaste.

In one test, for instance, children who brushed with Crest had 49% fewer new cavities.

In another test, with adults, Crest prevented 42% of all cavities.

I asked dental scientists how Crest made possible these striking results.

They explained that Crest, with its special fluoride formula, Fluoristan, strengthened "soft spots" on teeth, areas where decay often gets started, and stopped them from turning into cavities.

Indeed, because of Crest, many people have had no new cavities at all between dental check-ups. This is the delightful event dramatized by Norman Rockwell on the opposite page.

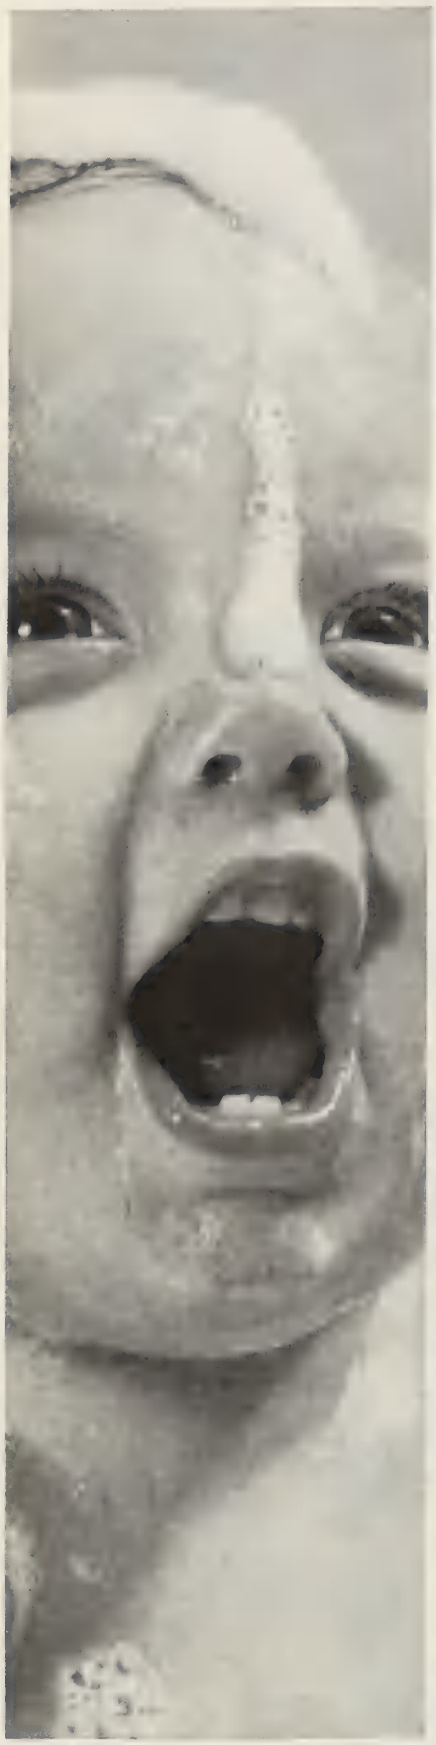
Yes, I think we all hold the key to a lifetime of fewer cavities—with Crest Toothpaste.

GROWNUPS AND CHILDREN get their supply of toothpaste in the tests at Bloomington, Indiana. Results of the 4-year series of tests showed that Crest prevented almost half of all new decay, compared with ordinary toothpaste.

A DENTAL HEALTH MESSAGE FROM PROCTER & GAMBLE, MAKERS OF CREST TOOTHPASTE

Norman Rockwell

"Look, Mom—no cavities!"



Crest Toothpaste stops soft spots from turning into cavities—means far less decay for grownups and children. And Crest freshens your mouth—sweetens your breath.

COMMENDED BY THE CONSUMER SERVICE BUREAU OF PARENTS' MAGAZINE

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Fluoristan is a trademark for Procter & Gamble's exclusive fluoride tooth decay fighter.
©1958, The Procter & Gamble Co.

No more tears

from soap in the eyes

Use the shampoo that can't burn or irritate eyes.

Leaves hair silky-soft, easy to comb.

Johnson's BABY
SHAMPOO

MOTHERS NEED A BREAK

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

DI PIETRO

Most mothers feel frustrated at times by constant demands of children, the confinement.

DR. SPOCK

"I refuse to believe we can't find ways to give mothers adult companionship, fun and stimulation."

Women confess that one of the toughest aspects of becoming a mother is the sense of loss of freedom. I wonder if this is more accentuated in America than anywhere else in the world. Our adolescent girls are allowed to roam with their group or go on dates in a way that is quite startling to many Europeans. By the time they are finishing high school they make important decisions on their own. Many choose to go to college, but this means independence and meeting the world as much as it means studying. After school or college there is, in theory, a wide-open choice between career and marriage, or some combination of both. Perhaps this gives them an illusion of freedom which is not conceivable to their brothers, for whom a lifelong job is inevitable, or to women in many parts of the world, for whom one role is more or less decreed. When American women do go to work, they don't have to think of this as a commitment for life, as long as they envisage the possibility of marriage. The job itself seems like a means to freedom because the wages provide independence from parents' authority and perhaps a place to live away from home. A job after marriage retains an element of free choice in it.

In all these stages there's always an escape hatch in the mind's eye.

When the first baby comes, the escape hatch seems to bang shut for an indefinite period. In motherhood there is no quitting. Vacations are not usually vacations at all. There is no salary. There are no promotions. The mothers with the most children have, on the average, the least time off, the fewest luxuries, the rarest distractions.

Of course American women aren't forced or abducted into marriage and child rearing. In fact, most of the unmarried girls spend a good deal of time dreaming about how to be rid of their freedom. And this isn't because grass always looks greener in the other pasture. Most basically it's because each of us who has grown up as a child, loved by a good mother and father, wants to become a loving mother or father more than anything else in the world. It's the desire to be like her mother that makes a girl want to learn to play pat-a-cake before a year, say words and stir with a spoon before she's two, play house and play with dolls every day until she's six or eight, then be a student for twelve or more years. It's the same almost irresistible force that leads her into the right marriage and the planning for children of her own. Otherwise there would be no real marriages and there would be no wish for children. What I mean is that there are no practical or selfish reasons for having a spouse or a child, as any confirmed bachelor or spinster can prove in five minutes.

But the fact that most of us would rather be married and have children than anything else in the world doesn't alter the fact that many women feel moments of panic and regret when the first child is on the way, and often again when each additional child comes.

But from what I've read and seen in pictures about civilizations that are simpler than ours—in the South Seas or in Africa, for instance—I imagine the transition to motherhood does not involve the renunciation that's involved in ours. In the first place, child care often begins at four or five years of age when a girl has a younger brother or sister entrusted to her. She continues to be chiefly a mother's helper through the rest of childhood—caring for children, preparing food, making clothing, if any. There is no school or college to distract her from life as it is lived, or to offer tantalizing choices. (Similarly, boys and men do the same job—usually procuring food—from childhood to old age.) This may sound a bit monotonous to us. But I doubt that learning to do things the adults do—which takes years in any civilization—is ever unexciting to children.

So the woman in a simple society does not have to change her activities or give up any cherished dreams when she marries and has a child. She does the same work that she did before, but in a much more satisfying way because it is her own baby she's taking care of, rather than her relatives', her own husband and children she's cooking and making clothing for.

Another aspect of the deprivation that many American women feel with the coming of children is the relative isolation from other adults for so many hours of the day. I remember the remark of a very busy young mother who participated in a symposium conducted by the JOURNAL a while ago who said that she looked forward to a trip to market as a gay social event.

This sense of isolation varies a great deal in individuals. Mothers who are able to identify with their young children, and see life through their eyes, find it fascinating even for long periods. Women who have worked for a number of years and loved not only the job but the companionship of it often find children quite limited as company.

In the kinds of communities and in the climates most of us live in, a mother has to stay in her house a major part of the day because of the endless jobs she has to do there. And unless there is also a safe and satisfying back yard which she can survey while she works, she may feel that it's better to keep the young children indoors.

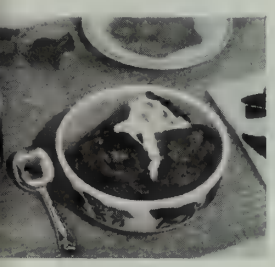
The woman who chafes at the monotony of child rearing (and I'm assuming that most mothers do at times) is really beset from two directions: the separation from adult companions, and being bottled up with the continual demands of the children. I don't think Nature ever intended the association to be quite so exclusive. During the evolution of our species I suspect that woman was designed with the expectation that she would have the company of adults as well as of children for most of the day.

In many simple societies the huts are not far apart or self-contained. They are huddled together and they are mainly for sleeping and storage. The walls and doorways are easy to talk through. Often the cooking is done outdoors, and the washing and weaving too. Pictures of villages show many women doing their job together in a central clearing, surrounded by swarms of children. Obviously in such an existence having children doesn't cut you off from social life, it makes you a full-fledged member of it.

When I listen to women who, despite genuine love for their children, confess a constant gnawing frustration in motherhood, I

CONTINUED ON PAGE 22

BRINGING UP BABY®



Hints collected by Mrs. Dan Gerber, mother of five...

WALK TALK

Many a parent is tempted to hurry baby into walking. (Especially if the little fellow down the block has taken that first step.) But to urge baby when he's not physically or mentally ready may slow up his desire to walk. Good to remember, that when mind, body and spirit are ready baby will strike out for himself and you won't be able to hold that live-wire down.

BAKED POTATO SPECIAL

Taste surprise for your toddler. Mix any Gerber Junior Meat with mashed, baked potato. Refill shells and bake until brown. Absolutely scrumptious!

P.S. Gerber Meats for Babies are prepared with the exacting care you'd expect from two great specialists — Gerber and Armour. Made from selected Armour cuts, they're specially processed to remove most of the fat and tissue and to preserve precious food values. ARMOUR

DRESS REVIEW

Taking that toddler to market with you? Try to remember to un-zip that snowsuit or coat while you're in the market. Overheating can lead to quick chilling when baby gets back in the big outdoors.

TACTICS FOR TODDLERS

The moods of a toddler are unpredictable, to say the least. There's a declaration of independence one minute . . . a heart-felt plea for help the next. As baby's first teacher, it's up to you to decide when to guide and when to let baby go it alone. Takes a bit of doing, but with patience you'll soon learn which lead to take to help your child develop confidence . . . an important factor in learning new skills.

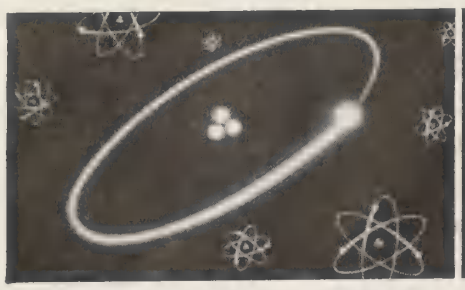
FEATURE OF THE MONTH

Here's something your toddler will love. A different tasting cereal with a big nutritional bonus. Gerber High Protein Cereal has a toasted, nut-like flavor . . . and a 35% protein content derived from oats, wheat, soybeans and yeast. Like all Gerber Cereals, it's vitamin-and-mineral enriched and ready to serve with milk or other liquids.

Babies are our business... our only business!

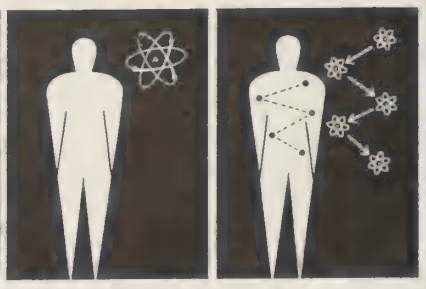
MENU THRILLS FOR JACKS 'N JILLS

Junior Jacks 'n Jills, that is! Yes, Toddler menus take on special magic when you serve Gerber Junior Foods. For they have the good-tasting, "grown-up" flavors that are just right for the more educated taste buds of toddlers. And they have the tender, evenly minced texture that encourages chewing . . . helps baby make the transition from strained to regular family table foods. Over 35 varieties including soups, fruits, vegetables, special dinners, meats, desserts and egg yolks.



Newest menu thrills: Gerber's Junior High Meat Dinners are exceptionally flavorful and extra nourishing because they have 3 times as much meat as regular vegetable and meat combinations. 3 savory varieties.

for Jacks 'n Jills



Gerber® JUNIOR FOODS

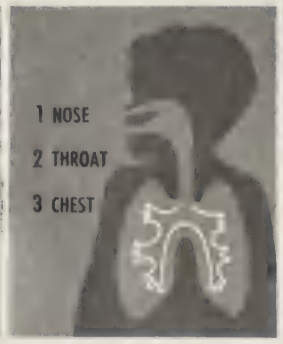
FREMONT, MICHIGAN

5 CEREALS · OVER 80 STRAINED & JUNIOR FOODS, INCLUDING MEA

This is a peaceful atom working for human health. Its job is to trace how medicines act in the body—where they go, how fast, what they do.

Scientists used this atom in animal laboratory tests on many colds medications—found VapoRub acts faster, hours longer!

New light on colds...



ATOM TRACER TESTS

prove VICKS VAPORUB

acts faster, longer than aspirin or any cold tablet

When your child has a cold, rub VapoRub over the area of lungs and heart, throat, back and neck. Acts fast!

No other type of treatment relieves all 3 cold areas... nose, throat, chest...all at once; no internal dosing.

VapoRub's medicated vapors relieve throat, head, cough, bronchial congestion. Your child feels good again fast.

While aspirin and cold tablets are still in your stomach...Vicks VapoRub is already treating nose, throat, bronchial area—and keeps bringing relief for hours after tablets have stopped working.

Now—from the laboratories of atomic medicine comes new proof of a more effective way you can get relief from miseries of colds.

For scientists have used atom tracer tests to check the action of colds medications—and found that Vicks VapoRub acts faster, longer than aspirin or any cold tablet.

No other type of colds medication treats all 3 cold areas—nose, throat, chest—all at once for hours—without internal dosing.

So it's no wonder that more mothers throughout the world depend on Vicks VapoRub than any other colds medication. Why don't you turn to VapoRub too? Enjoy the fast relief—the peace of mind—VapoRub can bring.

Grown-ups and elderly people throughout the world also prefer VapoRub. It acts faster, works longer than aspirin or cold tablets.

VICKS VAPORUB

World's most widely used colds medication

...as a rub...in steam...in the nose

"Vicks" and "VapoRub" are registered trademarks of the Vick Chemical Co., Greensboro, N. C.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 20

keep thinking of the ways other mothers now find adult companionship; and I wonder whether there aren't, in addition, some bold experiments we could be trying that might further lessen these feelings of isolation and confinement.

I think myself that we should scrutinize carefully the kind of expectations and ideals that are engendered in young people in school and college, to see whether they inadvertently contribute to later frustration—but that will take several discussions some other time. Today let's talk about community resources for the woman who has already finished her formal education and who already has her children.

Nursery school comes to mind first of all, but there are several limitations. There aren't enough good ones. They don't exist at all in many communities. They are too expensive for many parents. These obstacles have been lessened in some parts of the country by the development of co-operative nursery schools in which the mothers take turns assisting a trained teacher.

TRY THE "Y"

The woman whose life is bounded by children and chores may find help in the Y.W.C.A. program for young wives and mothers, which offers her one day a week of her own. She and other Y.W.-Wives can leave their children in the Y.W.C.A. nursery to play, eat and nap under supervised care. Meanwhile the mothers relax and enjoy themselves in a program of their own choosing: sports, health, arts and crafts, education classes, and public-affairs groups. "The Y.W.C.A. has opened new doors for me," says one mother. "I've started caring about my looks and my figure again, I'm getting to know my neighbors and taking part in community affairs, and I'm healthier and happier. I think I'm a better wife and mother—and a better citizen."

We should admit immediately that the pioneering nursery educators didn't conceive of these schools as a means of relieving oppressed mothers. They wanted to provide young children with ideal surroundings—that would make up for any limitations of space, equipment and companionship that they might have at home—so that they could mature optimally. They wanted to be able to help parents see the potentialities in children so that parents could do a good job at home. Nursery educators have hotly denied the criticism of some religious leaders that nursery schools encourage mothers to shed responsibility. I agree with the teachers. The mothers I've known in good schools were obviously making a sacrifice for their children's benefit and learned a lot themselves. There are probably a few mothers who think of a nursery school or a day nursery as a place to drop a child off while they themselves do something more enjoyable, but they were that way before—they were never made that way by a good school. Besides, it's not a bad idea for a neglected child to be well cared for a few hours a day.

I think it's fine when a devoted yet frustrated mother enters her child in nursery school, not only for his sake, but also because she senses that she will be able to be a better mother to him if he isn't under her heels for a couple of hours each day.

When we lived in New York and our children were young, my wife, Jane, took them to Central Park every morning and afternoon, and so did thousands of other mothers, including those who consulted me as a pediatrician. They chose their apartments with the park in mind and walked half a mile if necessary. They combined fresh air and com-

CONTINUED ON PAGE 132

It's easy to care for Baby with Port-a-crib.

THE DROP-SIDE PORTABLE CRIB THAT'S A PLAY PEN TOO!

Port-a-crib, the original portable crib, is the popular, modern baby bed that converts quickly into a play pen. Sets up in autos; rolls through doorways without folding; folds to 6" width for easy storage. Port-a-crib raises 6½" higher than normal cribs to take the "back-break" out of caring for baby.

Grandmothers: Have a Port-a-crib ready when little visitors call. They're wonderful maternity gifts, too! At better stores everywhere.

$32.95 As low as including mattress

Form-fitted sheets and bumper guards available

Write for free folder and name of nearest dealer. ▶ Port-a-crib INC.

Dept. L-2
Ballwin, Missouri

*T. M. REG.

MOTHER

to be?

If you're bothered by heartburn and acid indigestion, try Tums. Tums gives total relief from excess stomach acids in just 4 seconds—and they're high in calcium. Convenient to carry in pocket or purse.

3 rolls 25¢

Wanted: You!

IF YOU want extra money and have spare time to put to use, this is for you! You can spend your spare time taking orders for magazine subscriptions—and earning generous commissions.

Just send us your name and address on a postal card. In return, we will send you our offer with starting supplies. From then on, YOU are the boss. Subscription work of this type can be carried on right from your own home. As an independent representative, you may work whenever it is most convenient for you.

Write that card today. Information and supplies are sent at no obligation to you.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
292 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Pa.

WIN $20,000 or $200 a month for 10 YEARS!

A FIRST PRIZE THE WAY YOU WANT IT

653 prizes worth $50,000

2 Second Prizes

1958 Plymouth CUSTOM SUBURBAN—4-DOOR
6-passenger V-8; radio, heater & PowerFlite

50 Third Prizes

Four-Speaker New Orthophonic
RCA VICTOR HI-FIDELITY SET
AM and FM RADIO Model Mark III

100 Fourth Prizes

POCKET-SIZE RCA VICTOR SIX TRANSISTOR RADIO
Nonbreakable Case Model 9BT9

500 FIFTH PRIZES—De Luxe

Cedar-Shaving-Filled Dog Mattress (22" x 28")

$12,000 in BONUS PRIZES!

SEND IN THIS WEIGHT CIRCLE

Each winner (except fifth-prize awards) will be given an extra bonus prize if weight circle included with his entry is from 25-lb. economy size of New Purina Dog Chow. Look at the extra cash you can win.

First Prize—Extra $5,000
2 Second Prizes—Extra $1,000 each
50 Third Prizes—Extra $50 each
100 Fourth Prizes—Extra $25 each

The "Eager Eater" Dog Food!

New Purina Dog Chow's "WHAT'S MY NAME" CONTEST

IT'S EASY, FUN TO ENTER! Identify these famous dogs, then complete jingle. There are clues to help you.

OFFICIAL ENTRY BLANK. Clip along dotted line.

START NOW! HERE ARE THE CLUES!

HOW TO WIN—From this list, select nine clues that accurately identify the nine famous dogs. Write correct number for each dog in circle in lower right corner of each dog's picture.

EXAMPLE—No. 12 clue, "Purina Dog," is correct for dog at lower right corner. We have written in "12" to identify this dog. Now you write in correct numbers to identify remaining dogs.

1. SANDY—Orphan Annie's best buddy.
2. MASCOT—Famous Ivy League university.
3. CHAMPION SHIRKHAN OF GRANDEUR—This Afghan won highest honors at Madison Square Garden in 1957.
4. FLUSH—Elizabeth Barrett Browning's Cocker Spaniel.
5. SNOOPY—A comic pal of Charlie Brown's.
6. RCA VICTOR DOG—"Masterful" trademark.
7. SENOR DOG—Gordo's sidekick on the funny page.
8. GREYHOUND DOG—He runs from coast to coast.
9. CLEO—Noted television humorist.
10. FALA—This Scottie lived in White House many years.
11. ARGUS—Ulysses' famous hound.
12. PURINA DOG—Seen on TV for Purina Dog Chow.

Now complete your entry, following these EASY CONTEST RULES

1. Write in correct numbers to identify dogs; complete the jingle, rhyming last word with "V." Print or write plainly. Use entry blank in this ad, or pick up an entry blank at your local grocer or Purina feed dealer, or use a plain piece of paper, tracing the dog pictures.
2. Submit as many entries as you wish, but each entry must be accompanied by weight circle (2¼, 5, 10 or 25 lbs.) printed on the upper front of any package of New Purina Dog Chow, or facsimile. The weight circle is merely to show proof of purchase. Judges' decision will NOT be influenced in any way by amount of pounds shown on weight circle. To qualify for bonus prizes, contestants must enclose a 25-lb. weight circle and indicate on entry blank.
3. Mail to: Dog Chow, P. O. Box 5069, Chicago 77, Illinois. Entries must be postmarked by midnight, Mar. 31, and received by midnight, Apr. 15, 1958.
4. Entries will be judged by The Reuben H. Donnelley Corporation on: (a) correct identification of dog pictures, and then, in case of ties, (b) originality of thought, sincerity and aptness of expression for last line of jingle. Elaborate entries are not a factor. Judges' decision final. Duplicate prizes in case of ties. Only one prize to a person. No entries returned. All entries and ideas become property of Ralston Purina Company.
5. Winners will be notified by mail. Prize winner lists available May 15 to anyone enclosing self-addressed envelope.
6. Any resident of Continental United States may enter contest except employees (and their immediate families) of Ralston Purina Company, its feed dealers, and its advertising agencies. Contest subject to federal, state, and local regulations. Dog pictures and various marks are used with permission of their owners.

Now complete this jingle about the Purina Dog:

"Every dog has his claim to fame,
You won't find two that are quite the same;
Purina stars this one on TV,
.....

SAMPLE—"A real eager eater, tune in and see."

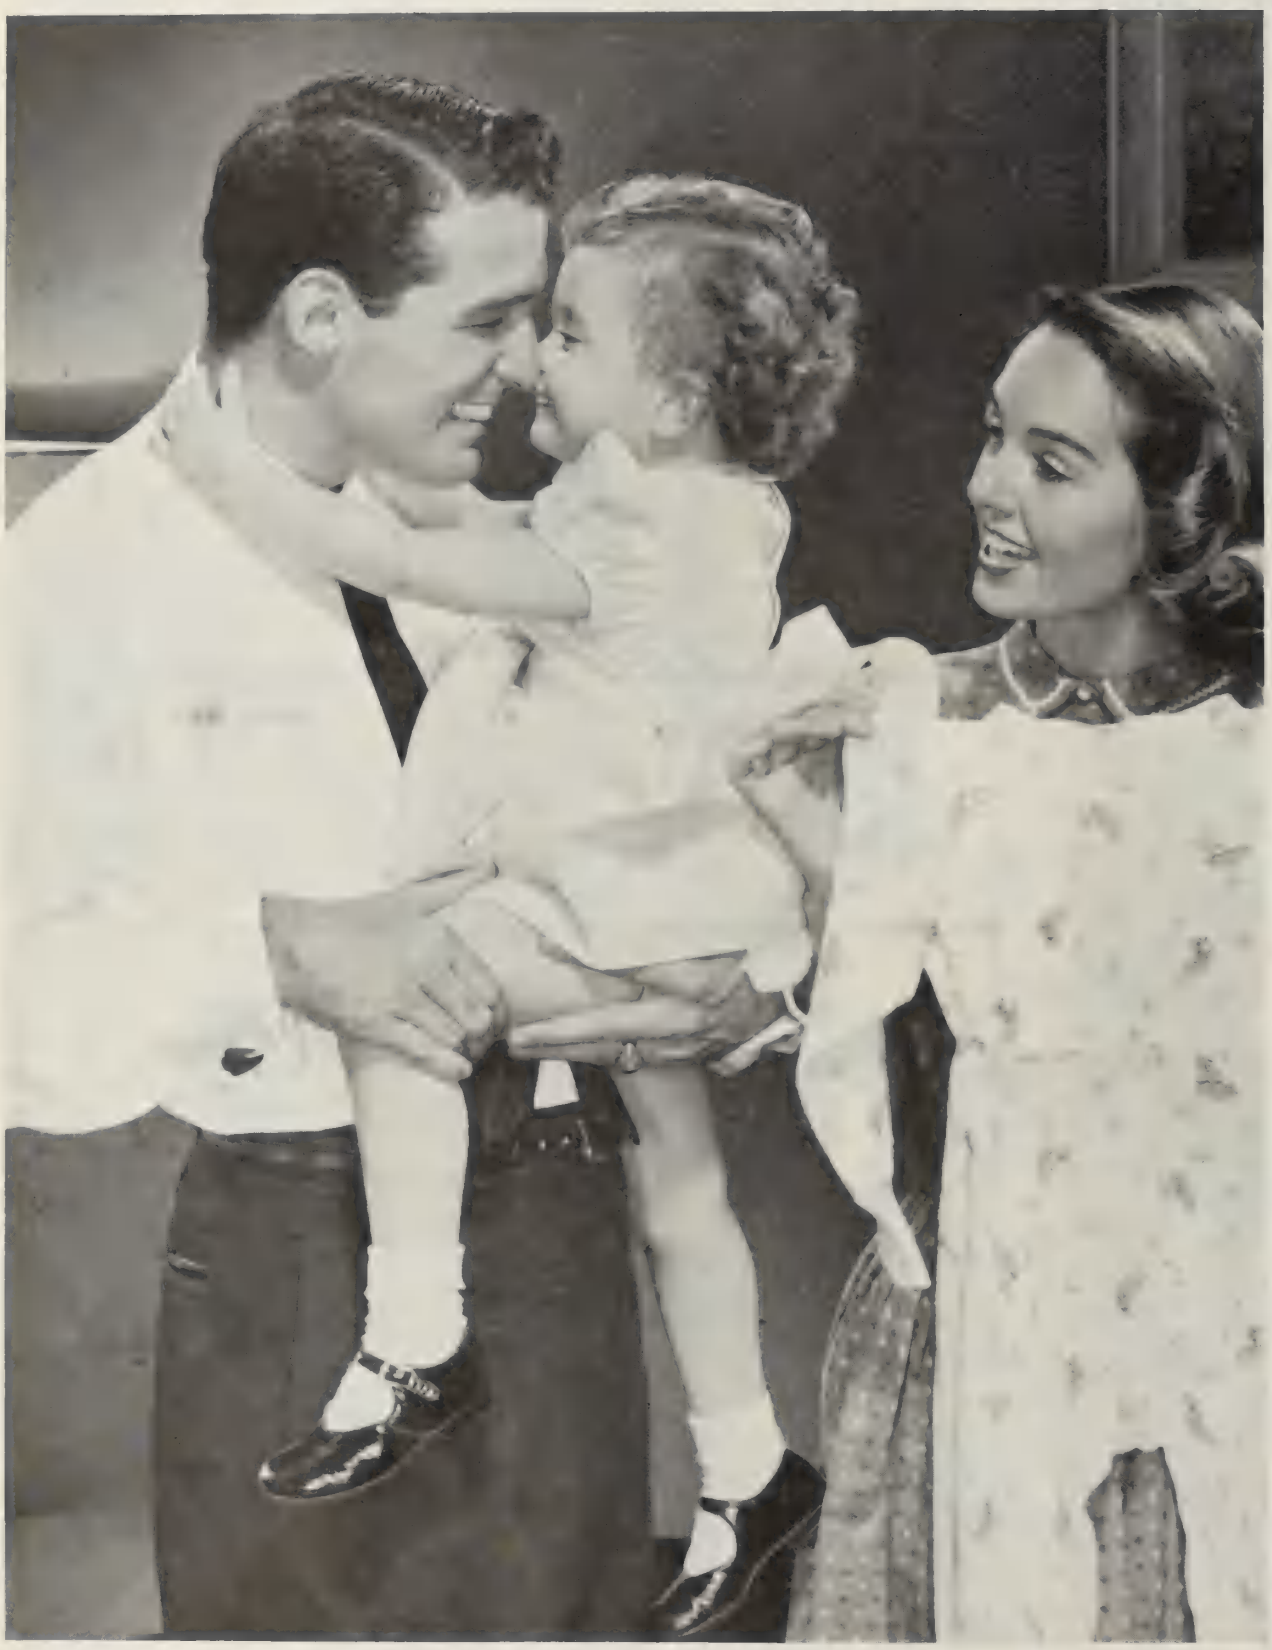
(Please print name and address clearly)

DOG CHOW, BOX 5069, Chicago 77, Ill.

I've identified each dog from the clues and completed the jingle. Attached is weight circle from a package of New Purina Dog Chow.



NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

CITY..... ZONE.... STATE....

If enclosing bonus 25-lb. weight circle, check here. ☐

You get a Cleaner Wash with CLOROX®

Whitest and Brightest!

When you add Clorox to your washday suds, you're adding extra cleanliness to your wash. White cotton, linen, nylon and rayon come out extra white...color-fast cotton and linen come out extra bright. Clorox does a better job of bleaching and stain removing than any other type of laundering product. That's why the cleanest wash you can get is a wash that's Clorox-clean!

Safest for Health!

Clorox adds extra health protection, too! For Clorox is a more efficient germ killer than any other bleach ...any other laundering product! It's a good health habit to disinfect your wash with Clorox every time!

KEEP AN EXTRA BOTTLE HANDY FOR HOUSE CLEANING!

CLOROX®

© 1958, The Clorox Company

WHEN DISASTER STRIKES, YOU ARE THERE—

With the American Red Cross

JACK SHERE

When Hurricane Audrey struck Louisiana, its victims streamed to Red Cross shelters. In a converted schoolroom, volunteer Mrs. Carmen Cheramie cares for injured Mrs. Louis Cole, mother of three, whose home was demolished.

Volunteers at Work

By MARGARET HICKEY

Whenever and wherever local disaster strikes, Red Cross volunteers rush to the aid of the stricken. They care for the injured, feed and shelter the hungry and homeless, comfort the fearful. When individual disaster befalls, too, the Red Cross volunteer is there—bringing cheer to a sick child, a lonely mental patient or aged shut-in.

This willingness to help others in time of misfortune is a tradition found in the thrilling life stories of nurses, beginning with Florence Nightingale and carried on by Clara Barton, Elizabeth Blackwell, Jane Delano. Today some 5600 nurse's-aide volunteers follow in their footsteps.

- In Texarkana, Arkansas, for example, Mrs. R. O. Mitchell and Mrs. Herbert Green since 1956 have worked at the maternity clinic for indigent pregnant women held every Thursday at St. Michael's Hospital. They are among some 10 Red Cross aides on duty, helping register patients, taking temperatures, pulse and respiration, weight—all friendly, efficient members of the important medical team that assures good professional care for mothers who otherwise would be unable to afford it.

- In Greensboro, North Carolina, Mrs. Joseph Hamilton and 15 other aides give some 800 hours of service at the public-health clinic in a year. During the general clinic one day a week the aides take medical histories, help prepare and reassure patients awaiting examination and assist the doctor with routine procedures; provide transportation when necessary.

- In Palo Alto, California, Mrs. Stanley Hiller, Jr., directs a corps of 20 aides at Stanford Convalescent Home for children. Tailored and crisp in their blue-and-white uniforms, the aides are always alert to changes in the health of the little patients. They help apply bandages, assist the technicians in the physical-therapy department. Fourteen of them have learned to use the electrocardiograph. They sit in on doctors' conferences on patients about to be discharged, then visit the family so that necessary home care may be arranged. But their first duty to these children away from their homes is to provide special attention and affection. A small child, the aides have found, eats more happily if held on a motherly lap at mealtime. And treatment is never so fearsome when a nurse's aide—who has two children of her own at home—is sitting alongside reading or telling a story.

These are just a few examples of the work women, all trained in the basic Red Cross nurse's-aide course, are performing without pay. The director of Stanford Home, who had never used aides before 1955 when he sent an SOS to the Red Cross, is no exception when he says now, "We wish we had many more like them." END

"There isn't food enough for a rabbit to eat," Clara Barton reported after the Michigan forest fire of 1881, "and, indeed, no rabbit to eat it if there were." The fire had raged for days, sweeping before it all living things. Nothing remained but black ruin, but over this the flag of the American Red Cross, founded by the indomitable Clara, signaled disaster relief for the first time in the United States.

At dawn on the day after Hurricane Audrey struck the Louisiana gulf coast, the Offshore Lafourche, a rescue ship bearing the first 400 refugees from Cameron, moved quietly into port at the Lake Charles city docks. Muffled sounds drifted shoreward in the slight breeze; a child crying, and these words were heard: "Gone—everything's gone." Then silence—the strained silence of exhausted and shocked people.

Screaming with wind velocities of more than 100 miles per hour, Hurricane Audrey spun over the Gulf of Mexico and propelled across the coastal lowlands of Western Louisiana a thundering wall of water. Crashing against the oak-bearing ridges fronting the gulf, the water broke in crests twenty feet high, cracked houses into splintered sticks, crushed life and scattered debris, house furnishings and livestock over many square miles of marshland.

Most of the survivors had lost everything they owned; many had lost those they loved. Faces were expressionless; eyes stared blankly ahead, not yet able to show hope. When they reached Red Cross shelters in Lake Charles, 59 miles from Cameron, they had little to say. Their first questions were: "Have you seen my husband . . . my wife . . . my mother . . . my baby?" Red Cross workers heard refugees whisper repeatedly, "Gone—gone; everything's gone. There is nothing ——"

The face of disaster is the same today as it was in Clara Barton's day—it is an ugly face, terrifying, destroying in moments the work of lifetimes, leaving after it great wounds in the land, in communities and in the human heart.

In Louisiana the Red Cross was on the job as it has been in every time of disaster anywhere in the United States since 1881. In its first 75 years, the Red Cross participated in 6000 disaster operations, giving assistance at a cost of more than $200,000,000—some of them your dollars, if you contributed.

Unprecedentedly costly disasters in recent years have imposed a severe strain on Red Cross finances. Clara Barton's first disaster-relief operation in Michigan cost $80,000. After the eastern states floods in 1955, the Red Cross spent $18,000,000 to help 14,961 families in six states. Assistance to victims of floods in the western states in December of that year cost eight and one half million dollars. Disaster preparedness and relief expenditures for 1955–56 totaled $32,743,319.

On the day of crisis in Lake Charles, everyone in town in a position to do so served selflessly, as did members of the armed forces, civilian defense, the Salvation Army and many other organizations, both governmental and private. Thousands jammed the telephone lines to offer their services or donations. "We had used clothing coming out of our ears," said Alcée Maxfield, chairman of the Calcasieu-Cameron chapter of Red Cross.

But only the Red Cross chapter had a nucleus of trained volunteers and a disaster-preparedness plan ready to put into action. The chapter's disaster organization was mobilized the day before the storm; the chapter house became a frenetic hive, the center of emergency-relief direction. Even before the heavy winds subsided, professional Red Cross workers, veterans of many disaster operations, had arrived and dropped into places beside the volunteers. Under the direction of Don Stout, Hurricane Audrey disaster headquarters were established in a vacated church building in Lake Charles, and Red Cross caseworkers began to plan long-term assistance to the homeless families.

Immediate assistance after a disaster—food, clothing, shelter and medical care for the stricken families—is dramatic, often heroic, and it is well known. But only twenty cents or less of each Red Cross disaster-relief dollar is spent for such help. The big expenditure is for long-term assistance, helping to restore the capacity of the family to reach and maintain its predisaster way of living. Eighty cents or more of each Red Cross disaster-relief dollar goes for this purpose, and it is all an outright gift of the American people. Nothing is sold or loaned.

After the storm in Louisiana, 27,000 persons from the Cameron and Calcasieu parishes used the Red Cross shelters set up in school buildings. Thirty thousand meals were served during CONTINUED ON PAGE 28

NEW IDEA! Add flavor to your with KRAFT

Use them as ingredients

Heavenly Peach Angel Food Cake

1 9- or 10-inch angel food cake
2 12-oz. jars Kraft Pure Peach Preserves
1 cup heavy cream, whipped and sweetened

Slice the cake crosswise to make two layers. Spread half of the preserves between the layers and the remaining preserves on top. Frost the sides of the cake with the whipped cream.

favorite foods Jellies and Preserves!

to add true flavor of fresh-picked fruit, captured the special KRAFT way!

New Kraft Jellies and Preserves are the ones to use—because they're made to be extra flavorful. Even when Grandma made her wonderful jelly, much of the good fruit flavor boiled away. But Kraft makes jellies and preserves a new, flavor-saving way. They're "cool-cooked" . . . at temperatures 'way below boiling . . . to keep the flavor and color of the fresh-picked fruit! Doesn't using new Kraft Jellies and Preserves as ingredients sound delicious, and easy? Try it!

❶ Strawberry Upside-Down Biscuits

❸ Minted Broiled Peaches

❷ "Philly" Pineapple Pie

❹ Double Treat Sandwiches

❶ Strawberry Upside-Down Biscuits

Parkay Margarine
Kraft Pure Strawberry Preserves
1 pkg. Ballard or Pillsbury Biscuits

Grease 10 large muffin cups generously with margarine. Place 1 tablespoon preserves in each cup. Cover with a biscuit and bake in hot oven, 475°, for 8 to 10 minutes. Turn out upside-down immediately. Yield: 10 biscuits

❷ "Philly" Pineapple Pie

1 8-oz. pkg. Philadelphia Brand Cream Cheese
½ cup sugar
½ teaspoon salt
2 eggs
½ cup milk
½ teaspoon vanilla
1 12-oz. jar Kraft Pure Pineapple Preserves
1 9-inch unbaked pastry shell
¼ cup chopped pecans

Place cheese in bowl; cream it until soft and smooth. Slowly blend in sugar and salt. Add eggs, one at a time, beating thoroughly. Blend in milk and vanilla. Spread preserves over bottom of pastry shell. Pour in cream cheese mixture; sprinkle with pecans. Bake in hot oven, 400°, 10 minutes, then reduce heat to slow oven, 325° bake additional 50 minutes. Cool before serving.

❸ Minted Broiled Peaches

Canned peach halves, drained
Kraft Parkay Margarine, melted
Kraft Mint Apple Jelly
Roast leg of lamb

Place peach halves, cut side up, on broiler rack. Brush with melted margarine. Broil a few minutes until lightly browned. Fill each peach half with jelly. Serve as a garnish with the roast lamb.

❹ Double Treat Sandwiches

White bread, sliced, crusts trimmed
Parkay Margarine
Peanut butter
Kraft Pure Grape Jelly

Spread the bread with margarine. Lightly score the margarine to divide the bread into four squares. Spread the peanut butter on two opposite squares. Spread the remaining squares with jelly.

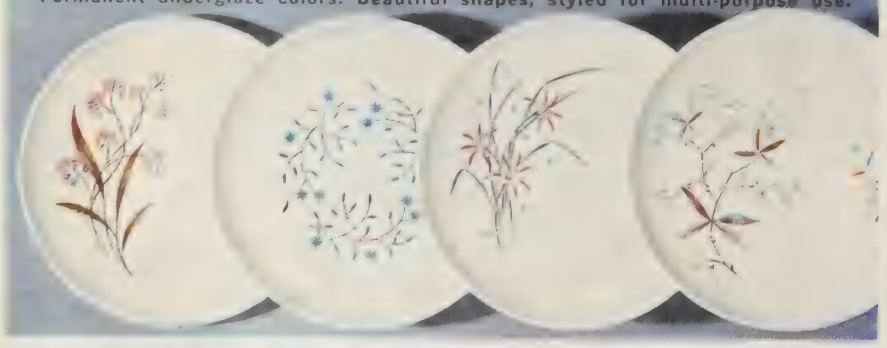
in all your favorite varieties

FREE RECIPE FOLDER!

Here are many ways to use new Kraft Jellies and Preserves to add flavor to baked goods, desserts, main dishes. Write to Kraft Jellies and Preserves, Dept. J2, Box 522, Chicago 77, Illinois.

Shown above: SERENE

REAL CHINA designed for America's new Carefree way of life



for only 5.95
5-piece place setting

● GUARANTEED AGAINST BREAKING* ● OVEN-PROOF
● DISHWASHER-PROOF ● COPPER COVERED SERVING PIECES

Not plastic, not pottery, not thick or heavy! Carefree is real china, translucent and delicate-looking, thinner than you ever dreamed an oven-proof china could be. So elegant for formal entertaining, so sturdy you can use it every day...even for outdoor barbecues. See Carefree, the beautiful, durable true china that pays for itself...over and over again!

Carefree
ALL PURPOSE TRUE CHINA
BY SYRACUSE

Permanent underglaze colors. Beautiful shapes, styled for multi-purpose use.

WINDSWEPT, 6.95 BLUE MIST, 7.95 FLAME LILY, 6.95 FINESSE, 7.95
Prices are for 5-piece place settings. 16-piece starter sets from 19.95. 44-piece family sets from 56.95.

* BE SURE TO ASK YOUR DEALER FOR GUARANTEE CARD

Send for free illustrated brochure and name of nearest dealer.
Syracuse China • Dept. CJ258 • Syracuse 1 • New York

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 25

the first twenty-four hours of the emergency. The terrible job of retrieving and identifying the dead, and locating relatives, began. Before the storm, the population of Cameron Parish was 6244. When it was possible to list deaths and damage, the appalling total was 369 persons dead, 40,000 head of cattle missing, 1200 homes and 1000 other buildings destroyed in Cameron Parish alone. ("Parish" is the Louisiana word for county; the hurricane did some damage in nineteen other parishes in Louisiana and in four counties in Texas.)

The disaster didn't end when the news faded from the front-page headlines. When the debris was partially cleared away, the major work began—rebuilding an entire community.

In Lake Charles the center of rehabilitation direction was transferred from the chapter house to disaster-relief headquarters. To this center, and other interviewing stations set up at Cameron, Creole and Grand Chenier, disaster victims came to discuss the varied problems of their rehabilitation. Young and old, large families, single persons, all needing help. They talked with experienced Red Cross social workers who knew how to evaluate what they had left, the amount of insurance due them, how much money they could safely borrow, how much Red Cross should give them in direct aid.

"If we could just get the roof fixed" . . . "My boat—it's three miles from water" . . . "I can rebuild most of the house myself, if I can get some lumber and tools" . . . "Just some clothes for the children, and food" . . . "Not a stick is left, no furniture, no garden, nothing" . . . "Well, we never had any insurance anyway."

Based on the need, not the actual loss, Red Cross disbursements may be made for clothing, food and maintenance; for the repair and rebuilding of homes and other buildings; for household furnishings; payment of hospital and doctor's bills; for supplies, equipment, or tools needed by a worker to earn his living. Small businesses, such as those owned and operated by a family with insufficient resources to recover from disaster losses on their own, may also be helped. Orders are placed at regular retail prices with merchants in the disaster area, whenever possible, since getting local businesses in operation again is an essential part of the rehabilitation process.

Perhaps the greatest help of all is hope. For many weeks following a disaster those who suffered the most painful losses are often in such despair they are unable to decide what they can do or whether it is worth while to do anything. Without Red Cross guidance, some of these people might find life merely a lasting burden, to themselves and to the community.

One caseworker recalled a young man who came to the Red Cross office after the Furies—hurricanes Connie, Diane and Ione—hit the coast of Eastern North Carolina in the fall of 1955. He had operated a roller-skating rink on the ocean front. Both his business and his home were wrecked and he wanted the Red Cross to help him buy a trailer. He was going to hitch it to his car, he said, and "go down the road."

"Where will you go?" the caseworker asked him.

"Far away from here," the young man said.

She suggested that he take a week to think it over. The next week he again reported at her desk, feeling much better. He had decided not to leave the area after all. Now he was going to rebuild—but he planned to build a fine restaurant on a highway several miles inland.

"Do you own the land?" she asked.

"No."

"Do you know anything about the restaurant business?"

"No—but I could learn."

Again she advised him to sit tight and give serious consideration to what he wished to do. The third week he was back again. He had, he said, decided exactly what he wanted to do.

"What is it?" the caseworker asked.

"I'm going to rebuild my house and skating rink down on the beach. That's the place and the business I know—and there's still the foundation left."

Finding the foundation on which disaster victims can build, and giving them the difference between such resources and credit as they have and their essential need, is the function of Red Cross rehabilitation. The sums awarded may range from a few hundred dollars to many thousands; the need, and what families can do for themselves, the determining factor.

"Giving money away—money held in trust for the American people—is the most vulnerable, difficult business in the world," observed Hurricane Audrey disaster director Don Stout. He had spent most of the day acquainting himself with a stack of several hundred recommendations for grants to be placed before the advisory committee that evening. The advisory committee was made up of civic leaders from the devastated areas—ministers, businessmen, teachers, lawyers—men and women who knew the exact circumstances and resources of the people recommended by caseworkers to receive Red Cross aid. "It's the Red Cross way of forestalling criticism of too little here, too much there, of making sure we are doing an honest job of helping these people," Don Stout explained. Similar advisory committees are set up for any disaster-rehabilitation operation. The names of the members are usually kept secret. They are, of course, unpaid volunteers.

Each caseworker is responsible for presenting personally to the committee the plan and the amount of Red Cross aid recommended for each family on his list. He must be prepared to answer any questions members of the committee might ask, and to follow the committee's suggestions.

"I'm not in favor of helping re-establish any business that sells beer," one member says. The caseworker explains that the amount of recommended Red Cross aid will hardly pay for replacing a part of the ruined furnishings in the family's home, which is also a part of the business. If they want to rebuild their beer business, they will do it on their own, or borrowed, money.

"Ten dollars an acre—huh!" another committee member says. "More likely he got a hundred dollars an acre for oil-lease rights on that property."

If the caseworker doesn't already know all the facts, he will take the information into

CONTINUED ON PAGE 30

THERE ARE OTHER LANDS

By BARBARA SHOOK

There are other worlds than ours, and stars
That burn across high heaven with a light
So brilliant in its passing that it scars
The firmament with flecks of fiery white;
Other lands than ours,
mountains that tower
Ice-crowned upon the silent hills below,
Where great trees gape their limbs to catch the shower,
The white magnificence of falling snow.
And yet no world is wondrous as your heart,
No valley vast as the haven of your smile;
No concord of the sky can quite impart
The crinkle of your laugh,
Beyond the while,
Beyond the seeming and the dream of days,
You are my world, completely, in all ways.

Betty Crocker says:

"Every once in a while you'll want a cake a mix won't make and that cake is a SOFTASILK CHIFFON CAKE!"

You'll bake a softer, lighter, lovelier—richer cake with soft . . . soft . . . SOFTASILK Cake Flour because it's made from special wheat that can carry more shortening and sugar, and give you higher cake volume. That's why you'll want Softasilk for this elegant butterscotch-smooth chiffon cake.

Betty Crocker

SOFTASILK BUTTERSCOTCH CHIFFON CAKE

- 2¼ cups sifted SOFTASILK
- 3 tsp. baking powder
- 1 tsp. salt
- 2 cups brown sugar (packed)
- ½ cup cooking (salad) oil
- 5 unbeaten egg yolks
- ¾ cup cold water
- 2 tsp. vanilla
- 1 cup egg whites (7 or 8)
- ½ tsp. cream of tartar

Heat oven to 325°. Sift flour, baking powder, salt into bowl. Add sugar. Make a well; add oil, egg yolks, water, flavoring. Beat with spoon until smooth. Beat egg whites and cream of tartar in large mixing bowl until whites form very stiff peaks (3 to 5 minutes on electric mixer on high speed). Pour egg-yolk mixture gradually over beaten whites—folding just until blended. DO NOT STIR. Pour into ungreased 10" tube pan. Bake 65 to 70 minutes at 325°, or until top springs back when lightly touched. Invert over neck of funnel or bottle. Hang until cold.

Frost with Satiny Beige Icing: Combine ⅔ cup brown sugar (packed), 3 tbsp. water, ⅓ cup light corn syrup. Boil until syrup spins a long thread, or 242° on candy thermometer. Meanwhile, beat ⅓ cup (2 large) egg whites until stiff. Pour hot syrup slowly into egg whites, beating constantly. Add 1½ tsp. vanilla. Beat until icing holds its shape.

A soft . . . soft . . . Softasilk cake says such nice things about you!

Only Royal Gelatin gives you the "FRESH-FRUIT VITAMIN-C"

LOWER IN CALORIES

than ½ large grapefruit

And simply scrumptious! Only ROYAL GELATIN DESSERT tastes like fresh ripe fruit . . . and gives your family the "Fresh-Fruit Vitamin"—C . . . the vitamin so important to sturdy bodies, good teeth and bones. Yet a serving of ROYAL GELATIN is lower in calories than half a large grapefruit. Get ROYAL today!

TWO FINE PRODUCTS OF STANDARD BRANDS INC.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 28

consideration. Oil leases are a complicated aspect of the economy of this region; people with no visible source of income may in fact have a great deal. Even leases for the right to shoot ducks in the marshes are an important source of income for many persons. Only members of the community could know the intimate details of its economy and society. The advisory committee listens sympathetically and gives hardheaded, but not hardhearted, advice to the Red Cross. No grant will be made without its approval.

The caseworkers, having put many hours of work into a family plan, present it with the utmost sincerity and conviction, as though they were dealing with their own families (they call them "my" families). More often than not, when a case is presented to the committee, a member will say, humbly, "I think that is a very just and reasonable recommendation. I move we approve."

A World War II veteran insists that he is perfectly capable of building his own home—the caseworker says he is not and recommends a grant for labor and materials. The mother of a large family is known to be suffering from incurable cancer and medical expenses will soon absorb all their meager resources. The caseworker recommends that this family not be required to participate financially in the rebuilding of its home. (Most families are required to participate, to the extent that their resources permit, in the costs of rebuilding or repairing their homes.)

Gilbert LaSalle, of Cameron, who lost his wife and one son, mother, father-in-law, sister and five other close relatives in Hurricane Audrey, was granted a Red Cross award amounting to $4007.75 to aid him in rebuilding and refurnishing a home. He and his three children who survived the disaster were given emergency assistance also.

Mr. and Mrs. Armogne Benoit and his daughter received $6505.50 to replace their four-room house, furnishings, and to buy a used pickup truck and a cow. Mr. Benoit, totally disabled because of tuberculosis, and his family were dependent upon welfare aid before the storm.

Mrs. Clarise Broussard, a sixty-four-year-old widow, received a total of $2131.43 in Red Cross assistance. Mrs. Broussard had no resources and only a small fixed income. Her home was one of five built during a single weekend by AFL-CIO craftsmen who donated their time. The Red Cross provided building materials.

A couple from Grand Lake who made duck and goose callers for a living were granted $1270 to repair their home, to replace furnishings and to get their small manufacturing business back into operation.

Family by family, house by house, the little town of Cameron rebuilds. Grand Chenier is coming back, better than ever. Ask old Sam Doland—he's seventy-five and all but his small bank account was washed away. The Red Cross supplied the materials and the unions supplied labor to build him and his aged wife a little house. Frank Kelly, disaster chairman of the Calcasieu-Cameron Red Cross chapter, who made trouble shooting and liaison work his full-time job for months after the storm, asked Sam why he didn't leave Grand Chenier when warned that a hurricane was approaching.

"Seen lots of storms acomin'," Sam said. "Seen 'em go too. I've lived on this ridge for seventy-five years, and my pappy lived here for seventy-five years afore that. That water never did come up over this here ridge."

"But it did this time."

"It did, but this is my land, and I'm going to stay right here on it till I die."

For many months hundreds of families lived in tents supplied by the Housing and Home Finance Agency and equipped by the Red Cross. The people of Cameron Parish are a sturdy breed, many of them the descendants of the Canadian French who were cruelly deported to this region from Nova Scotia in 1755. Others are of hardy Irish-Anglo-Saxon stock, independent self-sustaining people, who were, until roads across the marshlands were built twenty years ago, almost completely isolated from the rest of the country.

Two other hurricanes—Bertha and Deborah—threatened the area while the people were rebuilding after Audrey's violent visit, but storms will not keep these people from their land. The region is barren in appearance, but many find the marshland, with its birds and wildlife, beautiful. It is also extremely valuable as a source of oil and for raising cattle and rice. And there is the sea, the great Gulf of Mexico, from which many fishermen have wrested a living for centuries. Those who have suffered the sea learn to love her and will not willingly leave the land they own at the water's edge.

They all came back to Cameron Parish—all the old-timers, anyway, all the old and the young who survived. In Creole, Bee Nunez had his lumberyard in operation six weeks after the storm. He lost $45,000 worth of materials in the hurricane, and his house, though it stood, was packed in every crevice with green sediment and mud and cracked down the middle. He is rebuilding on his own resources and credit, without direct Red Cross help, but he was glad to get those orders which the Red Cross placed for others less able to help themselves. A lot of people were able to help themselves, it turned out. They just needed to get started, and the Red Cross helped to show them the way.

It took a lot of doing—and two and a half million dollars—but the job was done. In all, 3670 families registered for Red Cross help. Three mass feeding stations, using Army equipment and Red Cross food and personnel, operated for three months and produced more than 100,000 meals. But it is the reactivation of a disaster area that counts, for Red Cross assistance, if unduly prolonged, is likely to defeat its own purpose.

HELP YOUR HEART FUND · HELP YOUR HEART ·

More than 100 professional Red Cross workers served in the Hurricane Audrey operation; typical of every disaster operation, the local Red Cross chapter was the center and pivot for disaster relief. Walter E. Richard, acting chapter chairman; Jean McClatchey, chairman of volunteers; Jane Judas, service-groups chairman; Emily Spencer, her vice chairman, and many others worked at a frantic pace for the first forty-eight hours with only moments of sleep. Disaster chairman Frank Kelly has been a volunteer Red Cross worker since 1916.

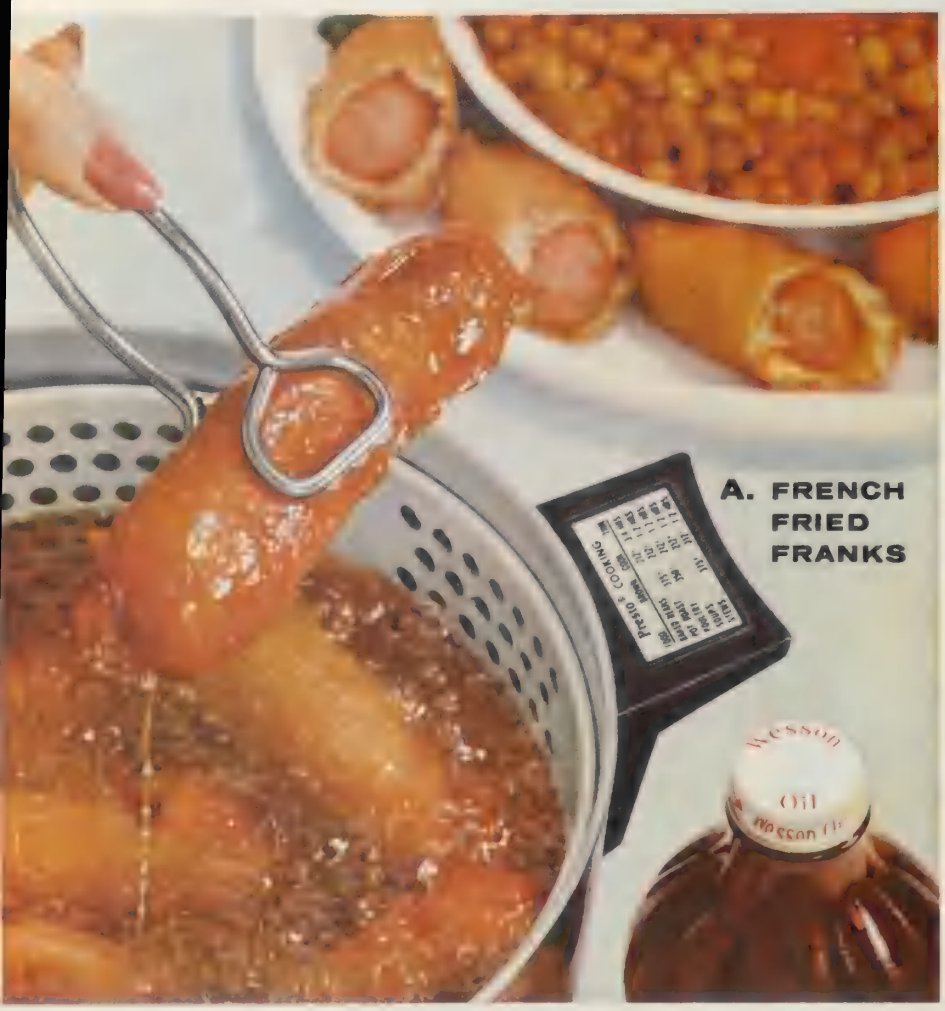
Jean McClatchey, attempting to summarize her feelings, declaimed: "Whatever Red Cross is or can ever hope to be depends upon its very lifeblood—the volunteers! They give it the human compassion and mercy and old-fashioned neighborliness for which it stands." She paused, as though too tired to remember an old speech, even a very good one. "I mean," she said, "everybody did their darnedest!"

The wife of an officer stationed at Lake Charles Air Force Base, Jane Judas was especially pleased that so many military personnel worked as a part of the Lake Charles community. The mother of two children, she herself worked almost daily, and sometimes half the night, for many weeks. When at last she found time to pound out some copy for Feminaire, the publication of an Air Force club, she wrote: We'll remember these acts proudly, a long while, and I truly wish it were possible for me to thank everyone who served. The fact is, though, I'd feel impertinent. Some things are too big for anyone's thanks.

Every person who contributes money or time to the Red Cross has a share in these "things too big for anyone's thanks." E. Roland Harriman, national chairman of Red Cross, describes the organization as "a working partnership between 3700 chapters and the national organization." Alcée Maxfield, chairman of the Calcasieu-Cameron chapter of Red Cross, will have little trouble convincing others in his community of the importance of maintaining a complete and up-to-date disaster-preparedness plan for years to come. The wounds inflicted by the hurricane are healing in Louisiana, but the people will not soon forget Audrey—or the Red Cross. END

When it's Bean-time U.S.A., most folks make it Beans and Wieners!

As nutritious as it is delicious!



Next time you want to serve your family a quick, low cost meal, remember that you don't have to sacrifice nutrition. Make an easy-to-fix dish of your favorite brand of wieners plus Van Camp's high-protein Pork and Beans. It's a fact, you can double the valuable, body-building protein contained in two wieners or frankfurters, just by adding a generous serving (1 cup) of Van Camp's Pork and Beans.

VAN CAMP'S PORK & BEANS

The secret savory sauce is cooked in...Just heat...eat...enjoy!

Outsells the rest 'cause it tastes the best!

Look what you can do with

C. FRIED CHICKEN

Aunt Jemima Pancake Mix!

Surprising idea but oh, so good! Pancake mix for cooking and frying. And what a wonderful new flavor it gives! Delicious fried chicken made golden-crisp with pancake mix. Tenderest buckwheat muffins you ever turned out. Pizza crust that sings "O Sole Mio!" Try them all. They're so good, and so easily made, with Aunt Jemima Pancake Mixes. And for extra speed and convenience in each of these recipes, the liquid shortening we suggest is Wesson Oil.

A. FRENCH FRIED FRANKS. To make batter for golden-crisp deep-fat fried franks, combine 1 c. of Aunt Jemima Pancake Mix, 1 tbsp. sugar, ⅔ c. water. Beat well. Dip franks in batter and fry in deep fat (375°F.) 2 to 3 minutes. Drain; cut in half; and serve with hot barbecue sauce, or as a main dish with baked beans. Makes 8 servings.

B. PEACH COBBLER. Use Aunt Jemima Buttermilk Mix for light, delicate-crusted cobbler. To make peach base, combine ⅓ c. sugar and 2 tbsp. Aunt Jemima Buttermilk Mix with 1 c. juice drained from a No. 2½ can sliced peaches; cook over low heat until thickened. Place peach slices, 1 tbsp. lemon juice and thickened sauce in 1½″ x 6″ x 10″ baking pan; dot with butter.

TOPPING: Mix 1 c. Aunt Jemima Buttermilk Mix and 2 tbsp. sugar. Add 1 beaten egg and ½ c. milk to dry ingredients; stir till fairly smooth. Fold in 3 tbsp. liquid shortening. Drop batter by spoonfuls over fruit. Bake in hot oven (425°F.) 25 to 30 min. Serve warm with peach syrup or cream, plain or whipped. Makes 6 servings.

C. FRIED CHICKEN. For crisp golden brown chicken, put 1 c. Aunt Jemima Pancake Mix, 1 tsp. salt and ¼ tsp. pepper in a paper sack; add chicken and shake well. Brown slowly in liquid shortening in frying pan. Reduce heat; cover and cook till tender.

D. MUFFINS. For deliciously tender, fine-textured muffins, mix 2 c. Aunt Jemima Buckwheat Mix with ¼ c. sugar. Add 1 c. milk, 1 beaten egg; blend. Lightly stir in ¼ c. liquid shortening. Fill greased muffin cups ⅔ full. Bake in hot oven (425°F.) about 20 minutes. Makes 12 muffins.

E. PIZZA. A tender, crisp crust is a must for good pizza. It's a snap with Aunt Jemima Pancake Mix. Just put 1½ c. mix in bowl; stir in ¼ c. liquid shortening with fork. Add ⅔ c. milk, mixing lightly. Form a 12″ circle on a greased cooky sheet or pizza pan. Bake in 450°F. oven 10 minutes.

FILLING: Pan-fry 1 lb. pork sausage meat; drain. In some of the drippings brown ¾ c. chopped onion till transparent. Add 1 can tomato sauce, 1 can tomato paste, ½ tsp. salt, ¼ tsp. pepper, ¼ tsp. oregano and the sausage. Cover and simmer 20 min. Pour over fresh crust; top with ½ c. shredded Cheddar cheese. Return to oven till cheese melts. Sprinkle with grated Parmesan cheese. Makes 6 servings.

We want your ideas . . .

$10,000 REWARD for the best original recipe using Aunt Jemima Pancake Mixes together with Wesson Oil in a brand new way. Try out your ideas and send your best recipe with your name and address to: RECIPE, Box 1088, Chicago 77, Illinois.

1st PRIZE: $10,000 CASH—plus national recognition as "QUEEN OF COOKS."

500 PRESTO CONTROL-MASTER FRY-PANS (illustrated above) for the next 500 winners.

FREE to every entrant—brand new Aunt Jemima Cook-book full of dozens of tempting recipes illustrated in color.

Get complete contest rules from your grocer, or write to box number above. Contest closes April 30, 1958.

Looking for Something?

SLIP COVERS

FROM PET SHOPS TO SLIP COVERS whatever you need-
Find It Fast In The Yellow Pages
Ads displaying this emblem make your shopping easy.

UNDER COVER

By Bernardine Kielty

"The funny thing is month after month Jackson sells more beds than anybody else in the department."

One night after a grinding day's work at Macy's during the pre-Christmas rush, Percy Straus, who at that time was running the store, fell into bed around midnight exhausted. At 2 A.M. his bedside telephone rang. A charming feminine voice identified itself as that of (say) Mrs. Noel, of Sunnyside, Long Island.

"I just wanted to tell you, Mr. Straus, that I am perfectly satisfied with the dancing bear I bought at Macy's for my little granddaughter's Christmas."

"I am delighted to hear it, madam," replied Mr. Straus, a courtly man. "But may I ask why you telephoned me at my home, at this hour, to tell me so?"

"Because your so-and-so truck just woke me up delivering it!" roared Mrs. Noel, of Sunnyside, and hung up.

THE PRICE IS RIGHT, by Margaret Case Harriman (World), is great fun, even though it has serious intent—a kaleidoscope of R. H. Macy & Co.; a striking passage of dry-goods-store history from 1863 to today and an especially nostalgic recollection of changing New York.

Did you ever hear that Queen Salote, of Tonga, that six-foot lady of dignity who stole the show at Queen Elizabeth II's coronation, was dressed from head to foot by Macy's Tall Girl Shop? Macy's got a letter from Queen Salote asking for an outfit for the coronation; so Macy sent her six outfits to choose from—and she kept them all.

●

VOLTAIRE IN LOVE is a subject which, for contemplation and research, should suit Nancy Mitford down to the ground. And so it has suited her, so much so that she has written a book by that title (Harper).

This was Voltaire in his younger days, playwright, wit, smart as all get out, sipping the honey where he chose, and finally deciding on Mme. du Châtelet, "Émilie," with whom he lived for nine years. Émilie, mathematician and scientist, was the Mme. Curie of her day, plus sex. She and Voltaire lived happily and busily together in her country home, along with her good-natured husband, who usually took his meals with the children.

The book is based largely on recently discovered letters that have not yet been published, reaching almost to the French Revolution.

At the other extreme (from eighteenth-century France) is MAKE MY BED, a nice lighthearted novel by Nathaniel Burt (Little, Brown). The eternal problem, Shall I marry Butch or Horace? in terms strictly American and up-to-date, is probed and finally solved.

●

Gladys Denny Shultz and Daisy Gordon Lawrence have written a lively memoir of Juliette Low, founder of the Girl Scouts: LADY FROM SAVANNAH (Lippincott)—lively and surprising. I mean, Juliette was quite a girl! who went fishing with Mr. Kipling in evening clothes, who stood on her head at board meeting to show off the newly designed Girl Scout shoes she was wearing, who was almost stone deaf, who was involved in divorce and money scandals. But she accomplished her serious purpose, and that's included.

●

Great stories about SHOW BUSINESS, by Jerry D. Lewis (Coward-McCann), is for all who love the romantic never-never land where laughs and tears are interchangeable and every figure is phosphorescent. Twenty-seven good stage stories.

Maybe it's show business of one kind or another that has changed the most popular girl's name in this country from Mary, where it long rested, to Linda. (Third most popular is Deborah.) But there's no nonsense about the boy's. For fifty years solid it has been John, and John it remains.

●

THE COMPLETE BOOK OF ABSOLUTELY PERFECT BABY AND CHILD CARE, by Elinor Goulding Smith, which JOURNAL readers will remember with delight, is now out in book form (Harcourt Brace) and seems even funnier—a cheering hospital gift.

PEOPLE OF THE REEDS, by Gavin Maxwell (Harper), is one of those books that might conceivably escape notice. But for this reader it was an unforgettable experience. It is about a journey taken by two Englishmen among primitive natives of the great swamp of Southern Iraq, in the ancient region of the Tigris River. For four months they sit cross-legged in the longest, the narrowest, the most precarious of canoes known to man. Their nights they spend on the islands of reeds that sway with the wind. They sleep in natives' huts—on their cameras and binoculars, lest a thin brown arm softly extract them. Fleas, snakes, belligerent wild boars, disgruntled water buffaloes surround them.

But there is more, far more. . . . "A satin sunset of oyster and duck-egg blue, against which trail long skeins of flighting ibis . . . a young Suwaid, poling his hunting canoe with a fishing spear, the points black against the sky, the taut silhouette, and the slim, dark sliver of the canoe carved in utter silence through the shining liquid sky and sunset-colored water. . . . Above him a single star bright as the moon."

The purpose of the journey was to carry medical help to a disease-ridden population: its saga—for me at any rate—as exciting as Kon-Tiki.

●

It must be this cold gray weather that makes us keep reaching out for laughs. But the best recent laugh book I know is BROTHER SEBASTIAN, a little book of simple line drawings by Chon Day, depicting that deceptively simple-looking friar in most revealing situations. (Hanover House.)

FROM BOOK "BROTHER SEBASTIAN."
PUBLISHED BY HANOVER HOUSE, NEW YORK
COPYRIGHT © 1956 BY COWLES MAGAZINES, INC.
COPYRIGHT © 1957 BY CHON DAY

●

But best of all—especially in this month of great men—is LINCOLN—a Picture Story of his Life, by Stefan Lorant (Harper). The most tragic and the most heroic chapter of our history, through which tall Abraham Lincoln walks so nobly, yet so modestly—a book to make the heart glad with pride.

One hundred years ago anaesthetic ether was the new miracle drug of the day. In 1858 Dr. Edward R. Squibb established a modest laboratory in Brooklyn, N. Y., to supply anaesthetic ether and pure medicinal drugs to the Army, Navy and medical profession. In the beginning he signed each label, to certify that the contents had been carefully selected, processed and tested for uniformity, purity and efficacy.

For a century Squibb has sought by every means of research and quality control to make every Squibb product, from ether and antibiotics to vitamins and aspirin, the best for the purpose intended. That simple principle characterizes the finest in every field of American endeavor, and you live today in a new world because of it.

Entering its second century, Squibb will continue as Dr. Squibb began in 1858, to make the Squibb name and the Squibb label your assurance of uniformity, purity and efficacy.

OLIN MATHIESON CHEMICAL CORPORATION, 1956

Who's at fault when a husband neglects his family for a game?

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

GOLF WIDOW

"Have you any suggestions that might help the family of a golf fiend? Because we were barely making ends meet, I went back to work a little over a year ago. Our three children are in school all day, so we can manage without help at home. At least we could if my husband would lend me a hand evenings and weekends. Instead, he spends every spare minute on the golf course, and I've become a work horse.

"Saturdays we're both up early, but he goes off to chase that miserable little ball while I try to catch up with the cleaning and ironing and do some cooking for the week ahead. He comes home just in time to 'catch a nap' before dinner—while I keep the house quiet so he can rest.

"Sunday it's the same story—the children and I go to church, daddy goes off to the golf course. How thankful I am when we have a rainy weekend! Then maybe I can get him to attend to a few household chores that are beyond me. At least he's at home, and the children and I see something of him.

"Worst of all, after a year of carrying an outside job while still looking after my home and family, I have nothing to show for it. I thought we'd use my earnings to pay off our bills and get something ahead. But with all the money he is spending on golf fees, balls and clubs, meals out—not to mention the liquor tabs on the 'nineteenth hole'—we're in deeper financially than ever before. What can a wife do when she and her children are neglected and deserted for a game?"

Obviously, this wife's problem involves more than her husband's addiction to golf. Either she has distorted the facts (no doubt unintentionally), or her husband is a selfish, irresponsible individual who, if deprived of golf, would still evade or ignore his obligations to home and family. Golf is the focus, but not the fundamental cause, of this wife's grievance.

Still, many conscientious and generally sensible men do let golf or some other outside recreation absorb an unreasonable share of their time and money, through sheer thoughtlessness or a kind of little-boy enthusiasm that a mature adult cannot afford to indulge. Dozens of letters come to my desk each year, bewailing the husband's obsession with hunting, fishing, bowling, boating or some other pastime that takes a man out of his home and that his wife cannot or does not share.

But the commonest complaints concern golf and bridge, probably because they are not limited to a short season, and because they are so often a serious financial drain. (Bridge can become very expensive if played for high stakes and accompanied by drinking.) How can a wife help her husband keep his mania within reasonable limits?

The first step is to analyze the situation, honestly and realistically. To get the facts, keep a written day-by-day record of the amount of time and money you actually spend on recreation, both at home and away. Keep a similar record for your husband, based on your observation and definite knowledge. (Don't quiz him about expenses—simply estimate as fairly as you can.)

At the end of a month, compare the two. If the situation appears less serious than you expected, ask yourself if you have been exaggerating. Some wives unconsciously resent their husbands' interest in masculine pastimes and begrudge them even an occasional evening with the boys. You may be one of them.

But if the present arrangement is really unfair to you, the discrepancies will be obvious to your husband as well as to you. Show him the record. If he is reasonable and responsible in other ways, he will not want to deprive his wife and children of their proper share of his time, attention and the family income for the sake of a mere hobby.

With his co-operation, you can work out a compromise satisfactory to both. This may involve his cutting down on his hobby, but you should neither expect nor want him to give it up entirely. Instead, be prepared to agree cheerfully to his standing golf date on Saturdays if he will devote Sundays to you and the children. Or ask his help in finding ways and means for you to take up some new outside activity of your own.

Tears, threats and similar methods sometimes improve matters temporarily. But they almost never result in a permanent solution, because they are not based on improved understanding between you and your husband. The only sensible approach is the one we have outlined. If that fails, then your real problem lies deeper. The solution must be sought, not by curbing your husband's mania for golf, or bridge, or lodge work, but by analyzing, then strengthening your entire relationship.

CAN YOU BE TOO INDEPENDENT?

Every human being is unique, distinct from all others in character, temperament and personality. For this reason, every individual needs some degree of self-sufficiency, some means of self-expression, in order to maintain self-respect.

Yet it is possible to overemphasize independence, at the sacrifice of other values. None of us can be totally self-sufficient. Physically, we all depend on others to produce (if not pay for!) our minimum requirements—food, shelter, clothing, medical care. Emotionally, our dependence on others is equally vital. The infant needs "tender loving care"; the adult needs companionship, affection, the sense of sharing and belonging. The husband or wife denied these things in marriage is likely sooner or later to seek them elsewhere.

Unless the marriage is failing and she has already decided to end it, a wife rarely deliberately seeks to become independent of her husband. But she may do so, unconsciously and almost imperceptibly, particularly if she is a career woman or if she becomes too absorbed in social and civic activities outside her home. That is what was happening to Shirley and Bob when she came to see me.

Both are approaching thirty, and they have been married ten years. Their daughter Roberta is seven. Shirley worked for the first two years of their marriage in order to help Bob complete college, but her pregnancy forced him to leave a year short of graduation. They managed on his small income (as a salesclerk) until Roberta was old enough for nursery school and Shirley returned to work.

Now she is an office supervisor, earning half again as much as Bob. Her salary enables them to live very comfortably, despite the outgo for a part-time housekeeper. She sums up the situation this way:

"Bob and I have grown apart. I have to look after Roberta when I get home, so he and I rarely go out together. He leaves most decisions to me, and we seldom disagree, but we share almost no interests. I try to encourage him to get ahead, but he lacks ambition. He seldom shows me any affection any more, and when he does it seems mechanical."

When Bob came in the next day, he was quiet, co-operative but almost indifferent. "Our marriage is all right—no better and no worse than most. Shirley's a smart girl and will always get along. She doesn't really need me; any man would do as well. Maybe she doesn't need a husband."

In successive interviews, Shirley began to see the pattern. In the early days, as a full-time student with a part-time job, Bob had willingly left money management and most decisions to Shirley. The habit had persisted. The apartment they lived in, their car, even their social engagements were Shirley's decisions and her choice. Roberta's upbringing was left almost entirely to her, and in her preoccupation with the child she ignored her husband's need for companionship.

Under the circumstances, Bob's apparent indifference was understandable, though not constructive. As Shirley continued to play the role of leader rather than partner, to divide her time between her job and her daughter, he felt less like a husband and father than like a casual visitor or paying guest.

It was easier to recognize Shirley's shortcomings than to overcome them. But fortunately she realized something was wrong, and wanted to save the marriage. Once she accepted the fact that her dominance was largely responsible for Bob's passiveness, she set about honestly and sincerely to improve the situation.

The very fact that she sought counsel gave Bob much-needed reassurance that she really loved him and valued their marriage. He, too, needed help, but he was quick to see that his aloof attitude and self-pity had only aggravated the difficulties. He is co-operating wholeheartedly, and their marriage is stronger than ever before.

There was no need for Shirley to give up her job, and she is a self-reliant, resourceful businesswoman as before. But she now recognizes that the husband and wife who are content to go their separate ways are not truly married at all. Interdependence, not independence, is her goal.

DO YOU AGREE?

My husband is very tired and depressed, even talks of suicide. What should I do?

Consult your physician immediately, since your husband may need psychiatric treatment.

ASK YOURSELF:

Why is My Husband Critical?

All husbands are occasionally critical of their wives, sometimes justifiably, sometimes not. Many wives can evaluate their husbands' criticism and profit from it, but others resent and reject it. If too much criticism is creating tension in your household, honest "Yes" or "No" answers to these questions may help you find out where the trouble lies.

Does Your Husband:

1. Often accuse you of carelessness?
2. Frequently complain about the food you serve?
3. Say you are an untidy housekeeper?
4. Make light of your opinions?
5. Accuse you of extravagance?
6. Blame you when things go wrong?
7. Criticize more than he praises?

Do You

8. Lose your temper often and easily?
9. Envy your husband's freedom?
10. Mistrust or suspect him?
11. Find it hard to forget a grievance?
12. Easily get your feelings hurt?
13. Say bitter things when you are angry?
14. Feel that your husband doesn't appreciate you?

If the total of "Yes" answers to the first seven questions exceeds the total of "Yes" answers to the next seven by three or more, your husband is more critical than the average man. But if your affirmative answers to questions 8–14 exceed the total in 1–7 by three or more, you may be giving him grounds for complaint. Any substantial difference between the two scores can only mean that his or your needs in marriage are not being met. Try to analyze the situation realistically, to see whether he is too critical, or you are too touchy. Then you can take steps to improve the situation.

New Palmolive Soap Gives New Life to Your Complexion!

BECAUSE NEW PALMOLIVE SOAP BRINGS OUT BEAUTY WHILE IT CLEANS YOUR SKIN!

There's never been a beauty soap like this before . . . not even Palmolive. Think of the softest, creamiest lather. It's yours in New Palmolive. Rich white lather that soothes as it cleans . . . helps your true complexion beauty come through. And daily Palmolive care gently washes away dirt and make-up . . . cleanses so thoroughly, it actually gives your complexion new life.

Think of the most fabulous French perfumes! They inspired New Palmolive's haunting fragrance which leaves your skin so fresh, so clean, so heaven-scented.

Best of all, New Palmolive's mildness and gentleness make it right for every age, every type of skin!

All New! lather fragrance color wrapper

Today's Palmolive is the Dream Soap of Tomorrow

"How I use Murine to rest my eyes at work"

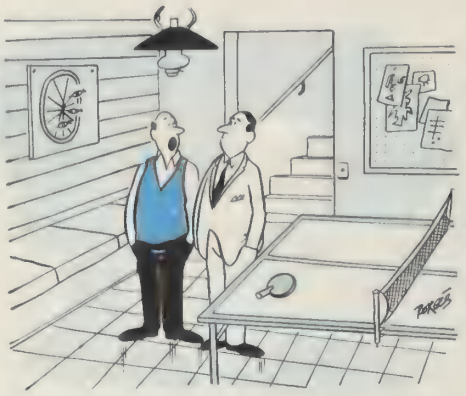
MILTON CANIFF
Creator of the popular comic strip, STEVE CANYON

"My eyes work hard every day while I draw, read scripts and check artwork, so I keep Murine handy," says Milton Caniff. "Murine is soothing, feels refreshing." Here's a restful idea, morning and night—or whenever your eyes feel tired from exacting work or minor irritations like smoke and dust. Murine comforts and cleanses your eyes, gently. Seems to make you feel more relaxed.



MURINE
FOR YOUR EYES*

The Murine Co., Inc., Chicago, U.S.A.
*Trademarks Reg. U.S. Pat. Off.

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

PORGES

"We remodeled it with a bucket of paint and our life savings."

One of our town's biggies has installed a sofa near the fireplace and TV in his de luxe kitchen so he can make himself comfortable while watching his wife wash the dinner dishes.

Our banker's wife doted on Rudy Vallee when he came to entertain the ladies at their state convention. (She first saw him on their honeymoon twenty-some years ago.) "I doubt they'll ever invite Elvis Presley to sing to us," she murmured.

"I don't mind my husband's remembering his old flames on Valentine Day," confides Betty Comfort, vacuuming the carpet in her convertible, "if he just remembers her: no two-pound boxes of candy or American Beauty roses."

I'd like to slug guests who nuzzle a defenseless baby with their phalanxes of germs. Somebody's invented a face protector for babies; maybe we should mask the nuzzlers.

Our town's off-season "garden tour" was a great success. Not many flowers, but platoons of curious people paid $1.50 to visit five houses and poke into bathrooms and closets. A bargain: our women's club could clean up with a new tour each month.

My lunch companions downtown complained mildly when the barbers raised the price for haircuts to $1.75. Some threaten to space haircuts further apart, or let their wives cut their hair. But it's far likelier they'll attempt to cut their sons' hair at home.

How eager my Lady Love's chums are to be first with the newest! Now they're pestering the phone company for the new horn-shaped phone with the dial at one end. It's designed (I gather) to overcome the rigors of phoning in bed.

Our seventeen-year-old and three chums are pressuring for a cycle trip in Europe next summer. But it shows signs of expanding from bicycle to motor scooter, from scooter to motorcycle, and from motorcycle to just a teeny-weeny foreign sports car on which they might make a fabulous profit, see?

Teen-agers are aggressive because they're full of doubts, thinks my insurance man who was a lieutenant colonel in the Air Force. "I know," he tells me, "I used to be one of the young men so rude at cocktail parties in the twenties because I was so shy."

I love to window-shop of an evening, strolling my Enchantress past the illuminated treasures. She insists it's only bafflement and frustration when the doors are locked.

Our horsiest merchant has three superb saddle horses in his paddock. But he gets the most mileage on an electric horse in his dressing room which he sits like a centaur, loping through a brunch.

Recently I spent a sunny Sunday afternoon flying around with the Civil Air Patrol to see if we could catch the Ground Observers napping. We didn't; but it was a sunny Sunday afternoon, like the December 7th when the Japanese caught all of us napping.

Valiant is the word for Suzi, who, at eighteen months, attacks a chunk of hamburger with her four teeth as if it were caviar, but disdainfully. Someday she'll turn up her little nose just enough to convince a splendid Princeton type that pâté de foie gras is for peasants.

I hear the younger movie-goers—16 to 23—don't worship Clark Gable or Gary Cooper as the right dreamy young hero to be courting Audrey Hepburn or Joan Collins. To them I suppose even Fred Astaire seems as seasoned as Lou Tellegen or Leo Dietrichstein seemed to me when I was twenty.

For $1 or $2 a month you can rent a genuine hand-painted oil painting at our town's art center to hang on trial in your house. If it turns out less dreamy than you thought at first glance, you're stuck with it only a couple of months, not forever.

Only two of the ladies I see frequently ever bake homemade bread, Shirlee and Marie, and in a way it's a trait more winsome than a dimple. I esteem good home-baked bread far above cake; I can dine on an end cut of it with peanut butter.

When my redhead and her brave-new-world husband start back to Oregon in their station wagon, it reminds me dimly of a prairie schooner. The rear is transformed to a corral for their two tots, which my son-in-law has mattressed, pillowed and padded.

I'm in a quandary: my Dream Girl knitted me a tennis sweater too good for Hoad or Gonzales. Red, white and blue around the V neck, ribs and bumps. I cautioned her to make it roomy; she did, and now it's far too big for me. Shall I boil it?

How little it takes to make a mom and a dad happier! Our bridge partners confide they're vastly cheered to learn that their children are exquisitely polite to everybody except pa and ma.

Our town's barbers don't take joyfully news from Junior in Japan of haircut, shave, shampoo, facial, shoeshine, massage and manicure, all for $1.85. They say he won't get a real trimming till he comes home.

Suddenly many of our sportsmen have gone sedentary. They sit and watch basketball games or football, or even TV. They seldom break 120 at golf unless they play winter rules; and they can't break 120 at bowling, either, even with a relaxing sit-down between shots.

So far (I've got my fingers crossed) my wife has never chided me for flirting with a homely woman. She's very gracious about it, even urges me. What puzzles her to the point of vexation is, what do I see in those frivolous beauties?

We're getting our snow shoveled by four boys who claim they're earning money for a trip to Europe next summer. I have it authoritatively from their parents that it's a scheme for avoiding chores at home for free.

At bedtime young Patrick has learned to fight a valiant rearguard action; he insists on a drink of water from each faucet in the house. Each one, he argues, gives a different flavor.

. . . When our youngest breaks a prize date in the middle to rush my envelope to the post office,

. . . Or my 119-pound brunet calls me "colonel" in front of somebody I don't mind impressing,

. . . And our son-in-law sends us a wall can opener apparently of solid gold, with a magnet yet to catch the top of the can,

. . . And the last thirty snapshots of Harlan III in Japan show a resemblance for both his ma and pa,

Then I congratulate myself on how I flimflammed my Dream Girl into marrying me without revealing my true self.

Journal ABOUT TOWN

Gossip about people you know,
editors you like,
and what goes on in New York

FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

In February, 1908, there were long bread lines in the Bowery, and an English butler with excellent references cost $25 a month. In villages and towns, a clanging bell announced the umbrella mender. New York City saw the start of a 20,000-mile auto race to Paris (via California), and Isadora Duncan in short Grecian tunic and bare feet and arms was dancing "like a wonderful April morning."

"Should one use a fork or spoon in eating peas, and is it improper to shove food on the fork with one's knife?" asks a reader in the February, 1908, JOURNAL. "However unsatisfactory," sighs Mrs. Kingsland, "the fork alone is used in eating vegetables."

"Should a woman resume her long gloves after leaving the table at a formal dinner?" Answer: "It is the custom to do so."

"Effie: Fresh stockings every day will become a necessity if you once try them."

"A piece of elastic across the instep will prevent children's long drawers from slipping up and making ugly wrinkles in their stockings," suggests Mrs. Ralston.

"What is appropriate mourning for a little girl of ten who has been left an orphan?" Replies the fashion expert, "Black serge dresses, a coat of black melton and a black felt hat trimmed with a large black ribbon bow."

"How long should a child wear the ribbed, knitted bands with shoulder straps? My boy is two years old now." Answers Dr. Emelyn Coolidge, "Keep the bands on until he is three at least. It is important to keep the abdominal organs at as even a temperature as possible."

"With macaroni and cheese, serve rice or potatoes and white bread. An excellent meal!" says Mrs. Rorer.

In this 1908 issue, Editor Bok points out that in America the oldest son often sleeps in a garret bedroom with one small window, while the daughter "has a large, luxuriously furnished chamber on the second floor fit for a princess. Why? A daughter is the first step to social climbing in America—a son is not."

"Donna: The dark line around the neck is often caused by wearing a stiff, tight collar."

"When was Memorial Day first observed?" Answer: "May 30, 1868, after the Civil War."

ABBOT MILLS

Cynthia Norman delays her first arithmetic lesson to take one in photography, under the watchful eyes of Bil and Cora Baird.

When we were invited recently to watch a dress rehearsal of Adventures in Number and Space, we took Dawn Norman's five-year-old Cynthia along. This bids fair to be a truly provocative TV program which Bil and Cora Baird have just put on this winter with their celebrated puppets to make children like to learn, and learn to like, mathematics. Cynthia was a little frightened at first face to face with Snarky Parker the puppet here, but after she'd taken his picture with one of Abbot Mills' cameras, they were friends, and in no time Snarky had Cynthia counting up to ten on the beads of the abacus, her first enchanting encounter with the mysteries of arithmetic.

The Bairds' puppets fill fractions with endless fun, and learning with laughter. Bil said he shortened his name to qualify for a club of boys with only three-letter first names, like Tom, Ted, Pat and Dan.

Eddie Cantor* was telling Peter Briggs at lunch about the entertaining he does as toastmaster and M.C., and the practical solution he has to holding down after-dinner speakers. "I ask the speakers in advance how much time they want. If a man insists he needs an hour to get his message across, I take a slip of paper out of my pocket and give it to him: 'This one can be read in a minute and fifty seconds.'" Immediately the speeches get shorter and surer. On the slip of paper: the Gettysburg Address.

Two years ago the JOURNAL printed a note to husbands: "Have you pinned a medal on your wife lately?" Well, we can't begin to tell you how many medals have been pinned on since then, but we'll tell you of two. One recipient's medal read: "To Mamie: for never-failing help since 1916—in calm and stress, in dark days and bright. Love, Ike." The other recipient we'll mention is Mrs. Richard Robinow, who's here from Durban, South Africa, on a Fulbright Fellowship and came in to let Laura Lou Brookman see her medal. "D.B.M." it said. "Means 'Distinguished Baking Medal'—only I'm not that good," Mrs. R. shyly confessed. "My greatest success was from one of your JOURNAL recipes—your banana bread."

We hope this news will put the conductor of the fascinating column on our left in her place: that it costs more to keep Federal employees in paper towels today than it cost to run the whole Federal Government in 1908. And we hope the following will be picked up by her successor fifty years from now: that 1957 was the year when peppermint-striped tooth paste was introduced, and polka dots in paint.

Tina Fredericks tells us that a friend of hers has found the perfect baby sitter. He's a retired churchman who likes children, books and nature. So he combines his hobbies by wheeling your baby carriage to a park bench where he reads. For this pastoral pursuit, his fee is 75 cents an hour. Babies enjoy his company, too, in mutual admiration.*

It's no wonder that professionals of all kinds, from fashion to films, like to take their pictures on locations here in town—New Yorkers having learned through long experience not to walk between the models and the cameras and pretty much to treat the photographing group as just other people with jobs to do. But oh my! how they like to collect in crowds to give audible advice—serious and otherwise. Here, for instance, when a girl from the Workshop took her camera down to Greenwich Village to take Bet Hart shooting Callie Devlin in the spring-clothes picture you'll find on page 108 this month, a bystander admonished her, "You shouldn't be taking pictures here. This is for the Ladies' Home Journal." . . . That's Bet in the foreground directing. The man in the checked jacket is the fashion photographer, Roger Prigent. The crowd? They're there, don't worry. They merely know how not to be seen—just to be heard.

New York and "foreign soil" are only blocks apart. Chinese dragons dance near Wall Street, the Polish parade Fifth Avenue, guitars sound in Spanish Harlem, Oktoberfest comes to Yorkville, Italian saints watch over Mulberry Street. Idea hunting, Jean Anderson and Jane Engel, of our food staff, hurried down to Little Italy's biggest festival, the San Gennaro. "Just like a country fair," they said. "Right in the middle of the city, a bandstand [two-story neon gothic], music [Verdi], crowds [200,000 knotting the streets, hundreds more window-watching], food." Jane and Jean ate their way down eight electric-bright blocks—pizza, cannolis (cream-filled wafers), prickly pears, zepolle (sugared fritters), espresso, scaloppine, manicotti, lasagne, assorted Italian pastries, hot peppers, sausage, tortoni, and spumone on a stick. . . . Keep your eye open for Italian specialties in our future food pages.

ABBOT MILLS

Jane Engel and Jean Anderson sample Italian delicacies.

Bet Hart directing,
Roger Prigent photographing.

JEAN ANDERSON

"All of what you see when you watch me on the screen isn't fake,"
Kelcey said.
"Some of it's me.
It has to be, Mike.
Don't you see?"

Every woman is somewhat of an actress. But how much of a woman was actress Kelcey Banks?

I THINK I LOVE YOU

By MEL HEIMER

From Wally Warner's "Hollywood and Broadway" column:

The Falcon Studio press agents can drum up all the hot air they want to about Kelcey Banks' "romance" with Rod Aikens, who just happens to be in the same Falcon stable, but her real heart is a handsome young roving editor for Era news magazine. Happened—boom!—just like that.

He tried to tell himself sharply, savagely, that he wasn't the first man ever to fall in love with an actress. They all feel this way, he thought; they all break out in cold sweats and they look at the actresses and they wonder and they say how will I ever know if ——

But it wasn't any good. The program was only half over, but he got up, setting the bottle of pop on the coffee table, and went over and snapped off the set.

The room went quiet quickly, and he became aware of the cigarette smoke still mushrooming under the shade of the one lighted table lamp. Through the one opened window he could see the dark, softly rolling hills of Hollywood melting with the night sky, and he could just about pick up the scent of flowers.

His name was Mike West and he was sitting in Kelcey Banks' apartment waiting for her, because she had gone off to the Brown Derby to attend this dinner and pick up an award as one of the movies' most promising young actresses.

"I wouldn't inflict it on you," she had said with a grin. "I know how that kind of mishmash makes you squirm and wish you were off playing poker. Only don't play poker; wait for me at home and watch it on the TV and tell me how pretty I looked with my new chignon and the green dress that Wardrobe lent me."

So he had been dutiful and had watched the TV, but after a while he couldn't stand it. It wasn't really a new reason. It was the same one he had felt that morning he had ducked into a cinema cathedral in Chicago and seen her for the first time on the screen.

Only this time it was live; it was happening at the time he was watching and it wrenched him inside. It was an informal kind of program and they panned the cameras around the room . . . and they had picked her up, in the act of being charming to Don Allison. Don Allison was the production chief at Falcon Studios.

It wasn't anything she said. The camera didn't come in that close; besides, somebody else was making a speech and there was this candid shot of her, see, and she was listening to the speech with part of her and giving the other part to Don Allison. It was just something about her air, her manner. She was being professionally charming. She was acting.

He stood by the open window and it surged over him, strong and morose.

The other men who fall in love with actresses—I know what they wonder, he told himself. They look at them the way I look at Kelse and they die a little inside and they say, "How will I ever know if she means it?" When she looks at me and touches my chin softly and tells me gravely, "I think I love you"—is that for me, and me alone?

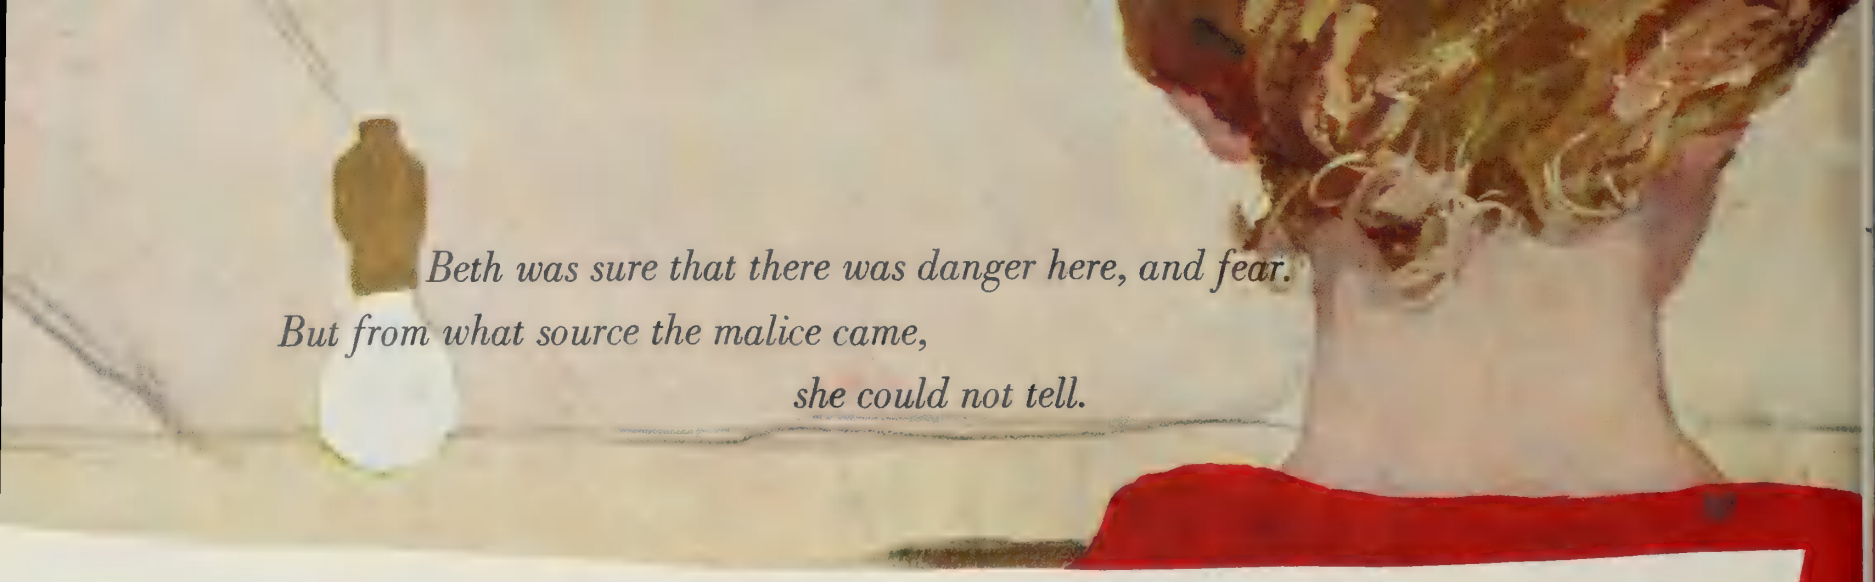
Or is it from a picture she made two years ago? Will I marry her and live happily and then turn on television one night and see one of her old films—and see the gesture of the chin being touched softly? "I think I love you."

Will she be saying it to Rock Hudson or Tony Curtis—and will it be exactly the same?

And will I look up and say, "All right, cut! We'll print that one"? While—what? two? four? seven?—years of marriage come apart suddenly at the seams and ——

Mike West shook his head and turned swiftly away from the window. He looked around the little, comfortable apartment with the beautiful green rug—"I had to have a green rug, Michael; that's all there was to it"—and the books lining the walls. It was an apartment that most of the time made him feel good just to be in it for a little while, but now it made him sad.

Charley Richards had said it, only a few months ago.



"I'm an actor," Charley had said that night in Sardi's just before she had come in, "but God deliver me from ever falling in love with an actress. Dear God—please deliver me from that."

Flash from Wally Warner:

Harry Barnes, the novelist, isn't losing sleep over the bust-up with pretty young Kelcey Banks. He's latched on to Broadway ingénue Mabel Lassiter. And Miss B., incidentally, is lost in the stars with Mike West, the scribbler.

It had been an early-winter night, just after the shows had broken around eleven. Jimmy had stashed them off in one of the corners of the front room in Sardi's and they had been sitting there drinking coffee and watching the thespians parade in. Mike knew a handful of actors casually, the way any writer does, and he knew Charley Richards a little better than that. Charley called himself Curt Wayne and was not bad, not good. In three years or so he'd be in Hollywood making B movies or TV commercials, still itching to do Cyrano or the Thane of Cawdor, with no luck at all.

"My business," Mike said almost smugly, "has yours backed right off the boards. I CONTINUED ON PAGE 139

Beth was sure that there was danger here, and fear.
But from what source the malice came,
she could not tell.

Last night I thought I heard her crying. She has been dead for over a year now, but always when I come back to this house I imagine she is back again in that room next to mine, and I think I can hear her crying. I always hated to hear her cry. I hated it then, and I hate it now. Poor little Rika. Poor little golden Rika with the fragile wrists and the size-three shoe, and the wide silver-gray eyes that could sometimes turn as black as jet.

Maybe when we go to the other house I won't hear her crying any more. Maybe when we go that far away, across two states where no one has ever known Fredrika King, I won't think of her tears; and maybe someday I shall even forget the rest of it too. Mrs. Bales said again this morning that it will look as if all four of us are running away, and I said flatly what did it matter—that of course we are running away.

"They'll never forget her here," I said. "They'll never forget how she died, and they'll never ——"

Stan came into the kitchen then, and I stopped abruptly. I was going to say: "—— and they'll never stop talking about the man who drove her to it." It was stupid of me to stop talking, of course, because he knows all that as well as I do. But I was glad I heard him coming just the same. Why poke through the ashes for a spark of misery that may or may not be there any longer?

Isobel Bales for once did not pursue the subject. All these dreary months she has maintained, in that grim right-is-right way she has, that time always takes care of the truth. Perhaps she is right, but time has passed, and time has not taken care of the truth so far, and so we are leaving tomorrow. All week we have been packing and now we are just marking time, waiting for the vans that will come in the morning.

© 1958 by C. Kage Booton

This is the author's first appearance in any magazine.
THE TROUBLED HOUSE is soon to be published in book form by Dodd, Mead & Co.

THE JOURNAL'S
COMPLETE-IN-ONE-ISSUE CONDENSED NOVEL

This noon I went down to The Corners for twine, and Minnie Pruitt asked me if it was true Stanley King was already planning to take another wife. She looked at me hard when she said that.

I am not going out of this house again until the vans come!

Who wouldn't run away?

It was warm, I remember. Not hot—not that still, brooding hotness that was to come later—but just pleasantly warm with drifting end-of-June breezes and the sun high and bright and clear.

I borrowed my brother-in-law's car and drove out to the edge of town, past the little farms, past The Corners, then on another mile or so.

Stanley King's telephone call had been brief and unexpected. I did not know him, and when my sister first spoke of him and his family as newcomers to these parts I had no idea who he was, although his name seemed familiar. It wasn't until he mentioned Lew Bannister that I connected the man I was talking with with the man Lew used to mention occasionally.

"I don't think you ought to go," my sister said. "I think it's peculiar, his calling you right out of the blue like this. Why you?"

"Lew told him about me."

"But he's been here all these months. He never needed anybody before."

We had been busy in the kitchen when the call came, my sister smilingly bathing her newest daughter, I at the stove with the formula. Now my sister's smiles were gone. "You don't know a thing about him. And I don't, either, except what I've heard, and what I've heard I don't like. People don't think much of Stanley King around here."

"But he's a friend of Lew Bannister."

"So he says."

"I know he is, sis; I remember Lew talking about him. Anyway, how would he know how to reach me if Lew hadn't told him?"

"I don't care; I wish you wouldn't go," my sister told me. "There's something queer about him; all this talk ——" she paused. "And you've never even met him, have you?"

"Darling, whatever made you think
I wouldn't know if you came out here?" Rika said.
"And at this hour, too, in the dark, and poor Beth there dressed—or undressed—
the way she is."

"I don't think so." Lew had so many friends. "I may have; I don't remember."

My sister did not like that, my not remembering, and she repeated the rumors around town about Stanley King and his vicious moods, and his cruelty to his young wife—"so gay and she just loves to talk—a regular little chatterbox, I heard—and quite beautiful too; that's why nobody can understand it. She's always trying to cover up for him, always making excuses for him, but anybody can see how jealous and possessive he is. Ever since they've lived here there's been talk about him, how mean he is to her ——"

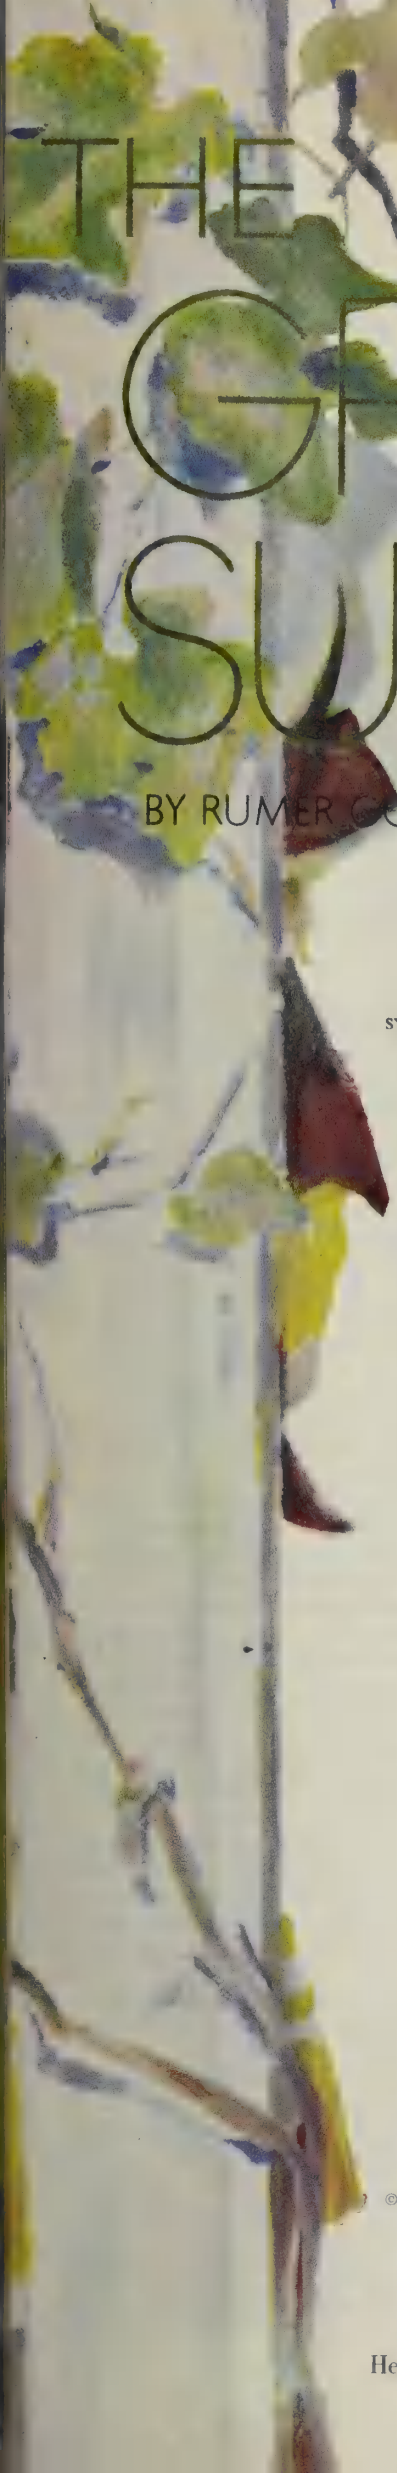
"Mean to her? What does he do? Beat her?"

"There are other ways than that, Beth. He's cruel, and from what I hear he doesn't care who knows it. It's a shame. . . . And rude? The girls were talking about it at club the other night. Everybody was so nice to them when they first moved here—there was a run on the library for his books, and everybody gave parties for them, but half the time he didn't even bother to turn up. One time—when they first moved here, that was—he had some people in for cocktails and he wouldn't even let his wife come downstairs. His housekeeper was there—whoever she is; an aunt, I think—and his daughter. She's by his first marriage and terribly spoiled, I heard. Well, they were there, and she wasn't. Mae Pendleton asked for her, and I guess some of the others did, too, but he got all frozen-faced and said he didn't think she would be coming down. Mae said she wondered, but he can be very charming and it never occurred to her that he might be keeping his wife almost a prisoner in that house ——"

There was more, of course, and of course I listened; but I wanted a job and if Stanley King had one for me, I knew that I would take it.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 88

The Troubled House



By C. KAGE BOOTON

Joss was sixteen. Eliot looked at her and then at Mlle. Zizi.

who had become curiously white. He said, "Zizi, you aren't jealous of a little girl!" . . . But then he looked at Joss again.

THE GREENGAGE SUMMER

BY RUMER GODDEN

SYNOPSIS OF PART I When mother became seriously ill in the Paris station, our only thought was to take her quickly to Les Oeillets, the hotel on the Marne where we had planned to vacation. But owner Mlle. Zizi and her friend Mme. Corbet did not care to assume responsibility for five travel-worn English children and a feverish mother; they would have turned us away but for the kind Englishman, Eliot. It was Eliot who sent mother to a nearby hospital, persuaded Mlle. Zizi to let us stay, and agreed not to notify stuffy old Uncle William of our plight. For days my older sister, Joss, kept to her room with an attack of nerves; this meant that I, thirteen-year-old Cecil, must take charge of Hester, Willmouse and little Vicky. Mlle. Zizi, who loved Eliot, did not like us; we were made to eat with the staff, including the crude kitchen boy Paul, and every afternoon were sent into the orchards with picnics, to keep us out of the way. We thought it odd when we overheard Eliot refer to us as "camouflage," and we wondered at a hotel whose only overnight guests seemed to be Eliot and the painter, M. Joubert. But it was summer, the greengages in the orchard of the hotel were ripe, and we were happy—until Joss recovered and came down to dinner looking fragile and lovely. Eliot was immediately enchanted; Mlle. Zizi turned pale.

II Dinner was not comfortable that night. If anyone French came to the hotel, Eliot dined alone, and tonight, all through dinner, his eyes kept coming to Joss, still with that amazed look, and from her table Mlle. Zizi's eyes followed his. At last she got up and left the dining room. I do not think he noticed her going.

We, at our table, had long waits because Paul did not come to us at all. He had on the white coat he wore when help was needed in the dining room, but he only brought dishes to the service door for Mauricette and took the dirty plates from her. I heard her order him, in angry whispers, to come in and help her, but he would not. Joss, of course, did not know it was different; she sat innocently well mannered and patient, but Vicky began to nod with sleep and Willmouse yawned and even fidgeted.

Hester beckoned to Paul to bring us the dish he was holding in the doorway, but he scowled and turned his back. There were celery soup, stuffed tomatoes, veal with potatoes, flageolet beans served separately as they did here, cheese and fruit. We had only reached the veal when Mlle. Zizi called to Eliot from the office. He threw his napkin down impatiently and went out. Soon the visitors finished and left, too, but Mauricette still walked past us, putting things away instead of bringing our fruit. We, who were familiar, began to be annoyed, but Joss said, "Naturally they have to attend to the more important visitors first."

When Mauricette at last planked down our plate of greengages, the cut-glass bowl of water for our fingers and the clean plates, Joss said, "Merci," as if Mauricette had been normally polite. "Mlle. Zizi vous attend dans le bureau," said Mauricette.

Joss looked inquiringly at me; she was not used to Mauricette's quick talking. "Mlle. Zizi wants us in the office," I said. "Oh, Joss!"

She was a little startled, and we looked at one another. The table seemed suddenly small and the dining room big and foreign.

"Who gave you permission to change your time for dinner?" asked Mlle Zizi.

Joss looked at me in surprise. "We have been having it when Monsieur Armand and the others have theirs," I explained to her.

"What others?"

"Mauricette, Paul, Toinette, Nicole." I was beginning to regret this childish helter-skelter week.

"Who said that you could change?"

Joss turned her eyes on Mlle. Zizi. Her voice was still gentle as she asked, "You want us to eat with your servants?"

Mlle. Zizi's neck went red. "Mauricette cannot manage with so many in the dining room."

I should have accepted that, but Joss answered, "But Cecil says you often have sixty people for luncheon. Tonight we were only fifteen."

"I do not wish"—Mlle. Zizi floundered a little—"to have children with adults."

Joss' soft answer came relentlessly. "But Monsieur le Colonel and Madame—I don't know their name—had their little girl with them tonight."

"Do not argue with Mlle. Zizi," said Mme. Corbet to Joss with such venom that Joss was surprised again.

"I—I'm sorry," said Joss, "but our mother would not like it."

"Your mother left you in my charge," said Mlle. Zizi.

"She left us in Mr. Eliot's," said Joss. "Shall we ask him what he thinks?"

I thought Mlle. Zizi was going to slap Joss, but she controlled herself and, after a moment, "You may have your dinner with the guests," she said, "but I forbid you, absolutely forbid you, to trouble Monsieur Eliot."

After a while Hester and I went to the back steps. We did not want Paul to think we had deserted him, but though he saw us and knew that we knew that he saw us, he did not come. He worked ostentatiously in the kitchen and each time M. Armand passed him he said, "Bougre de gâte-sauce! Marmiton miteux! Espèce de mitron de merde!" I knew they were swear words, but what they meant I fortunately did not know; and I did not know, either, why he should be out of temper with M. Armand.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 66

© 1958 by Rumer Godden

"Come along!" It was Eliot's voice but it did not sound like Eliot.
He had picked up Vicky. "Come along!"

"We Can't Live on $25,000 a Year"

as told to BETTY HANNAH HOFFMAN

How we spend $25,000

(Monthly averages)

Federal, state taxes.....	$415.48
House expenses
Real estate taxes.....	101.20
Fire, theft, liability ins....	23.83
Mortgage, home imp. loans.....	333.57
Swimming pool.....	8.33
House upkeep (hardware, paint, furniture, repairs).....	82.92
Heat, electricity.....	46.83
Water.....	7.54
Husband's personal note at bank	90.00
Education
Newspapers, magazines.....	6.66
Private school, one child.....	31.60
Dancing class, one child.....	2.90
Entertainment
Liquor.....	76.07
Meals charged out.....	24.48
Sporting goods.....	6.59
Vacation.....	65.85
Club dues.....	11.00
Baby sitter ($10 a week).....	43.33
Food ($40 a week).....	173.33
Milk.....	21.21
Cigarettes.....	16.16
Cleaning woman.....	51.60
Medical, dental, drugs.....	32.59
Clothing.....	99.63
Charities.....	38.89
Telephone.....	11.97
Husband's city expenses.....	164.40
Car expense.....	102.70
Life, health accident ins.....	70.75
Boys' allowances, haircuts.....	15.50
Misc. (includes wife's hairdresser and gifts).....	92.31
Total expended each month.....	$2269.22

In the Red: $185 a month or $2,000 a year!

THE HUSBAND SAYS:

(He is an advertising account executive, a former Californian, with a deep resonant voice, springy step and erect carriage. He is in his late thirties. His manner is easy, calm and self-confident.)

My wife and I have never kept a budget. We arrived at the accounting here by adding up the checks we wrote last year. At the end of every year, we're generally about $2000 in the red. This past year was no exception.

Once upon a time, when I was first out of college and earning $35 a week, $25,000 a year seemed like a lot of money to me. I thought you could buy many luxuries on such an income. Yet here we are on a $25,000-a-year treadmill, running as fast as we can to stay in one place. Within two years, the oldest of our four sons will be ready for college. We haven't a cent of savings. How did we get into this dilemma?

Of course taxes are much higher. One fifth of my income goes for state and Federal taxes. And when we bought our present house six years ago, my wife was horrified at the real-estate taxes, which were $840 a year. Now they are over $1200 a year.

The laboring man talks about his take-home pay and counts only what is received after deductions. But the young executive is supposed to get his round figures and few people realize how much he never handles at all. My salary is $25,000 a year, but my take-home pay is only a little over $20,000.

Salaries like these are paid only in big cities or industrial centers where it's generally much more expensive to live. To find a big, roomy house in the country within commuting distance of New York City comes high. If we lump together all our house expenses, the total seems pretty staggering. At least to us, a couple who lived contentedly as newlyweds in a $45-a-month apartment. Maintaining our present house, swimming pool and four acres in an exclusive residential area costs us $604 a month, or approximately 36 per cent of my take-home pay. One in every three dollars we spend (after taxes) is for shelter.

Of course one way to save on house maintenance is to do it yourself, but my wife and I just weren't brought up that way. I bought a big garden tractor with the idea of plowing up a few acres and planting vegetables, but every time I climbed up on the seat something seemed to go haywire with the motor and it was another big repair bill. I know perfectly well that the local repairmen charge me twice as much as they do in the village. We sold the tractor and bought a rotary power mower so the kids could help cut the grass, but they managed to burn out the motor the first summer.

The swimming pool is very large and some of the pump and filter machinery is pretty ancient and needs constant tinkering; all I can do when it breaks down is to call in an expert.

When we finished building a new wing on the house this past summer, my wife and I decided to save money by doing much of the interior painting ourselves. We started on the bedrooms with rollers, but had trouble reaching the corners and switched to brushes, which made the final effect streaky. Also, we didn't know that it is necessary to fill in the nail holes with putty before giving new woodwork three coats of paint.

We have no servants because help is too expensive. A yardman to help with the leaves or storm windows charges $2.50 an hour, a cleaning woman gets $10.20 a day. Medical care is high too—$7.50 each time the family doctor makes a house call.

But although it's a strain financially to live where we do, we wouldn't exchange it. I get a thrill every time I look out over the swimming pool with its brick walks and beautiful roses and rhododendrons, past the baseball field and tennis courts to a distant view of Long Island Sound. There's a small yacht club nearby, too, where the boys have learned to sail. Every weekend finds me in old clothes with a spade and trowel and fertilizer, busy landscaping.

Our rambling house and pool and patio lend themselves admirably to the kind of casual, informal entertaining CONTINUED ON PAGE 133

WHY YOUNG EXECUTIVES GO BROKE

It's when a young executive suddenly jumps from $10,000 to $25,000 a year that he gets into the red. He feels that he should live in a house and a neighborhood that do credit to the company—and this doesn't mean the nearest subdivision.

Living out in the country, you need two cars, more insurance. You can't dine constantly with wealthy families and return the invitations with your wife coming out all pink and steaming from the kitchen; you need more household help. You join the country club and then the hunt club. You almost always want a boat. And there's one big reason yachts are so expensive: you're always the host.

The man in this story can't cut expenses by pinching pennies here and there. He would have to sell his house, move to a different community, uproot his wife and children. That's the only way he could lower his expenses by even 10 per cent.

JOHN L. HANDY, Management Consultant

"We're Doing Fine on $8,400 a Year"

By NELLE KEYS PERRY

"We don't consider money important," says slim, pretty Virginia Collins; "it's just essential! Chuck and I feel that money is to spend—as wisely as we can. We have to manage on our income, but we try to make living as pleasant and meaningful as possible, for our children and ourselves."

Since their marriage ten years ago, Charles (Chuck) and Virginia, both thirty, have managed on monthly incomes ranging from $90 to their present $700. With three handsome blond sons—Charles, seven; Jonathan, five; and Patrick, four—they now live in a comfortable new home ("We own 25 per cent of it") on the outskirts of the thriving Midwestern town to which they were transferred last year when Chuck, a mechanical engineer, was promoted within his company. The prospect of moving gave new impetus to the youngsters' chronic yearning for a tree house—impossible in the ultranew suburban development where they then lived. Young Charles asked wistfully, "What good is a tree if you can't climb it?"

The boys now have their tree house, in a low-boughed maple down by the creek that flows through the meadow back of their lot. In summer the meadow echoes with family baseball games and picnics; the creek is fine for wading, and abounds in fascinating crawdads, frogs and bass bugs, all of which can be caught by determined small boys. At night they turn them all loose again. "Daddy doesn't like killing," Jon explains.

The tree house is only one feature giving the Collinses pleasure in their new home. (Collins is not their real name, by the way, but their story is true. The JOURNAL is respecting their request for anonymity in deference to his company's policy about revealing salaries.) The $17,800 house boasts a well-planned kitchen, airy living room, three bedrooms and two baths—"Every day at noon I bow toward that second bath," says Virginia. The house also came equipped with air conditioning, Thermopane windows, gas heater in the full (unfinished) basement, and garbage disposer. The only "extra" they have added is copper weatherstripping around front and rear doors. They paid $3560 down (received from their equity in their last home) and are paying off the twenty-year mortgage at $102.86 a month (including interest).

Although Chuck is a mechanical wizard, according to his wife, he had never done any carpentry; yet he has finished the basement, using only handsaw, hammer and T square—plus the somewhat questionable aid of three ebullient sons. They display their work with modest pride. "I just dropped a plumb line and marked the floor at intervals, so I knew where to set the studs," says Chuck. With shining eyes Pat shows you the nail he hammered in all by himself; and quiet, imaginative Jon insists stoutly that he personally built the cabinets. Charles, oldest, was really a help, says their patient father: "He can saw straight and knows how to use a hammer."

Half the basement, lengthwise, is divided between garage and Chuck's future workroom, in which a small bench will be set up for the boys' use. Expert marksman Chuck's gun collection will be housed here too. The recreation room, with plasterboard walls, asphalt-tile floor and soundproof ceiling, takes up the remaining area, with space at one end for the seventeen-cubic-foot freezer, the new washer and dryer, and for the sewing bar Chuck means to build, which will do triple service as room divider and dining table. He also plans a laundry chute, but Virginia, who likes clothes dried in the sun when possible, votes for a dumb-waiter, to get the laundry down and back up.

All this work would be much simpler if Chuck had the power tools he wants for his workroom, but, says he, "We needed the rec room worse than I need the tools, so they have to wait till we can afford them. Tools next, then furniture." The "rec" room is now furnished with odd bits and pieces, but it has practically doubled the living area of the house. The TV has been moved down from the living room. A battered but still sweet-toned piano ($10 secondhand) gives expression to Chuck's love for Chopin; sometimes he shifts to trumpet, while Virginia takes over the keys. Charles' beloved trains whiz around an intricate system of tracks; and cowboys and wild Indians can shoot and shriek down here without disturbing their elders above.

With Federal and state income tax, Social Security and group health payment withheld, Chuck's take-home pay is $602 monthly. This is considerably more money than the Collinses have ever had before, yet they have always given regularly to church and charity, and carried adequate-to-ample life and property insurance. They have college funds building for each son; they eat well and dress well, entertain frequently, and take active part in community affairs. They own a '49 car, which Chuck keeps running as smoothly as a watch. They save regularly, and have no debts except the mortgage and payments on washer-dryer and freezer which are planned for in their budget.

How do they do it?

"We found out a long time ago," Chuck says, "money goes farther if one partner—either one—handles it, with absolute confidence from both. I used to do it, but didn't enjoy it—and frankly, I wasn't as good at it as Va." (He pronounces it "V a.") "So she's been our financial expert for years now."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 151

How we spend $8,400

(Monthly Budget)

Federal, state taxes, Social Security, group health ins....	$ 98.00
House expenses
Mortgage.....	102.86
Insurance.....	7.00
Taxes.....	13.00
Fuel.....	18.50
Electricity.....	8.00
Water.....	4.00
Softener.....	5.00
Payment on washer-dryer.....	15.96
Payment on food freezer.....	26.00
Education
Magazines and paper.....	4.10
Savings for Charles' education	4.00
Savings for Jon's education...	4.00
Savings for Pat's education...	4.00
Boys' insurance, payable at age 20, for college costs...	6.50
Entertainment
(baby-sitter).....	10.00
Food, cigarettes, genl. supplies	94.15
Milk.....	28.00
Bread.....	12.00
Med. and Dent.....	10.00
Clothing.....	8.00
Dry Cleaning.....	2.00
Church.....	10.00
Telephone.....	10.00
Husband's personal expense money (inc. car costs).....	40.00
Life, sickness, accident ins..	29.20
Charles' allowance, bus, lunch..	7.50
Set aside for "extras".....	10.00
Savings
Christmas Club (for special expenditures).....	20.00
Joint Account.....	30.00
Total monthly budget	$641.77

Left as a Surplus: $58.23 a month!

A day of rest

After all, mothers are people, aren't they?

So they can pamper themselves once in a while, like anybody else. . . . Can't they?

By HELEN RITTELL

Beryl's throat felt scratchy when she woke in the rainy early morning, and her head ached dully. It was nothing serious, she told Stephen; she'd been sicker, lots of times. She smiled up at him as he bent over her, his forehead wrinkled in a little anxious frown that made him look ridiculously like the new baby, Dickie.

"You should stay in bed today." Stephen was at the dresser now, expertly knotting his tie. He looked at her through the mirror. "Take it easy and drink lots of water. That's the only way to lick a cold."

Beryl winced as she sat upright. "Sinus," she diagnosed, throwing back the covers and reaching for her slippers, "and a touch of grippe. I'll be all right as soon as I have some coffee." She thrust her arms into her robe, shivering.

Stephen gently pushed her back against her pillow. "No, you're going to stay right there! The girls can look after the babies, can't they? Maybe I can get Mrs. Arkwright to come over." He drew the comforter up around her shoulders. With a heavy hand he pushed the hair back from her forehead in a gesture he had always considered soothing. Beryl closed her eyes, enduring it bravely.

"Mrs. Arkwright wouldn't come on a Saturday—that's the day she always visits her married daughter." Beryl turned her aching head cautiously. It was restful just to lie here, she thought, tempted. The girls were old enough to take over, and perhaps the twins could go down to Meggy's for the day—though it seemed unlikely after the case of nerves Meggy had suffered following their last visit.

The new baby was awake and fussing, but not yet down to the serious business of screaming for his bottle. Suzie, the old baby, appeared in the doorway, a battered fur rabbit clutched in her arms. Her shabby sleepers bagged in the seat, but her cheeks were wild-rose pink, and her yellow hair was a tousled halo. She smiled affably up at Stephen, holding the rabbit up by one floppy ear. "Suzie good girl?" She tipped her head, flirting with him.

He picked her up and dangled her high in the air. She grasped his hair in both hands and shrieked happily. The new baby burst into furious wailing. As if in sympathy, the rain increased its tempo, tapping against the pane like frail crystal bullets, ricocheting down the pane.

"I should get up," said Beryl worriedly. "How you'll ever manage them all ——"

Stephen slung his daughter over his shoulder. Reaching down, he expertly scooped up the baby in his other arm. "We'll manage," he told her firmly. "You stay right there. I'll go round up the girls, and then I'll telephone Mrs. Arkwright. I can call Denham and tell him I'll be a little late getting in to the office ——" His voice trailed off as he went down the hall to the girls' room. "Margy! Kathy!" she heard him call. A roar of protest came from the sleepy girls, followed by the rumble of Stephen's voice.

He thundered down the stairs, his heels sharp on the wooden treads. Beryl could hear her daughters moving around in their room, getting dressed. They were thirteen and fifteen, and they quarreled unceasingly.

"Of all the sordid things to do"—Margy's tone was high and penetrating—"wearing my new sweater and dripping soy sauce all over it!" "Sordid" was Margy's new word. Last month it had been "fabulous," and before that everything had been "too utterly grim."

"I did not drip soy sauce on it!" Kathy screeched from the bathroom. "That's Worcestershire! Anyway, I only wore it because you went and scorched my red blouse."

They bickered and shoved their way down the stairs. At the bottom they scuffled briefly, their sponge-soled shoes squeaking on the polished floor.

Stephen roared from the kitchen, "Stop that, you two! Your mother's sick, and here you are, raising Cain. Pipe down, now, and be quick about it."

They piped down obediently. Beryl turned stiffly on her side and closed her eyes, grateful for the comfort of warm blankets and a soft pillow. It was sheer luxury, to be lying in bed at this hour of the morning, she thought sleepily. The radiator hissed softly, the rain settled to a steady drumming.

Strange odors drifted up the stairs. Burned toast, decided Beryl, sniffing delicately, and they were boiling the bejabbers out of the coffee. She drowsed deliciously.

A twin appeared on either side of the bed. Two freckled faces bent to peer anxiously into hers. Bruce and Dusty had both had baths just before bedtime, but they had already acquired a smudged look. "We were up in the attic, looking for our football helmets." Dusty's tone was faintly accusing. "Have you seen anything of them, mom?"

The Journal Presents
HELEN RITTELL
HER FIRST APPEARANCE IN ANY MAGAZINE

"Not lately. What do you want of football helmets in March, anyway?"

Bruce sat down heavily on the side of the bed, bouncing as if to test the springs. Dusty hung over the footboard sociably. Beryl's head throbbed. "Don't jar the bed, please."

Bruce got up hastily, causing the springs to bound.

"We wanted our football helmets to trade," he said, getting back to first principles. "Ratty Cartner might give us his guppies for them. Bowl and all."

"That's handy," said Beryl. "But if you keep guppies you'll have to look after them, boys."

"Oh, sure"—they spoke glibly, and in unison—"we'll take good care of 'em." So had they spoken of the puppy, the hamster, the family of white mice.

"If you don't, out they go. And I kid you not, gentlemen."

They jarred the bed again, scuffling out, and the door slammed behind them. "Gee, mom, we didn't mean to," called Dusty.

They appeared to fall headlong down the stairs, but apparently they arrived safely at the bottom. Beryl heard them burst through the kitchen door, clamoring loudly for Crispy-Wispies. Not that they liked the cereal especially. They were saving box tops.

In what passed for quiet in that household Beryl lay savoring her leisure. She was in the blissful state between wakefulness and slumber when a new sound roused her to wide-eyed awareness. She turned her head toward the window, but the rain had slackened to a mere drizzle. She listened intently. That tap-tap-tapping sound ——

She was out of bed, racing down the long hall to the bathroom. The door was closed, but a thin trickle of water ran leisurely over the sill, soaking the edge of the hall rug. Beryl shuddered as frigid water lapped over her bare feet. She shut off the tap, plunged her wrist into ice water, and wrenched the stopper from the sink.

When Stephen came upstairs to say goodby, five minutes later, his wife was sopping frantically with bath towels, rugs—anything absorbent she could lay her hands on. He wasted no time on words, but stripped off shoes and socks, rolled up his pants legs and waded in. The twins arrived, carrying mops. Margy came upstairs regally, the baby in her arms, and remarked that it was all too sordid for words.

When the last bath towel had been wrung out, Stephen CONTINUED ON PAGE 83

THE WEEK MOTHER WAS SICK

by Ted Key

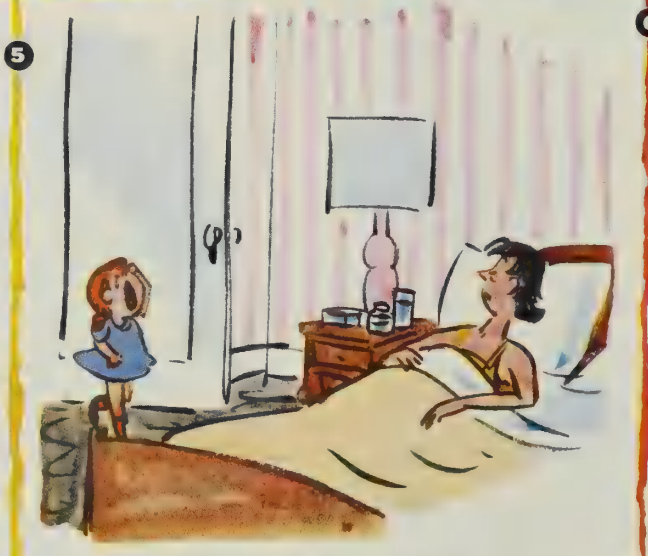
1

"She must have absolute bed rest for a few days."

2

"When I say 'Quiet' I mean. . . .!"

3



"Mind if I take her temperature?"

4

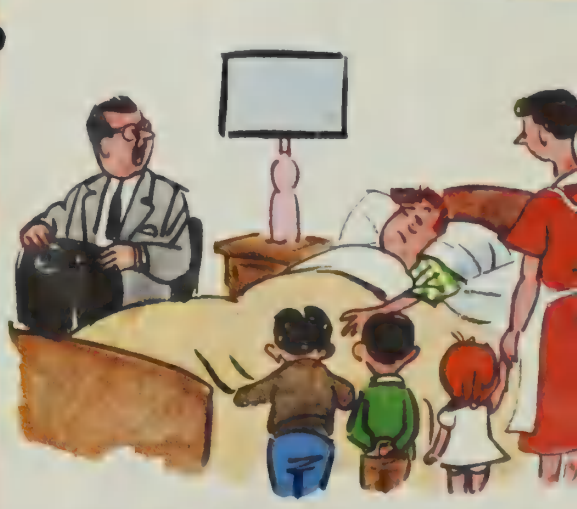
"The master asked me to ask you . . ."

5

"Daddy won't read to me!"

6

7



"You'll EAT and you'll LIKE it!"

8

"I HATE daddy!"

9

"He must have absolute bed rest for a few days."

FIRST STEP INTO SPRING

A coat with no boundaries—cornflower-blue fleece by Nat Bader. Silk turban from John Frederics.

WILHELA CUSHMAN

A new color, a new "shape," but above all, a new point of view—the intriguing idea that clothes are judged for their year-round merits. Hence the silks with weight and wools with almost no weight . . . the influx of nonseasonal blues and rose-reds, clean grays, universal beiges, long-lived prints, flower hats that come early and stay for the summer.

By WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor

The bow pump for spring '58 is in patent leather with grosgrain, designed for suits or dresses. The big square silk scarf from Balenciaga is splashed with color.

Calendar-wise suit of pale beige wool, lightly shaped, worn with a straw breton in the same tone, a gold-and-rhinestone bracelet, by Hattie Carnegie. Capeskin bag by Michel.

RICHARD HANLEY

Right: New silk-and-wool tweed in a gray-and-white check, its short jacket faintly fitted, by Philippe Tournaye. The rough-straw breton by Elizabeth Marks. Below: A great black bag from Gucci, a Tourmaline pin and bracelet by Seaman Schepps, and new excitement in a suède-and-kidskin shoe by Roger Vivier of Christian Dior.

The bloused silhouette in checked silk steps into spring and summer, providing a new all-day fashion, by Herbert Sondheim. The shiny straw hat bound with velvet by Adolfo of Emme.

Printed silk-twill blouson dress and new soft hat by Christian Dior, N. Y. Rhinestone bracelets.

FIRST STEP INTO SPRING

Signs of spring: a suit the color of bachelor-buttons or a coat the shade of frosted strawberries . . . a printed silk hat to match a jacket lining, a printed slipper.

Wider necklines and slightly extended shoulders make throats stem-slim and minimize snug hiplines. Most skirts are slender and tapered, but flat box pleats (like a schoolgirl's) appear in the most sophisticated suits.

Four silhouettes give new variety to dresses: the bloused look, the chemise, the easy two-piece overblouse and the small-waisted shirtwaist dress.

The easy silhouette calls for subtle shaping underneath— the figure rounded, slim-hipped, utterly feminine.

The small elegant bag in the hand for evening is in contrast to the calfskin with the look of fine luggage for day. Instep straps and T-straps begin to change the shoe silhouette.

Once again the T-strap in a red leather sandal, or a pump in bright blue. The small blue purse tucks inside the scarlet satchel. Flower pin from Lilly Dache.

The fashions on all these pages are presented to you because they show you the trends of the season and serve as a guide as you shop. You will find many of them in stores throughout the nation. However, if you do not find identical styles in your local shops, we believe similar ones will be available.

Silk polka-dot shirtwaist dress by Larry Aldrich has the still-coveted small waistline. Big white horsehair picture hat by Irene of New York.

Tone on tone—a brown T-strap shoe or a caramel-colored pump to match a buckled bag by Gucci. Gloves a shade lighter, compact and earrings by Seaman Schepps.

A new pink wool chemise by Larry Aldrich, for any season.

WILHELA CUSHMAN

The printed silk overblouse matches jacket lining of this wool costume by Adele Simpson. Hat, Irene of New York.

Frosted pink spongy wool coat in the yoke silhouette by William Fox. Accessorize with claret-colored calfskin bag and long crushed capeskin gloves. Wonderful to wear early or late, or for summer vacations.

The Journal's

Gem of a wardrobe

Season after season, year after year, the JOURNAL's basic philosophy on what is a "Gem of a Wardrobe" remains the same. We continue to show you quality fabrics, timeless fashions, seasonal color combinations, but always with new ideas. For instance, on these pages we have made two costumes interchangeable to serve double duty. Your suit skirt with a silk broadcloth shirt and a sweater makes a very casual daytime costume. The black-and-white printed skirt can be worn now with a black wool jersey top and later becomes completely seasonless by the addition of a matching sleeveless bodice. The lovely blue coat was designed to go over everything and is especially pretty over the blue-and-turquoise hound's-tooth tie-silk shirtwaist dress.

By NORA O'LEARY
Pattern Editor

PEARLS BY DOROTHY ADAMS

MARGARET SOMMERFELD

This blue basket-weave coat has a yoke with easy fullness both front and back. The collar is notched, the sleeves can be three quarter or long. Patch pockets. Vogue Design No. S–4862, 12 to 40.

BEIGE HAT BY SALLY VICTOR BAG ■■ ROGER VAN ■■

Our Gem of a suit is an easy-fitting natural-color raw silk in a herringbone weave. The suit skirt, left, can be worn with a plaid silk-broadcloth shirt, Vogue Design No. 9387, 10 to 40. Matching cardigan. Jacket has an away-from-the-neckline collar. Vogue Design No. S–4863, 12 to 18.

A soft shirtwaist dress is a comfortable timeless fashion. This one in a blue-and-turquoise hound's-tooth tie silk has a pleat and fullness eased into the back belt and a larger-than-usual flattering collar. Vogue Design No. 102.

A crisp black-and-white print can be prettily accented with any color. This skirt has pockets in the seams hidden under pleats. The blouse, a low square neck.

EARRINGS BY HATTIE CARNEGIE

LEOMBRUNO-BODI

This romantic black jersey blouse is cut low in the front and filled with filmy black nylon lace. The lovely full skirt is black printed roses on silk shantung. Both the black and the printed blouses are Vogue Design No. 9408, 12 to 20. The printed skirt, Design No. 9410, 24 to 30.

Other Views, Sizes and Prices of Vogue Patterns on Page 66.

Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto, Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 5c additional for each pattern ordered.

© VOGUE

EZRA STOLLER JAMES C. ROSE, LANDSCAPE ARCHITECT

Note the luminosity provided by the plastic panels on the sides, the shade and screening by the bamboo awnings above.

A garden is an Open-Air room in city, town or country

By RICHARD PRATT
Architectural and Garden Editor

Because this garden is a New York City back yard, it needed extra-special privacy, not only on three sides but from above where tall tenements looked down on you all day. And because the difficulties of maintaining good growing soil are so great in a big city, the only things that are planted in the ground here are the columnar ginkgoes, which thrive in adversity, are stylishly slender, and take up minimum room. Everything else grows in water or in pots, and offers no problems—little water lilies and other small-scale aquatics, a hanging bowl of begonias, a tub of zinnias. There is a counter for serving and other handy uses; a sheet-metal tank for water lilies, and—blessed relief!—the garden is paved wall to wall with brick. It is furnished to taste, and everything can be kept clean and fresh with a hose. The party-line fences shared by the neighbors are of cedar palings woven with wire; while the garden structure you see here is simplicity itself to buy and to put together (we'll tell you how if you ask), with plastic screening framed on the sides, and with weatherproof bamboo screening fastened on above.

Can this Marriage be Saved?

Broken homes breed broken homes. Sometimes, after a divorce, it is claimed that the children have benefited—that they are behaving better than they did when father and mother were quarreling with each other. Recent studies, when boys were involved, show the change to be mainly that the boys, deprived of a masculine pattern in the home, become less aggressive, show less initiative, are more feminine in their behavior. This docility, this tendency to stay close to mother and imitate her, is interpreted by the mother as meaning that they are now good little boys. Years later, another woman—the wife—pays the penalty for this change, for the boy who is grown up and now a husband doesn't know how to behave like a good husband and father. He had no masculine patterns in his own home—the divorce prevented that. He flounders around in his marriage. That was one of the problems in the present case, in which the counselor was Dr. William O. Walcott.

PAUL POPENOE, SC.D.,
General Director

SHE: "Tod told me he wanted a divorce. He is the only man I've ever loved, but he said I didn't love him any more, that he had found a woman who did love him and that he had just come from seeing her."

HE: "I was hungry for love. I'd hardly kissed Julie since Joe's birth: any time I tried, I could sense that her true feelings were untouched. She thinks of me as the family breadwinner."

JULIE TELLS HER SIDE: "I was in bed pretending to be asleep and Tod was in the living room pretending to watch television," said Julie, five years married at the age of twenty-five and the mother of three preschool children. She was attractive in her blondness, but slightly overweight, and she looked older than her age. "It was only nine P.M., but I was exhausted. The TV program was good and noisy—Tod goes for Westerns and is indifferent to the fact I need plenty of rest—and I had a pillow over my head. Even so, I thought I heard the telephone ring. I didn't hear Tod answer, but pretty soon he tiptoed across the living room to the front door. The floor squeaks.

"By then I was out of bed and listening as hard as I could. I heard the front door open and close very softly. The television was still going full blast. Tod is the production engineer in a small shop that subcontracts for big aircraft plants and occasionally unexpected emergencies call him down to work in the evening. But usually he tells me. And he doesn't leave the television set playing away in an empty room to make me think he is still sitting there.

"I went in and turned off the program. All this happened three weeks ago, on Easter Sunday, which means Tod and I had put in a hectic day with the kids. At the crack of dawn we had staged an Easter-egg hunt in our garden. Anyway, I staged it. Tod read the Sunday papers while I hid the eggs. While Bobby and Billy, our older boys, ran around and hunted I kept the peace between them and also filled a little basket for baby Joe. Tod retreated to the garage and used his electric saw.

"At noon we had to go to my folks' home for lunch, and during the afternoon the children and my mother and my sisters and I went through a second Easter-egg hunt. Tod listened to a baseball game on the radio. At five o'clock we had to go to my mother-in-law's place for supper. She, too, had Easter baskets for the youngsters. At that point the older boys were overtired and cross as bears—Bobby is four, Billy is three—and the baby, who is usually an angel, was crying and I couldn't get him quiet.

"Bobby refused to thank my mother-in-law for his third Easter basket of the day, and she was so shocked I insisted on the thanks. Bobby then hauled off and threw an egg at her. While I was trying to handle his case, Billy proceeded to have an accident on the damask sofa. It was his first accident in months. My mother-in-law told me the sofa didn't matter, but she ran to get the cleaning fluid as though demons were after her. As she mopped at the spot she told me for the thousandth time that Tod was toilet-trained at six months, which is something I will never believe.

"I looked around for Tod to help me—they're his children too—but he had conveniently vanished into the bathroom, another one of his favorite hiding places. Later on, when at long last he decided we could leave and start home, he apologized to his mother for the children's conduct, which wasn't too awful, and laid the blame on me. He then let me cram all three youngsters into their sweaters, jackets and caps, a chore that is like trying to put bridles and saddles on a basketful of eels. By the time we reached home it was eight P.M. and I was ready to drop.

"Tod sat himself down with the television while I bathed the children, who were covered with chocolate and sticky goo, and put them to bed. Ever since early morning Tod had been announcing at regular intervals that the day was a mess and that I was wildly inefficient. I'd held my tongue—my mother wouldn't allow dissension in our home—but personally I thought Tod had no kick coming. I didn't think he was entitled to stalk out of the house in a fit of sulks. Half an hour went by. I telephoned the shop, got no answer. I couldn't imagine where he had gone.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 128

DON ORNITZ

"Suddenly I couldn't keep from crying. I hid my face in my apron and went stumbling out to the kitchen."

KEEP YOUR BEAUTY IN FACT

WIDE WORLD PHOTO

Winston Churchill was once in the position of having to exclaim over a baby he considered to be downright homely. He neither lied by offering a compliment, nor hurt the parents' feelings by speaking the truth. To everyone's satisfaction, he simply remarked in a booming, jovial voice, "My, that is a baby!" Here are some more examples of how saying and doing the right thing can turn even the most average person into someone who is a delight to be near and befriend.

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN
Beauty Editor

Recently a little six-year-old girl was acting as junior hostess at her parents' party when, in her excitement, she stumbled and broke her mother's favorite china dish. The mother quickly jumped to her daughter's aid, hugged her, and announced, "Honey, that's the first time you've ever broken a dish, and boy, you did it like a pro!" Every guest in the room showed signs of acknowledging the mother's sweet and quick-thinking action which not only dried the child's tears and erased her embarrassment, but eased the tension all around.

If love and consideration of other people's feelings are what make your home go round, you've probably discovered that this talent for being tactful can get off to an early start. Two little boys were playing together when the mother of the young host came into the room to serve refreshments. The little guest looked up at the stout woman and remarked, "Gee, my mommie is real thin!" The other child thought a moment, then countered with, "Yes, but does she put chocolate and vanilla icing on the brownies?"

All of us, in everyday life, have the choice of accenting the gay or the cheerless, the positive or the negative. With a word, look or gesture we can lift a person's heart sky high, or plunge it downward. Some women consistently make the right choice—a choice based on generosity of spirit and a fine sensitivity toward others. Day by day, month by month, their little "upbeat" approaches to life, and to the niceties of life, make them special and popular.

A three-year-old girl was riding in a taxicab with her mother when she pointed to the Negro driver and asked, "Mommie, why is he so black?" The mother, seeing the man's shoulders tense, hastily searched for just the right words to satisfy both her companions. She said, "God makes people as He makes flower gardens, so the world will be more colorful. Some of us are white, some brown, some black, some yellow—and there are variations of all these shades. That makes us all the more interesting to look at, don't you agree?" The little girl nodded, and when she and her mother got out of the cab, the driver said, "Ma'am, I feel lucky to have had you ride with me. When my little girl gets big enough to ask me why some people are so white, I'll be very happy to know what to tell her."

Being a tactful person is just as often a matter of knowing what not to say—of knowing when to keep your troubles, your aches and pains to yourself, in favor of creating a cheerful impression. At a party, or on some chance encounter, you greet a friend and ask, "How are you?" and she answers enthusiastically, "I'm just fine, thank you!" then she adds something such as "How becoming that shade of blue is to you," or "I saw your daughter last week and she looked so cunning in her bright red coat." Her eyes twinkle, her voice is warm and vibrant, her handshake firm and friendly. She may not be pretty or prepossessing in any particular way, yet the day seems better for your just having seen her.

How Tactful are You?

Time out for tact! On her visit to America, Queen Elizabeth was scheduled to listen, while seated in her car, to a little speech given by fourteen-year-old Eagle Scout John Rowsey. Quite understandably, the youngster became flustered at taking a leading role in such a formidable occasion. He blushed, stammered and gulped as he fought his way through to the end. "How nice," the queen said, smiling; "thank you very much." Then, touched by his jitters, she invited him into the car to sit next to her. Like a mother soothing a child, the young sovereign talked softly to the boy until slowly his blush receded. Comforted and reassured by the pretty queen's thoughtful gesture, young John was soon able to launch excitedly into answering her questions.

Your hostess can't hide her dismay over the roast beef which is too well done. Do you commiserate with her at length, or do you take her mind off the overcooked beef by telling her you've never tasted such a delicious salad?

You meet a friend whose husband has lost his job. Do you ask her anxiously, "Has Harry found anything yet?" or do you comment cheerfully on other things, knowing well that if she cares to discuss Harry's job status she'll bring up the subject herself?

Can you pride yourself on genuinely admiring someone else's possessions without being guilty of trying to snoop out such information as how much they cost or how come she can afford them?

A friend returns from her vacation in the South. Do you put a damper on her fun by saying, "Dearie, you've gained weight!" or do you make her feel like a lucky girl with, "What a heavenly tan!"?

Even though you're sure you have an answer to a friend's personal problem, can you refrain from offering advice until she indicates she'd like to have it?

Mary, with no outside help, is struggling under the burden of giving a dinner party for twelve. Do you sit back with the others and wonder aloud how she does it, or do you unobtrusively, and without getting in her way, take over some of Mary's little chores such as emptying ash trays or passing hors d'oeuvres?

Your datebook is filled for the rest of the month, but Susan's is one blank page after the other. Do you regale her with stories of your own popularity, or do you wait until she asks before telling about the parties and dances?

A friend pridefully shows off her new brass-and-glass coffee table. You happen to think it is hideous. Do you take the edge off her pleasure with, "Well, you know me, Sarah, I've never been one for modern furniture," or do you underscore her happiness with something such as, "How beautifully it fits into the rest of your room"?

It's grandma's first outing since her bout with influenza. Do you remind the children, in advance, to confine their comments to exclamations of how wonderful it is to see her again, and put a firm foot down on such pint-size observations as, "Look at grandma's hands shake"?

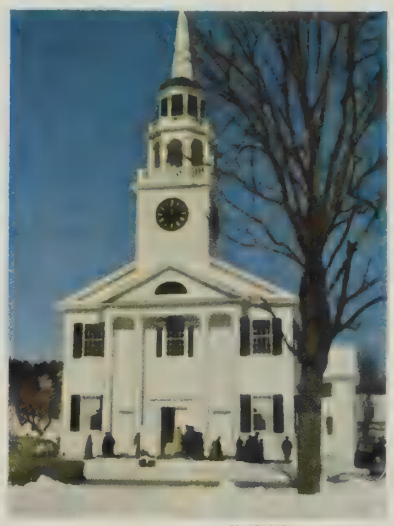
The conversation at the dinner party comes to a deafening halt. Do you suffer in silence with the rest of the guests, or try to help out your hostess and get things going again by introducing some sure-fire topic such as, "I was certainly surprised by the front-page news today!" or "I wonder what changes Frank Jones will make as new president of the school board"?

You meet a friend for the first time since she suffered some personal loss (death in her family, breakup of her marriage, serious financial reverses). Do you go into an elaborate demonstration of your sorrow for her, or (no matter how sincerely sorry you may be) do you spare her feelings by not actually mentioning her loss but indicating, with some warm little gesture (a squeeze of the hand, a pat on her shoulder), that you are in sympathy—and then get on to some other subject?

All of us, from time to time, find ourselves in the awkward position of forgetting someone's name. Do you settle for a frank, unflattering "I don't remember your name," which might make the other person feel like a Mrs. Nobody, or do you get a lick in first with "Hello! I'm Ellen Smith," thus setting the stage for her to respond with, "And I'm Mary Brown"? (There are times when it's just downright necessary for us to explain our forgetfulness, but it can be done appealingly—"My mind has been a blank all day. I'll bet I wouldn't recognize my own husband!")

This appealing quality of personality has nothing to do with "buttering up" people with false compliments or undeserved praise. We are all quick to detect and resent insincerity and to distrust the person who indulges in it. We steer clear of the woman who swamps her hostess with gushing "compliments"—"What a divine soufflé," or "Your children are angels"—only to turn around and remark later, "The luncheon was quite uninspired," and "Really, those children are beasts!" But when your kindly gesture is backed up by sincerity and thoughtfulness, it can instill in you a quality of beauty which manifests itself in many enchanting and rewarding ways.

A new mother, just home from the hospital with her baby, was expecting her first visitor, a woman with excellent taste and money to indulge it. The "nursery" was a crowded corner of the young parents' bedroom, furnished with clumsy hand-me-down pieces. The mother was painfully aware of the shabbiness. The only bright touch she had been able to wangle out of the budget was at the window—a pair of frilly pink-and-white organdy curtains, pretty but out of keeping with the rest of the room, like shiny sparkle buttons on a threadbare suit. The elegant visitor arrived and spent her first few minutes ooh-ing and ahh-ing over the baby. Then she glanced about, taking in her forlorn surroundings. Her expression was pleasant but noncommittal until quite suddenly she smiled radiantly and exclaimed, "They're the sweetest curtains. I'd love some just like them for my own house!" Her real enthusiasm cheered the young mother and filled her with pride. This tactful visitor, with very little to inspire her, had neatly turned the occasion into the happy one it deserved to be.



There are some women, though, who never take the trouble to do or say the right thing. They cannot resist the cutting remark, the little "dig." You may know just such a person. She looks about a room filled with animated women in colorful party clothes, but makes no comment until she spots Helen, who happens to be wearing black. Then she says, "Isn't it a shame Helen doesn't realize black makes her skin look so sallow?" Or she might study your new blue sofa and ask, "Oh, do you like blue upholstery? Doesn't it fade terribly?" It apparently never occurs to this Miss Negative that her unnecessary and disagreeable remarks serve only to point up her own lack of self-assurance. This type of woman (very often a young girl) usually is so ill at ease herself that she attempts to draw attention away from her own inadequacies by belittling other people. Or, in her futile attempt at "superiority"—in her selfish desire always to be the one to run the show—she is afraid to chance what competition may arise from acknowledging another person's good points.

A friend tells this story: "Recently I had my living room painted pure white, and I was still in

CONTINUED ON PAGE 78

Church Supper Specialties
MRS. APPLEYARD'S MEAT PIE WITH BISCUITS
SCALLOPED POTATOES MRS. APPLEYARD
ALMA VINCENT'S ROAST PORK WITH GRAVY
GREEN BEANS WITH PORK CRACKLINGS
MARY FLINT'S ALMOND, GRAPE AND PINEAPPLE SALAD
RED-PEPPER RELISH
CHOCOLATE ICEBOX CAKE
MARY FLINT'S LEMON-MERINGUE PIE

Appleyard Church Supper

HANSON T. CARROLL

By ELIZABETH KENT GAY

Luscious meat pie topped with feathery biscuits, a juicy roast of pork, creamy potatoes scalloped with cheese—these church-supper specialties from Appleyard Center will be the mainstays of many delicious winter's meals.

According to my mother, Mrs. Appleyard, one way to taste the food of the best cooks in America is to frequent church suppers. She ought to know, for she is one of those cooks herself—the natural-born kind who can produce delicate miracles of soufflés from temperamental wood stoves, to whom a baking failure is unthinkable.

In our town the church-supper planning committee deals out the parts of the menu rather like a local Shakespeare society casting a play. Years ago, when I first set up housekeeping, I used to be asked for a couple of pounds of butter, a role usually reserved for invalids. Then I rose to mashed potatoes and salad. "Even if she's not much of a cook, she can't do much harm with those." Having proved myself on salads, I was promoted after a while to baking-powder biscuits. Finally, when I was asked to contribute one of the main dishes, I knew I had arrived, at least in a culinary sense. Mother, of course, had been there all along.

"I can't promise to get to the supper," says mother, "but of course I'll cook. What shall I send?"

"One of your wonderful meat pies," I said, representing the planning committee, "the kind that grown men have eaten seven helpings of, and asked for more. And how about those heavenly scalloped potatoes with onion and cheese that you bake in the big white casserole?"

Mother purrs. Good cooks are no more immune to flattery than ordinary mortals. "The best cooks in our church are sending one or two of their specialties," I went on. "We're asking Mary Flint for that divine lemon-meringue pie, and I'm taking chocolate icebox cake and several jars of my red-pepper relish."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 146

STUART-FOWLER

Eggs COLLECTOR'S ITEMS from the Journal Kitchen

Bring spring into your kitchen with a few branches of forsythia in a mixing bowl.

"No wonder, child, we prize the hen Whose egg is mightier than the pen."

What we like about the egg is not its might, but its versatility. The egg plays as many roles in as many guises as a summer-stock star.

Consider the omelet. It comes to breakfast boutonniered with parsley, accompanied by bacon or frizzled ham—and the day begins on a happy note. It takes to sauces, leftovers, herbs and other trimmings as a good basic dress takes to accessories.

Don't get the notion that a perfect French omelet is to be found only in a little bistro on the Left Bank. You, in your own kitchen, can make an omelet to rival those of the worthy Madame Poulard, and in less time than it takes to pass along the know-how.

Allow one or two eggs per person, depending on appetites. Beat lightly with a fork, adding one tablespoon water, milk or cream per egg. Salt and pepper too. Have ready a piping-hot skillet of ample proportions, in which a generous tablespoon of butter is sizzling but not brown. In with the eggs, lower the heat, then shake the pan vigorously, stirring the eggs lightly as they begin to cook. Then let them set for just a few minutes, until the bottom is delicately brown and the top still creamy. Don't overcook. Quickly loosen the omelet around the edge of the pan. Now tip the pan, and with a spatula nudge the omelet gently. It will obligingly fold itself over. Turn it out onto a hot platter. And there you are! Sixty seconds does it, as few as forty-five seconds when you become really adept.

Let's suppose you have a few bits and pieces from last night's dinner. A slice of cooked chicken or ham, a few cooked peas, one mushroom. And you have eggs. Make a cup of medium cream sauce, well seasoned. Slice the mushroom and sauté in a little butter. Add it, the meat, the cooked peas—and a spoonful of sherry if you like—and a bit of pimiento for gaiety. Keep the sauce hot while you whip up an omelet. Turn the sauce over the omelet, add a few toast points and serve with a flourish.

STUART

Puffy omelet filled with a treasure of good things.

Perhaps a quick reconnoiter reveals half a green pepper, an onion, a cup of canned tomatoes and three slices of salami. Not much to work with? Ah, but you have eggs. Slice the onion, dice the pepper and sauté them in a little butter or bacon fat. Add the tomatoes, salt and pepper to taste and a teaspoon of sugar. A pinch of basil or orégano will help, as will a dash of Worcestershire. Taste as you go, adding a whiff of this, a hint of that. Make an omelet, surround with the sauce and top with the salami which you have cut into julienne slivers. (Cold cooked chicken or turkey, ham or even roast pork may be used instead of the salami. Depends on what you have.) Chunks of bread, buttered, sprinkled with caraway seeds and slipped into a hot oven, go along with this, with a pot of steaming coffee. Who would ask for more?

Here's a new twist to the SPINACH-AND-SOUR-CREAM OMELET. Make a 6-egg omelet as usual. Meanwhile, cook, drain and chop 1 package frozen spinach. Season with salt and pepper to taste, ¼ teaspoon nutmeg and 1 tablespoon each minced onion, heavy cream and butter. When you are ready to turn the omelet, put the spinach in the fold. Transfer omelet to ovenproof platter. Spread 1 cup commercial sour cream over the top. Broil until cream is lightly tinged with brown.

THE OYSTER OMELET is a natural for Friday. Cook a dozen oysters in their own liquor until the edges curl. Drain well and chop. Save the liquor. Make a medium cream sauce using half milk and half oyster liquor. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Add the oysters to the sauce. Make an omelet, and arrange on a serving platter, pour the oyster sauce over it and cover everything with a lavish sprinkling of minced parsley.

Variations on the omelet theme: Add a teaspoon of prepared mustard to the egg mixture, cook the omelet as usual and fold it over cooked minced ham which has been well seasoned and mixed with a little cream.

Try an omelet with anchovy croutons. Cut a slice or two of bread into small cubes. Sauté in a little butter mixed with a bit of anchovy paste. Add the croutons to the egg mixture and proceed with the omelet.

Cook a package of frozen mixed vegetables. Drain well and add to half a cup of hot, well-seasoned cream. Serve around an omelet.

Omelette aux fines herbes is a high-flying name for a simple omelet seasoned with a mixture of two or three herbs. Basil, orégano, minced parsley, minced chives—these or any others on your pantry shelf.

Fold an omelet over creamed codfish, haddock or halibut, or over cooked rice mixed with sautéed chopped pepper and minced onion.

Sweets to the sweet. For the dessert omelet, omit pepper, of course, and go lightly on the salt. Add half a teaspoon of sugar for each egg. If you like, substitute fruit juice or the syrup from canned fruit for the milk or cream. Cook the omelet as usual. Now for the aux confitures:

Spread the omelet with warm orange marmalade, fold, dust with powdered sugar and serve.

Substitute pineapple syrup for the milk in mixing the omelet. Spread with well-drained canned crushed pineapple, fold and sprinkle with toasted coconut.

Spread the omelet with warm peach or apricot jam. Dust with confectioners' sugar and serve.

Sprinkle grated sweet chocolate over the omelet, fold, and sprinkle more grated chocolate on top.

Simplest of all, just before serving sprinkle the omelet with cinnamon and sugar.

Take scrambled eggs. Do them in a double boiler to avoid too high a temperature and to insure those soft, delicate gold-and-white "fluffs" which are the trademark of good scrambled eggs.

Scoop the centers from hamburger buns, butter the insides generously and toast lightly. Fill with scrambled eggs and sprinkle with minced chives.

Add a little cooked rice and a few bits of chicken to the beaten eggs. Season and add a touch of curry powder, if you like, or serve the eggs sprinkled with a few drops of soy sauce.

Scramble eggs as usual, cooking barely enough to set them. They should be very soft. Then turn into a greased shallow baking dish, sprinkle with grated Swiss cheese and buttered crumbs. Bake until crumbs are golden brown and the cheese has begun to melt.

Give the hard-cooked egg a whirl. This egg, without which a picnic basket or lunch box is not complete, may be plain, or stuffed and deviled. It goes into a salad. It may be creamed, combined with tomato sauce, baked with cheese, scalloped with fish or vegetables, curried, sliced and sandwiched, chopped and dressed for a sandwich spread.

Hard-cook, shell and cut in half lengthwise enough eggs to allow two to a customer. Remove the yolks and mash, adding a little grated onion, salt, pepper, enough dry mustard to give bite, a little minced parsley, vinegar for zip, a little mayonnaise, maybe a grain or two of cayenne. This is a taste-as-you-go affair. Fill the egg whites with the deviled yolks. Arrange in a shallow greased baking dish, filled sides up. Cover with sour cream and bake until piping hot.

Spread buttered toast generously with deviled ham. Arrange slices of hard-cooked egg on the ham. Cover with hot tomato sauce.

Arrange slices of hard-cooked egg on toast. Cover with hot cheese sauce. Sprinkle with paprika.

Start with hard-cooked eggs, well-seasoned cream sauce and canned shrimp or crab meat. In a greased shallow casserole, arrange layers of sauce, sliced eggs and the shrimp or crab meat, topping each layer with buttered crumbs. Bake until the top crumbs are brown and everything is hot. Sprinkle with minced parsley.

Chop hard-cooked eggs and mix with mayonnaise. Add prepared mustard to taste. And make it snappy. Then add chopped cooked tongue. It's a sandwich spread, and a tasty one.

You can go high, wide and handsome with shirred or baked eggs. Do them in individual greased shallow ramekins. Put a tablespoon of cream in each cup, break an egg into each, sprinkle with salt and pepper, add a drizzle of melted butter and bake in a moderate oven until the eggs are just set. Or try these variations:

Cut green peppers in half lengthwise. Seed and put a spoonful of melted butter into each half. Break an egg into each, sprinkle with salt and pepper and arrange in a greased baking dish. Surround with tomato soup or sauce and bake until eggs are set. Sprinkle lightly with grated cheese and broil until the cheese melts.

Cook fine noodles in boiling salted water until tender. Make a cream sauce, add grated sharp cheese and a little prepared mustard and cook until the cheese melts. Add the noodles. Turn into a greased baking dish. Make little depressions in the sauce and break an egg into each. Sprinkle with buttered crumbs and bake in a slow oven until the eggs are set.

20-MINUTE SOUPER SUPPERS

Campbell's Soups add flavor, and save you time in creating these 4 souper suppers!

Tuna à la Queen so easy with Cream of Mushroom Soup. Blend 1 can Campbell's Cream of Mushroom Soup with ½ cup milk in saucepan; stir in 7-oz. can drained and flaked tuna, 1 cup cooked peas, and 1 tbsp. chopped pimiento. Heat. Serve over 8 refrigerator biscuits or toast slices. 4 servings.

Burgers with yum-yum Onion Soup gravy. Fry till done 4 burgers (1 lb. ground beef). Remove meat from pan. Blend 2 tbsp. flour into drippings; stir till smooth. Blend in 1 can Campbell's Onion Soup; heat, stirring until gravy thickens. Pour over meat. Serve to 4 — with fluffy mashed potatoes.

Tomato Soup Barbecued Franks—terrific! In skillet cook till done ½ cup each chopped celery and onion in 2 tbsp. shortening. Add 1 lb. franks (cut into ½-inch slices), cook till light brown. Stir in 1 can Campbell's Tomato Soup, ½ cup water, 1 tbsp. Worcestershire sauce. Cover; cook about 10 min. Meanwhile, cook 6 oz. spaghetti. Serve together. 4 servings.

Creamed Chicken so quick with Cream of Chicken Soup. Cook 1½ cups green beans. Separately cook till soft ¼ cup chopped onion in 2 tbsp. butter; stir in 1 can Campbell's Cream of Chicken Soup, 1/3 cup milk, 1 can Swanson Boned Chicken and 2 sliced hard-cooked eggs (save some slices for garnish). On 4 slices of buttered toast, spoon beans and chicken mixture.

Good cooks cook

with Campbell's Soup

No matter how active you are all day...New Mum stops odor without irritation

If you've ever worried about your deodorant failing, or about underarm stinging or burning from using a deodorant daily—now you can set your mind at ease.

New Mum will stop odor right through the day and evening. It's so gentle for normal skin you can use it right after shaving. Mum gives you the kind of protection you can't get from any other leading deodorant. It works a different way!

Contains no aluminum salts

Mum Cream is the only leading deodorant that works entirely by stopping odor . . . contains no astringent aluminum salts. And it keeps on working actively to stop odor 24 hours a day with M-3—Mum's own hexachlorophene that destroys odor and odor-causing bacteria. Try Mum!

SO GENTLE FOR ANY NORMAL SKIN
YOU CAN USE IT FREELY EVERY DAY

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF LAUNDERING CERTIFIED

REPLACEMENT OR A REFUND OF MONEY ★ Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

WON'T DAMAGE CLOTHES

MUM® contains M-3...stops odor 24 hours a day
(BACTERIA-DESTROYING HEXACHLOROPHENE)

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

THE GREENGAGE SUMMER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 47

"What is the matter with Paul?" asked Hester.

The next morning Mlle. Zizi met Eliot in the hall; he had on his linen trousers and dark blue shirt, the canvas shoes, his old cap, and was carrying dark glasses. "But you said you were going to Paris," she said.

He laughed and put his hands on Hester's and Willmouse's heads. "I must see to my family, Zizi." When he saw her face he went to her and, holding her arms, swayed her gently backward and forward. "Can't a man have a day or two off?"

In the wilderness he picked a bunch of roses and took Joss and me to see mother. The doctor, M. le Directeur, met us and, as if we were grown ladies, took us over the hospital.

Eliot talked in the passage with the nun in charge of the private wing while a nurse took us in to see mother. "For two minutes," said the nun through the open door. The private rooms were blue-and-white cubicles that seemed shut in another world of hushed quietness. A strange smell hung round mother—"They had to open her leg again yesterday," Eliot had warned us—and tears ran out from under her lids while she held our hands. I could never have imagined mother pale, but she was yellow-white like wax. We were frightened.

She asked us, "Are you quite . . . all right?" It was a faraway whisper.

"Quite all right." I said it absently, for though I was frightened and full of pity, I could not help listening to Eliot in the passage outside. He can talk to anyone in French or English, I thought with a pang. I was suddenly more grateful to M. Armand and his newspaper lessons, and decided to stop being shy and practice my French on everyone from that day.

"I have been . . . so worried," breathed mother.

I do not know how Eliot caught that, but he broke off what he was saying and came to her. "You are forbidden to worry," he said. When he was there mother opened her eyes and smiled at him; she seemed to quieten, not to want to talk any more, and he motioned us to go away.

As we walked back through the town many people greeted him; he was continually stopping and shaking hands with someone. "In France you must always shake hands," he told us. "Watch the children." There were scores of children. We watched and saw, sure enough, that as soon as the children met anyone they knew they gave their hands. The streets were full of people; there were women in slippers, wearing shawls like Mme. Corbet's and carrying heavy shopping bags; there were men in blue overalls, patched and faded, with berets like M. Joubert's. There were businessmen in heavy suits, nuns, boys and girls, children all dressed in pinafores, and I said, "Children don't wear pinafores in England."

Eliot let us linger at the sweet-and-cake shop that Joss had not seen; he explained the different kinds of cakes to us: éclairs, rum babas, meringues with crème chantilly, pears and apples crystallized whole in sugar. He did not make the mistake of offering us any, but took us inside to buy a carton of chocolates to take back to Hester and the Littles. There was a rich smell in the shop from the chocolates, for which Vieux-Moutiers was famous.

We watched while the mademoiselle did the carton up in white paper, tying it with golden thread and sealing it with a golden seal. It seemed inexpressibly elegant to us.

"They don't do boxes up like that in Southstone," said Joss.

"In London they might," said Eliot.

"This isn't London. This is a little town, smaller than Southstone."

"The French understand living," said Eliot, and I longed to be French.

Then he took us to the Giraffe. Dazzled, we sat at one of the small marble-topped tables I had passed so often. The waiter poured wine and water for me, but filled up a glass for Joss; Joss tried not to glow, but she glowed. When M. Gérard, the proprietor, came and talked to us she sat very erect, her eyes going from M. Gérard to Eliot and back again as she tried to keep up with the quick French. I remember that her hair caught the sun again as it struck down through the awning, and from the heat, tiny beads of sweat came out on her forehead and neck. Eliot put out a finger and touched

OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERNS ON PAGES 56 AND 57

Vogue Design No. S-4862. Coat; 12–40 (32–42). $1.00.
Vogue Design No. S-4863. Suit; 12–18 (32–38). $1.50.
Vogue Design No. 9387. Blouse: 10–40 (31–42). 60c.
Vogue Design No. 102. One-piece dress; 10–18 (31–38). $2.00.
Vogue Design No. 9408. Blouses; 12–20 (32–40). 60c.
Vogue Design No. 9410. "Very Easy to Make" skirt; 24–30 waist measure. 60c.

one. "Dew of Joss," he said, and Joss sat oddly still.

"Does it taste of salt?" I asked.

"Sugar and spice," said Eliot, and once again his eyes stayed on Joss and he seemed to listen half absently to M. Gérard.

Then we went back to Les Oeillets and on the hall table were our packages laid out.

"What are those?" asked Eliot.

"Our picnics"; and I explained to Joss, "We have to go out now."

Eliot looked at the packages, at Joss, and then out to the orchard shimmering green in the sun. A noise of people came from the bar, loud voices and laughter, the sound of glasses. "I will have a picnic too," said Eliot.

"A picnic! For you?" asked Mme. Corbet.

"For me," said Eliot. Mme. Corbet seemed not to know whether to be shocked or pleased, but she went to get another package ready.

We went to the cove. At the blue door we met M. Joubert coming in. When he saw Joss he took off his hat—he changed the beret, when the sun grew hot, for a panama. He smiled and stood back to let us pass. Joss walked one side of Eliot, her head level with his shoulder. Vicky was on the other, swinging on his hand; Willmouse and Hester were in front, Hester walking backward and talking all the time, and I came behind. When I looked back M. Joubert was still gazing thoughtfully after us.

It was a gay picnic. We felt more as if we had escaped than as if we were shut out. After luncheon Vicky fell asleep, her head on Joss' lap; Hester and Willmouse paddled and I lay, as Eliot liked to do, flat, face downward on the sand. Joss' and Eliot's voices were a low murmur; they seemed to have a great deal to talk about, but I was too peaceful to be jealous; everything—and everybody—was at peace.

Then, "Come along, all you lazybones," said Eliot. "I have to go to Soissons. Who would like a drive?"

I sat up and, "In your Rolls-Royce?" breathed Willmouse in awe, coming out of the water.

"Yes. We can look at the cathedral."

In the Rolls-Royce! We looked at one another, excitement spilling out of our faces. "But . . . won't Mlle. Zizi mind?" I said.

"Why should she mind?" Eliot's voice had the coldness that only I knew and I was quiet, but none of us went into the house; we washed our faces and hands in the river and left our packages on the back steps.

As we drove along the road to Soissons the stooks were piled in the fields, stooks of dark-colored corn, darker than in England. In the woods the woodcutters had stacked cut logs to dry. "Think of having fires!" said Hester. The heat was shimmering between the trees and hot air fanned our cheeks. At last we drove into Soissons, with the twin towers of its ruined abbey, its thick-walled houses, honey-colored plaster wash and wide cathedral square.

Outside the cathedral, "Put something on your heads," said Eliot to Joss and me; "the people like it," but neither of us had anything.

Eliot lent me his handkerchief, but there was nothing for Joss; then a woman coming out paused to admire us—it was part of the warm, happy day to be admired; she had been in the cathedral and in her hand had a black lace veil. She came up and put it gently over Joss' hair. "Enfin, vous voilà, mademoiselle," she said and showed Eliot a door in one of the houses opposite where we could bring back the veil.

The meshes of the veil made Joss' hair look even finer and shadowed her face so that it seemed mysterious; her skin looked more ivory than ever and Eliot kept glancing at her. I went and walked by myself, trying not to feel the hot sharpness in my heart.

Inside, the cathedral, with its wide doors opening on the sunlit square, was light, not dim. The long nave was of pale stone cut like huge bricks, the floor was stone, too, and worn. Why was it so worn?

"This is the old floor. The walls are newer. Soissons cathedral was knocked down in the war. They built it up," said Eliot.

We had to tilt our heads back to look up at the vaulted roof with its flutings of stone, at the huge rose window in the transept, the long windows below with their amber and red and brilliant blues that sent colored light down to the floor stones. It was all vast, sealed in quiet.

We had not been in a Catholic church; it was interesting, from the massive stone pillars to the gilt Stations of the Cross along the walls. There was a smell of incense that made us sniff, and we liked the candles that gave a warm light to the small side chapels.

People were coming in and out all the time, though there was no service. They came and prayed on their own, some of them with beads; some brought flowers and some lit candles. They were not dressed up; some even had shopping bags or tools, one woman was wearing slippers as if she were at home; indeed, they all seemed comfortably at home. I had not imagined one could feel so in a church.

In the Chapel of the Resurrection the flowers and candles were white but, to our intense astonishment, the Virgin was black. "Isn't she beautiful?" said Eliot.

"Why is she black?"

"She often has a black statue in France," said Eliot.

"The guidebooks say the very first sacred statues were carved from bog oak, which is black," said Joss, and she asked, "Would this one be as old as that?"

"I don't know," said Eliot. "But she is very, very old."

"How old?" asked Hester.

"Hundreds of years, I expect," said Eliot. "And she is supposed to be miraculous."

"Miraculous?" Hester was puzzled.

"She can work miracles."

"Really?" We all gazed at the statue.

"They say so," said Eliot. "And so thousands and thousands of candles have burned in front of her and the smoke has turned her even blacker."

Both she and the Holy Child had on small crowns set with jewels. "Rubies and turquoises," said Eliot.

"Real?" breathed Willmouse and gazed at them, rapt, as Eliot nodded. Hester, who always wanted to test things, held her hand over a candle flame and, sure enough, it made a black mark. Vicky tugged at Joss' arm. "Let me see the rubies," she whispered, and Joss lifted her up.

As she held Vicky up to see the crown, Joss' face was lit by the candles so that it was gilded, framed by the black lace. Mother had said Joss was beautiful "just now," but in this moment I knew it was more than that: my sister's beauty was real, for always—like a painting, I thought, marked out, and then Eliot's hands held my shoulders. They hurt and I craned my head back to look at him and saw what I had guessed from the hardness of his hands: he did not even know he had touched me; he was looking at Joss as Willmouse had looked at the jewels.

A few minutes earlier I should have jerked away, hurt and angry, but now I stood quietly. Perhaps the black Virgin had worked another of her small miracles, because I did not struggle any more; Joss was beautiful and I was not; Eliot looked at her and did not even notice me and yet I was not jealous.

When we came out of the cathedral it was good to feel the sun again, warm on our arms and heads. Hester and Willmouse went back with the veil and Eliot made them rehearse what they would say: "Mille remerciements, madame," and "Merci pour votre bonté." When they came back he took us all into a pâtisserie for coffee, chocolate and cakes. The pâtisserie was if anything more elegant than the one in Vieux-Moutiers, and Joss must have been feeling what I felt, for presently she said to Eliot, "I am sorry about our clothes."

"Your clothes?"

"Yes," said Joss briefly.

"I like your clothes," said Eliot.

"You couldn't possibly." I could tell by the way she said it, her nostrils pinched in, that she was suffering.

As no roads are so rough as those that have just been mended, no sinners are so intolerant as those that have just turned saints.
COLTON

How to be younger than your years

When you meet a grandfather like this who's still "young," vigorous and active . . . even though he's nearly 65 . . . you're likely to exclaim, "He certainly doesn't look his age!"

The truth is he's what he should be . . . and what most of us could be when retirement draws near. Better still, anyone who has reached this age in good health can usually look forward to many more useful and happy years.

You should start taking extra precautions for your physical and mental health before you get along in years. Then, you will have far better chances of making your later life rewarding. Why?

The answer is that diseases of later life seldom appear suddenly. They start gradually and may quietly develop for a number of years before they become evident or cause disability.

Even if your retirement may be years ahead, you should begin planning now for the time when you'll become a senior citizen. Here are some things you can do:

1. Keep your mind open to new ideas. If you always have something to do tomorrow . . . something you want to do . . . your mind will be alert and active.

Working with and for others—in community, church and fraternal organizations—can also be a deep and lasting source of satisfaction at any age.

2. Select your foods carefully. Your diet should provide all the elements for good health—proteins for body upkeep and repair, carbohydrates for energy and foods that supply protective vitamins and minerals.

3. Control your weight. Overweight makes your heart, kidneys, lungs, liver and arteries work harder all the time. Overweight also tends to increase your chances of developing diseases of these organs.

4. Try to keep your emotions on an even keel. It is unhealthy to keep emotional tensions "bottled up." Instead we should look for ways to work them out. Just talking over problems with a friend or advisor often helps to clear the air.

5. Plan for your financial security. It is not necessary to have a lot of money to enjoy later life. Nevertheless, your financial needs during retirement should be carefully planned long before you stop working. Advice from some competent person on personal financial matters will help you avoid "money worries" later on.

COPYRIGHT 1958—METROPOLITAN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company
(A MUTUAL COMPANY)

1 MADISON AVENUE, NEW YORK 10, N. Y.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.
1 Madison Ave., N. Y. 10, N. Y.

Please send me Metropolitan's free booklet, "Your Future and You," 2-58-J.

Name_____

Street_____

City_____ State_____

"I like them," said Eliot and put his hand over hers. "I like everything about you."

Again that momentary stillness; then she took her hand away.

The color of that day was gold, but the next was green, for Eliot took us and our picnics to the forest of Compiègne.

All day we wandered and walked in the long avenues and glades of beech trees. In that high summer the forest was intensely green, laced under the trees by green-white cow parsley, with sturdier shapes of bracken and, underfoot, white shamrock-leafed wood sorrel. We found honeysuckle and Hester twined it into wreaths for the Littles. We came upon two empty lakes, reflecting the green and the stretches of blue from the sky where there was not a cloud; white water lilies rocked a little when Hester and Vicky splashed sticks in the water, making ripples.

When we were tired we got back in the car and drove; the Rolls seemed to go soundlessly down the long avenues and everywhere was the same filtering green, sun rays coming through branches, flickering gently on the ground. We came to a village, and it had a château, a castle with turrets and walls. "Like the Sleeping Beauty's," said Hester.

I said prettily, "It's a fairy-tale day."

"It isn't. It's true," said Joss. She said it vehemently, and vehemence was so unlike Joss that we all looked at her.

"It is true," said Eliot. He drew her arm through his, but I could see it was not possible for Joss to walk arm in arm with him, and as soon as she could she took her arm away.

I do not know what time we ate our luncheon—perhaps three o'clock—and afterward we lay in the warm grass and slept. Then we met a French family picnicking too. I remember they were playing patball, but we taught them rounders, playing England against France. They gave us lemonade and we drank their health before we drove away.

Toward evening we got out of the car and walked again. The sun was lower now and the light slanting down the glades and through the trees was deeper, richer . . . and heavier, I thought. We were heavy, too, surfeited with happiness. Vicky dragged her feet, Joss looked pale. "I think we had better have some dinner," said Eliot. "Do you remember that little restaurant on the lake? Let's go and dine there."

"In a restaurant?" Joss and I said it together. We had forgotten about trying to be sophisticated.

"Why not?" asked Eliot, and Hester promptly exposed us.

"We have never been in a restaurant," she explained. "Only in the Violet Tearooms or the Oriental Café."

"Would you like to go in one?"

"But . . . can we?"

"Of course we can," said Eliot.

Joss looked at her watch. "It's nine o'clock!" She sounded a little alarmed.

"All the more reason to dine."

"Won't"—I could see Joss did not want to mention Mlle. Zizi—"they be cross?"

"We shall telephone," said Eliot, but when we came to the chalet restaurant, La Grenouille, there was no telephone. "They will guess," said Eliot. "Come along."

At first we were disappointed. The word "restaurant" for us meant places like the glimpses we had taken into hotel dining rooms as we walked along the promenade at Southstone, the hotels Hester admired. We had thought of waiters, white tablecloths, shaded lights, silver, flowers. La Grenouille was a holiday restaurant. The dining room was pitch-pine wood, with glassed-in side walls. It was used for shooting parties in the autumn, the patron told us, and on the wooden walls were stuffed heads—a boar, foxes and chamois—while antlers were made into electric lights. The tables had paper tablecloths in green and red plaid and the chairs were folding wooden ones. The patron came to meet us in his shirt sleeves and wearing checked cotton trousers. Our eyes examined him disapprovingly while he and Eliot talked. "He can give us soup," said Eliot, "fillet steaks, tarte and cheese. Will that do?" Distantly, because we did not want to show we were disappointed, we said of course it would do. "Thank you," added Joss and we chorused, "Thank you."

The soup and the yard-long bread from which we broke off pieces as we needed them were good, and as the patron cooked our steaks in front of us and dusk came down, shutting the little glass-sided restaurant into a world of its own, the disappointment went. Eliot talked to the patron and his wife, and we began to talk too; then we were laughing. Everything made us laugh, for this was better, happier than anything we had imagined.

The steaks were cooked with field mushrooms and served with fried potatoes; after them was a salad; and when the great tarte was brought, its apple filling glazed with apricot jam, even Vicky thought the dinner complete.

Eliot's face looked calm and happy. He is happy with us, I thought; and when at last we got up to go it was nearly eleven. "We shan't get back till twelve o'clock," said Joss.

"Well, what of it?" asked Eliot. He sounded a little defiant and we looked at one another, our faces scared.

The evening before, when we came back from Soissons, Mlle. Zizi had joined us for drinks; we had the pink grenadine syrup we liked while she and Eliot drank martinis. We had told her about the cathedral, the cake, of all we had done and seen. It had all been pleasant and easy, but we guessed it would be different tonight.

Mlle. Zizi was waiting when we got in. Eliot had taken Vicky, asleep, from the car, and as he carried her in she still slept soundly against his shoulder, while his other hand held up the stumbling Willmouse. The honeysuckle wreaths were crooked now, Hester and Joss and I had our hands full of flowers and ferns, our dresses were crumpled, and our faces were flushed. "So! You had a good time!" said Mlle. Zizi.

"Thank you, a very good time," said Eliot. Mauricette was peeping; he beckoned her and gave Vicky into her arms. "Take Monsieur Willmouse as well," he said. Mauricette would always do anything for Eliot and she obediently took them. "Zizi, give me a drink."

"You look as if you had had a drink already."

"I have had a little vin rosé," said Eliot. "I want a real drink." He looked at her face that had strange pouches under the eyes, patches of red on her cheek and neck. "So do you."

I did not think she did; she looked as if it were she who had had one already . . . or two or three or half a dozen, I thought. I know now it is children who accept life—grown people cover it up and pretend it is different with drinks—and, as Eliot turned her toward the bar, he whispered over his shoulder, "Go up to bed." It was not an order, but said as if in a conspiracy. We silently disappeared and he led Mlle. Zizi away.

The little present must not be allowed wholly to elbow the great past out of view.
ANDREW LANG

"But it was spoiled," Hester said and I think she was right. Nothing had that pure happiness again. I wish we had stopped after Compiègne, but the next day Eliot said he must take us to the caves at Dormans. "And it was very spoiled," said Hester.

It began with trouble over Paul. Eliot had gone down to the Giraffe for cigarettes. When he came back he found Paul in his room.

"Stealing?" asked Mlle. Zizi, frightened.

"I don't think so," said Eliot. "He was just nosing around, but you can't have that. He must go. At once."

"In the middle of our season?" said Mme. Corbet dryly.

"Yes. You can't employ a boy like that."

"Mais, Eliot ——" pleaded Mlle. Zizi, but Eliot would not relent. "I said he must go."

Hester tugged at Joss. "Ask Eliot not to," she said urgently. "Please, Joss. If Paul has to go now he will lose his summer bonus and he will never get his lorry. Ask Eliot, Joss."

Perhaps Joss was not unwilling to try where Mlle. Zizi had failed. She went to Eliot and put her hand on his arm, looking up at him, and presently we heard him say, "Very well . . . if you will come out with me again today."

"Can you spare the time?" said Joss doubtfully.

"Of course I can. We will go to the caves."

"What caves?" we said. It was pronounced "carve," not "cave."

"The champagne cellars. You can't be in the champagne country and not see those."

"Are we in the champagne country?" asked Joss, startled.

"I shall show you," said Eliot.

In our bones we knew it was better not to go, but Eliot was queerly determined that morning . . . as obstinate, I thought, as Vicky. When one came to know them it was surprising how childish grown people could be. I think, too, he did not mean to take the rest of us. He began by trying to get rid of the Littles.

"But I need to go," Willmouse pointed out to him. "I must know about champagne."

"We shall leave Vicky, then," said Eliot, but he did not know Vicky as we did.

"We are going where we have to walk a long way in the dark," he told her.

"I like the dark," said Vicky.

"You wouldn't like this."

"I would."

Marie Gifford's secret—perfect pie crust in 5 minutes

The final test of a pie is the crust. To turn out melt-in-your-mouth crust start with the right shortening. The right shortening is lard and the finest lard is Armour Star!*

Marie Gifford, Armour's Home Economist and pastry authority, makes this wonderful crust in just five minutes: Measure 2 cups all-purpose flour, then sift with 1 teaspoon salt. Blend in ⅔ cup Armour Star Lard until mixture resembles coarse meal. Add 4 tablespoons tap water. Mix lightly, press into ball. Roll out to ⅛" thickness.

FREE: NEW PICTURE PIE BOOKLET. 32 new pie recipes. How-to-do-it illustrations. Write to Marie Gifford, Consumer Service Dept., Armour and Company, Chicago 9, Illinois.

The best pie crust is made with a good lard and the finest lard is Armour Star.

*Use Armour Star Lard, too, for light, fluffy biscuits and crisp, golden-brown fried chicken.

"You stay with Monsieur Armand and I will bring you back a doll. You must have a French doll."

"All right," said Vicky placidly, but when we were ready in the hall she came downstairs. "I will help you choose the doll," she said to Eliot and put her hand in his. "And it was odd," said Hester. "If he had not taken Vicky he must have been seen."

For us champagne will always have a ghost; it can never be a wine for feasts, but one for mourning. "Because it made the first crack," said Hester.

When we drove in through the important-looking iron-and-gilded gates at Dormans we had no inkling. It was more magnificent than any place we had seen. There was a lodge by the gates, then a great courtyard laid out with lawns and flowers, and facing the courtyard what looked to us like a palace but Eliot said were packing rooms and offices.

An entrance with turrets led into the cellars. "But you must not call them cellars," said Eliot, "they are caves, ten miles of galleries, like the catacombs."

"Tours go over all day long in summer," Eliot had told us and, sure enough, a tourist party was there. It was French, but we were allowed to join it and Eliot interpreted for us.

We went down into the darkness and coldness of the galleries. "But it is warmer than aboveground in winter," said the guide, "because the temperature never changes." First we saw the enormous casks in which the wine waited until it was bottled, then we walked after the French party down the long cellar lanes where the bottles were racked, neck downward in the pupitres, as the stands were called, and the bottle twisters moved with their jets of light among the racks, twisting, twisting the bottles with a rattling rhythm that echoed in the vaulted roof.

"Every bottle gets a twist every two days," said Eliot.

"Why?"

"To bring the sediment down on the cork; and this is an art," said Eliot. "The remueur—bottle twister—is a devoted person; all his thoughts are for the cuvée he is working on. You see," he said to Hester, "he doesn't talk. The whole racking place must be quiet and still; even the currents of air we make as we walk by disturb the wine."

We had not heard of wine being disturbed before, and the Littles looked solemn and walked on tiptoe.

We saw magnums and jeroboams and half bottles, and some 1893 champagne draped in the strange webbed fungus that always comes in the caves from the wetness of the chalk. We saw pink champagne—"For the English," said the guide contemptuously, and the whole party turned to look at us—and we were shown the rare red wine of the champagne country. Then we came up into the daylight again, to the packing room where women worked at unbelievable speed putting on the gold-foil tops, the scarlet seal, the label, and giving each bottle the final wrapping in pink paper.

When we were out in the sunlight again, still surrounded by the party, the guide asked if we would like to visit the museum, in the office opposite. "Would you?" asked Eliot. As we stood debating a man in a black coat, striped trousers, white shirt, silver-and-black tie and a red carnation came from the office doorway.

He spoke to us in English. "May I say you have a fine family?"

"We like being called a fine family, don't we?" Eliot asked us and, in this junketing mood, we did.

"Perhaps you would care to take a glass of our champagne with us, monsieur, you"—I noticed he was looking especially at Joss—"and mademoiselle and the demoiselles?"

"Champagne?" We were dumfounded.

"Would you like to?" asked Eliot.

"Champagne, for us?" I could not believe it and even Joss was shaken out of her calm.

"I don't want champagne, I want a syrup," said Vicky.

"If you would step into our little museum you could look at the pictures until it comes," said the man.

He led us to the door, opened it, then closed it again. From inside we had heard the sound of voices, men's voices speaking French, and footsteps coming near. "A moment," said our man. "They are just coming out. There has been a luncheon in the directors' room." As we looked impressed, "It is the annual convocation of Le Brochet de la Marne. That is a fishing club. Every year they come here for four days—it's a competition, you understand—and on the last day every year the directors of Dormans entertain them at luncheon. We have some famous members. This year the guest of honor is what in your country you would call your Sherlock Holmes, one of the greatest detectives in France. If you wait a moment you will see him coming out, Inspector Jules Cailleux."

"Cailleux!" I suppose it was Eliot who said that, but it did not sound like Eliot, and I saw he had picked Vicky up and was holding her in front of him on his arm.

"Put me down!" Mortally offended, she slapped Eliot, but he did not put her down.

"We have forgotten your doll," he said and looked at his watch. "Nous vous remercions infiniment, monsieur, mais nous n'avons vraiment pas le temps d'attendre. Merci mille fois," and—what was he saying?—"I had forgotten. I have an appointment in Reims."

"Mais, monsieur ——"

"Je regrette ——" and he turned to us. "Come along."

"But ——"

"Eliot!"

"You said ——"

"Come along!" Eliot's voice was as I had heard it once before, cold and clipped.

He went toward the car holding Vicky, who hid his face from us. We were following, amazed, when a group of men came out the door, three of them dressed like our man, the rest in suits or flannels and tweed jackets; there were two priests and, in the middle, a little man in a suit of mixed sand-and-olive-colored cloth that went well with his sand-colored hair and clipped mustache. "That

CONTINUED ON PAGE 71

Pie Right! Pie Bright!

...with MINUTE TAPIOCA's magic in your fruit pie fillings!

✳ Better body!

Every fruit pie lusciously juicy—yet never "runny"! Just use Minute Tapioca instead of flour or cornstarch thickeners. Tapioca's bubbles burst in oven heat—mingle with the fruit—give your pies perfect body.

✳ Truer flavor!

Every pie glorious with fresh fruit flavor! No more starchy, floury, pasty taste. Only Minute Tapioca lets all the natural goodness of the fruit come through. Minute Tapioca never hides the true flavor!

✳ Brighter color!

Every pie a sparkling beauty! Minute Tapioca can't dull the glowing colors of the fruit as flour or cornstarch does. Tapioca's so much easier to use, too—no pre-cooking. See easy directions on every package.

The same Tapioca that makes those wonderful light-as-a-bubble desserts

MINUTE TAPIOCA

A fine product of General Foods

"Drink Borden's Skim to keep you slim,"

says Elsie, the Borden Cow

ELSIE: It's just a little jingle to help you remember that Borden's Skimmed Milk is low in calories.

ELMER: Here's one for you, I'm NOT fat and that's that!

ELSIE: I'm afraid that isn't that at all. You've got to get back to normal and there's just one way to do it.

ELMER: Uh-huh . . . starve.

ELSIE: Oh, no! It's especially important for weight-watchers to get plenty of proteins, minerals and vitamins—that's where Borden's Skimmed Milk comes in . . .

ELMER: Well, do I drink it, or do we just talk about it?

ELSIE: Here you are. Borden's Fortified Skimmed Milk tastes so much better than the ordinary kind. And it has only about half the calories of whole milk!

If it's Borden's, it's got to be good!

Drink Borden's Skim to keep you slim . . .

BORDEN'S MILK • FINE CHEESES • ICE CREAM • STARLAC • See Borden's TV shows, "The People's Choice" and "Fury" over NBC.

© 1958, The Borden Company

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 69

must be the inspector—did he say Cailleux?" asked Joss. The men's faces all looked jovial but, great detective or not, we were given no time to look. Eliot had started the Rolls and we had to run across the courtyard and scramble in, even Joss. It was the first time he had treated her in this undignified way and her cheeks looked as if they burned.

He drove swiftly round the courtyard and through the gates, and before the men had left the office steps we were out on the road and speeding down it.

We drove in dead silence until at last Hester spoke. "This is the road to Soissons, Eliot."

"I know."

"You said you had an appointment in Reims."

"I know."

After a moment Hester asked, "Do you tell lies, Eliot?"

"Yes."

He drove fast into Soissons and stopped at a toyshop, got out and helped Vicky from the back seat; he glanced at Joss and said, "Cecil, you come."

In the shop he was not as he usually was with people. "Une poupée? Mais oui, monsieur. Voulez-vous une belle petite poupée ou une originale?" the shopgirl asked. I did not know what une originale meant, but Eliot did not answer and I had to say, "Une belle petite poupée—that means a pretty little doll," I told Vicky.

Vicky took a long while to choose, but when we were back with the others and heading for Vieux-Moutiers the silence was still unbroken.

At last Eliot stopped the car. "I'm sorry I had to do that," he said.

"Then why did you?" asked Joss.

"I had a reason," said Eliot, "that you would not understand."

"Then you can't expect us to understand, can you?" asked Joss. Her voice was cold, but it trembled a little.

"All right. I tell lies," said Eliot violently. It was the first time he had come up against a family opinion. "I tell lies and so do you and you and you, all of you."

"For you to tell them is different," said Hester.

"I didn't ask to be a hero."

"They mean you are grown up," said Joss coldly.

"I see," said Eliot. "You expect yourselves to be comfortably riddled with faults ——"

"We are."

"And you think you will lose them when you grow up."

"I hope so," I said firmly.

"You poor little fools!"

Joss put her hand on Eliot's knee. "Eliot, what has made you so unhappy?"

He looked down at her hand and I shall always remember his answer. "What has made you so unhappy?" Joss asked and he answered, "Being perfectly happy for two days."

After a moment he turned to look at us in the back seat. "Have none of you ever tasted champagne?"

"Don't be silly," said Joss, exasperated. "How could we?" and I said sorrowfully, "We have never even seen it."

"It is not as exciting as all that," said Eliot. "You soon get tired of it." Silence. "I suppose, to you, that is another silly thing to say."

"Yes."

He did not say anything more, but started the car. When we got back to the hotel, we separated; it seemed by mutual consent.

There were roses on our table that night. Usually ours was the only one without flowers. Nobody else was dining but M. Joubert and Eliot; Mme. Corbet's and Mlle. Zizi's places had not been used. Besides the roses we had a clean starched cloth—often ours was left on dirty—clean napkins, and by each place was a new kind of glass, high, with a three-inch stem. "What are these?" we asked.

"Flûtes de champagne," said Mauricette.

"Glasses for drinking champagne," said M. Joubert in careful English. He had never spoken to us before except to say, "Bonjour." Now he was as interested as Mauricette. "They have a hollow stem and keep the wine to sparkle," he explained.

Mauricette served our soup. She was friendly that night and did not slam things down on the table nor lean across us. After the soup there was chicken. Then Mauricette, with a smile at the corners of her mouth, brought in one of the silver wine buckets we had often helped to fill with ice. Eliot left his table, came to ours and drew the cork, making us jump. Then Mauricette wrapped the bottle in a napkin, carried it to Eliot's table and poured a little into his glass and gave it to him to taste. He sipped it and nodded. For one moment we had thought it all might be for him, but she filled Joss' glass, and went round the table. After Hester, she hesitated, but Eliot said, "Monsieur Willmouse will take a little. Bring a grenadine for Mlle. Vicky."

We sat in amazed silence, looking at the glasses and the pale sparkling wine. I think our eyes must have been quite round, our faces awed, but I admired Joss. No matter how moved, she did not lose her manners. She got up, went to the bucket, reverently lifted the bottle from the ice, copied Mauricette by wrapping it in a napkin, took it to Eliot and filled his glass up.

"May I offer some to Monsieur Joubert?" she asked.

"It's your wine," said Eliot. "Say, 'Vous prendrez bien une verre, monsieur?'"

She took it to M. Joubert. "Vous prendrez bien une verre, monsieur?" Mauricette ran with a glass and Joss poured. "Thank you, Mlle. Hébé," said M. Joubert.

When Joss was back in her place he lifted his glass and called, "Santé!"

"Santé." . . . "Santé." . . . "Santé." . . . "Santé."

Willmouse was white, Hester approached her lips as if she were afraid champagne might bite, Joss looked over her glass at Eliot and quickly lowered her lids, and we drank. "It goes up your nose," said Willmouse.

"Monsieur Eliot," called M. Joubert, "you must take the bouchon—the cork—wet it and touch it behind mademoiselle's ears"; and to Joss, "Always with the first bottle of champagne you taste that must be done."

Eliot came over to us. Mauricette gave him the cork; he wetted it and we watched, as in a ritual, while he lifted Joss' hair and touched it behind her ear. I do not know why, but we all clapped. "Now you must keep it forever," said M. Joubert to Joss.

"Eliot! E-liot!" Mlle. Zizi's voice rang through the hall. The next moment she appeared in the dining room. "Eliot!"

I thought that, quite deliberately, he touched the cork to Joss' other ear before he answered, "I am here, Zizi."

"Irène says you ordered champagne, Dormans—for those children."

"Yes."

"Are you mad?"

"It was for a reason, Zizi."

Had Mlle. Zizi forgotten her rouge? She was curiously white; her eyes had dark, purple-colored stains under them as if she had spilled the eye shadow, only it was darker than that. "I know your reason!" said Mlle. Zizi.

Those haunted-looking eyes took in the table, the roses, the chicken. "Who said you could do this?"

"Pauv' p'tits choux!" said Mauricette. "Armand et moi leur avons préparé une petite surprise."

"With my things?"

Joss got up. She did what she thought was the best thing. Taking Vicky's flûte de champagne from where it stood unused beside the glass of grenadine, she filled it from the bottle and brought it to Mlle. Zizi. "Mademoiselle, vous voudrez bien prendre une verre?"

I thought she would not, but Mlle. Zizi took the glass. Her eyes turned from Eliot to Regret is an appalling waste of energy. You can't build on it; it is only good for wallowing.

KATHERINE MANSFIELD

Reprinted from FORBES Magazine of Business. Copyright by B. C. Forbes and Sons Publishing Co., Inc.

"Did you know Johnny helped us to send him through college?"

When Johnny was 10, his parents struck on a fine idea. They started a savings account for him; and promised that they would meet and match every dollar he put in. There was lawn-mowing money, even baby-sitting money; and later on, 3 months' summer salary through high-school years. With each dollar being matched and with earnings on his savings over the years, Johnny wound up with much of his college education paid for.

The place this family chose was an Insured Savings and Loan Association. It's the modern way to save. Informal . . . friendly . . . safe and secure, and savings are insured up to $10,000 by the Federal Savings and Loan Insurance Corporation, an agency of the U. S. Government. Get wonderful things for your family. Start a savings account or add to your present one today.

WHERE YOU SAVE DOES MAKE A DIFFERENCE

Look for this symbol of safety where you save

FEDERAL SAVINGS AND LOAN INSURANCE CORPORATION
SAFETY OF YOUR SAVINGS INSURED
UP TO $10000

©This message is sponsored by The Savings & Loan Foundation, Inc., 1111 E Street, N. W., Washington 4, D. C.

WORLD'S FASTEST FUDGE

NEW

Real old-fashioned flavor... in just 4 minutes!

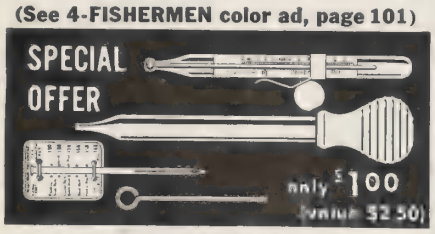
Only new "Junket" Quick Fudge Mix is pre-cooked, pre-creamed. No testing. No beating. Smooth, luscious fudge guaranteed every time.

CHOCOLATE • PENUCHE • COCONUT

GRAVY MASTER
MAKES IT EASY
There's No Gravy Or Stew Like Homemade

ENJOY "Constant Comment" TEA

At Food Gift & Dept. Stores



fine Ceylon tea with bits of oranges and sweet spice added. "Constant Comment" is the richest, liveliest, most deliciously different tea you've ever tasted. With your family, — your friends — enjoy "Constant Comment" daily.

For 6 cup sample, send 10c to R. C. Bigelow, Inc., Mfrs. 15L Merwin St., Dept. L-F Norwalk, Conn.

TOGETHER

(See 4-FISHERMEN color ad, page 101)

SPECIAL OFFER

only $1.00 (value $2.50)

4-PIECE THERMOMETER AND BASTER SET

Now you can own—or give—this useful 4-piece set at less than half price! Set includes candy and deep fat thermometer; roast meat thermometer; skewer for piercing meat; combination baster and gravy-skimmer. Send only $1.00 and one 4-Fishermen Fishsticks wrapper for each set desired.

MAIL TO: 4-Fishermen Special Offer, P. O. Box 64, Springfield, Ohio.

Offer void where prohibited, taxed or otherwise restricted.

Joss and back to Eliot. "Santé," said Eliot pleasantly.

Mlle. Zizi went even whiter; her mouth made an ugly grimace, and she threw the champagne at Joss.

We knew from newspapers and books that grown people quarreled, but we had never heard them.

After Mlle. Zizi had thrown the champagne no one moved or spoke; the glass had fallen with a tinkling crash and the tinkle seemed to go on and on. Then M. Joubert got to his feet and walked out of the dining room and Vicky began to cry. "I want mother. I want mother," she wailed. Joss' dress was wet with champagne, she shook her hair back as if she were dazed, then ran out of the room and through the hall. We heard the terrace door bang, and Eliot said to Mlle. Zizi, "I want to see you alone."

They did not wait to reach the office before they began; their angry loud voices rang through the hall. They spoke English when they remembered because of Mauricette and the rest who were listening with all their ears, but they kept breaking into French.

"I should never have let them be there at dinner," cried Mlle. Zizi. "That girl!"

"She was quite right," said Eliot. "The small ones could eat with the servants, but she and Cecil are big."

"Of course you take her part."

"I don't."

"You do. For three days I have scarcely seen you."

"For heaven's sake, Zizi! I happened to have a little time and amused the poor brats."

"You don't think of them as children."

"Don't be ridiculous."

"Ridiculous! For three days ——" Mlle. Zizi was crying.

"Don't keep on saying that!" Then Eliot's voice altered. "Zizi, you're not jealous of a little girl?"

"First she is big, then she is little. Remarkable!" That was Mme. Corbet, who had come out of the office.

"Is it too much to ask," said Eliot, his voice like ice again, "that we might occasionally talk without Irène?"

"And why may I not remain?"

"Because this is not your business."

"Irène, please go." That was Mlle. Zizi.

Mme. Corbet came through the dining room. Her neck was patched with crimson, her topknot shook and the bobbles on her shawl danced up and down. "Ah, le vaurien! Canaille! Fripouille!" said Mme. Corbet as she passed. We shrank down in our chairs.

"Eliot, écoute. Écoute-mois." Mlle. Zizi's voice was soft and I guessed she had gone close to Eliot. I stood up to see and yes, she had; she was standing in front of him pleading. "Eliot, please let us send for this uncle and get them away."

"Dear Zizi, because of a child ——"

"She isn't a child."

"Don't be absurd."

"Then send for the uncle."

"Zizi." Eliot had taken her hands. "I gave my word; besides"—I had the feeling he was choosing the words very carefully—"I can't have the uncle, an Englishman, here now."

"Because he is English?" She sounded scornful.

"I explained to you, Zizi. I can't have talk yet."

"But a man in Southstone. That is in Sussex, it is far away from London."

"Not so far. I can't afford to risk it."

I did not know what they were talking of. I could have told them that Uncle William never went to London, but Eliot sounded as if he were . . . making excuses, I thought. He said now, "You never know."

"N-no," said Mlle. Zizi slowly and . . . She is coming to heel, I thought.

"Zizi, promise. Promise me you won't do anything."

"Irène says ——"

"You know Irène would do anything to separate us. Promise." Without looking I knew he had put his arm round Mlle. Zizi. I looked at the floor, the blood thrummed in my ears.

"Let's go out," whispered Mlle. Zizi. "Let's go away from here. Somewhere. Anywhere."

"Get a coat, then," said Eliot. He sounded as if he had given up. Why should he sound like that when it was Mlle. Zizi who had been defeated? I tiptoed out into the hall. He was there alone, but Mlle. Zizi was only fetching her coat; and she soon came back. He said as if he were very tired, "Come through the garden. We will go to the Giraffe."

As they reached the glass door it opened and Joss stood there. Behind her the garden was twilit now; she must have been alone in the dusk—in the orchard, I thought, looking at her drenched sandals; her feet and the hem of her dress were soaked, and it was only in the orchard that the dew lay like that. I did not think Joss knew where she had been. Her eyes still looked shocked.

For a moment Mlle. Zizi and Eliot stopped. Then Mlle. Zizi walked past, her head high.

Joss' eyes went to Eliot. There was no appeal in them, she simply looked. There was a pause, like a breath. Then Eliot squared his shoulders as if he had made up his mind. He went after Mlle. Zizi and passed Joss as if she were not there.

TOILERS

By ARCHIBALD RUTLEDGE

Who'll break the tough glebe now?
"I," said the patient plow.

Who'll smooth the field tomorrow?
"I," said the sturdy harrow.

Who'll wet and warm the clod?
"I," said unfailing God.

Who'll gather in the grain?
"I," said strong Farmer Lane.

And gather him, who must?
"I," said the quiet dust.

When someone has been slapped in the face it is polite not to look at them. I went to a table, picked up a magazine and turned the pages over while Hester quietly gathered Vicky and Willmouse and took them to bed.

The house had never seemed as big. I could hear Mme. Corbet scolding Paul; I knew it was Paul because he did not answer as Mauricette did, then I remembered that Mauricette was not there. She had gone to the cinema with M. Armand.

Mme. Corbet came from the kitchen and went into the office. I heard her lock up, take the keys and go out. Would she go to the Giraffe and spy on the others or to the convent? I could not guess, but soon after all the lights went off. That was one of Mme. Corbet's economies: if she wanted to go out and the house was empty of people—we and Paul did not count as people—she would turn off the electricity at the main; she would be back, the lights suitably burning, before Mlle. Zizi and Eliot came in.

Though it was only dusk outside, the house was immediately dark, which made it more desolate. At other times when Mme. Corbet had done this Hester and I had been in the garden with Paul. "Talking gossip," said Joss scornfully but, quite often, "Not gossip, dreams," I could have said. We talked about what we should do when we were grown: I was to be a writer or a nun; Hester thought she might keep a teashop or a hotel like Mlle. Zizi; Paul talked about his lorries. "If I stay the summer," he said, "I shall get the bonus," and he told us again how, at the end of the season, Mme. Corbet shared out the tips. "It makes a lot," said Paul; he had seen a good secondhand Berliet at the garage. But now Joss and I were inside; even the dogs were away, they had gone with Eliot and Mlle. Zizi, and the house was eerie. Joss must have felt it, for she came and sat at the table by me. I could just see the pale oval of her face, the whiteness of her arms.

"Shall we go to bed?" I asked.

"I . . . can't." There was a pause. Our voices in the emptiness seemed small, then. "They have even kept our passports," said Joss.

"Our passports?" I asked.

"Yes. How dared they!"

"But why do you want them?"

"I'm going home," she snapped, "and one can't travel without them."

"But ——" Every sentence I said seemed to begin with "but." "But how can you go?"

"By myself if I must," and she thrust at me, "You were quite happy without me when I was ill. You were happier."

The way in which she said it made it a guilty thing to have been, but I had to admit it. "But it is far more interesting now," I blurted out.

"You call it interesting!"

"Yes. Oh, Joss! Don't, don't spoil it."

"Spoil it!" She bent her head.

"I know it is sometimes difficult ——"

"Difficult!" All she seemed able to do was echo my words, spitting them out as if they tasted bitter.

"Yes, I know, but we are alive," I argued. "It isn't like Southstone where nothing ever happened. Here I can feel us living. Don't you feel as if you were being stretched?"

"It hurts to be stretched," said Joss.

There was a flapping sound that was oddly cheerful, and a glimmer of light appeared that grew larger. Joss raised her head as Paul came through the kitchen doorway carrying two lighted candles in bottles. Paul put the bottles down on our table.

"V'là ce que j'ai trouvé!" he said, felt in his pocket and brought out the champagne cork. He put it beside Joss.

"Merci," said Joss dully.

"Vous n'en voulez-pas?"

Joss shook her head. "It doesn't seem very lucky," she said and, laboriously, "Pas bonne chance."

"C'est la vie," said Paul without rancor. "Des gens." People! I thought, and winced.

"Psst!" Paul spat the people out on the floor. Joss did not even flinch. In fact, she looked better. Perhaps it was the chili in the elephant's eye. Father had told us about that: in India when an elephant has a wound that hurts so that the pain cannot be borne, the mahout squirts chili juice into its eye for the smarting to distract it.

I guessed that Joss would have liked to have spat too; then the anger faded; she rolled the cork forlornly on the table.

Paul looked at it and her, then he whispered to me. "He kept the champagne," I told Joss.

"I don't want it."

"Le champagne c'est toujours du champagne," said Paul. He added that he was not going to let that she-cat have it.

"The she-cat is Mauricette," I explained to Joss.

"What can we do with it?" asked Joss.

"We could . . . drink it," I said timidly.

"Out of other people's glasses!"

"Only ours. Monsieur Joubert drank his. Ours and . . . Eliot's." Joss turned her head away.

Paul came back with a round tray. He had tactfully poured all the glassfuls back into the bottle so that no one could know which was which. There were two clean glasses. "Where is yours?" I asked.

A pleased look came into his face, but he looked at Joss. "Certainement," said Joss.

He fetched another glass and I filled it.

We drank. I tried not to grimace at the strange feeling in my nose, but my eyelids flickered so that Paul laughed. Joss managed to hide everything but one long shudder.

Paul and Joss finished the bottle, then he looked at the empty glasses and asked, "Encore un coup, hein?" Paul tapped the bottle and pretended he was opening another.

"But it's all locked up," I said.

"Si," said Paul mockingly.

Joss thought he had not understood. "Mme. Corbet has taken the keys—les clefs," she said.

"Si," said Paul and laughed. Then he flapped across the hall and went into Mlle.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 75

See what Family Style whole kernel corn lets you do!

Heat it without close watching. No stirring, no butter needed when heating. DEL MONTE Family Style Corn is packed with liquid, so kernels can get hot clear through without danger of sticking, scorching.

Heat it in the oven. When you're having an oven dinner, empty DEL MONTE Family Style Corn, liquid and all, into a casserole, cover, put it in the oven, too. Allow about 20 min. at 350° F., or 15 min. at 400° F.

Reheat leftovers tender and juicy. Leave this corn in its liquid—you can warm it up for late-comers to meals or even next day. It keeps so well, you'll say it tastes as good the second time around as the first.

Enjoy true fresh-corn flavor. DEL MONTE Family Style Corn is so juicy, sweet and tender — don't be surprised if your family thinks it tastes more like young corn, freshly cooked, than any you've ever tried.

Del Monte® Family Style Corn

One of 3 styles of Del Monte Corn Whole Kernels in Liquid • Vacuum-Packed Whole Kernel • Cream Style

Frigidaire–America's No. 1 Washer

EVEN DYES CLOTHES AUTOMATICALLY!

Give tired, stained, old "throwaways" a new lease on life with color. It's as easy as automatic washing in a Frigidaire Washer.

Just pour dye directly from package into Dispenser Cup, set dials as for washing. That's all! No boiling, straining, mixing.

Bath mats to shower curtains, undies to party clothes bloom like new—for pennies. It's color magic – yours with one setting of the dials.

New Frigidaire Washer Rated No. 1 for CLEANEST CLOTHES – LINT REMOVAL – DRIEST SPIN

By U. S. Testing Company, Inc.*

Not only does this new Frigidaire Washer get clothes up to 50% cleaner than other automatics – by test –

Not only does this washer automatically handle the lint problem –

Not only does the built-in SudsWater-Saver save enough hot water and detergent to do every other wash load practically free –

But it also washes everything from "delicates" to denims, under ideal conditions with one setting of the dials – cuts down drying time and costs by spinning more water out of clothes—and now restores new life to faded garments, spreads, curtains—the fastest, easiest way yet. If you can wash it you can dye it automatically in this Frigidaire Washer!

On top of that, it's styled with the New Sheer Look—Plus—that keeps you in style and in step with the future. In your choice of four glamorous Sheer Look colors, sold by Frigidaire at the same price as White.

See America's "No. 1 Washer" at your Frigidaire dealer's, now.

*In tests of six leading washers under controlled laboratory conditions. Tested and verified by world-famous U. S. Testing Co., Inc., Reports #29123 and #29123-A, dated May 2 and May 10, 1957.

Models DCI-58
WCI-58

Get the One That's No. 1

'58 FRIGIDAIRE

ULTRA-CLEAN WASHER with Matching Electric Dryer

NEW! "Wrinkles-Away" Drying in Matching Frigidaire Dryer—One turn of the dial removes wrinkles from Wash 'n Wear garments – ends hanger drying. Freshens most articles mussed from wear or storage like new. In all Frigidaire Dryers, even the lowest priced.

Exclusive!

3-RING AGITATOR

Automatic Dispenser, below turquoise cap, dilutes and releases detergent, dye, bleach safely, evenly, under water.

Lint Chaser Ring, "sweeps" out lint, dirt, scum —leaves less lint on clothes than washers with filters that have to be cleaned by hand.

Circulator Ring, keeps clothes separated, guards against tangling.

Energy Ring, energizes water into surging currents that gets clothes ultra clean.

Automatic SudsWater-Saver!
Cut Washday Costs Almost Half!

GM GOLDEN ANNIVERSARY

Golden Anniversary Models from Frigidaire, celebrating 50 years of General Motors Leadership

LIVE BETTER ELECTRICALLY

See "The Patrice Munsel Show" on TV

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 72

Zizi's room. In a moment he was back holding up a bunch of keys.

"Zizi, where are your keys? You had better give them to me." How many times had I heard Mme. Corbet say that, and, "You are not fit to have them." It seemed Mme. Corbet was right.

Paul turned toward the kitchen door. Behind it stone steps went down to the cellar.

"But, Paul ——"

Joss cut across me. "Go on," said Joss. "Allez-y." She was not despairing now, but sitting up straight. "Go on," she said to Paul, and I knew that the hurt was really angry now. That made me afraid; when Joss was angry she did not care what she did.

"Joss. He shouldn't ——"

"Shut up," said Joss.

Paul came back with two tall bottles. "Vous en boirez pas du comme ça à l'étranger," he said. "C'est moi qui vous le dis."

I was proud that I could understand him when Joss could not. "You won't drink this away . . . outside France."

"Why?" asked Joss. "What is it?"

"Champagne nature"; and seeing we did not understand, he said, "Blanc de blanc."

When I think of that evening it seems to run together into that name: "Blanc de blanc."

"We mustn't drink it," I said, but the words seemed to burst in the air and disappear.

"We drank the other," said Joss.

"Our wine . . . given to us." Now I seemed to have lost some words.

"Shut up."

Paul caught that. "Shut up," he said amiably to me and poured the wine. Joss lifted her glass to me and drank; she emptied the glass straight off. Paul filled it again and she laid her hand on his. "Thank you, Paul," she said. "It was s-sweet of you to get this for us." She had drunk too quickly. The "s-sweet" was a tiny hiccup, but it was not that that sobered me. It was Paul's face. Paul had not understood what she said, but his face had flooded with crimson and that pleased look was in his eyes.

"Joss, don't. He will think you mean it."

"W-what if he does?" She leaned toward Paul and said, "You give cigarettes to Cecil. Why not to me?"

"Cigarette?" Paul sounded dazed, but he brought out his packet. Joss took one and he tossed her the matches. It was not that he meant to be rude, but he did not know how to treat girls. Joss tried to light the cigarette, but the smoke got into her eyes. Paul laughed at her and, taking the cigarette, lit it himself, then he put it into her lips.

For some reason I did not like to see that. "Joss, don't."

"Why not?"

I would not say why not; I said instead, "You will hurt him."

Her eyes narrowed into small glints. "I am g-going to hurt him." This time the hiccup was loud.

"You are getting drunk," I said.

"I want to. I am going to get d-drunk." She lifted her glass. "I am g-going to do all the d-disgusting things they do." She drank the wine off and held out her glass while I was doubtfully sipping mine. I do not know how many Paul had had, but when he had poured for her the bottle of blanc de blanc was empty. "L'autre," commanded Joss.

Paul picked up the other and showed it to me. "Bouzy Rouge," he said.

"Bouzy? Bouzy. Bouzy." Joss started to laugh and the laugh turned into giggles like the bubbles coming up. "C-Cecil. B-bouzy!"

Paul was having difficulty with the corkscrew. He located the cork, but as soon as he tried to spiral the screw in, it slipped sideways. Now he tried again and seared his thumb. "Aie! Merde!" said Paul. "Hit it," said Joss, "tapez dessus," and he hit the bottle against one of the console tables. The neck smashed off on the floor with a gush of red wine that spattered his apron and hand. There was an ugly great gash across the table.

I was horrified. "Paul! Paul!"

He swore at me with his new word, "Shut up!" and poured the wine.

"I don't want any," I said, but he picked up my glass, drank the white and filled it with the red. It seemed to my bleared eyes that the whole hall was spread with red wine; the glasses were red, and the pool on the floor. Paul's and Joss' heads seemed to come nearer and go away again, as did the candle flames in the bottles. When I looked at the walls they moved inward a little, while the stairs went sideways. It was no longer blanc de blanc, that happy time; the red was terrible, and I began to cry.

Joss had drunk her glass already. I do not know why she was not sick. "Another cigarette. Encore une Gauloise," she said.

Paul looked at her. His eyes seemed to squint so that he looked hideous and he said, "Viens la prendre."

He was sitting back from the table, his knees apart, his apron dangling between them, a cigarette stuck to his lower lip. Now he pulled open his shirt and showed where the cigarettes were crumpled inside. "Viens-y," he said. Joss went pale and stood uncertainly up.

I knew what he would do. I had seen him with Mauricette too often. Mauricette could look after herself, but, "Joss you are not to!" I screamed. "You are not to!" I pushed her down and screamed at Paul, "Ne la touchez pas!"

Paul picked up the bottle. I do not know what would have happened if Joss had not settled it herself. She had been sitting where I had pushed her; now, quite softly, with a sigh, she fell forward on the table, knocking over my untouched glass. Her head rolled a little, her hair tumbled forward into the wine and began to soak it up.

We heard footsteps. The garden door opened. M. Joubert and Mlle. Zizi came in and stopped,

Why the bees should pamper their mothers whilst we pamper only our operatic prima donnas is a question worth reflecting on. G. B. SHAW with Eliot close behind them. At the same moment the lights went on and there was a scurry of steps in the kitchen passage: Mme. Corbet had stayed too late and the others had beaten her; she came running in breathless and stopped too. "Grands Dieux," said Mme. Corbet. The others said nothing, they simply stood.

It must have looked an orgy with the bottles and glasses, the candles burned down in the bottles, the wine on the table, the cigarette ends where we had thrown them down on the floor with more wine and broken glass. "Grands Dieux!" said Mme. Corbet again.

Then I saw the rat in Paul. "C'est pas moi! C'est pas moi! C'est elle!" His voice was shrill with fear—he pointed at Joss—"elle et Mademoiselle Cecil. Elles m'ont forcé!"

"La ferme!" said Eliot, which was the rudest way I had heard of saying "Shut up."

Mlle. Zizi had stayed in the doorway; it was as if she kept her skirts held back. Eliot crossed at once to Joss, but before he reached her M. Joubert came up behind and stood with his hands on her chair. It was as if he kept Eliot off. M. Joubert bent and straightened Joss up, but she could not sit; her head fell forward again. "She is drunk," said M. Joubert to Eliot as if it were an accusation, and he said, in English too, "I do not know what has been going on here, but it is not good." He was not looking at us but at Eliot and Mlle. Zizi.

"Good!" Mlle. Zizi was defensive. "To be drunk at their age! On my wine!"

"And look at the table!" cried Mme. Corbet.

She darted forward and picked up the bottles. "Zizi! The Villers Marmery and Bouzy Rouge!"

Paul had been picking up the broken glass. Now he rolled it in his apron and slipped adroitly through the kitchen door. Joss was insensible; there was only I, Cecil, to face them. I was standing unsteadily where I had risen by the table and Mme. Corbet turned on me and slapped my cheeks. "Petite canaille. J'm'en vais te flanquer une correction. Drôlesse! Oh! Cette petite crapule!"

"Stop that, Irène," said Eliot. "Stop. Hush!" he said more loudly as the stream of names went on.

"Hush! And who is to pay for it?"

"You can put it on my bill," said M. Joubert and there was silence. He bent and picked Joss up. "Mlle. Cecil, can you walk upstairs to your room?"

My ears were singing with Mme. Corbet's slaps, but I managed to leave the table and zigzag to the stairs; there the banister rail came unexpectedly into my hand. M. Joubert followed, carrying Joss.

"Let me take her," said Eliot.

"I think you have done enough," said M. Joubert. He carried Joss up. I followed, missing some steps but holding by the banister rail. Eliot was left standing at the foot of the stairs.

"If this is how grown people feel," said Joss, "they are even worse pigs than I thought."

I said, perhaps tactlessly, "They know when to stop."

"Do they!" said Joss. "Look at Mlle. Zizi," but I had to be fair.

"Of all the grownups she is the only one who doesn't seem to know," and I sighed.

I did not remember getting into bed, but I had wakened to find myself under the clothes though dressed.

When I had gone in to Joss she, too, was in bed, the covers tucked carefully round her, her sandals placed neatly side by side on the rug, but she also was dressed. I felt so miserable that I woke her and she was cross. Then, sitting up, she had taken in where she was, her crumpled dress, the smell on her hair, and she gave a sound like a moan and shut her eyes.

Too shamed to go down to breakfast, we stayed in Joss' room. "But it wasn't our fault," I argued and used a phrase I had read in M. Armand's newspapers, "They drove us to it," but Joss was more truthful than I.

"It was our fault," she said wearily, "and we shall have to learn."

"Learn what?"

"To manage."

"Manage what?"

"Manage what happens to us better than this. I smell," said Joss.

"I smell too," I said.

"Not as badly as I do," and she covered her eyes with her hand. It was only to shut out the light, but it looked tragic and I felt torn.

When something is badly needed it is amazing how an answer will come. I was moved to tell Joss about M. Joubert. She was quiet as she listened, then she took her hand down. "You mean he said, 'Put it on my bill,' just like that?" she asked.

"Just like that."

"He wasn't angry?"

"Not with us. He carried you up to bed."

"Not . . . Eliot?"

"Eliot wanted to, but Monsieur Joubert would not let him."

Joss thought for a moment, then got out of bed, went to the washstand, poured water into the basin and began to splash her face. She did not speak while she dried her face and hands, then stripped off her crumpled dress; I knew she was thinking very deeply or she would have told me to go away. At last, as she was putting on a clean dress, I asked, "What are you going to do?"

"Give Monsieur Joubert one of my paintings," she said.

"But Joss! He is famous. He gets hundreds of pounds for a portrait. He has paintings in big galleries like the Salon and the Academy."

"Not the Academy. The Uffizi in Florence. They have just bought some of his," said Joss calmly, putting on her shoes.

"He is to have an exhibition in London this year," I argued. "Mme. Corbet said so. He—he won't be bothered with a girl, Joss. He is Marc Joubert. Mme. Corbet says he is one of the best painters in the world."

"Then he will know when a painting is good," said Joss.

She was, of course, right. M. Joubert did not send her away; he held the little painting at arm's length, looked at it again, put it up on a chair and went away from it. Nor was he play-acting—I do not think M. Joubert ever acted. We all stood round in a chorus while a

I'll tell you the Secret of a Carefree MOVING DAY says

Noted Moving Consultant

Bette Malone

"It's the 'Pre-Planned' System, offered exclusively by your nearby United Agent. And write me personally if you need any advice on the care of fragile items, upholstered furniture, fine-finish pieces, lamps, bric-a-brac, heirlooms, pictures . . . also information about any city to which you may be moving. Address Bette Malone, Dept. H1, United Van Lines, St. Louis 17, Mo. For estimate on local or long-distance moving, call nearest United Agent listed under "Movers" in Yellow Pages."

Sanitized MOVING

United Van Lines

familiar catechism began. "You did this yourself?"

"Yes," said Joss, and we nodded.

"No one helped you?"

"No. I am going to an art school soon."

"When?"

"Perhaps when the holidays are over."

"Painters don't have holidays," said M. Joubert. "They don't know how. Why an art school?"

"I need to learn to draw," said Joss meekly.

I thought he would say "Nonsense" but he nodded. "That won't spoil you. When madame your mother is better I will speak with her"; and he said to me, "Does she talk?"

"Mother?" I asked, startled.

"Mademoiselle." He pointed at Joss.

"Oh! She! Sometimes."

He pounced. "Not all times?"

"Oh, no! That's Hester."

"Then," said M. Joubert, "Mlle. Joss can come and paint with me. Not near but near enough, but no other child must come," and he said fiercely to the rest of us, "Keep away!"

We nodded again, our eyes wide with respect. This, we knew, was something different from Eliot.

Eliot made one approach to Joss. Before dinner she stayed out on the terrace so that she need not meet him. Mlle. Zizi was talking to some American arrivals and he went out.

"Joss."

"Yes."

"I'm sorry. Joss, I had to do that."

Joss said nothing.

"You won't talk to me?" asked Eliot.

"No," said Joss.

"Tomorrow I'm not going to Paris and ——"

"I will be busy tomorrow," and it was true, not an excuse.

From that day we were split as we had been . . . before Eliot, I thought. Joss got up in the mornings now as early as M. Joubert; almost before it was light she was out on the bank—she, too was painting two pictures—and she went early to bed. "There is no light then. I might as well go to bed," she said. The other people in the house hardly saw her at all.

As Hester and I dawdled at the cove we would watch her. She had none of the trappings M. Joubert had, not even a camp stool; she sat on an upturned wooden box and held her board on her knee. She had not any proper canvas, only a piece of linen stretched on the board, but M. Joubert showed her a way of washing it over with two or three coats of white—"not paint, tempera," said Joss—to make it smooth. He had given her a flat tin box filled with jars of tempera and, "One day he will help me with oils," she said. Worst of all, she had no umbrella and she had to sit out in the heat with only her old straw hat to shade her. Every now and then she climbed down the bank and wet her handkerchief to spread on the crown; even so, she was sickly pale at the end of the day.

"Monsieur Joubert ought to send you in."

"He doesn't notice me," said Joss with pride. She knew how to please him and she interrupted her work only to join us when we went to pay our evening visit to mother. We were allowed to go and see mother every day now and, "I'm painting," Joss told her and mother looked relieved.

"And what are you doing, Cecil?"

"Nothing."

"But you are looking after the Littles?"

"Yes," I said grudgingly. I had to. Joss was as good an elder sister as any, but when she was painting Vicky or Willmouse could have fallen into the Marne and she would not have known.

"Only they wouldn't," said Hester.

"No, but Willmouse goes off every evening alone and he shouldn't."

Every evening when he had finished his work Willmouse put his things away: his box of scraps, his sewing box, Miss Dawn and Dolores, and their new confections; then he would wash his face and hands, sleek down his hair and, like any old gentleman, go for a little walk. A new barge, the Marie France 47, had anchored above the cove; he liked to walk up and look at that.

"Why don't you go when we go?"

"I like to go by myself."

I let him. It was too hot, everything was too strained, to bother.

Before Eliot. We were back to that time, yet we were not back. It was the same, and it was not the same. A curious tenseness was in the house. Eliot when he came from Paris looked bone-tired and haggard, and he was so curt with Mlle. Zizi that her eyes looked bigger than ever with perpetual tears.

For three days he did not come at all. Mlle. Zizi went to the telephone four or five times. We heard her ask for the same Paris number, then wait, listening, while that far-off bell rang and rang. There was never any answer.

Then there was Paul. I could bear his having tried to make Joss come to him, that was to be expected of Paul; if he had hit me that night, as I think he meant to with the bottle, I could have expected that, too; but he had sneaked out and left me. In our code that was mean.

Neither of the Littles liked Paul. Hester, of course, took a more lenient view. "But you were not there," I said. "You don't know how awful he was."

"More awful than you and Joss?"

"Yes," and then, thinking of what Paul had been through, the camps and the almshouse, I had to say, "I don't know."

I did not want to see all these things in Paul, but since coming to Les Oeillets I seemed to see a long way into people, even when I did not wish it. "You think of no one but yourselves," mother had said on that long-ago day on the beach, and how much more comfortable that had been. I seemed to see into everyone and, "There isn't anybody good," I said in misery.

"Yes, there is," said Hester. "Monsieur Joubert."

Perhaps even he was not completely good but he was . . . kept good, I thought; we could see him now, with Joss faithfully behind him, both of them busy. "I wish I had painting or something," I said. "How can you be good if you are just lying about?"

Hester was looking at the river, at the water eddying down. There was a long silence, then, "Cecil, is Eliot good?" she asked.

The question seemed to fall with a plop into the peaceful water. "We love him," I said uncertainly. Is Eliot good? It was a question I would rather not have answered and I was glad when the water whirls took it away.

It was the third week of August, and the same high-summer weather: even in the cove it was hot; hardly a breeze disturbed the willows so that they hung dustily green, not showing their silver; the grass was dusty and untidy, filled with the litter left by Sunday walkers and picnickers. Mother was better but still not out of bed, not even sitting up. Next month the holidays would be over, but there were still three and a half weeks to go and at Les Oeillets each day was like a year.

There seemed nothing wrong; in fact, there was a new friendliness in the house. We had put Paul out of bounds so that we heard no scandal; Mlle. Zizi and Joss kept truce under M. Joubert; Mme. Corbet, perhaps because she wished she had not slapped me, was less sharp; and for us it was as if we had taken a step or two backward: we were children again, and that was a relief.

Joss finished her first painting and took it to mother. Vicky had her fifth birthday; M. Armand made her a cake and we had a French birthday party. We were to remember it always. "Because it was from then," said Hester, afterward. "That was the day," she said, "when Eliot began to be where he wasn't."

"And wasn't where he was."

It was a queer birthday party. A table was carried out in the garden. Mauricette covered it with a white cloth and decorated it with vine leaves from the arbor. In the middle was the cake, covered with cream icing and nuts, and round it Mauricette put a ring of wineglasses filled with grenadine. Mlle. Zizi came, and Mme. Corbet, Mauricette, M. Armand, Toinette and Nicole, Robert the gardener and his wife and baby; M. Joubert and Joss left their painting, Willmouse his sewing. Paul curtly refused to come out of the kitchen and Eliot, though he had known about the party, had gone to Paris. That made it more amiable but less exciting.

It did not last long; there were no presents—we had no money; but Vicky, with so few birthdays behind her, was not in the habit of presents and did not know what she was missing. We drank her health, cut the cake and, after eating and drinking, broke up. Joss, Hester and I went to the hospital, Willmouse took his walk, and Vicky had more cake in the kitchen.

When Willmouse came in he said, "Who told you Eliot was in Paris?"

"He is."

"He isn't. He's here."

"How do you know?"

"I saw him," but Willmouse seemed perplexed.

"What is the matter?" I asked him.

"It was Eliot, not in Eliot's clothes."

"You must have made a mistake."

"I don't make mistakes about clothes," said Willmouse.

He had been walking home along the bank—"You know the bit along the path where the cove is hidden in the bulrushes?"—when Eliot had appeared, walking in front of him. "And he was wearing blue, like the overalls here but trousers, and one of those striped jersey shirts."

"Eliot doesn't wear those sort of clothes," said Hester.

"I know," said Willmouse, exasperated. "That's why."

"Why?"

"Why it seems funny when he does. He went off the path just above the bulrushes where it has a side path into the wood." Willmouse wrinkled his forehead again. "Do you know it looked —— I thought —— But he couldn't have ——"

"Couldn't have what?"

"Come off the new barge." Willmouse sounded oddly sure, but what would Eliot have been doing on the Marie France?

"It wasn't Eliot," I said, and that seemed positive when Eliot came back at nine o'clock that night.

"Did you have a good day?" Mlle. Zizi asked anxiously.

"Damnably hot," said Eliot. He looked exhausted.

He had brought Vicky a box of chocolates such as we had never seen or imagined; it was a pink satin box painted with roses and tied with wide velvet ribbon. It was marked Dorat. "One of the most expensive chocolate shops in Paris," exclaimed Mme. Corbet.

"You see he was in Paris," I told Willmouse.

"Yes," said Willmouse, but he did not sound convinced.

Eliot stayed at Les Oeillets next day, but he did not sit, as he usually did, reading in the garden. First he took the Littles to see mother; when he came back he asked Hester and me if we would like to go with him into the town. We passed Joss on the riverbank but she did not turn her head, nor did Eliot say anything. In the town he bought post cards, giving them to us, and then some grapes for mother which we took to the hospital, calling on M. le Directeur, who called out, "À ce soir," when we left.

"Why 'à ce soir'?" I asked.

"He is coming tonight. There's a big dinner," said Eliot. "Didn't you know?"

"We are not told things," I said.

As soon as we got in, Eliot coaxed Mlle. Zizi out to the Giraffe. "That's three times," said Hester.

"That Eliot has gone into the town?"

"Yes. Isn't he fidgety?" said Hester.

He could not have had very much lunch, for just after twelve he came to the cove where Hester and I had taken our picnics and turned us out. "Keep away," he said. "I want to sleep."

"But we haven't eaten our picnics."

"Well, go and eat them somewhere else."

There was no one about. M. Joubert had gone in; he lunched at twelve. Joss could not accompany him; she ate her picnic humbly in the orchard; after that they both went to their rooms to sleep. Willmouse, too, after his picnic, would take a nap under his cherry tree. Vicky was still at the age when she was put to rest and was collected by Joss on her own way up. Hester and I had meant to bathe, immersing ourselves, coming out now and again in the sun, going back; the water would have been cool, but now we could not bathe.

Eliot must have divined this for he asked, "Did you want to bathe? Go to the plage."

"We should have to pay," said Hester.

Eliot laughed. "You little skinflints."

That hurt us. "Ever since we have been here," I said in a muffled voice, "we haven't had any money."

"Why not?" asked Eliot.

"Nobody has given us any. Usually we have pocket money every week," I explained.

"I'm sorry," said Eliot. "Why didn't you ask? Look. Have three weeks' now," and he took out his wallet, fat with French notes, and peeled off seven. "One for Hester, one between Vicky and Willmouse, two for Cecil and three for Joss."

We looked at them, stunned, and neither of us moved. "Take them," said Eliot; he sounded impatient, but we shook our heads. "What's the matter now?"

"It's too much," said Hester and I added, "More than a pound each."

"If I say you can have it?"

"We can't," said Hester, shocked. "You see, Vicky has sixpence, Willmouse has ninepence, I have a shilling, Cecil has two, and Joss has another arrangement." I would not have told all this, but Hester never minded exposing the family. "She has ten shillings, but she has to pay her bus fares and buy her own stamps and soap and tooth paste and handkerchiefs and stockings."

"Don't. You make me giddy," said Eliot. "Well, have this for now," but we still shook our heads.

"Look," said Eliot, "I'm tired." He did not seem tired, but . . . was it excited? Why? I wondered. "Take this." He gave us a note. "Go and bathe and we will settle the rest this evening." We still hesitated and he shouted, "Go! If anyone comes near me before five o'clock I shall skin them alive."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 78

"But you're eating a full meal—I'm just eating a salad."

60 SECONDS
WITH SATURA

STARTS A YOUNGER LOOK

Five instant aids to youthful radiance from one great moisture cream.

1. Special elements catch dew from the air to shield against drying by wind and weather.
2. Estrogenic hormones help protect against age lines and sallowness with deep, under-surface moisturizing action.
3. Humidifying formula works directly toward a young and creamy smoothness.
4. Vitamin A guards against flaking indicative of a dry or aging skin.
5. Special emollients slow evaporation from the skin to counteract the lines of age.

Smooth on dewy, pink Satura every night, and use it regularly under make-up. Disappears instantly, starts working instantly. Cream $3.50 and $5. Lotion $5. In Canada, too.

For beauty the modern way...

Dorothy Gray

Always a special need...now, for the first time

A special laxative for women!

Sure, gentle, more normal relief... even after childbirth and during menstrual periods

Constipation presents special problems to a woman.

A woman's system is complex and sensitive. It repeatedly undergoes cycles of change, during which constipation may make discomfort even more severe. So it's almost unbelievable that science never until now has developed a special laxative for woman's special needs!

But only a major medical discovery could make such a laxative possible... and today it's here. You can get it by asking for Correctol.

The secret of Correctol is a non-laxative, miracle regulator – with a wonderful, harmless action that simply softens waste. Along with this, Correctol contains just enough mild laxative to give normal regularity a gentle start.

Thus Correctol acts promptly, yet unhurriedly. It gives the relief a woman wants and needs...but it's gentle, more natural relief.

You'll want to try this new feminine laxative. So get a bottle of these tiny pink tablets today, to have when you need them. See how much better you feel with Correctol's relief. 30 tablets, only $1.00—at any drug store.

Correctol®

the first laxative especially for feminine use

ALSO AVAILABLE EVERYWHERE IN CANADA

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 76

In fairness we ought to have gone and fetched the others when we had finished our picnics, but, "They are probably asleep," said Hester. "They can go afterward. There's heaps of money," and so we went to the plage we had looked at and yearned after so often. We walked over the white bridge; we rented one of the red-and-white cabins and used all three pools and the low, the middle but not the high diving boards. I could dive, though sometimes I hit the water with a slap; Hester simply jumped off, holding her nose. It was blissfully cool and for an hour or two we were like a pair of porpoises playing. At last we came out, and after we had dressed we bought strawberry ices from the kiosk and ate them at one of the white tables. "Eliot is good!" said Hester reverently as she licked her cardboard spoon.

The ices we spun out as long as we could. "We had better not have another one, had we?" asked Hester, but in the end we had another between us. We spun that one out as well. Four o'clock struck.

Don't throw a stone into a well from which you have drunk. PROVERB

We left the plage and walked back along the bank; it was then that Hester said, "Let's creep up on Eliot."

"For what?"

"Just to love him," said Hester. Another Eastern idea of which father had told us was the taking of "darshana," that even to look on anyone good or great would feed the soul.

"He told us not to."

"How will he know?" asked Hester.

Les Oeillets had taught us to be as adept as red Indians in stealing up on what we wanted to see, and we came up to the cove without a sound. Eliot was lying, as he always lay, face downward on the sand, his length pressed into it, his head pillowed on his arms, the old cap tilted over his eyes. Behind the bulrushes we crept up on him. He was lying with his head toward us.

"Fast asleep," breathed Hester.

That must have made a sound, for he stirred, stirred and lifted his head and . . . it was not Eliot.

In Eliot's clothes, under Eliot's cap, we were looking into the face of a dark, unknown man. I do not know why it was so frightening, but for the long moment he looked we froze as rabbits do and the river seemed to be running in my ears. When his head went down again we retreated backward through the bulrushes so fast that we were covered in bulrush dust. Then we ran. We reached Joss' box and I sank down on it while Hester fell on the grass. My neck and the backs of my knees were clammy and cold; her chin was shaking.

We sat there a long while without speaking and the sun did not make us any warmer.

At last, "Do you think it could be us—after the ices?" asked Hester.

"No."

"It was another m——"

"Yes."

"Then?" The question seemed to go on and on in the hot summer air.

It was some time later that Hester looked round and said, "Hullo! Monsieur Joubert's things have gone." There was no umbrella, no easel or stool, and Joss' box, alone on the riverbank, looked small.

The light grew deeper, swallows were beginning to skim the river as they did when the insects flew down; five o'clock struck from the Hôtel de Ville and we got up to go in. As we reached the blue door it opened and Mlle. Zizi came out.

She was in white and carried a deep mauve sunshade, the color of heliotrope. She was freshly powdered and made up and her scent came to us in waves. "Are you going out?" we asked stupidly.

"Only to the cove, to meet Eliot," she told us.

We looked at each other, opened our lips and shut them.

"Why didn't you tell her?" said Hester after she had gone.

"Why didn't you?"

We did not go in, but stayed in the orchard. We talked to Willmouse, admired Miss Dawn's new hat, and played with the dogs. We did not say it to each other, but we were waiting to see, and after what seemed a long while the blue door opened again. Mlle. Zizi came through, and behind her was Eliot.

(To be Concluded)

KEEP YOUR BEAUTY IN TACT

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 61

the process of pushing furniture around to see where it looked prettiest, when my aunt arrived. Even in what might laughingly be described as her cheeriest moments, Aunt Belle views the world with the hangdog expression of a homeless basset hound. (The sun may be shining brilliantly, but Belle dwells on the drizzle we had last week.) On this day, she viewed my newly painted room with great sad brown eyes and moaned, 'All I can say is it looks like a hospital.' Then she waggled over to the coffee table, picked up my bowl of flowers, rearranged them to suit her taste and placed the bowl on the desk. 'That bowl is too big to be on that low table,' she grumbled, plumping herself down for a visit which lasted an hour but which seemed to me to be an eternity. Friends ask why I tolerate her rudeness. I do because I pity Belle. She is alone in the world and in view of her outlook it's easy, though sad, to see why."

Being a truly tactful person, having the ability to meet people and face situations with pleasant perception, is not something that comes to us, as if by magic, the instant we slip into our first formal dress or sit down to our first dinner party. The fact is that courteous manners must be practiced and polished at home before we can expect them to be dependable traveling companions, ever ready to help us in and out of other people's lives with grace and comfort. From the first long-playing tune of, "Let Susan share your toys" . . . "Serve Jamie the largest slice, he's your guest," mother and father are in the driver's seat steering their offspring this way or that toward the final destination of getting along well with others.

One way for parents to cut teaching time in half is to let their own pleasing behavior serve as a useful example. A group of young mothers were discussing the problems of bringing up children when one asked, "Julie, how do you do it? Four children, a new house and a full-time office job. Yet your family life is exemplary in every sense. In your situation, I'd go to pieces!" Julie laughed and answered, "Some mornings when I'm still half asleep and the children are tumbling over the bed wanting 'mommie' for four different reasons, and my husband is yelling from the shower, 'My pants need pressing,' I wonder myself. I close my eyes for a moment and think, 'Can I really make it this morning? Can I dress them, feed them, brush, wash, breakfast and press them and still find time for myself?' And the answer is always, not can I, but how. I can do it cheerfully, for I have to do it no matter what, or I can grouch my way through the next hectic two hours, making everyone cross and irritable. So I force myself, if necessary, into a good mood and I keep up an 'Isn't-this-a-glorious-day' attitude as I hustle all of us into action. I compliment Nancy on the way she sets the table, tell Stevie I've never seen such neatly tied shoelaces. I absolutely refuse to get flustered, even if the iron goes on the blink, or the school bus arrives just as Patty announces, 'Skirt is torn.' It may sound silly—after all, who really feels that exuberant at six-thirty or seven o'clock in the morning? But it works. We all really do work up a good mood, the mornings go pleasantly (if not smoothly!), and I feel better knowing that Bill and the children are leaving the house in a happy frame of mind." END

"perfect protection"

A girl's search for perfection just naturally takes her to Kotex —for here's the most absorbent napkin ever designed. The Kotex napkin with new Wondersoft covering protects instantly, completely. And, there's no rubbing or chafing.

Now's the time, too, to discover the new Kotex belt in its smart new package. All Kotex belts now have the new kind of self-locking clasp. This special clasp is far more comfortable than metal because it molds itself gently to your body. And, it holds the napkin securely, never lets it slip or slide.

No wonder more women
choose Kotex than all other brands

MEMO TO MOTHERS: Every year over 100,000 girls begin to menstruate before they are eleven. So it's not too soon to tell your daughter at ten. Our free booklet "You're A Young Lady Now" helps give the facts she needs to know. Write Miss Jones, Kimberly-Clark Corp., Neenah, Wis.

KOTEX and WONDERSOFT are trademarks of Kimberly-Clark Corporation

Bright Ideas . . .

for mother and daughter

Janice Harayda loves the idea of dressing like her mother—and what eight-year-old girl doesn't? Her mother likes to sew for her and finds she can fit her to perfection. Both love color and enjoy shopping for pretty fabrics. This Easter you will see them both in gray flannel suits . . . the linings and blouses are in a bright cotton print. Their quilted robes, appliquéd smocks and peasant dresses round out their mother-and-daughter plan for spring.

By NORA O'LEARY
Pattern Editor

One of Janice's hobbies is painting. Her cover-up smock buttons in the back and has ample pockets across the front. Vogue Design No. 2817, 4 to 14. Mrs. Harayda's apron smock wraps to the back and can be made full length as well. She has added chintz appliqués of fruit to both. Vogue Design No. 9121, 12 to 20.

LEOMBRUNO-BODI

Janice is shown here having her pretty blond hair brushed and wearing her quilted print cotton-satin robe completely bound in washable grosgrain. Janice's robe, Vogue Design No. 2819, 6 to 14. Mother's robe, No. 9409, S, M, L.

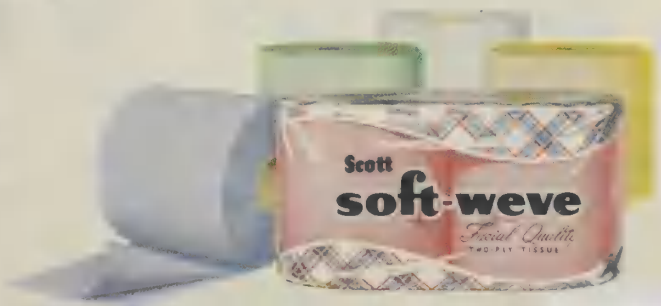
Both Mrs. Harayda and Janice will be wearing these washable gray wool-and-nylon flannel suits on Easter Sunday. Both have pleated skirts and short jackets with brass buttons. The cotton print blouses and linings are a bright contrast. Mother's suit, Vogue Design No. S-1806, 10 to 18. Child's, No. 2758, 2 to 10.

HOW AMERICA LIVES

For back and other views, sizes and prices of Vogue Patterns, see page 129. Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto, Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 5c additional for each pattern ordered.

MARGARET SOMMERFELD

Hearts and flowers in a striped design make these charming peasant dresses trimmed with coarse cotton lace. The aprons are in the same print, but in a different color. The pattern also includes sweaterlike jersey bolero jackets. Mother's dress, Vogue Design No. 9420, 12 to 18. Child's, No. 2818, 6 to 14.



Elegant silk Empress Kimono designed for Scott by Count Sarmi—pink crepe de chine lined with brocade for double luxury! Doubly luxurious, too, the matching "facial quality" Soft-Weve, Scott's superb 2-ply bath tissue. Now wrapped in cellophane to show you the lovely Soft-Weve colors.

SCOTT PAPER

Probably the most noticed luxury in your home...

Soft-Weve® by Scott

2-PLY "FACIAL QUALITY" BATH TISSUE

so safe in glass

. . . because the perfect purity of glass cannot alter the contents—and clean, pure glass forms an impenetrable barrier against outside contamination. That's why the protection of precious drugs can best be entrusted to glass. Scientists know that life-preserving drugs, like so many other things we depend on, keep extra safe in glass.

GLASS CONTAINER MANUFACTURERS INSTITUTE, 99 PARK AVE., NEW YORK

A DAY OF REST

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 50

hurried Beryl back into their room, and into dry pajamas. "You should be in bed," he told her solicitously, "resting."

After a while, the ice in her veins thawed somewhat, and she began to grow sleepy. Not much damage had been done, she reflected thankfully; the dining-room ceiling had been spared this time.

Kathy crept in, a chastened and white-faced culprit, who disarmed her mother completely by bursting into tears. "It was my fault, mom. I forgot to turn off the water—and I meant to leave the bathroom all nice and clean, so you'd be proud of me." She wept bitterly, dabbing at her eyes with the hem of the sheet. "I'm always doing such clumsy, dumb things!"

Beryl pressed a handkerchief into Kathy's hand, forgetting entirely the scolding she had been grimly preparing all during the mopping-up operations. Suddenly, miraculously, the barrier of years was gone, and she was thirteen again, awkward and uncertain, with arms and legs that had grown too long for comfort. She hugged the sobbing child. "Why, honey, I am proud of you! Don't cry so, Kathy."

But Kathy cried forlornly for a long time, her mother's arms close around her. "I—I don't know what's the matter," she stammered thickly. "It's just that I feel sad, somehow."

Beryl stroked her daughter's hair gently. "I know. Someone once said that tears are 'white bleeding'—you just had to get it out of your system." The loneliness of growing up, she meant. The strange nostalgia for a childhood so recently left behind, the eager reaching toward maturity. The sense of being stranded, halfway between.

Kathy roused herself finally, smiled mistily at her mother, gulped, "You're swell, mom."

A crash and a thud in the hallway brought Kathy to her feet, her eyes wide with horror. "Oh, golly, mom—I left your breakfast tray on the top step ——" She fled, banging against the doorjamb with her elbow. Beryl knew she was crying again as she ran down the hall to where the twins, with much shouting, were gathering up the remains of the tray.

Beryl lay staring out the window for a long time after Kathy left. Thirteen was a hard age to live with, she thought, but it was much harder to live through. She began planning a spring outfit for Kathy. One of those dresses with the swirling skirts, for grace; shoes with little French heels, for dignity.

The breakfast tray, when it finally arrived, was a triumph. A frosty glass of orange juice, a cup of perfect coffee, toast triangles, and a soft-boiled egg in a fragile pink cup. "Why, Marge," she said to her eldest daughter, "I didn't know you could cook like this!"

Margy's face was a thundercloud. "Mrs. Arkwright's downstairs, bossing everything. Mother, did you, or did you not, say I could bathe the baby?" She tossed her hair back in a gesture Beryl found familiar, but could not quite place. Some movie star, probably. Margy's roles were many and varied.

"Why ——" Beryl considered the problem gravely. Diplomacy of the highest order was required here.

"Because Old Lady Arkwright is planning to give him a bath in the kitchen sink. Imagine, right in with the pots and pans, of all the sordid ideas!"

"I expect she'd take the pots and pans out first," said Beryl mildly. "But I'll tell you—why don't you bring Suzie and Dickie upstairs, and I'll bathe the baby in the bathinet while you give Suzie her bath in the tub." Margy's face was still mutinous, so Beryl added hastily, "We could run through the play while we're scrubbing the babies."

Margy brightened. "Oh, would you, mother? I've been wanting someone to go over it with me. But shouldn't you stay in bed?" she added, belatedly concerned. "Dad said you should."

Beryl flung back the covers and reached for her robe. "I'll get back as soon as we're through."

The babies were bathed to Shakespeare's music. It was fun, Beryl decided, and most companionable. She rather fancied herself as Romeo. "But soft (No, no, Dickie, not in your mouth!), what light through yonder window breaks (Hand me that jar, will you, Marge)?" The babies liked it too. Dickie cooed and kicked, sending water flying in an arc all over his mother's robe. Suzie sang "M-i-c-k-e-y M-o-u-s-e" and dangled a dripping washcloth over the side of the tub.

The bathroom was mopped dry again, and the babies settled off for their morning naps. Beryl climbed back into bed and adjusted her pillow. There'd be time for a nice nap before luncheon.

She switched on her bedside radio, the dance music turned low. Her headache was gone, but her throat still felt raw. I really should take an aspirin, she thought, yawning. It hardly seemed worth the effort.

Mrs. Arkwright loomed tall in the doorway. "Did you tell them twins they could make fudge?" She glowered at her employer. "Panocha fudge," she further enlarged, as if that compounded the felony.

"Good heavens, no!" Beryl snapped off the radio and sat up, the pillows bunched behind her back. "Tell them absolutely no fudge today!"

Mrs. Arkwright leaned precariously over the railing. "No fudge!" she bellowed. Then in her normal tone, "Sick, huh, Miz Oliver? How many will this make—lessee, there's Margy and Kathy and the twins ——"

"No, no," Beryl hastened to correct her, "it isn't that, really! Just a cold, and I'm feeling much better. but Mr. Oliver felt I should stay in bed."

Mrs. Arkwright looked unconvinced. "Well, maybe. Still, babies sometimes start that way, with a little case of sniffles."

Beryl wondered where Mrs. Arkwright had studied biology. "It's just a cold," she repeated firmly.

A call from downstairs sent Mrs. Arkwright to the railing again. "What's that, Margy?" she shouted.

"I'm calling the grocer. Ask mom if she needs anything."

Still hanging dizzily over the railing, Mrs. Arkwright bellowed lustily at Beryl, "Margy wants to know if you want anything at the store."

"I heard her. Why, yes—ask her first to look in the back hall. The milkman was supposed to leave some eggs today."

In a voice undiminished in volume, Mrs. Arkwright passed on the query. There was an interval of peace. Mrs. Arkwright examined her fingernails and hummed nasally.

"O.K., there're two dozen here, and a quart of buttermilk, of all the sordid things! What else does mom want?"

Mrs. Arkwright opened her mouth to relay the message, but Beryl had already slipped on her robe. "Tell her never mind. I'll call Mrs.

NECESSARY EVIL

By JANET HENRY

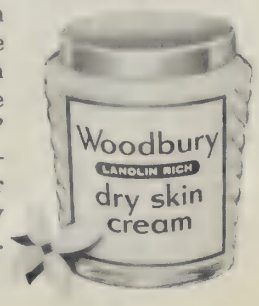
My stand is firm and resolute
On letting children watch TV;
It's just a parent's substitute
For his responsibility.

It undermines the family ties,
Discounts ideals that should be taught.
It stoops the shoulders, strains the eyes,
Disparages creative thought.

But halfway through the day I find
Without it I would lose my mind.

New deep moisturizing discovery

Stops Dry Skin Problems in these 5 "Danger Zones"



★ Frown lines!
★ Crow's feet!
★ Flaky patches!
★ Expression lines!
★ Crepey throat!

Now flood precious moisture deeper into your dry lined skin. Age-revealing "danger zones" become less apparent as your skin drinks in the rich benefits of Woodbury Dry Skin Cream. Skin looks, feels smoother.

Woodbury's new deeper moisturizing and deeper softening ingredients help smooth and freshen skin where the look of age strikes! Its remarkable blend of skin softeners and rich, beauty-giving lanolin penetrates deeper than ever before!

Woodbury Dry Skin Cream is a moisturizing cleanser as well as a superb skin softener. Use it for seven days. See "danger zones" become "beauty zones" or your money back! 25¢ to $1.

WOODBURY LANOLIN RICH DRY SKIN CREAM

Glutz myself. There are some things I need for dinner."

The telephone call involved a dissertation on spring colds, and a detailed account of Mrs. Glutz's harrowing adventures in the dentist's chair, where she had recently parted with what she proudly referred to as an "unpacked wisdom tooth." When Beryl at last succeeded in getting her grocery list across, the babies were awake again. It took Margy, Kathy and Mrs. Arkwright to prepare a bottle for Dickie and invest him with clean diapers. The sky had cleared and the twins, with many admonishments from Mrs. Arkwright and the girls, wheeled Suzie off for a ride in her stroller.

Quiet took possession of the house. Beryl swallowed experimentally. Her throat was much better. She picked up a magazine from the bedside table, turned pages idly, yawned. The house was so silent, almost as if it were the middle of the night. Unconsciously she listened for children's voices, but heard only the fusty, busy murmuring of the clock and the dreary swish of tree branches against the house.

Somewhere a door banged. There was a sudden rush of footsteps, a muffled, whimpering cry.

Beryl was running, stumbling down the endless hall, the slippery stairs. She was in the kitchen, reaching blindly for Suzie—dazed, frightened Suzie, on whose soft forehead a hideous purple bump was forming. Mud smeared her new pink coat, her hands and plump round legs.

Both the twins were sobbing out their story, turn and turn about.

"She stood up in the stroller, mom." Dusty's face was paper-white, the freckles stood out on his snub nose like tiny gold coins.

"And before we could catch her, she fell. It knocked her out for a minute." Bruce leaned against his mother's shoulder, she could feel the trembling all along the slim length of him. "We couldn't catch her, mom." He sniffled into the kitchen towel, leaving streaks of dirt across its whiteness. Margy wept in sympathy with her brothers. Mrs. Arkwright leaned against the sink and complained of feeling faint.

But it was Kathy who brought the bowl of ice cubes, and whose firm, suddenly capable hand held a cold compress to Suzie's forehead. "I called Doctor Curtis. He'll be over before he goes into his office. In about fifteen minutes, his wife said." She lifted the compress and examined the bump. "I don't think it's anything, mom. It just looks bad, and she's so little."

Doctor Curtis confirmed her diagnosis when he came strolling in, a half hour later. He lifted one eyebrow when he saw Beryl in pajamas. "Good grief!" he said softly, under his breath. "How old is Dickie, anyway?"

"It's just a cold!" Beryl told him crossly. "I don't know why I can't have a common cold, just like anyone else."

"You can," conceded the doctor, with cheerful unconcern. "Feel free!"

He distributed sticks of gum to the twins, patted Suzie's cheek and praised Kathy's coolheadedness. "You'll make a good nurse someday, Kathy girl. A fine nurse!"

Beryl forgave him everything when she saw the glow in her tall daughter's eyes.

"As for you," he told Beryl, at parting, "you should be in bed, resting. Only way to lick these spring colds."

Mrs. Arkwright declared herself as being "too shook up" to cook lunch. Beryl sent Dusty upstairs for her robe and slippers, tied on an apron and whipped up a cheese omelet. The twins wanted cocoa, so she made enough for everyone. Margy toasted bread with the air of a tragedy queen, and Kathy set the table, breaking a plate in the process, and upsetting the bottle of catchup. In the midst of the activity Stephen called.

"You sound better," he told her. "But stay in bed, anyway. A little extra rest won't hurt you a bit."

Beryl made no mention of the events of the morning. After all, Stephen had only an hour for lunch.

She fed Suzie her baked potato and lamb chop. Below the darkening bruise, the innocent baby eyes looked up at her. "Mom-mom-mom," she crooned, joyously banging her high-chair tray with her curved silver spoon. Beryl kissed her.

The twins were clumsily clearing the table. Margy scraped plates with an air that said, more clearly than words, how sordid she found the task to be. Mrs. Arkwright was lying down on the living-room sofa, a cold cloth on her head. "If you'll just close the door," she called as Beryl passed. "Them twins is enough to wake the dead."

"Why don't you go on home, Mrs. Arkwright? The girls can manage all right now."

"What, and leave you with all this on your hands—sick like you are and who knows what all?" Mrs. Arkwright's tone was shocked. "Why, I wouldn't do that to a dawg! No, I'll just lay here a minute, kind of pulling myself together, then I'll be up and at 'em again." With the competent air of one who leaves no stone unturned, she adjusted the pillow under her head and composed herself for slumber.

Beryl tucked Suzie into bed, peeked in at the angelically sleeping baby, and went back to her own room. The rain had started up again, the bare trees looked dark against a sky grown leaden and heavy. She smoothed the bed, pulling the sheets taut, and turned back the blanket invitingly. With the babies both asleep the afternoon stretched ahead, golden and idle.

The telephone shrilled, next to her bed. She replaced the receiver noiselessly when she heard a young, uncertain male voice say, "That you, Margy? Say, Marge ——"

A few magazine pages later, the twins shot into the room and disappeared, as one boy, under the bed. Kathy's feet thundered on the stairs. Once more Beryl got into her robe and slippers, hauled her sons from their hide-out, and marched them through the door to settle with their accusers.

Afterward, Mrs. Arkwright looked pathetically at Beryl. "I don't know about you, but I could stand a nice hot cup of tea."

"Make mine coffee," said Beryl. "Strong and black."

Margy hung up the telephone receiver as they came into the kitchen. "Have you been talking to that same boy all this time?" Beryl measured coffee into the percolator with a lavish hand.

"Rupert Bagley." Marge stared dreamily out the window. "His mother plays the violin and his father went to school with Senator Armbrugh."

"My!" Beryl was properly impressed.

"Is he that tall boy with the Adam's apple, that wears sideburns?" asked Kathy interestedly. She spread applesauce thickly on a slice of bread, bit into it, chewed thoughtfully. "Because if he is, he's a drip."

"He is not a drip! And what's more, he asked me to go to a movie tonight. In his father's new car."

Mrs. Arkwright stirred her tea, her eyes fixed on space. "It was at the moving pictures I first met Mr. Arkwright. He had on an ice-cream suit, and one of them straw skimmers ——"

Beryl relaxed, sipping her coffee. It was snug in the kitchen, with the rain sluicing down outside. She glanced at the kitchen clock. Four-thirty. She patted back a yawn, considered the supper menu. Chipped beef on toast, she decided, and scalloped corn. There was plenty of ice cream in the freezer, and the children could have cones if they wanted them.

The twins came in, each with a baby in his arms. "They were both crying," they explained virtuously, "so we changed their diapers, and brought them down."

Beryl fed the new baby orange juice, cuddling him in her arms. His minikin soft hand clung to her thumb with a surprising strength, his wide eyes never left her face. "Bum," she said tenderly, browsing kisses along his fluff of hair.

Mrs. Arkwright lifted Suzie to her lap and poured more tea. "Thirty-one years ago tomorrow, we was married." She was still in a reminiscent mood. "Stood up in my mother's little parlor in the Bronx." She sighed gustily. "Yep, thirty-one years; don't seem possible. Seventeenth of March, and warm as June ——"

Beryl set her cup down hastily. "The seventeenth! Tomorrow?"

Mrs. Arkwright consulted the wall calendar. "Says so right there—Sunday, March seventeen."

Beryl handed the baby to Kathy, and stood up. "Then Cousin Alma and Harold are coming for supper tonight! I asked them a week ago and completely forgot it until this minute."

Mrs. Arkwright emptied the teapot into her cup. "Call'm up and say you're sick. It's no day for traveling, anyway."

Beryl was distractedly examining the contents of the refrigerator. "I can't. Alma's so sensitive she'd never get over it. Anyway, they've probably started by now."

"Well, I'll stay and cook supper, providin' you keep that woman out of my kitchen." Mrs. Arkwright rattled pans capably. "Him, I like. But her! Pokin' around here, puttin' herbs into my good roast every time I turn my back ——"

"I'll keep her away! And you're an angel, to help me out like this."

Within the next hour they accomplished miracles. The boys ran to the butcher's. The vacuum whined, dustcloths were run swiftly over the visible surfaces of the furniture, clutter was swept out of sight. Beryl showered, dressed, ran a comb through her hair, superintended the twins' baths, zipped Kathy's dress, telephoned the greengrocer to order celery, dressed Suzie in a fresh pink pinafore, and slipped a clean flannel nightie over the baby's head.

At five-twenty-nine she sat down in the living room to catch her breath. Promptly at five-thirty, Cousin Alma and Harold arrived.

"We almost didn't come"—Cousin Alma kissed Kathy and Margy, and looked around for the twins—"what with the rain, and all. But I said to Harold, here you were expecting us, and going to no end of trouble, and I just couldn't disappoint you." She captured the twins and kissed them resoundingly.

"I'm so glad you did come." Beryl led the way into the living room. "We're having veal cutlets, just the way you like them, Harold, and apple pie." Her tone was the composed one of the housewife whose household machinery runs on greased wheels.

"You always do things so nicely," beamed Cousin Alma.

One of the twins' model airplanes was protruding slightly from under Beryl's chair. She pushed it out of sight with her foot. "Why, thank you, Alma. It's nice of you to say so."

The girls moved softly around in the dining room, setting the table. In the kitchen, Mrs. Arkwright hummed. The fragrance of spice, and of browning meat, drifted in whenever the door was opened. The twins sat together in a big chair, angelically reading from the same book. Suzie flirted with Harold through the bars of her playpen, and the baby smiled his wide toothless grin at Alma.

"Such a lovely family," she sighed. "So well behaved and adjusted to the group." Alma, who had no child at all to raise, was currently studying child psychology.

Stephen came in, his shoulders spattered with raindrops. He had brought home yellow daffodils. He shook hands with Harold, accepted Alma's kiss. "How're you feeling?" he asked Beryl.

"Why, I'm just fine, dear," she assured him in a bright social tone, but with a slight movement of head and tiny warning frown.

He nodded cheerfully, not getting her message. "You never looked better. Took it easy all day, didn't you?" His eyes approved of her. To Harold and Alma, he explained, "Beryl had a little cold this morning and I made her stay in bed and rest. Only thing that'll cure them!"

Harold nodded judicially. "Rest, and take an aspirin every four hours."

"Orange juice," added Alma; "and a hot footbath is good too."

They filed out to the dining room, and Beryl sank gratefully into her chair. With any luck at all, she should be able to relax for a little while. She looked around at them all: Kathy and Margy, their eyes shining in the candle glow; the twins, brushed and unwontedly neat; Suzie, whose hair drifted over the ugly bruise, concealing it; the baby, propped on pillows, one fist aimlessly waving. Her eyes met Stephen's across the table and they smiled at each other.

They bowed their heads, and she spoke from the fullness of her heart: "Dear Lord, we thank Thee for this food, and for this day ——"

END

Treat your children to a real Italian-style meal... CHEF BOY-AR-DEE® Beefaroni

Tender macaroni, juicy beef, rich, tangy tomato-cheese sauce... just as Italian children might be eating it near Rome. Grown-ups love it too...for lunch, for dinner, for company snacks. And it costs about 13¢ a serving! Get some today.

Now available in Canada

Conversation piece

DI PIETRO

The dessert, thin French pancakes with a creamy filling and delicious raspberry sauce, may be served from a chafing dish in the living room.

In February, a heavenly, hearty French soup and an incomparable dessert are the basics for a wonderful party!

By RUTH MILLS TEAGUE

In many parts of the country the weather in February is nothing to brag about—in fact, it's often worse than that—but it's a fine time to get together with our friends and make with the merry. We can ignore the weather if we're in a congenial group with plenty of good talk and delicious food to enjoy. Here's a meal that fits this program and won't put too great a strain on the hostess—mainly because practically everything can be made in advance.

The hors d'oeuvre will be marinated mushroom caps filled with salmon or chicken salad. With these we can serve something crisp, a bowl of toasted mixed cereals and nuts, as a taste contrast. The main dish is bouillabaisse, but a version different from the bouillabaisse we encounter in fine restaurants here and abroad. The ingredients are the same (except that availability must be considered), but the shells of the various sea foods have been removed. This is for me, and unless you're a purist on this subject I think you'll agree. As excellent as this famous dish is, it's a messy chore to eat when the succulent morsels are encased in shells. With the bouillabaisse we'll have garlic French bread and a crisp salad of shredded celery cabbage (Chinese cabbage), raw-cauliflower flowerets and pimientos tossed with French dressing. And there's the main course. The dessert, crêpes aux framboises, is something of a do, but truly a chef-d'oeuvre and well worth a little effort. It is French pancakes filled with a mixture of cream and cottage cheese, rolled and served hot with hot raspberry sauce and very cold sour cream. Doesn't this sound good? Well, it is, I assure you.

We'll plan for eight people.

STUART

A steaming tureen of hot bouillabaisse, full of succulent lobster chunks, shrimp and scallops. A crisp salad of cabbage and crunchy cauliflowerets, and savory garlic bread, make a really sublime meal!

MUSHROOM CAPS FILLED WITH SALMON SALAD

Get medium-size mushrooms, allowing at least 2 to each person. Remove stems; wash and peel caps and put them in a marinade of ½ cup of vinegar, ¾ cup water, 1 teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon sugar and 3 tablespoons grated onion. Shake well, store in refrigerator and repeat shaking occasionally. This should be done the morning of the party day. The stems can be used for mushroom soup or in a sauce for steak or other meat. Drain a 7¾-ounce can red salmon; remove bones and skin and mash with a fork. Combine with ⅔ cup celery, ¼ cup onion, 3 tablespoons sweet-pickle sticks and 3 hard-cooked eggs, all very finely chopped. Season with

CONTINUED ON PAGE 151

MAKE IT A DINNER TO REMEMBER...

Make FRENCH'S
Crown o' gold Meat Loaf

Crown o' gold Meat Loaf

1½ cups fine soft bread crumbs
1½ lbs. ground lean chuck beef
4 egg yolks
1½ tsps. salt
2 tbsps. French's Mustard
1½ tbsps. prepared horseradish
3 tbsps. finely diced green pepper
2 tbsps. French's Minced Onion
⅓ cup ketchup

Crown o' gold Topping

4 egg whites
¼ tsp. French's Cream Tartar
4 tbsps. French's Mustard

High . . . Gold . . . and Handsome . . . Here's a brand-new meat loaf idea with a savory, golden topping. Mix bread crumbs with the meat. Combine remaining ingredients. Blend into meat-bread mixture. Pack lightly into a 9-inch casserole and bake in a moderate oven (325°) 30 minutes. To make topping: beat egg whites until foamy; add cream tartar; continue beating until very stiff. Fold in mustard gently. Swirl on hot meat; return to oven; bake 20 to 25 minutes longer or until crown is tipped with brown. Makes 6 to 8 servings.

Friendly warning: Because French's Mustard is made with rare spices, specially grown mustard seeds and finest vinegar, it has a special flavor, texture and color all its own. Don't expect the best results from this recipe with any other mustard.

On food . . . In food

no other mustard has the light and lively flavor of

FRENCH'S MUSTARD

THE TROUBLED HOUSE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 44

The house the Kings had leased was one of those big old English types, high and dark and surrounded by an iron fence. I parked the car and walked up the crushed-stone drive.

I lifted the ornate bronze knocker and somewhere inside a dog barked. An instant later the heavy door swung open. "Yes?" She was tiny against that huge dark door, golden-tanned, with pale, soft-looking hair piled high and twisted back in a knot. "What is it, please?"

"Mr. King telephoned me this morning ——"

"Why, yes!" She smiled, stepping back, opening the door wide. "You're Beth, aren't you? How nice of you to come! The Bannisters have told us so much about you. I'm Fredrika King. Rika, everybody calls me." An exquisite figure in her dark green toreador pants, she drew me into the cool dimness of the big hall. "Stan's expecting you."

Her thin silver bracelets jingled softly as she led me through the high dim hall, going to the right of the open stairway, passing a room with an enormous television set squatting on the floor, on into a room much larger, brighter, lined with bookcases. "We were just saying how lucky it was Stan had to telephone Lew on business this morning." She waved me to the leather couch. "Stan happened to mention he could use some help, and right away Lew thought of you. Almost as if it were planned somehow, you know? Your quitting your job, I mean, and coming here."

"I grew up here," I told her. "I'm visiting my sister."

"Lucky you. I always wished I had a sister." She sank down gracefully at the other end of the couch. "Lew Bannister hated to lose you, you know. We could tell the way he talked to Stan on the phone this morning. How could you bear to leave?"

"I wanted to get away. Too long in one place, I guess."

"Too long in New York?" She shook her head. "I can't imagine that. I don't think I'll ever get used to country living."

"Maybe you haven't been here long enough."

"We've been here exactly four months, two weeks and one day."

I smiled. "That's not long."

"It's more than half my married life." But she smiled back at me. "To tell the truth, it has been kind of fun. After Stan got the incinerator incinerating again, and the water softener working—no matter what it is, animals or machines or somebody's old-fashioned kitchen appliance, he always makes it work. It must be the engineer in him."

"Nice for you."

"And nice for our friends too. Well, anyway, I'm not sorry we came here. It's done him a world of good. He was so tired and irritable for a while; couldn't write, couldn't sleep, couldn't get along with his friends"—she looked at me—"not even Lew Bannister, can you imagine?"

I shook my head. "No, I can't."

"Well, that's how bad it was. So when he got the idea of leaving, of coming here ——"

I nodded, watching her. Such utter perfection, the heart-shaped face so smoothly golden, the wide gray eyes tilted like a kitten's at the corners. "Someday," I said, "you'll probably be just like the rest of us here." I quoted the old quote: "New York is all right to visit, but I wouldn't want to live there."

She laughed. "That's exactly how I feel about this place, but I hope you're right. I don't know why it is; New York has always been the place for me. I can remember when I was little. My family had a summer place in Maine, huge, as I remember, high up on the rocks with a veranda that went all around it, jutting out over the cliff in front. And there were a million stone steps down to the rocks below, with an iron-pipe handrail. Friends came from all over the country to visit us there, and they raved about the coolness and the clean cold water. But did I like it?" She shook her head. "All I could think about was getting back to the city. I loved the excitement and all the people and the wonderful places to go. But maybe if you came I wouldn't be thinking about going back so much."

She's lonely, I thought. I said, "The only work I've ever done has been in a law office."

"Then for you this will be a snap." Suddenly she was anxious. "Or did you mean you might not like it here?"

"Oh, no, it isn't that, Mrs. ——"

"Rika." She was still looking at me anxiously. "Please call me Rika."

"Rika," I repeated. "What I meant was that maybe your husband won't ——"

"Oh, yes, he will," she said. "I worked for him once myself, before we were married. It was for only three months, but if he hired me he'll certainly hire you."

She changed the subject, lightly, easily, mentioning people she had known in New York, the things she and her Stan had done together. Perhaps, as rumor had it, he was cruel to her, but she obviously was very much in love with him.

I only half listened, watching her, fascinated. Always before, when I had seen a face I would like to paint, if only I could paint, the hands did not go with it, or the legs did not, or perhaps there was a thickness at the waist or shoulders. Here was perfection. Why had someone not discovered it? Then I thought, But someone has; Stanley King has.

"—— wonderful place for children," Rika King was saying. "She loves the pool and there's a place now for all the pets she wants—and then of course there are all those children up and down the road to play with. Debbie's especially fond of the Benson twins ——"

"Debbie?"

"Yes, Debbie. And you haven't heard a word I've said, have you?" She laughed. "Oh, you might as well confess. I'll —— Oh ——"

The breath seemed to go out of her. The laughter disappeared from her face. I followed her eyes to the door.

"Sorry," he said, "I didn't mean to interrupt." He was tall and lean and dark, and he was wearing jeans and a T shirt and, except for startling blue eyes, he was the homeliest man I had ever seen. He did not smile, but something in the long face seemed to change, and I got the impression that he was surprised to see Rika and me together there. "I lost track of the time," he went on, "but I suppose it's still early. I'm expecting someone around two-thirty."

"I know who you're expecting." Rika got up and ran toward him, slipping her arm through his. "This is Beth, Stan. You thought she was one of the neighbors come to call, didn't you, darling?"

"If I did, I should have known better." His arm did not tighten on the slim golden one through his, and he did not smile back. "Why didn't you call me?"

Her smile faded. "You're always so busy. I didn't think you'd mind if we sat here and talked until you ——"

"Talked." The lean jaw tightened. "Oh, sure." Moving away from her, expressionless, he went to the big desk. "This won't take long." He stood there, obviously waiting for her to go. "Will you close the doors, please?"

She hesitated, and then, as appealing as a lonely child, drew the great doors together.

I stood up uncertainly, looking around the long paneled room at the handsome tables and leathered chairs. What a room to work in, to read in!

"Do you want to sit there, or would you like to come over here?"

Courtesy or sarcasm? I moved around the end of the couch toward the desk. "No, over there will be fine."

It was the way she left us that made me sure the interview would not be a success. Not that Stanley King was not polite enough as he came around to place the chair for me in front of the desk, as he moved back to the one behind it.

But the brilliant blue eyes, such a contrast to the thin dark face and the close-cropped black hair, were withdrawn, watchful. The voice that had seemed so easy and friendly on the telephone was cool and impersonal now.

I thought, He knows I am still thinking about his wife, about the way his cold words changed her, took all her laughter away.

"Do you like children?" he asked abruptly.

"Yes. At least most of them, most of the time."

"What do you mean by that?"

"I shouldn't have said it that way. Yes, I like children."

"But why did you say it that way? Most of them, most of the time."

"I don't know; I was just being honest, I guess. I don't think anybody likes everybody all the time, even if they are children."

Was there a flicker of something in those cold bright eyes? He said, "Have you had much experience with them?"

"Quite a bit. My sister has five. I grew up in her house."

"Any girls?"

"They're all girls."

He looked at me thoughtfully. "With all those girls in your family, you'd certainly be able to spot a child who isn't quite normal if you saw one, wouldn't you?" He stretched sideways in his chair, reaching into the back pocket of his jeans for cigarettes. "It wouldn't take you long to tell if there was something seriously wrong with a child, emotionally or otherwise, would it?"

"I don't know. It's hard to tell."

"You're familiar with normal, well-adjusted children. You've seen a lot of them ——"

I frowned a little, hesitating. A spoiled child, my sister had said. "If you're troubled about . . . anything, I think you should consult somebody who is qualified to ——" He had the coldest blue eyes I had ever seen. "Lew Bannister could help you," I said quickly. "He'd be sure to know the very best."

"Lew doesn't think we need that kind of help, any more than I do."

I thought, Then what are you worried about?

"I understand you swim quite well," he said.

"I used to. I taught lifesaving at Camp Wilderness for seven years."

He nodded, and somehow I knew that not one of my answers was news to him. Lew, of course. So why had he bothered to ask?

My gaze wandered past the man across from me to the windows beyond him, to the wide sill where two little dolls about eight inches high were sitting. When I looked back at him, I saw he had been watching me.

"Do you like dogs?" he asked.

"Yes. I don't know much about them, but I like them, yes."

"That's good, because that's important here."

He was perfectly serious. Hiding my bewilderment, I looked down at the desk between us. Was I, I wondered, being employed as a secretary and typist? Or as a baby sitter and keeper of the pets?

It was I who brought up my business qualifications, my references.

"No need to go into that," he said. "I know all about you." Then he hesitated. "Maybe you'll want to think this over. Whatever you do for me will be pretty routine."

"I take dictation," I suggested.

"Yes, I know. I work best this way"—he gestured toward the clipped piles of yellow paper with their neat scrawls and blacked-out spaces.

I waited, glancing again at the little dolls on the wide window sill behind him.

"I need a part-time secretary," he said, "and my daughter needs a companion. Lew tells me you're exactly the one for us both."

"Sometimes Lew overestimates me."

"No, I don't think he ever did." Nice words, but how cold; how formal. "There's just one thing."

I looked at him.

"No matter what you're doing, if you think my daughter needs you, I want you to forget everything and everybody but her. Never mind me or the work I might have for you, or anything anybody else says. She's the important one. Do you understand?"

He was a tricky one. I never would have answered an ad for a nursemaid. On the other hand, I was curious. And I could always quit.

"All right," I said. "I understand."

"One other thing ——"

"Yes?"

"I want you to live here."

I hesitated. "I'm only ten miles away."

"That's the most important part," Stanley King said. "You've got to be here to see. Work or not, it's up to you. But I want you to live right here."

"Your little girl, you mean?"

"Debbie, yes. My little girl."

"All right," I said again. What did it matter where I lived?

Going back down the drive to my brother-in-law's car, I found myself thinking not of Debbie, the little girl, nor of my new living quarters, not even of the rather startling salary I was to get. All I could think of was Fredrika and Stanley King. Rika and her lovely expressive face, and her husband who had not smiled once. He was the man who had become famous because his books were full of clever fun and unexpected touches of tenderness. But he had been cold and not noticeably polite to his wife.

And he had not smiled even once.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 91

WE NEED YOUR HELP!

PLEASE . . . Include your city postal-zone number in your address when writing us about your present subscription,

renewing your subscription.

ordering new subscriptions.

questions concerning any of the Curtis magazines.

This will help us to handle your order or answer your question more quickly. If you have a postal-zone number, use it—always!

We have pledged to the Post Office Department that we will co-operate with them to help achieve the most economical and efficient means possible of delivering your magazines to you.

In order that we may co-operate with the Post Office Department in this endeavor we must include the zone number for each subscriber's address in zoned cities.

So, help yourself to better service by always using your zone number!

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
INDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA 5, PENNSYLVANIA

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 88

I had expected, I suppose, that when I returned to the King house with my luggage the following evening I would be greeted by one of the Kings. Instead there was a sallow-faced woman in a maroon cotton-knit suit who introduced herself as Mrs. Bales, and a fat golden cocker spaniel that barked peevishly as it came waddling from the back of the house.

"All right, Trix. All right." The white-haired woman did not look down, but the dog immediately subsided. "She isn't feeling well, poor thing. Here, let me ——" She reached for my armful of books. "I'll take you up and help you get settled." Turning, she almost fell over the dog. "Back in the kitchen, Trix."

The cocker sat, spinning her stub of a tail, her golden eyes pleading.

"Is she yours?"

"Oh, no. Theoretically she belongs to us all. Actually she is Debbie's, and Debbie's alone."

She took me through the hall into a pleasant room done mostly in pale yellows, high-ceilinged, with tall windows. "Stanley had to go to Wilmington—some article he's working on—and tomorrow he'll be in New York."

"Will he be gone long?"

"He expects to be back tomorrow night, but he wasn't really sure. He still does a lot of work for the industrial magazines."

"Is Mrs. King here?"

"Yes, but she's lying down."

I was disappointed a little. "Perhaps I'll see her later on this evening."

"I doubt it." Mrs. Bales went over to the two doors on the right, opening them. "This is your bath . . . and this is your closet." She stepped in, snapped the light on and off. "I hope you have everything you need."

"I'm sure I have, thank ——" I lifted my head. Was somebody crying?

"Debbie will be in to see you as soon as she can manage it," Mrs. Bales said. "Right now she's taking a bath, but she's been waiting for you ever since dinner. As soon as she's finished with her bath ——"

I was sure of it. Somewhere in the house someone was crying.

This time Mrs. Bales heard. She paused, her face tightening, all pleasantness gone. Without a word she reached for the door.

"Is anything the matter?" I asked. "Has something happened?"

"No. Nothing unusual."

"But isn't—is someone ill?"

Out in the hall now, Mrs. Bales turned to look at me, her mouth grim. "No. No one is ill." Then just before she closed the door she said, "You'll get used to it."

I started to unpack, uncomfortable, still hearing the weeping. I moved around my room noisily, trying not to listen. It was not a child—that I knew. It was a woman and she was crying not in pain but in some deep, terrible grief. Was someone with her? I wondered. Was someone comforting her?

I went over to the small bedside radio and turned it on low. Whoever she was, whatever had happened, the weeping woman obviously did not know there was an outsider close by.

I hung up my dresses, still seeing Mrs. Bales as she had paused there at my door, all pleasantness gone from that plain face.

There was a sound outside my room, then the click of a latch. I turned to watch my door slowly opening.

"Hi." The dark-eyed little girl peering around the edge of it grinned, her teeth gleaming big and square and white in her thin, tanned face. "I know I'm supposed to knock, but I heard your radio, and anyway I knew you were unpacking, not undressing or anything."

"Well, hi yourself," I replied. "Come on in, Debbie."

"Thank you." Her sheer, little-girl housecoat swirling, she turned to push the door closed, looking at me over her shoulder. "I've been wondering what you looked like."

"Me too." I smiled. "And you look exactly as I thought you would."

"Do I?" Pleased, she came over to me at the bureau, peering down into the drawer I was arranging.

"Will you bring me the hankies and scarves, please?"

She trotted over to the suitcase on the bed, and brought them to me. "Aunt Isobel said she is going to call you Beth. May I too?"

"I want you to. Who's Aunt Isobel?"

"Mrs. Bales. She's not my real aunt; she's daddy's. She takes care of me." From that other room came the sound of weeping again. Debbie flicked her dark eyes up to see if I had noticed, then looked intently down into the drawer. "There's a pretty hanky," she said quickly, "that pink one."

"If you like it, I insist right this minute that you have it." The cries grew louder, too loud now to be ignored, even pretending. "Who is that, Debbie?"

She looked away from me. "Rika."

"What's the matter? Why is she crying?"

"Because daddy wouldn't take her with him."

"Oh, surely it must ——" I caught myself. I reached out for the pink handkerchief and tucked it in the pocket of her pink housecoat. "Your daddy tells me you like to swim."

She nodded. "We have a pool." Carefully, seemingly oblivious of the weeping, she added one more silk scarf to the neat folded pile. "Did you know my dog is going to have puppies?"

"No. But, thinking it over, I'm really not surprised."

"Because she's fat, you mean?"

"Yes. I guess I really don't know much about dogs."

"I didn't either until we had Trix. But the more you get to know about dogs, the more you like them. Doc Benson said people are like that about a lot of things, other people even. Trix is his patient now. He's the one who told us she had to get all grown up before she got pregnant. Daddy and I took her through two times before this last one. The first two weren't bad because we were way up high in the apartment, but this last one was awful." She shook her head. "Here Trixie was, engaged to one of the Benson dogs, and here were all these other ones coming around all the time. One—he was a big one, a collie—he even put his paws up on the window sill and looked in our kitchen window. It's like courting, Doc Benson says. We had to be awful careful."

"I can imagine."

"Rika forgot and one night she let Trixie out when that collie was here," the little girl said. "She and daddy had an awful fight. I heard them. He said she did it on purpose, and she cried and cried." She turned to look at me. "Did daddy show you the nursery he built?"

"No. I'd like to see it."

"I'll take you down after. Trixie used to go swimming with me. Would you like to see the pool? You can see it from my room."

"I'd love to."

We went out into the hall. Debbie turned to point back to the doors on either side of mine. "That's Aunt Isobel's room there, and the one by the stairs is Rika's and daddy's. Only daddy always sleeps in here now."

Moving across the octangular hall, she waved toward the room directly opposite mine, and through the open door I caught a glimpse of an old oaken desk with stacks of paper on it, and a worn studio couch.

"And this is mine." Debbie opened the door into a room that had been lovingly planned with its delicate pink rosebud paper, fluffy white curtains, and the wide window sills that comfortably accommodated every one of the little dolls she had placed there.

"You have quite a family," I said. "Do they always live on window sills?"

"Most of the time, but not always. They keep wanting to move."

She took my hand and drew me to the window, and we stood looking down through the dusk at the darkly sparkling pool, and the rose-covered rustic fence that enclosed it. "Daddy says that's the only reason we took this gloomy old house, on account of the barn and the pool."

"I don't think it's so gloomy. The library is lovely, and I like my room—and yours, too, don't you?"

"Yes, I do. But nobody's lived here for a long time, and daddy says the wiring is terrible, and Aunt Isobel hates the kitchen, and Rika —— Oh-oh." She started to smile. "Do you hear what I hear?"

It was the dog, slow and clumsy on the stairs. Debbie hurried across the room and out into the hall. "She has to have her nails clipped pretty soon. There's no pavement out here for her to wear them down on. Hello, Trixie, dear. You're not supposed to be up here, you know."

I stood in the doorway, watching as she knelt, as the cocker circled around her, rear end wriggling awkwardly with its stub of a whirling tail. "Why isn't Trix supposed to be up here?" I asked Debbie.

"Rika says she might have her puppies on somebody's bed or in a closet or something." She rose. "I'll take her down in a minute."

"But if it's against the house rules ——"

"They're not the house rules," she said matter-of-factly. "Only Rika's."

I looked at her. So far I had seen no sign of the spoiled child my sister had mentioned.

"Do you like licorice?" she asked.

"Yes, very much."

She went over to the little chest next to her bed and opened the top drawer and took out a small brown paper bag. There were two long strips of licorice folded inside. She took them out, unfolding them, and brought one to me. "Are you going to eat it now, Beth?"

"Are you?"

"Yes."

"Then so will I."

I went over to the white-painted Boston rocker and sat down, leaning over to pet the dog, and then I began on my strip of licorice.

Debbie watched me with a curious intentness. "You really do like it, don't you."

"I told you I did, and I thank you very much. Next time it will be my treat."

"I'll show you something if you won't tell."

"I won't tell."

She went back to the little chest and reached under folded things to draw out a large, leather-framed photograph, then brought it to me. "Guess who this is."

I looked down at the calm quiet face, at the dark eyes and the smooth dark hair. "I don't have to guess. It's your mother, isn't it?"

She nodded, her dark braids bobbing, pleased that I had not had to guess.

"You look like her," I said. "What was her name?"

"Diane." She pointed to the lower right-hand corner. "Right here, on the picture daddy had on his dresser before Rika came, it says 'I love you.' The reason it isn't on mine is because I wasn't born then. Daddy had this made especially for me after she died, so of course she couldn't write 'I love you' for me. But he says it's there, even if we can't see it."

"Of course it is. Do you remember her, Debbie?"

She shook her head. "Sometimes I think I do, but Aunt Isobel says I don't really. I was just little." She took the picture back to the chest and put it carefully in the bottom drawer, then pushed the drawer closed and stood up. "Don't tell anyone I showed you my mother's picture, will you?"

"No. Not if you don't want me to."

"Promise you won't tell?"

"I promise," I said.

Mrs. Bales and Debbie were watching television, and I had not seen Rika all day, not even at dinner. I wandered into the library, hoping to find something that would help me learn a little about dogs.

I came to the dog books and chose a slim one that seemed to start with the barest fundamentals. I found other books that interested me too. But there was none by Stanley King.

"If you're looking for any of Stan's stuff, you probably won't find it there."

I looked up to see Rika smiling in the doorway. "Well, hi. I was beginning to think you'd gone into hiding."

"Not if I can help it. I've been busy. I have all his books in my room. Anything you want, you're welcome to. Why don't you come up with me now? I'm just starting an ironing, and I love to have someone to talk to when I iron."

We went upstairs to a room, all pale greens, cool and airy-looking. There was an immaculately covered ironing board set up. "The books are over there on the table next to my bed," she told me.

She plugged in her iron, and got a bundle of something from the bathroom.

I went past the desk with its snapshots and photographs to a low, wide table that held a pale green telephone, a record player, some albums and a pile of books. All Stanley Kings. There were no other books in the room.

"Which one was the first?" I asked.

"Finest Feathers. I can't remember the sequence offhand. Why don't you take them all?"

Ask any WOMAN

By Marcelene Cox

She was talking rings around him: engagement and wedding.

A crisply ironed, pure-white linen handkerchief in a man's pocket is the letter of introduction his wife gives him to the world.

Home sweet home: It was the kind of house where the apples were always lovingly polished but the furniture remained forever dull.

Whether or not a parent thinks so, it is possible to get a small boy to wash his hands before eating without being told: take him to a restaurant with a hand dryer in the men's room.

Relatively new husband comments, "I have not quite arrived at the opinion that America is run by women. For example, I am the ruler of my house as long as my wife agrees with me. Then we discuss the errors of my thinking, and, bathed in righteousness, we do as she wishes. That's why I love her as I do: she lets me rule my home."

Mother to marriageable daughter: "Try to choose the man whose children you would have emulate their father."

One wife, on the subject of a man wielding a paintbrush: "Even with a roller, mine can miss; and after he has finished painting a window it could be used in a greenhouse."

Delighted teen-age daughter's final comment on her newly decorated room: "And it will be the most to be sick in!"

All the world loves a lover—unless it's a teen-ager in your own family.

An egoist is a person constantly contriving to guide the conversation back for station "I"dentification.

You've had a successful day when you arrive home with your umbrella.

The mother who tiled all her floors so her teen-agers could dance anywhere, any time, eventually was told, "But mother, all my friends have carpeting."

I picked up the books, five of them, and paused to look at the record player. "This is a beautiful thing, Rika."

"Yes, isn't it? Stan gave it to me for my birthday. Come on over here and sit down. Surely you can stay awhile."

I went to the desk and sat down. How pretty she was in the crisp, lime-colored cotton, her pale hair curling damply at the temples. Naturally curly, I thought.

"How are you and Debbie making out?" she asked me.

"Fine. We had a swim this afternoon. Goodness, how that child can swim!"

"Yes, can't she?" She swooped a crisply starched blouse off the ironing board, slipped it on a hanger and hooked it over the frame of the door into the bathroom. "Debbie's been needing somebody like you."

"Like me? What's the matter with you?"

"Lots of things. First of all, I'm a stepmother."

"Oh, Rika ——"

"No, it's true. I haven't been too happy about it, but I understand. I went through the same thing myself."

"What?"

"All of it. My mother remarried when I was quite little. All I can remember now is that for a long time my father was there and we were really good pals. Then my father went away and we moved to a little house, and then all of a sudden there was someone else I was supposed to call father. We had a big house again and that place in Maine every summer—my mother loved it—and all the clothes we wanted, all the money we wanted to spend. Only he was a new father. I kept wanting my old one."

"Yes, but this is different. Debbie doesn't even remember her mother."

"It's different, but in a way it's worse. She idealizes somebody she never even knew. How can you fight a thing like that?"

I shook my head. "I don't know."

"That's what bothers me. In the beginning I thought we were going to be such good friends. She seemed to like me just as much as I liked her, then all of a sudden —— She's shown you her mother's picture, hasn't she?" she asked abruptly. "Oh, please don't look so uncomfortable. I know she has. She always does."

"Always?" I asked her.

"Always." She went back to her ironing. "Oh, it isn't that I object to the picture itself, it's just that I can't understand why she hides it away like that. She never used to before I married Stan. Why does she do it now?"

"Maybe she thinks you wouldn't like it if she kept it out."

"But why should she think that? I never said so. And why is she always taking somebody up to her room and closing the door and talking about someone she doesn't even remember?"

That was not exactly the way it had happened, of course, but I remembered uncomfortably that I had asked questions, had even encouraged Debbie to talk about her mother.

"I don't think it's healthy for a child, or anyone, to concentrate on the dead like that." She glanced up at me, frowning a little. "It worries me. I don't mind the little fibs, the little things she tries to hide from me, but this business of trying to compete with a woman who's been dead for ——"

"Debbie lies?" I was surprised.

"Yes, but I don't worry about that too much. I can remember telling whoppers myself when I was a child, especially around that time my mother remarried. She'll outgrow that after a while, but right now all this ——"

She stopped abruptly when the phone rang, her lovely face lighting. "I bet that's Stan." Gray eyes shining, she fairly flew the length of the room.

I upended the iron, turning the dial to OFF.

Rika had not said a word into the phone. Holding it close in both hands, pressing it tight to her ear, she sank slowly to the edge of the bed, her eager smile fading. Then carefully she replaced it. She looked up, caught my eyes on her. "He didn't even ask for me."

I didn't say anything.

"That was Isobel he was talking to, on the phone downstairs. Something about a meeting in the morning. He won't be home until tomorrow night." She was perplexed, maybe even hurt.

"I think I'll turn in, Rika."

She smiled politely, absently. "So early?"

"I like to read in bed, and I've got all this ——"

Suddenly she laughed. She stood up. "Why, of course! That's why he didn't ask for me." She was gay again. "I hate it when he's away, and he knows it. And having to stay away another night, he knew how disappointed I'd be. That's why he talked to Isobel instead of me. He didn't want to tell me."

Debbie came to my room the next morning around eight, wearing a cotton-print swim suit, her dark hair hanging loose and uncombed. Around her neck were a couple of striped beach towels, and on a small tray she had crowded two huge, luscious-looking tomatoes, her hairbrush and a salt shaker.

"That's quite a collection," I said.

She put the tray down and handed me one of the tomatoes. "The very first home-grown. The Bensons sent a whole basket to Aunt Isobel last night."

We went into my bathroom and stood leaning over the washbasin and ate the tomatoes whole. Her alert dark eyes took in the faded old cotton housecoat hanging on the back of the door, the cosmetics on the shelf, even the toothbrush. She looked at the ornate light fixture over the tub. "That doesn't work."

"So I found out. That's a bad place for it anyway, with the hand switch right over the tub like that."

"That's why daddy fixed them all so they wouldn't work. When he gets time he's going to change the switches. He says it's criminal. This house was built before there were ——" She frowned, trying to remember.

"Building codes?" I suggested.

"Yes, rules like that. But daddy says there's always some damn fool who doesn't remember you shouldn't touch anything electric while you're in the water."

She looked up expectantly. I shook some salt on my tomato.

"Don't you know that little ladies aren't supposed to say damn?" she asked curiously.

"Certainly I know it, and furthermore I know that you know it."

"Why didn't you say something then?"

"If I had reminded you that little ladies don't say damn, you would have said you didn't say it, your father did."

She laughed, then said, "Did you see the nursery daddy built for Trixie?"

"No. You were going to show me yesterday, but we went for a swim, remember?"

"Do you really want to see it?"

"I told you I did, didn't I?"

"I don't know if you really mean it. Sometimes people say they like dogs just to get on the good side of me, so they can get on the good side of daddy. But they really hate dogs."

"Who?"

"People. Some people."

We finished our tomatoes in silence.

I brushed her hair and we went downstairs and out to a building, more barn than garage—it might have been a carriage house once—that stood about thirty feet behind the house. There were three cars there: two in early middle age; the other, a long pale green convertible, obviously new.

"What a beautiful car!" I stopped, peering in at the deep olive leather upholstery. "Would I love to have a thing like this!"

"It's Rika's," Debbie said. "She hardly ever uses it. Daddy got it for her when we first came here, but she doesn't like to drive it alone. She won't do anything without daddy. Come on." She tugged at my hand, pulling me toward the back of the barn. She made a little crooning sound. "Good morning, honey."

I knelt down next to her in front of the large, fresh-smelling plywood frame raised on low legs a few inches from the cement floor. "Hi, Trix."

But Trix, busy scratching and tumbling at the newspapers on the floor of her nursery, was not much interested in having visitors.

"She scrunches up her rug in the kitchen like that all the time." Debbie watched the cocker, her face glowing. "Aunt Isobel says a litter of growing puppies is too much for anybody's kitchen. Anyway, it's dry and warm here, and daddy made them this nice bed."

"It's a lovely bed," I said, rising. "Was Trix very little when you first got her?"

"She was five months old. Uncle Lew gave her to me."

"Uncle Lew? You mean Lew Bannister?"

She nodded. "He's not really my uncle; I just call him that. One night when he was at our apartment he said I ought to have a dog, and when daddy said I could, he went right to the phone and called Doc Benson long distance and Doc Benson sent him Trix, and he gave her to me."

"Did you know the Bensons before you came here?" I asked.

She shook her head. "Uncle Lew asked them to find a house for us to rent, and they found this one and that's how we got to know them." She stood up and we started toward the pool. "Rika doesn't like them much."

"How do you know?"

"I heard her telling daddy. She's always saying it's like a plan the way we ended up living so near the Bensons, especially when they're against her just like the Bannisters are."

"Against her? What did she mean by that?" I asked.

"I don't know. She says all kinds of funny things."

We opened one of the gates and passed through the rustic fence with its tangle of pink roses and came to the edge of the pool. Debbie's dive, while I was still standing there poking my hair up under my cap, was unexpectedly into the deep end.

"Debbie!" I went in after her, but she was way ahead of me. A water baby, no doubt about it. "You don't need me," I gasped. "I can't imagine what in the world your father is concerned about."

"He says nobody should ever swim alone, and he says he has to work sometimes."

Breathless, I pulled myself out of the water and stretched out on the oversized striped towel on the edge of the pool. Debbie performed for me, swimming under water, holding her breath until thirty, bobbing around like a cork doing the jellyfish. Presently I called out to her, "You'd better come out now, Debbie."

"Oh, not yet. Please. I'm not tired."

"No, but you're cold. Come on, now."

She came out, not liking it, her hair clinging sleek and black to her head.

"You look," I said lazily, "like a little-girl witch."

She stopped, halfway up the ladder, her eyes wide and disbelieving.

"What's so awful about that?" I asked, smiling. "I think it would be fun to be a little-girl witch."

She came up the ladder the rest of the way, and I leaned over to straighten out her towel for her. She thanked me, but she didn't look at me.

"Honey?"

She put her face down on her folded arms, her hair falling like seaweed all around. "What?"

"What's the matter? I was only trying to make you laugh, you know."

At first I thought she wasn't going to answer. Then finally she lifted her face, all flushed. "That's what Rika says."

"What, Debbie?"

"Rika says I'm a witch."

"Hey, now ——"

But she was scrambling to her feet, reaching down for her towel, not looking at me. "I'm hungry."

I got up slowly, looking after her. Then I picked up my own towel. Why had I said that? I kept thinking about it as I went up to my room to dress. When would I ever learn that words that were a joke in one house could be hurting ones in another?

From the room next to mine I could hear the sound of Rika's radio, could hear her moving around. "I thought Debbie and I were going to be friends," Rika had said. Is this what happened to her? Had she started out the same way I had, relaxed and easy, saying foolish things in fun? And had her gay words been twisted, misunderstood?

I put on some lipstick and went down to a table set for one, and Isobel Bales to serve me.

"But I'm used to getting my own breakfast. You go on with what you were doing."

"Nonsense. That's what I'm here for. You sit down, everything's all ready."

I sat down. "I'm sorry I'm so late."

"You're not late. It's been a long time since everybody sat down to take a meal together in this house."

She disappeared through the swinging door to the kitchen, returning a few minutes later with a tray of scrambled eggs and blueberry muffins, and a flowered china pot of steaming coffee. "I have to have something to do. If I didn't keep busy, I'm sure I'd go straight out of my mind. When I came east after Diane died I never thought I'd be here this long."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 94

"I didn't know he was trying to rob the bank. I hit him because he pushed ahead of me."

Lower in calories

than any other type of juice

Libby's is Twice-Rich: rich in flavor, rich in vitamins

Non-fattening Libby's ...3 times a day...

makes it easier to stay with your slimming program

Tonight, start the Libby's chilling for tomorrow. Never thin and watery, Libby's is the satisfying juice that quenches between-meal hunger; keeps you from nibbling. (Fine idea at bedtime, any time!) Gives you vitamins and minerals, and only 25 calories to the 4-ounce glass! Libby, McNeill & Libby, Chicago 9, Illinois.

See Libby's Tomato Juice label for special offer on Slimdown Cocktail Glasses

Helena Rubinstein solves your beauty problems

The first lady of beauty science helps millions of women

HELENA RUBINSTEIN has had more experience with skin problems than anyone in the world. Since her medical student days she has been working to keep young skins beautiful . . . to correct bad skins . . . to make aging skins look younger.

Today dry skin, aging contours, large pores, blackheads are no longer tragedies. With the help of Helena Rubinstein's scientific skin care every woman can solve her own beauty problems. The first step is knowing what to do. The second step is doing!

DRY SKIN? "PASTEURIZED" FACE CREAM SPECIAL corrects dry skin with special oils and moisturizing ingredients that penetrate deep into the sub-skin tissues. Use for daily cleansing. Also massage into skin before retiring and leave on overnight. 1.50.

AGING SKIN? Here's wonderful news for women over 35 who want to look younger! The oil glands that keep your skin smooth and unlined in youth can now be reactivated! The miracle is Progesterone, the most feminine sex hormone of all. For the first time, Progesterone and Estrogens are available in medically approved ESTROGENIC HORMONE CREAM so you can correct wrinkles caused by dryness, bring moisture back to aging skin. Only Helena Rubinstein's ESTROGENIC HORMONE CREAM has Progesterone! 3.50.

FACIAL HAIR? NUDIT is a new scientific formula that wipes off facial hair! It is safe, quick, easy. It is the only hair remover that comes with SUPER-FINISH, the medicated cream that eliminates redness or rashing. NUDIT melts off hair below the surface of the skin for more lasting effect. 1.50.

CRACKED, CHAPPED LIPS? Helena Rubinstein's new DEW-KISSED LIPSTICK helps heal while it beautifies. It actually releases moisture to the lips all the time it is on. The luscious shine lasts as long as the color! In new Convertible Cases, 1.35 to 5.00. Refills .90.

DEHYDRATED SKIN? SKIN DEW is the remarkable new beauty discovery created in Helena Rubinstein's Paris laboratories. It is a fragrant pink lotion that is delicious to use and indispensable for a fresh young look. SKIN DEW, sinks deep into the skin's under layers replacing moisture. It is instantly absorbed without a trace of grease. Wonderful as a foundation under make-up. Perfect as a glamorous night cream. 3.00, 5.00.

BLACKHEADS? Now you can actually wash away blackheads and correct oily skin problems with BEAUTY WASHING GRAINS. These miraculous little granules combine with water to clean out pores, turn greasy shine to pretty glow. 1.35.

PIMPLES? For skins that "break out," Helena Rubinstein has formulated new greaseless MEDICATED CREAM. Its medicated ingredients dry surface blemishes and actually help the skin heal itself. A boon to teenage boys and girls. 1.25. Prices plus tax

Helena Rubinstein beauty products are available at leading department and drug stores or write Helena Rubinstein®, 655 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. 22, N. Y.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 92

The scrambled eggs were done just right; not too damp, not too dry.

"Was Mrs. ——" I hesitated, but I had been wanting to know. "Was Diane ill long?"

"All her life, poor thing. But they didn't know how bad it was until after Debbie was born."

"Sad."

"Yes."

"Your nephew was lucky he had you."

"I don't know how lucky he was, but at least I was available. Someday, though, I'm going to buy a trailer and see the country, maybe even Canada and Mexico too."

"I'd like to do that. I should think now that Rika is here you could come and go pretty much as you please."

She gave a short laugh. "That's what I thought too. For a few very short weeks, that's what I thought." She said it bitterly, and I could almost physically feel her dislike of Stanley King's new wife. "I've cared for Debbie ever since she was nine months old, and I couldn't love her any more if she were my own. I'd no more leave her with that ——" She stopped abruptly; sighed. "I better get going." She picked up the tray. "There's salad and dessert in the refrigerator for your lunch. I probably won't be here. I have a lot of shopping to do."

"Has Debbie had her breakfast?"

"Yes, in the kitchen. She's going to a birthday lunch at the Bensons'. She's upstairs getting dressed. I'll drop her on the way."

"Is"—I hesitated—"is Rika up?"

"Oh, yes," Mrs. Bales said dryly. "She came down and made her own breakfast and took it back to her room. If she follows her usual routine, she'll be there until Stanley gets back."

I finished breakfast, lingering over my coffee. With everyone away and Rika closed in her room, I would have a whole day to read. How many years since I'd had that luxury?

And as Mrs. Bales said, I probably would not be seeing Rika. I had been past her room three times this morning, and each time the door had been closed. What did she do in there all by herself? I wondered, and then, remembering her husband's coldness and Mrs. Bales' obvious dislike, I felt a rush of sympathy for her. Such a gay little thing, and even Debbie seemed not to be her friend.

I rinsed the china and went out into the yard. After the coolness of the house, the heat seemed to rush at me.

I strolled around the house in time to see one of the older cars backing cautiously out of the barn. Mrs. Bales sat tall and sedate behind the wheel, Debbie beside her.

"The dog isn't out there, is she?" Mrs. Bales called.

I looked down the driveway. "No, I think she's back in the barn."

"Good-by, Beth." Debbie waved to me.

I waved back, smiling, glad to know we were friends again. "Have a good time."

The only reason I was in front of the television that night was that there was a scheduled repeat of a play adapted from one of Stan's short stories. I did not want to miss the program but, sitting there with Debbie and Mrs. Bales, I was uncomfortable. Isobel Bales and I had had an argument. We sat together amicably now, speaking pleasantly, trying to pretend it had never happened.

It had begun late in the afternoon. I was on my way downstairs after freshening up for dinner when I met Rika coming up, her eyes on the tray she was carrying.

"Aren't you coming down?" I asked her.

"Not tonight." She laughed shortly. "Isobel and I just had a few thousand more words, and right now I wouldn't force myself on her for the world."

"Oh, Rika, I'm sorry."

"So am I. She's peeved because you came to my room last night, because we talked."

I was dumfounded. "Why would she object to that?"

"I don't know. That's how she is." She looked at me, her eyes suspiciously bright. "I don't suppose you'd like to have dinner up here with me?"

I hesitated. "I'd like to, Rika, but Debbie's home. I'm supposed to ——"

"I know, I know." She sighed, then she smiled. "I'll see you later, I hope."

The dinner table was set for three, and when I came into the dining room Mrs. Bales had already dished up. For two. When she saw me she reached across for my plate. "I was sure you'd decide to eat upstairs."

"Why, no. Unless you'd rather I did."

"I'd rather you be right here with the rest of us, if you care one bean what I think."

I pulled out my chair and sat down, remembering Rika and her tray. "You have only three places set. There must have been one of us you didn't expect."

"There were two of you I didn't expect," she said dryly, "knowing Rika as I do."

"I think you should have set a place for her at her own table."

"Why? I knew she wouldn't be down."

"How did you know?"

"Because she never has anything to do with either of us when Stanley isn't here."

"Maybe it's because she thinks you don't want her."

Mrs. Bales snorted. A nasty little snort. "Going where she's not wanted has never bothered her before."

I waited a minute. It's a thing you can learn.

"You doubt it now," she said, "but it's the truth." She looked up at me, and from her eyes, her sallow face, I could tell what she thought of me. "Even if her royal highness hadn't already informed me you two are now the best of friends, I would have known."

I put my fork down. "You don't like her at all, do you?"

"No."

"Why?"

"Because of Debbie. Ever since I found out she had no affection for the child except when Stanley was around, I haven't liked her."

Parents wonder why the streams are bitter when they themselves have poisoned the fountain.

JOHN LOCKE

"And when did you find that out?"

"Sooner than anybody else, let me tell you. I tried to warn Stanley, but he wouldn't listen. 'Nonsense,' he said; 'Rika loves the child.'" Her pale mouth tightened. "Well, he learned. They weren't home from their honeymoon three days, and he learned."

"But maybe it was the other way around. Maybe it was Debbie's affections that changed after the honeymoon."

"Well, that settles it!" There was a mottled pinkness in her sallow cheeks. "She hasn't wasted any time, has she? There's no point in trying to talk to you ——"

"I'm here." Debbie came swishing through the swinging door from the kitchen.

Mrs. Bales took a moment. Then: "It's about time. I called you ten minutes ago." She turned in her chair. "I can see the wetness on your hands from here. Go back and dry them."

Debbie grinned and revolved herself back through the swinging door, and Isobel Bales and I picked at our food in silence until she returned. Still little-girl glamorous in her fluffy party dress, Debbie said the prayer and then, not paying much attention to her food, reported on the party.

Mrs. Bales stood up and brought an angel-food cake and a bowl of crushed strawberries from the sideboard. "When you're finished, help yourselves. I'll be back in a minute."

She did not look at me when she spoke, and a moment later I heard her go quietly out the back door.

"Aunt Isobel used to take Rika's trays up to her when she wouldn't come down because daddy wasn't here," said Debbie, "but she doesn't any more. She says she's no servant." She paused. "She used to like Rika, but she doesn't any more."

Mrs. Bales did not come back to the house until after Debbie had got ready for bed and we had seen the first act of the Western that preceded Stan's story. Standing behind Debbie's chair, she looked at me. "Thanks for doing the dishes." She picked up her mending basket before she sat down.

We were watching a local-talent program when Rika joined us. It was going on ten.

"Oh, isn't she darling!" Rika paused, watching the little tap dancer on the screen. Then, her chunky bracelets clanking, she sank into the low chair near the door. Lovely in a slim dress of the softest green, she had piled her pale golden hair high tonight.

"I like your hair that way," I told her.

"Why, Beth!" She seemed surprised that I even noticed. "Thank you."

During the commercial Mrs. Bales looked at Debbie. "You ought to be in bed."

"You said I could wait up for daddy."

"Yes, but look what time it is."

"Just a little longer. Please."

We were watching blond twins doing a soft-shoe when the headlights hit the front windows; when the car an instant later came crunching up the drive. Rika gave a little cry and was instantly out of her chair. Debbie sat up, her face lighting. Seeing her stepmother rushing out into the hall, she settled back again.

"Go on out and meet him if you want to," Isobel Bales urged impatiently.

Debbie shook her head.

There was the slam of the car door, and directly outside the windows the sound of Rika racing across the lawn. "Darling, darling! I've missed you so ——"

The background music for the mock-melodrama pantomime rose to a crescendo, drowning out all outside sounds.

A few minutes later Stanley King came in, his wife's arm through his. "Evening, all." To my surprise he was smiling, his bright blue eyes including us all. He moved toward Debbie, bent to kiss her. "Hi, honeybunch. How was the party?"

"Fine. I won a prize."

"Good for you. What'd you win?"

"A barrette. It has rhinestones in it."

"Your Aunt Isobel has been trying to get you to bed for half an hour now." Rika, her hand still on her husband's arm, smiled down at the little girl. "I think it's about time, don't you?"

Debbie's dark eyes flicked up at her father's, past her great-aunt's. Without a word she got up, obediently. Stan made an almost imperceptible movement away from his wife. "I'll tuck you in, toots."

"Me, too," Rika said.

"Why don't you stay and see the end of your program?" Stan said pleasantly.

"I don't care about any old program. I was just killing time, waiting for you."

"I'll be right down ——"

"I want to come with you." Rika ran her small hand down the inside of his arm, slipping her hand into his. "I've missed you, darling. I haven't seen you in three whole days."

Watching her I thought, As beautiful as she is, why does she always beg for attention like this? For affection? Yet, in a way, there was something about him. He was not as homely as I remembered him. Perhaps it was because for the first time I had seen him smile. Nice smile; bright blue eyes warm.

He reached for his daughter's hand and the three of them started for the stairs.

"Are you hungry, darling?" I heard Rika ask him. "Are you tired?"

Mrs. Bales made an impatient sound, then hurried out toward the kitchen.

I turned off the television and picked up my book. It was quiet in the house then and that was why, although their voices started out low, I heard them as they came down the stairs about fifteen minutes later.

"Debbie, Debbie, Debbie." Rika sounded as if she wanted to cry. "It's always like this. You're away for days and days, and all I do is wait—just waiting for you to come back again—and then when you do come it's always Debbie. You can't sit down and talk to me alone for five minutes because Debbie's doll has to be fixed, or Debbie has a new trick in the pool to show you, or Debbie's dog is having pups. What about me? I'm your wife!"

"We've gone through this before. She's my daughter."

"A wife should come before a daughter."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 96

For Fever and Pain due to COLDS or FLU—

BAYER

Brings Fastest Relief

...the fastest, most gentle-to-the-stomach relief you can get!

SUSAN'S GETTING A CHILL which can lead to a cold. Bayer Aspirin—taken at the first sign of colds or flu—quickly reduces fever, relieves aches and pains. Bayer brings the fastest, most gentle-to-the-stomach relief you can get—and the reason is that Bayer Aspirin is different from pain relieving tablets which are still whole when they enter your stomach. Such tablets delay relief until they disintegrate. But Bayer actually disintegrates on its way to your stomach. Because of this, Bayer is ready to go to work instantly—without delay.

Because she took Bayer Aspirin as soon as she got home from the hockey game last night, Susan's feeling better this morning. So whenever you feel a cold coming on, be sure you take Bayer Aspirin—before you do anything else. And for a sore throat due to a cold, gargle with 3 Bayer tablets dissolved in one-third of a glass of water. With amazing speed, Bayer soothes the irritated membranes of your throat . . . has you feeling better fast! When you buy, buy the best pain reliever the world has ever known—Bayer Aspirin!

FEEL BETTER FAST—with BAYER® ASPIRIN

THIS YEAR.. see TENNESSEE

send for FREE BOOKLET

Treat your family to a 3-way vacation that includes mountains, lakes, and history. They'll ride highways into the sky in the Great Smoky Mountains National Park; fish, boat and swim in Tennessee's 22 Great Lakes; see the homes of three presidents, historic battlefields, TVA dams, and the world's only Atomic Energy Museum at Oak Ridge. Yes, for three vacations in one, see Tennessee. Send now for free 40-page vacation guide.

Mail Coupon Today

Tennessee Division of Information
1744 Cordell Hull Bldg., Nashville, Tenn.
Please send Free Booklet

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

CITY & STATE _____

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 94

"That may be." (I could see those bright blue eyes so cold.) "I think it depends on the circumstances."

"You mean because she's your daughter by your first wife, don't you? Diane's daughter."

"That has nothing to do with it. Those weren't the circumstances I was referring to."

"Yes, they were," she said bitterly. "If it weren't for Debbie we'd be happy—the way we used to be, before we were married, on our honeymoon ——"

"You know very well we wouldn't, and if you think I don't know why, you're —— What are you following me for? I told you; I'm going out to the barn!"

"If you're going, then I am too."

"You stay here."

"I want to come with you." She was crying now. "Why can't I?" She cried out something else, but I don't know what because by that time they were out in the kitchen and I, one finger marking the page in my book, was hurrying up the stairs.

She's doing it all wrong, I thought. And then I thought, But she's young, madly in love, jealous. Why can't he spend a few minutes alone with her if it means so much to her? I went to bed and I read, and after a while I slept.

"Seven of them and they're just the sweetest little —— Beth! You're not hurrying ——"

"Yes, I am." I had expected Debbie to be early this morning, but not this early.

"Doc Benson says it's most unusual to have seven in the first litter. They're beautiful, he says."

"Well, he ought to know; he's seen enough of them." I hurried with comb and lipstick, then saw the little doll, about eight inches high, complete with poke bonnet and parasol, sitting primly in the corner under the table. "I didn't even know she was here." I looked at Debbie over my shoulder.

"Her name is Mrs. Appleblossom. I brought her because you haven't any mother."

"That's very thoughtful of you. I'm pleased and honored," I said, and I was. Debbie's dolls did not go living around in other people's rooms unless Debbie's love went with them.

Debbie was not listening. "They're all blond like Trixie except one. He's the runt, daddy says, and he's black as coal all over. Oh, Beth, come on!" Impatient, she was like a jumping jack.

Trix was giving breakfast when we got to the plywood nursery in the barn, but her beautiful golden eyes and the windmilling of her stubby tail made us welcome.

"Why, they don't look like cockers at all!" I looked down on the tiny square heads with the slits that would someday be eyes, and the small flaps where ears should be. "Those long tails! They look like little rats!"

Debbie laughed. "They're all males except this one." With her forefinger she softly touched one tiny blond head.

We went back to the house for breakfast. Mrs. Bales brought us tomato juice and golden waffles with tiny curled sausages. Debbie began chattering again.

"You like the runt best, don't you, Beth?"

"Oh, no. I like them all."

"I think you like the runt best. When daddy and I were out there, before I called you, I told him you'd like the runt best. He thought you would too."

"I don't know why."

"Because he's different—not as pretty as the others. He's littler, kind of helpless."

I kept glancing at my watch, wanting to get to work. I wondered how he would be. Would he be the cold-eyed one I had first met? Or would he be the one who had come in last evening as we sat watching the talent show? The one who spoke gently, the one who could smile a slow quiet smile.

He was hunched over his desk, writing on a long yellow pad. He stood up in his T shirt and jeans, pleasantly and remotely polite. "The desk down there will be yours. But if you'd rather work by yourself, I'll move the typewriter up to your room."

"No, no; this is fine."

There was a pile of letters on the desk that was mine, all with notations at the bottom. I answered them, saying what Stanley King wanted me to say, using the soft-sounding words Lew Bannister had taught me to use. Yes, no or maybe; always do it soft, Lew said.

"I don't know why you want to paint," Stanley King said after he had read them over. He had the bluest eyes I had ever seen. He smiled a little, and I wondered how he knew I wanted to paint. Lew, probably. He handed me a thin sheaf of handwritten notes. "Just this and then you and Debbie can go for a swim or whatever you want to do."

I had almost finished when Rika wandered in. "Go on with what you're doing, you lovely people." She smiled at both of us. "I just thought I'd come and set a spell."

Turning in my chair, I smiled back at her, thinking how beautiful she was in her flowing peignoir. But her husband watched with cold eyes as she settled in the wing chair. "Beth is almost through," he said.

"Darling, I didn't mean to intrude. I thought you were working, that you wouldn't mind my sitting here."

"You know what I think."

She twisted in her chair to look at him. "But if I'm quiet, what difference does it make?" She turned to me. "Will I make you nervous? Be honest."

"No, not at all." I said it hastily.

IT'S LATER THAN I THINK

By ALBERTE WRIGHT

For every year the tree survives
It adds another ring,
But does it secretly—inside—
So no one knows a thing.

Ach! Nature's ways are really snide.
I'd change them were I bidden,
And put the rings on trees outside
But keep the ring-kles hidden.

"There! You see? Darling, she doesn't care."

There was silence then and after a few minutes I took the typed notes over to his desk, picked up the letters with the neat signature.

He looked up at his wife, expressionless. "All right; she's all through now. You don't have to stay any longer."

"Why do you always make it sound that way? Why are you always twisting things around? Just because I want to be with you for a little while!" Then, contrite, she jumped up, came toward him. "Oh, darling, I'm sorry! I didn't mean to say it like that."

Sealing envelopes, licking stamps, I could see her imploring look. I saw her turn away from him, saw her when she got to the wide doors—"How long are you going to keep on being angry with me?"—saw her backing out of the room.

I piled the sealed letters neatly. Suddenly, to me, he was homely again.

I went out into the hall. Rika was standing at the foot of the stairs, one small hand on the newel post.

"It looks like I'm through for the day," I said. "What do you say? Let's go for a swim."

She shook her head. "You wouldn't have been through if I hadn't come in right then. That's how he is." I watched her in her bitterness, so young, climbing up the stairs.

Debbie and I had our swim and then, still wearing suits that had seemed to dry almost immediately in the blazing sun, had lunch with Mrs. Bales in the kitchen. Now Debbie was busy showing off the pups to neighbor children from up and down the road, and I was free.

I went up the stairs. I knocked. "Rika?" She did not answer, and I knocked again. "Rika, it's Beth."

"Oh, it's you. Come on in."

She was lying flat on her stomach on a mat in front of the tall screened windows, wearing nothing but the ribbon that caught her silken hair back in a rippling pony tail. Her small body gleamed golden with oil, and hanging over her was an enormous sun lamp.

"What are you using that thing for? It must be almost ninety out."

"I know, but it's not so complicated this way." She waved a hand toward the jars of creams and lotions on the floor beside her. "Besides, I've been using it every day for years and I know what my skin can take. Being a blond, I have to be careful. Sit down. Oh, first, would you turn off the radio, please?"

I looked around for it.

"It's over there on the radiator."

I walked around her to one of the tall radiators that stood at either end of the room next to the windows, and reached to click the small knob. The sudden tingle that shot up my wrist made me step back abruptly. I stumbled, then caught myself.

"Oh, Beth—did you hurt yourself?"

"No, no, I'm all right." I had stumbled over a thin extension snaking from somewhere under the bed. "I got a shock and it startled me, that's all."

"I'm always doing that too." She turned back on her stomach again, resting on her elbows, watching me over one smooth shoulder. "I know I shouldn't have all those extensions around; Stan is always telling me not to. But then he scolds if I put too much on this line, and he won't let me use any of the plugs in the bathroom." She laughed. "He's an electrical engineer, you know, and he never lets me or anybody else forget it."

"Well, if he's an electrical engineer," I said mildly, rubbing my right hand with my left, "he ought to know what he's talking about."

"He does, I guess. Come sit where I can see you. It's so wonderful to have someone around my own age to talk to!"

It was out-and-out flattery—she was at one end of the twenties and I at the other—but I went over to the ottoman and sat down.

"I hate this house," she said moodily. "What with all his reading and writing and the trips he's always taking and then fooling around with the house here, I never see Stan any more. I wish he'd stuck to engineering."

"How is it he didn't?" I had been wondering about that. "How did he get started in the other direction?"

"Oh, he always wrote, I guess; I don't know. But when he went back to finish college after the war ——" She lifted her head to look at me. "Isobel Bales is always telling me about it; how desperate he was for money, how hard he worked—I get so sick of listening to it!"

"It doesn't sound as if it had been very easy."

"No, I know it wasn't. Even that first job he had after he finished school —— You heard us last night, didn't you? Stan and me fighting."

"Part of it, yes."

"I didn't know you were still down there."

"We all say things we don't mean when we're mad."

"But that's what depresses me about me. That's why I'm so ashamed. I mean what I say when I'm mad. I know Debbie is a darling child, loving and affectionate and all that. She has her faults; she fibs, does little things—but she is only a child. Probably Mrs. Bales is all right, too, if you don't take that tongue of hers too seriously. But I don't care any more." She pulled herself to her elbows, looking up at me. "Just once, Beth, I'd like to be the most important person in the world to somebody. I'd like to know I counted more than anybody or anything else."

Like a baby, I thought. I tried to think how to say it. "No matter what," I said carefully, "there are always other kinds of loves, other loyalties. Someday you'll have children; then you'll know."

"My mother had me." She dropped her head to her arms again. "I was no other love, no other loyalty. She couldn't wait to get rid of me. I spent most of my life in boarding schools."

I didn't know what to say.

"That's why I'm the way I am, I suppose. No wonder everybody in this house hates me."

CONTINUED ON PAGE 99

Sitting pretty with the Light refreshment

LOOK around at any party today. You can't help noticing today's slim, trim figures—and the preference for the lighter food and drink.

Pepsi-Cola, of course, is right in step with this idea. For today's Pepsi, reduced in calories, is never heavy, never too sweet. Make friends . . . with Pepsi. Refresh without filling.

PEPSI-COLA

Pepsi-Cola

refreshes without filling

Naturally better on French toast

because it's blended with real maple sugar

...best of all, it's Vermont Maid Syrup

IN THE NEW NO-DRIP BOTTLE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 96

"I don't hate you," I said.

"No, but you probably will, sooner or later. There's something wrong with me; I know it. Nobody will ever adore me the way my father and stepfather did my mother. They waited on her hand and foot, and I used to think it was so nice. Now it makes me sick. I don't want that because it would make me sick now too." She made a convulsive movement. "I'm not going to think about it."

She reached out to pick up the tiny diamond-studded watch that lay among the collection of bottles and jars. "Will you hand me that towel, please, Beth?"

The phone rang, then rang again. Rika, tucking one corner of the towel inside itself at the cleft of her bosom, made no move to answer.

"Mrs. Bales is out in the barn with Debbie," I told her.

"Oh?" She rose gracefully, went to the pale green instrument on the table next to her bed. "Hello. . . . Oh, Minnie, dear. How nice of you to ——" She sank to the edge of the bed. "No, much better today, thank you ——"

I waved and started toward the door. "I better go see what Debbie's doing. Why don't you come down when you're finished?"

She nodded, smiling, listening to the phone.

Debbie was in the barn with the puppies. When she saw me she gave Trix a pat, then came running toward me, my swimming cap dangling from her wrist. "Put on your cap, one, two, three! I'll race you to the pool."

We went in together, but she beat me. When we got to the other end Stan was there, in trunks.

"You're way out of practice, or you're getting old." He reached lean tanned arms to pull me up, his brilliant blue eyes smiling. "Isn't that what you're telling yourself?"

"It sure is." I was gasping for breath. "I thought it would be only a couple of days and I'd be as durable as ever, but that child of yours ——" I lifted a heavy hand to my cap, fumbling at the strap. "I'll never be able to keep up with her."

He laughed. "Sure you will. You're trying to do too much too fast, that's all." He gave the towel a flip and spread it out. "Here, sit down."

I sank down tiredly, and he turned to watch Debbie thrashing in the pool.

"Daddy"—she came toward us in her highly personalized interpretation of the dog paddle, her hair hanging lank and sleekly black around her eager face—"come on in with me."

His dive was quick and smooth and shallow. They raced with perfect crawl strokes, and played all Debbie's favorite water games, the child laughing, shrieking. I had never seen her so boisterous, so openly affectionate before.

"It sounds as if you're all having more fun than I am." Rika, lovely as always in a crisp off-the-shoulder cotton, had nudged my back gently with the toe of her shoe. "I bet they can hear Debbie clear down to the Bensons'."

"Hi. I bet they can too. Come on, sit down." I sat up and shook out the towel Stan had brought down. "You can tell where she gets that fine swimming form, can't you?"

She nodded. "She looks cold, Beth. I think she ought to come out."

"The water's almost as warm as the air is. She's not cold."

"It's well water; it can't be warm," she said worriedly. She cupped her mouth with both hands. "Debbie—come out now. You're cold. Debbie ——"

"This isn't running water, Rika. The sun warms it. She's all right."

But Debbie had heard. She lifted her head, her laughter vanishing. She looked almost guilty as she struck out, swimming quickly away from her father.

"Hey!" Stan, surfacing, looked around for his daughter. "Hey, Deb! What's the matter?"

But Debbie was climbing the ladder. Frozen-faced, she started running toward the house.

Surprised, I looked at Rika. "Tell me, what's your system? I've never seen any kid come out of the water so fast without an argument in my entire life!"

But Rika was walking around the edge of the pool to where Stan was standing.

"It was time she came out," she called to him. "This is polio season, and you know she's not supposed to get chilled. They talk about it on the radio all the time!"

Stan started to say something and then, perhaps remembering that I was there, turned abruptly and started swimming toward the end of the pool.

Picking up my towel, I could hear Rika, trying to keep up with him: "—— to look after her as a mother would, that's what I promised. Darling, her lips were blue ——"

I went back to the house, surprised because although it was still only afternoon I felt a little tired myself.

When Rika wandered into my room late that night saying, "It seems I always do everything wrong," I wondered what was the matter with her husband. Or with Debbie, or even Mrs. Bales. A few words of explanation and Rika would not always, in spite of her intentions, find herself playing the role of a killjoy.

It was Debbie's idea that we walk down to The Corners.

"What do you want to go down there for?" I asked.

"Don't you want to go?"

"I don't care. You better tell somebody we're going. Go ask your aunt or your father."

"It's all right. They know I want to go."

"Go ask them anyway. I'll run upstairs and put a skirt on."

Rika's door at the top was held halfway open by the big ottoman. "Beth?"

"Hi."

The best preacher is the heart; the best teacher is time; the best book is the world; the best friend is God.
TALMUD

"Can you come in a minute?" Sitting at her desk, she turned sideways to look at me. "I need somebody to talk to."

"I can't, Rika. We're going to walk down to The Corners. Why don't you come along?"

"Who's going with you? Aunt Isobel?" There was a curious accent on that last.

"No; Debbie."

Rika's answering smile was an absent one. Then, motioning toward the little chair; "Please? Just for a minute?"

"Just for a minute." I sat down, looking curiously at the green leather journal open in front of her on the desk.

"My diary," she said. "I've kept one all my life off and on. Just the other night I was looking through my last year's diary. I was simply furious because my stepfather made me go to New York and take that business course because I wouldn't finish college." She hunched up her shoulders. "Now it gives me the shivers whenever I think I almost didn't go out on that interview."

"With Stan, you mean?"

She nodded. "He called the school and when Mrs. Durkee asked me to go, I said I would but I really didn't intend to. Then on the way down in the elevator one of the girls told me who he was and ——"

"And that was that."

"And that was that." Her eyes were soft. "I knew from the moment I saw him, he was the one for me." She sat back, looking at the framed photographs on her desk. "I suppose you think I'm foolish."

I shook my head. "No, I don't think you're foolish."

"You said you were engaged once." She looked down at the desk. "You couldn't have been jilted or anything like that. I mean, I can't imagine anybody ever ——"

She stopped, flustered, and after a moment looked up at me with eyes dark with self-reproach.

"That isn't what I meant to say at all. You're angry. I don't blame you."

"No." I shook my head. "I'm not angry."

"Maybe when I reach age ninety I'll learn to mind my own business. But I am fond of you, and sometimes when you think nobody's looking you look so darned unhappy."

That surprised me. It had been days since I had felt sorry for myself. "I'm not unhappy," I said truthfully. Then, remembering Debbie, I stood up. "Sure you don't want to come down to The Corners with us?"

"No, thanks, really."

I went to my room to change, then hurried downstairs. Debbie was not there. I went out through the kitchen to the barn. Debbie was sitting on the floor, watching the puppies.

"I'm sorry I kept you waiting, Deb. I was talking with Rika."

"I know. I didn't think you'd come down again."

"I said I would, didn't I?"

"I know you did, but most of the time when people start talking with Rika they don't come back." She stood up.

We started down the road, Debbie glancing back now and then to see if Trix was following. "She always used to follow me," she said.

"She won't now. Not while she has the puppies to take care of. Stop worrying."

The Corners was an incongruous combination of country store and downtown delicatessen, with its candy case and dusty collection of straw hats, cosmetics and glass-enclosed racks of thread at one end, and a modern meat counter and freezer at the other. Behind the stand that held the cash register sat three gray-haired women.

The youngest-seeming of the three, a short mannish-looking woman in her early sixties, came around from behind the cash register. She looked at Debbie without a suggestion of the smile most people usually have for children. "Hello, Debbie."

"Hello," Debbie said diffidently. She went over to the candy case, stood waiting patiently.

The woman looked at me. "You must be Mr. King's new secretary." Then her face lighted with recognition. "Why, you're one of the Bellamy girls, ain't you?"

"That's right. Beth."

"I'm Minnie Pruitt. You don't remember me, but I remember seeing you bicycling around town when you was a little girl. That's Mrs. Hayes sitting over there, and Mrs. Painters. My sisters."

The two women nodded and smiled.

"How's Rika today?" Minnie Pruitt asked.

I looked up in surprise. Rika? "She's fine."

"Glad to hear it. She ain't been feeling too good lately. We're pretty good friends, you know, Rika and me. She comes down every day or so, and when she don't come, I kind of miss her. We all do"—she looked at her sisters—"don't we?"

The two women nodded, one of them murmuring, "So nice."

"Yes, she is." I waited for somebody to say something more, but Minnie had gone over to the candy case and, seeming to know what Debbie wanted, was bending to reach the tray of long licorice sticks. "How many?"

"Fourteen," Debbie said. "And I'd like them in two bags please, seven in each."

After she carefully counted her change Debbie said a polite thank you, and we started our walk back.

"Don't you like Minnie Pruitt?" I asked.

"Not very much," Debbie said. "She doesn't like me much either."

"For heaven's sake—why not?"

"I don't know. She used to, but she doesn't any more." She handed me one of the little paper bags. "I bought this for you. One for each day. It's a present."

"Thank you, Debbie."

"You're welcome. Should we eat one now?"

"Let's."

We walked slowly along the road, enjoying the sun on our backs, chewing on licorice sticks.

It was not until I had been with the Kings eight days that Stanley King had any real work for me and, as luck would have it, Debbie did not wake me for our swim and I overslept. I had been unable to fall asleep; perhaps it was the talk Rika and I had had until the small hours, or the sound of her record player later. "Diane," she had played, over and over. Diane was the name of Stan's first wife. Why that one?

I went down for a quick breakfast and hurried to the library. On my desk was a pile of Happy meals for everybody—the whole family loves the better natural flavor of Carolina Brand and River Brand White Rice. And Mom is happy too, because cooking is so fast and easy!

TASTES BETTER NATURALLY!

RIVER BRAND
Popular low-cost medium grain rice.

COOKS QUICK NATURALLY!

CAROLINA BRAND
King size extra long grain rice.

READY TO EAT
as fast as any rice!

14 Minutes from Box to Plate.
Fast Cooking Recipes on Every Box.

RIVER BRAND RICE MILLS, INC.
New York, N.Y. Houston, Texas Memphis, Tenn.
El Campo, Texas Eunice, La.

handwritten pages with the notation: Yellow paper—triple space. I felt a twinge of excitement. The new book.

At about twelve-thirty Rika wandered in, smiling at me as she moved toward the desk where her husband was working. Later Mrs. Bales stuck her head in. "Lunch is ready. Want it in here?"

"Yes, Isobel, please."

"You are not going to work through your lunch hour ——"

"I can't stop now, Rika."

Touching his face, forcing him to look at her, she said gently, "You mean you don't want to. But you're going to sit back and relax, and we're going to enjoy a quiet lunch together."

"Rika, for the love of ——"

"Sh-h-h ——"

I followed a rather grim-looking Mrs. Bales into the dining room. "Has Debbie eaten?"

"An hour ago." She reached for my plate.

When I returned to the library neither Rika nor Stan was there. All afternoon I expected Debbie but, although I heard her outside calling to Trix, she did not come. Around four, Rika did.

"Have you seen Debbie?" I asked her.

"Not since last night, before she went to bed." She made a face. "All she could talk about was dogs, dogs, dogs." She sighed. "I guess I better be going upstairs."

But she did not go upstairs. An hour later when I leaned back for a break she was sitting in the big chair, taking the clip from each handwritten chapter as she read it, then carefully replacing it. She looked up at me. "Could I see what you have over there? I'd like to see how it begins."

I hesitated and then, not understanding why I hesitated because no one had ever told me not to, I picked up the pile of typed sheets and handed them to her.

It doesn't take long to read triple-spaced pages and soon Rika was reaching for the sheets as I rolled them from the typewriter. I could feel that first annoyance growing, turning slowly to anger.

She noticed it finally. "Beth, I'm so sorry! I'm making you nervous!"

"Knowing you're just sitting there, waiting, isn't helping. Why don't you go away and come back in about ——"

Outside Trix barked, and a second later Stan's car passed the windows. I could hear Debbie shouting a welcome.

Rika put the papers on my desk and stood up. "I didn't mean to be a nuisance. Naturally I'm interested in my husband's work."

A moment later I heard her out in the yard, calling to Stan.

Debbie had not come near me all day, and when I went up to shower and change I discovered that my little Mrs. Appleblossom was no longer on the bed where I had left her. No matter where I searched, I could find no Mrs. Appleblossom.

At dinner there were only Mrs. Bales, Debbie and I; but Debbie ate silently, speaking to me only when I forced her to.

"What was that all about?" Mrs. Bales asked after the child had gone.

I shook my head. "I don't know," I said.

I helped clean up in the kitchen, then went out to the barn, sure that I would find Debbie there. She was kneeling close to the big plywood box, talking to Trix and the pups.

"—— nice girl, Trixie, dear, and I'm so glad all your children are beginning to grow their ears. They were awful skimpy there in the beginning, awful skimpy ——"

"Debbie," I said, kneeling beside her, "what's the matter? Are you mad at me?"

When she did not answer I leaned forward, trying to see her face.

"Where is Mrs. Appleblossom, honey? Why did you take her away from me?"

Debbie concentrated on Trix, smoothing the gleaming neck with one brown hand. Still not looking at me, she said, "You know why."

"No, I don't. Please tell me."

"You broke your promise. You promised, and then you told anyway."

"Told what? I never broke any promise to you, Debbie."

She pulled away from me. "You did, too, Beth! You said you wouldn't tell Rika I showed you my mother's picture, and then you went right to Rika's room and told her!"

"No!" Startled at what I saw in her dark eyes, I stood up. "I promised you I wouldn't tell anybody, and I didn't."

"You did! You did—you promised a lie, and now Rika's taken my picture away and it's all on account of you ——"

"Debbie, please!" I reached for her, but she wrenched away from me. "Honey, Rika wouldn't take your picture away. You're mistaken ——"

"I am not! You told Rika and I know you did, because Rika said so. How would she know if ——" Her voice broke. Head down, she dashed past me, sobbing. At the door she whirled. "You wait, Beth! Something terrible is going to happen and it will be all your fault ——"

I looked after her, shaken, not trying to follow. It wouldn't do any good anyway. I hurried to the house.

Mrs. Bales was ironing in front of the open windows in the kitchen. "I thought if I waited until tonight to do this it would be a little cooler," she sighed, "but it isn't."

"Is Rika upstairs, Mrs. Bales?" I asked.

"No, she went out. Down to The Corners, probably."

I opened the screen door and went out. "I'll be back in a little while."

Trix barked from somewhere in the barn as I started down the driveway. Looking back, I saw that Stan's car was not there either.

I kept thinking of Debbie. Certainly, as much as she disapproved of Debbie's devotion to the memory of her mother, Rika would not take that picture away from the child. Certainly—and I remembered Rika's troubled groping for understanding of her own self—certainly she had never said the things Debbie seemed to think she had.

Through the dusk I could see the cars parked at all angles at The Corners, could see Rika's convertible, top down, its shining newness glittering like a jewel in the midst of the jalopies.

I went in, absently saying my thanks to chattering youngsters as they moved to let me pass.

Rika waved to me from a corner behind the meat counter. "Come on back here, Beth. We're having a Coke."

I went back. It was a good spot. From there Minnie Pruitt could watch the door, the cooler and the cash register.

Rika reached for a wire-back chair and pulled it up to one corner of the table. "This is Miss Pruitt and ——"

"We met the other day ——" All three sisters started to say it at once, then all stopped, tittering.

"You remember," Minnie Pruitt said to Rika. "I told you on the phone." She straightened on her chair. "One Coke, Alvin," she bellowed. "Lots of ice."

"Right away, Min." One of the boys at the door, stocky and muscular, moved away from the rest of the group.

"This is where I always come," Rika said, "when Stan's busy and I get lonely." She smiled at the three women. "They always make me feel so welcome."

"Why shouldn't we?" Minnie Pruitt asked heartily. She looked at me. "The only complaint we got is she don't come often enough. Now you're here, maybe you'll see to it she does."

"I'll do my best."

"Ain't that nice," one of the women said, "you two being such good friends?" She spoke as if Rika were not there. "It's going to mean so much to her. She needs a good friend."

They were fond of her, these three; that I could tell. They hung on her words, watching with gentle half-smiles as she talked about New York and the people she had known there. They laughed when she did, watched the play of expression on the perfect face, the sparkling eyes that grew darker and darker as the sun went down.

Minnie stood up to pull on another white-globed light.

"We've got to go," Rika said. "It must be after ten."

We went out to the convertible, Minnie Pruitt walking to the car. "Is he home?" she asked, low.

"I don't think he could be, yet," Rika told her

"Will you be all right?"

"Of course I will." Rika leaned over the half-open door and kissed Minnie Pruitt on the cheek. "Why shouldn't I be? You go upstairs now and go to bed, and don't think about me one bit."

"I can't help it."

"You're just an old worrywart, you doll."

Minnie laughed at that, and as we pulled away from the store I could see her still smiling as she went back into the building.

"What was Minnie so worried about?" I asked.

I could see her glance at me in the light of the dash. "Worried?"

"Yes. I heard her ask if you'd be all right."

"Oh, that. I've been having headaches lately. It's just the heat, but she does worry. She told me tonight that you got your job

Cheerfulness and content are great beautifiers, and famous preservers of youthful looks.

CHARLES DICKENS

easy good ways to serve Blue Lake green beans-

plain-

Blue Lakes Pan Fried—Heat 1 (1-pound) can Blue Lake variety whole or cut green beans and liquid in a small skillet; drain. Add ¼ cup French dressing and a little crumbled crisp cooked bacon to beans; heat a few minutes longer. Serves 4.

and fancy!

Blue Lakes Tetrazzini—Combine 1 (1-pound) can drained Blue Lake variety cut green beans with 2 (10½-ounce) cans condensed cream of chicken soup, 1 (2-ounce) can mushrooms and liquor, 1 cup diced cooked chicken, ⅓ cup cream and 1 tablespoon lemon juice. Heat and serve with noodles or in patty shells or toast cups. Serves 6.

Meet Mr. Blue Lake—the aristocrat of the green bean family from Oregon and Washington. Blue Lake is a variety of green bean that is stringless, straight, round, firm, and has a wonderfully delicious flavor.

Blue Lakes are packed under many brand names so to be sure you get this superior variety—look on the can label for "Blue Lake GREEN BEANS."

Blue Lake variety green beans - developed especially for flavor!

ASSOCIATED BLUE LAKE GREEN BEAN CANNERS, INC. • 522 PITTOCK BLOCK, PORTLAND 5, OREGON with Lew Bannister through Doc Benson. You never told me you knew him."

"Didn't I? I've known him practically all my life. I used to baby-sit with the twins when they were tiny."

"And you got your job with Stan through Lew Bannister."

"Yes. But Stan called me, if you remember; I didn't call him."

She was quiet a moment, and then she laughed. "The trouble with me is that I'm bored. I let my imagination run away with me."

"Well, don't waste it on me."

There was only one dim light in the front of the house.

"That's Isobel for you," Rika said crossly. "She knows how I hate to come into a dark house."

She left the car halfway up the drive, and we could hear Trix barking in the barn as we made our way across the lawn to the darkened kitchen.

"It's so hot," Rika said. "Let's make some iced tea."

"Thanks, Rika, but I'm full of Coke up to here. I think I'll go up and read."

"Oh, please don't. It will be terribly hot up there. Let's just sit here and talk." She reached out to turn the dial that said Right-Front on the range, then went over to the table and dragged it over in front of the two narrow screened windows. "I'll put lots of lemon in it," she said.

I sat down in the chair she brought and said what I had been waiting to say all evening. "Something happened tonight, Rika. That's why I came looking for you."

Her smile faded. "What?"

"I never told you I saw Debbie's mother's picture."

She shook her head. "No. I assumed that she had shown it because she always does. But no, you never told me." She looked at me questioningly as she poured hot tea over the ice heaped in the blue pottery pitcher.

"Debbie told me you said I did."

She shook her head again. "What's this all about?"

"Debbie said I broke a promise, and that because of it you took her mother's picture away from her."

"I took her mother's picture!" The gray eyes grew black. "Why should I —— Oh, what's the use? You won't believe me ——"

"I might."

"You'd be the only one if you did. Nobody else ever does."

"Try me. What happened?"

"I don't know." She sank back in her chair. "That's just it. I don't know anything about it."

"Then what did you mean when you said I wouldn't believe you?"

"Things like this have happened to me before. I did this; I said that; I never know anything about it. Nobody ever believes me."

"But this thing tonight. There's a misunderstanding somewhere; there must be."

"No, there isn't." She shook her head. "Not the honest kind of misunderstanding you mean. This is just the beginning for you, Beth; you wait and see. She's just a child; that's what's so horrible. To me it's a nightmare. Who will ever take my word against hers?" She was quiet a moment. Then she picked up the long spoon, began absently to stir her tea. "Why should I take anything away from her? I want her to love me."

"Do you love her?"

"No. I have to be honest about that. I wanted to, and I began to, and I still want to. But she won't let me get anywhere near her. She's crazy about Stan and that's natural, I suppose, but she likes Isobel and she likes you. But me, I'm a stepmother, and it will never work out. Sometimes I wonder if it wouldn't be better for all of us to send her away to school."

"Oh, no. She's much too young."

"But she isn't happy here and you can see what she's doing to Stan and me. We're growing farther and farther apart."

"Do you think it's Debbie's fault?"

"Not all of it. I have my faults, but so has she. Only nobody can ever see hers. She's done everything she could to cause trouble." She stared at her tea, poking at the ice cubes. "Before she turned against me we were the happiest little family—but now . . . I don't dare say two words to her unless Stan's there. She's too smart to be rude to me in front of him."

"I've never known her to be rude, Rika."

"Not to you. But to me she is, and I think Isobel encourages it. Another of her tricks is pretending she's afraid of me. In front of other people, I mean." She looked at me indignantly, then she sighed. "Tell me what happened tonight."

I told her, and she listened, staring at her frosty glass of tea. "Why didn't Debbie want me to tell anyone about the picture in the first place?" I asked when I finished.

"I don't know, I don't know, I don't know!" One small fist clenched hard on the edge of the table.

I got up and rinsed out my glass at the sink. "Are you going to finish yours?"

She shook her head.

I went back for her glass, for the blue pottery pitcher. "You shouldn't leave your car out all night with the top down."

"I know. I didn't intend to." She stood up. She was hurt and angry. Just a kid, really.

Going toward the front of the house toward the stairs, I flinched at the sound her foot made on the accelerator, at the way she roared her handsome automobile into the barn.

Knowing that Debbie would not be coming to call me, I had carefully set my alarm, but to my annoyed surprise I was fully conscious long before it was due to ring. I lay there waiting to doze off again. But I came wider and wider awake.

Might as well get up. The house seemed strange; so quiet. I tiptoed down the stairs and, because I was not yet ready for breakfast, went to the library to finish up some work there, then to search the files for a few pages Stan was sure were there somewhere.

"No hurry," he'd said, "but when you start looking, try the bottom drawer. It's all old stuff I chucked in there. I haven't looked at it Savory supper, Brazilian-style...

with 4 Fishermen® Fishsticks

The Premium Brand

2 packages 4 Fishermen Fishsticks • 4 oz. shell macaroni
3 tablespoons fat • ⅓ cup chopped onion • ⅓ cup chopped green pepper
1 clove garlic, minced • 2 8-oz. cans tomato sauce
1 6-oz. can tomato paste • dash of pepper • ¼ teaspoon basil

1. Cook macaroni. 2. Heat 4 Fishermen Fishsticks—they're the premium-quality kind, cut from snow-white center fillets. (It takes 3 pounds of fresh fish to make our ½ lb. package—that's why they taste so good!) 3. Melt fat in skillet and saute onion, green pepper, and garlic until tender, about 5 minutes. Add remaining ingredients and bring to boil. Lower heat and simmer 5 minutes. 4. Drain macaroni. Place bowl with sauce on serving platter. Surround with macaroni, top with fishsticks (mmm—that golden egg-batter crust!) and dribble a little sauce over all. Makes 4 to 5 servings. Look for 4 Fishermen Fishsticks in the 8-oz. or 14-oz. economy package in your grocer's frozen food cabinet. Cost a bit more—but they're worth it. Fulham Brothers, Inc., Boston, Mass.

Special Offer:

For yourself, for gifts—a 4-piece Thermometer and Baster Set for crisp fried foods, taste-tempting candy, perfect roasts. Less than half price! See 4 Fishermen Special Offer ad, page 72.

in years. But it must be there. Just a couple of pages, in pencil on blue letterhead."

I knelt, pawing through the scrambled mess. Seeing the dates, I realized that this was all material from eight and nine years ago, during the time of his first wife's illness when he was either in school or on his first job.

"What are you doing up so early? I thought you were the kid who liked to lounge around in bed until at least seven-thirty."

I looked up at Stanley King. "And I thought you were the kid who always beat the sun up."

"I got home late last night."

And late to bed, I thought. I had heard him and Rika quarreling down in the kitchen long after she'd run down to meet him. "Some filing system you have here."

"Yes, isn't it?" He sat down. "Have you had your breakfast?"

"No."

"Don't you think you better go get it?" he asked.

"It's too early. My stomach isn't awake yet."

"Oh, isn't it?" His bright blue eyes smiled a little.

Out in the hall someone was coming quietly down the stairs. He lifted his head, listening, then turned to look down into the chaos of the open file drawer.

I put the loose papers back into the heavy drawer and pushed it closed, then got to my feet, the faded blue sheets in my hand, "Is this it?"

He glanced at the notation across the corner. "This is it. Thanks, Beth."

"I'm glad we found it. You ought to take a day off and go through all those drawers."

"I've been intending to ——"

And then we heard Debbie. "Daddy ——" The screen door slammed. She came screaming from the back of the house. "Daddy ——"

Stan's chair crashed to the floor. He came swiftly around his desk, caught his daughter as she flung herself into his arms.

"Trixie won't get up! She's got blood in her mouth, and she won't get up!" She shrieked it. "Daddy ——"

"All right, honey. All right. We'll go see." He spoke quietly, but his face was tight. "Here, you stay with Beth."

But she jerked away and followed her father. Isobel Bales came running down the stairs. We hurried out to the barn together.

Trix was lying on her side about two feet from the plywood nursery, a thin trickle of blood at her mouth. Her breathing was so shallow that for a moment I did not think she was breathing at all. The puppies were crying.

"Isobel, get me a blanket or sheet or something." Stan rose and started for his car, parked halfway up the drive where he'd left it the night before. "Beth, call Doc Benson. Tell him we're bringing Trix over."

Isobel and I went running to the house. I got Mrs. Benson almost immediately, and as I was hanging up Rika came down the stairs, tying the ribbons on her sheer housecoat. "What happened?" Her face, bearing marks of cream hastily rubbed away, was anxious. "Is someone hurt?"

"It's Trix. I don't know what happened. Stan's taking her over to the doctor."

"What's the matter with her?"

"I don't know."

When we got out there, Stan was lifting Trix, wrapped in a blanket. "Want me to come with you?" I asked.

"Thanks. If you want to." He put Trix in the back seat and I got in beside her.

"I want to come too." Debbie began to cry again.

Rika reached for her. "No, Debbie, that's no place for you. Stay here, and look after the puppies. They'll miss their mother."

Debbie wrenched away. "I want to go with Trix."

"Try to calm down, then," her father said, sliding under the wheel.

Debbie, her dark eyes still welling tears but her lips resolutely closed, ran around to the other side of the car and got in next to her father. Rika, watching, made a convulsive movement as if to join us, but Mrs. Bales said something and Rika looked down at her night clothes and stepped back again.

Doc Benson came out the side door as we drove into the yard, and led us to a new-looking building behind the house. The room was much like any doctor's examining room, shining instruments, long white-sheeted table.

He took Trix from Stan's arms and laid her on the table.

"I want you to go home, Debbie," he said quietly after a moment. "Take the blanket and go home."

"I want to ——" Debbie stopped when her father touched her shoulder. "Can't I leave the blanket here? When she wakes up she'll smell it's like home, and she won't be lonely."

"You better do as Doc says," Stan said.

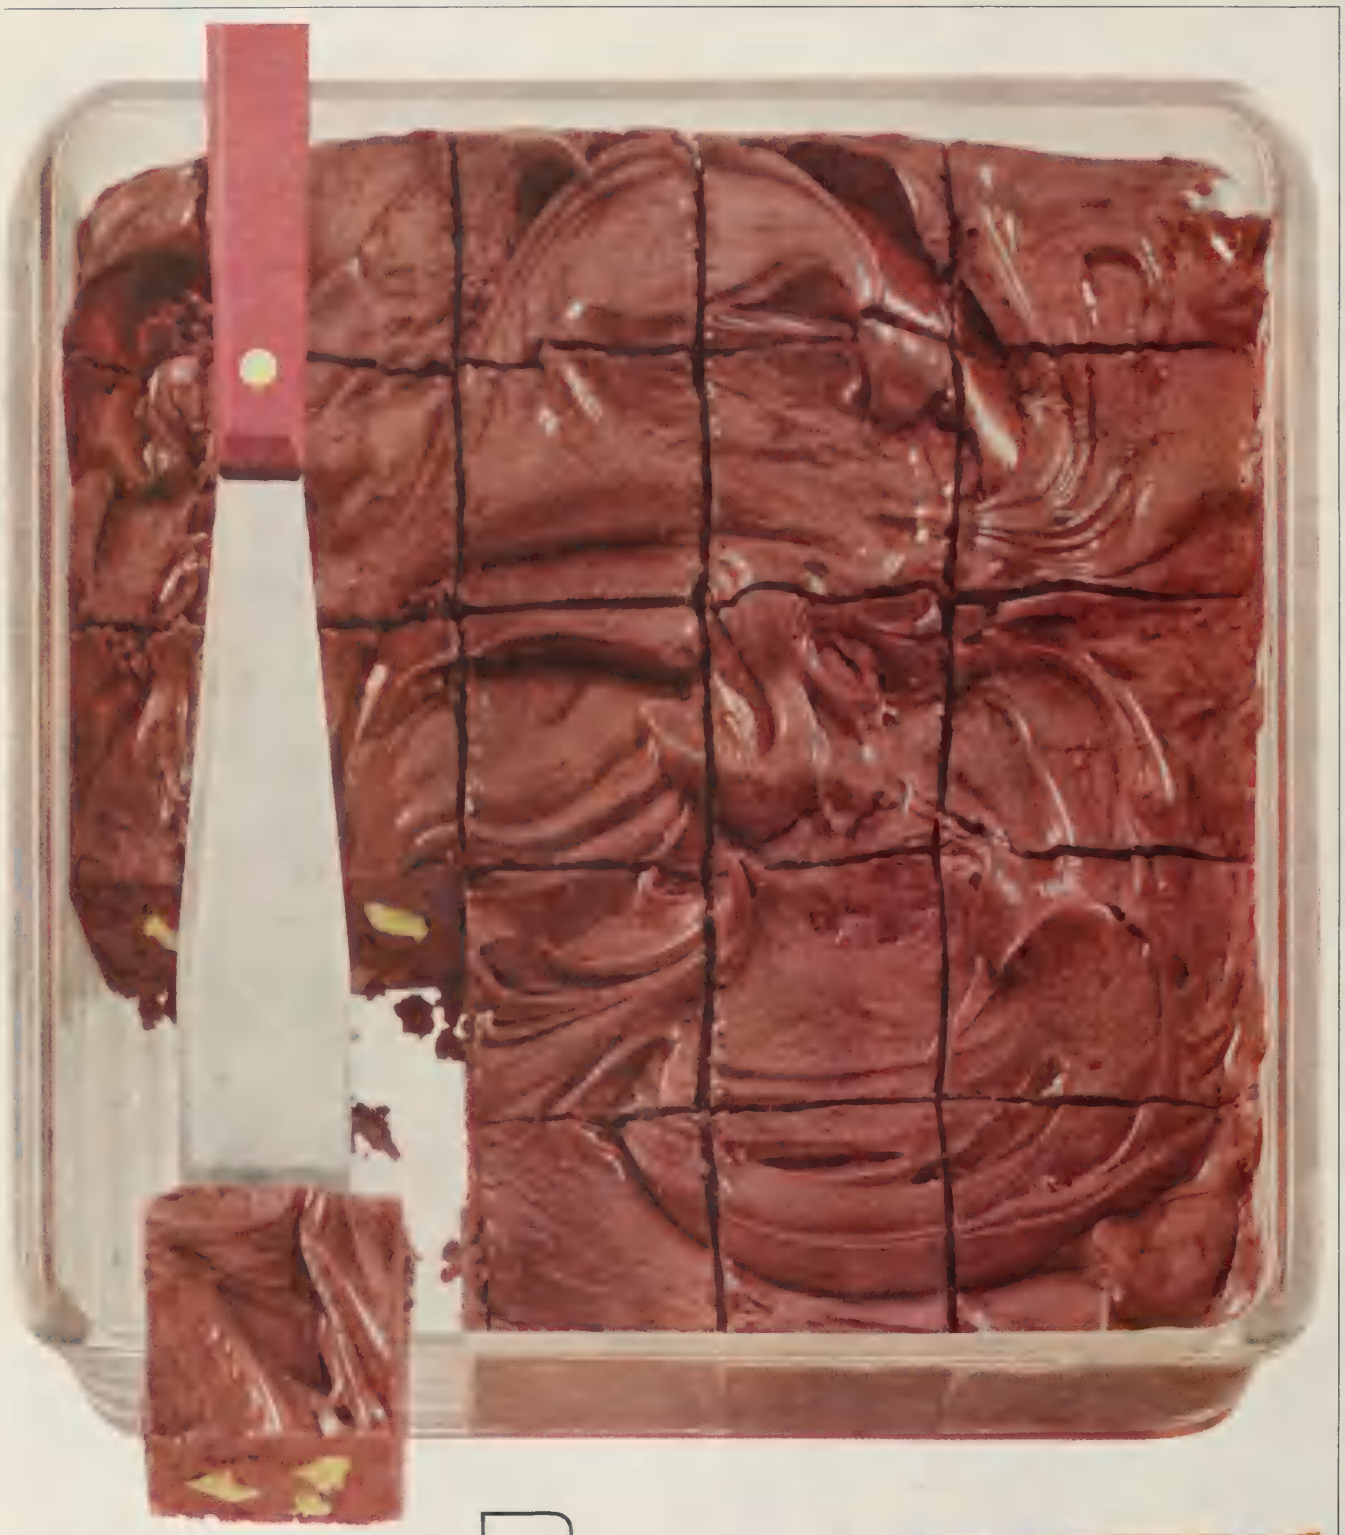
I reached for the blanket and folded it. "Come on, Debbie."

She sat way over on her side of the car all the way home. "See," she said, "I told you something terrible would happen."

"It's a coincidence," I said. "We don't even know what's the matter with Trix yet."

I left the car in the drive, quite a distance from the barn. But even from there we could hear the puppies crying. It had been a long time since they had been fed last.

About an hour later Doc Benson brought Stan home. Doc went out to the barn, but Stan, carrying a paper bag, came directly into the kitchen. "Where's Isobel?"



"Out with the puppies. She's trying to figure out how to keep them warm tonight if Trix has to stay at the vet's."

"I'm going to use the infrared. Here." He thrust the bag in my hands. "Evaporated milk, sirup—here's the formula." He started for the barn, letting the screen door slam behind him.

"Trix can't live," Mrs. Bales said. She came in quietly, closing the screen door, and came to where I was standing at the stove, and looked down into the pan of warm milk. "Internal injuries."

"Internal injuries?" I thought of Debbie. "From the puppies' birth, you mean?"

She shook her head. "No. She was hit by something. Probably a car."

If this isn't the most luscious fudge you've ever made—WE'LL EAT IT!

NESTLÉ'S MARSHMALLOW CREAM FUDGE*

BRING to full boil—stir constantly: one 5 to 10 oz. jar marshmallow cream; ⅔ c. evaporated milk (Nestlé's preferred); ¼ c. butter; 1½ c. sugar; ¼ tsp. salt.

BOIL 5 min. over moderate heat, stirring constantly.

REMOVE from heat. STIR IN till melted: 12 oz (2 c.) Nestlé's® Semi-Sweet Chocolate Morsels; 1 tsp. vanilla; ½ c. nuts, chopped (optional).

POUR in greased pan 8" x 8" x 2".

CHILL well. YIELD: approx. 2¼ lbs.

*P.S. It's so easy!

For Toll House® Cookies and all the things you love in chocolate!

©1956, The Nestlé Company, Inc.

"When? She couldn't have been. She never went any farther away from those puppies than the driveway."

"Yes, I know."

I had always thought, when I heard about the bottle feeding of young animals because their mother could not care for them, that it would be a long and tedious routine. But for us, for Debbie and Isobel Bales and me, it was not tedious and it was not routine.

At two-thirty I returned to the barn. Every three hours, Doc Benson had said.

Stan's car was gone when we went out again at five-thirty with our handfuls of small warm bottles, but there were two old car seats there to sit on, and we could see the heavy-duty lead, not yet plugged in, stretched across the rafters, and the end of it with its flat maroon bulb hanging a few feet above the plywood nursery.

"I wonder what time he intends to turn that contraption on," Mrs. Bales said. "It's warm enough now, heaven knows, but the minute the sun goes down it could get damp in here." She looked at Debbie. "Where did he go?"

"Into town." Debbie reached for one of the puppies. "Something to fix a wire, I guess."

Rika came into the barn then. She stood just inside the wide doors. "I think it's cruel, getting the child's hopes up this way."

I twisted to look at her. "Hopes up about what?"

"You know what I mean. You won't be able to save them. They're much too young to be without a mother."

"We'll save them," Mrs. Bales said, "every last one of them."

Debbie looked at me, her eyes frightened. "They have a mother ——"

There was the crunch of wheels on the drive but Debbie, unhearing, whirled and ran to the socket high on the wall, and picked up the end of the long black lead.

Isobel Bales half rose. "Your dad told you not to touch that!"

"The sun's going down," Debbie cried. Standing on tiptoe, she plugged in the heavy lead. "It's going to get damp ——"

We could hear Stan walking up the drive, could hear Rika running to meet him.

A small brown paper bag in one hand, Rika holding onto his other, he stopped short when he saw the red light glowing. "Who turned that on?" he asked harshly.

"I did, daddy."

"I told you no one was to touch that until I got back!"

"But they have to keep warm. They're too young to be without a mother."

"How many times have I told you!" He roared it, flinging Rika's hand aside. He started toward the child, black brows low. "Don't you ever listen?"

Debbie's eyes widened, but she did not move. "We have to save every last one of them ——" Her voice broke.

He stopped, his face suddenly strange. He went over to the plug and pulled it out. "Honey"—he picked her up, turning to the socket high on the wall of the barn—"honey, do you remember all the times I've told you never to plug in a lead when any part of it is frayed or cut? Look here, right near the plug. See the cut? It must have got caught in something pretty sharp to tear away the covering like that. That's why I went into town, for tape to close it all in again." He reached out with one hand to turn back the heavy black covering on the dangling lead. "See the black and white under here? If you had touched that spot when you plugged in, it could have tossed you clear across the barn."

He put her down gently, then cupped her flushed face in his hand. "Deb, listen to me. I want you to remember this. If you had touched both those wires, if you had been standing on anything wet, or near a pipe, the shock would have killed you."

Rika and I said nothing.

On the way back to the house Mrs. Bales said crossly, "What was he trying to do? Scare the child to death?"

It was the first time I have ever heard her criticize her nephew, and I looked at her in surprise. Under all that anger hadn't she seen the fear in his eyes, the love for the little girl as he picked her up and held her close?

"If it was so dangerous," she said, "he shouldn't have left that thing dangling in the first place."

"He probably thought she couldn't reach it," I told her. "I was surprised to see that she could."

Isobel Bales nodded, forgetting her displeasure. "She is growing fast, isn't she? It's this air, all that swimming."

When I went out to the barn to look, I wanted to be sure that no one else was there. If anyone catches me, I thought as I scrambled into my clothes, I'll say I wakened early and came out to see if the puppies seemed hungry. It could have been an accident, I thought. Perhaps she drove in and hit Trix and then was afraid to tell. Who wouldn't be afraid in her spot? All this hostility around her.

But, remembering that night —— No, it couldn't be. Rika had bathed and changed to the filmy night clothes she always wore, and when she knocked at my door it had been the same as it always was, Rika sitting at the foot of the bed, brushing her hair as we talked. Stan. The current top record. Isobel Bales.

She and Isobel had had another quarrel. I could not remember what it was about. All I could remember now was saying, "Maybe if you worked a little around the house with her, or out in the kitchen, you'd get to know each other better. You might even become friends."

"She doesn't want to be friends," Rika said.

"Well, maybe not. But you could try."

"You don't know Isobel Bales. How would you like to come home from your honeymoon to a house run by somebody else, and a child who began to hate you the minute your wedding ceremony was performed?"

"I wouldn't like it. But I don't think I'd give up trying. I'd take over with the house more if I were you."

"Why? According to law, it's my house; actually it's hers. As long as she has to be here, isn't it easier to let her do as she pleases?"

"She's not always going to be here. She wants to ——"

"—— buy a trailer and tour the country." Rika looked at me scornfully, her brush in mid-air. "Don't tell me you fell for that!"

"That's what she says she wants to do."

"She's been saying that ever since I knew her," Rika told me. "But she's still with us, you'll notice."

Going through the kitchen now, and quietly out the back door into the damp warm morning, I shook my head. Rika could not have hit the dog the night before last because when she came to my room later she had been just as she always was. Gay and laughing one moment, morose and bitter another.

All three cars were in. I went first to Stan's, then to Mrs. Bales', knowing all the time I was putting off something I had to do. Slowly I went to Rika's car. I looked at the bumper and the grill and the headlights, walked around to the back of it, then to the front again. In the dim morning light there was nothing. Nothing!

I went to the light switches and turned them on, and looked again. Every bit of that beautiful car was as shining and unmarked as it had been the first day I saw it.

"There's not a mark on it. I've already looked." I whirled. Stan stood in the doorway. "What were you looking for?"

"I came out to see if the puppies were hungry."

"The puppies," he said, nodding his head, "are over there. Trix died last night."

"Mrs. Bales told me she couldn't ——" I leaned against the fender of Rika's shining car. "I'm sorry, Stan."

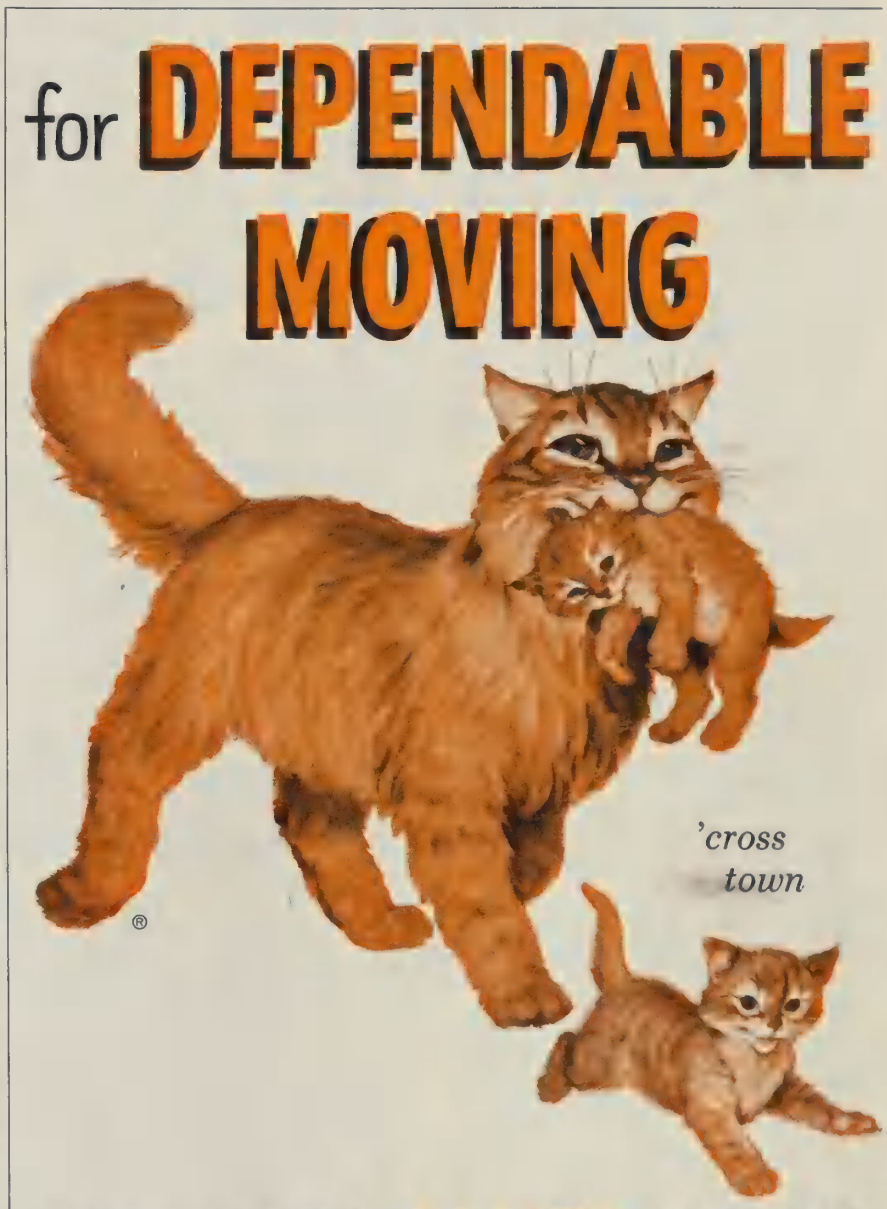
"I haven't told Debbie." He went to the back of the barn and stood looking down at the puppies. "Isobel tells me you came home with Rika from The Corners night before last."

"Yes, a little after ten."

"You were with her, and the headlights were on when you drove into the barn?" he asked.

"The headlights were on, but we didn't drive into the barn. She left the car in the drive near the front door."

"Were the garage doors open, do you remember? Did you see Trix?"



I thought a minute. "The two doors on the right were, but I didn't see the dog." Then I remembered. "She barked, though. I remember hearing her."

NEXT MONTH

Two young strangers in London, in wartime, in love. Cousins—yet strangers. He had crossed an ocean to find her, and now he might lose her. For Wallis lived a life of danger, and Alix was afraid of love. Were they doomed to disaster?

SEARCH FOR AMELIA
By D. K. FINDLAY

condensed novel, complete in the March JOURNAL

"Rika's car wasn't in the drive when I got home. Who put it away? You?"

"Rika did. I reminded her."

"Did you go out with her when she drove it into the barn?"

"No," I said, remembering the sound of the motor as she tore into the barn. "No, I didn't."

"And that's why you're down here now, isn't it? That's why you were looking at her car."

"No, no! I looked at all the cars. I thought one of you might have hit the dog and not even known it."

"Nobody could hit anything as hard as that dog was hit, and not know it."

I looked at him helplessly.

"Do you want to know what happened?"

No. "What?"

"Somebody," he said grimly, "came barreling into this barn and just inside that door"—he pointed to a spot behind Rika's car—"the dog was hit so hard she was thrown into the air and landed over there by the pen. She didn't crawl, because she was hurt so badly she wouldn't have been able to. She was thrown there. Now"—and he lowered his head, looking at me from under angry black brows—"Isobel Bales didn't use her car at all that night. I came in after you and Rika did, and I left mine in the drive. You think about it, and then you tell me. What's the answer?"

At noon Mrs. Bales brought me a sandwich and a glass of milk. "Debbie knows about Trix," she said. "Stanley told her."

"Is she all right?"

"As all right as she can be right now, I guess." She started for the door. "I don't know how any of us are going to forget this thing. Any animal killer, in my opinion, is a potential murderer."

I opened my mouth to say that as yet we had no proof an animal killer existed, then closed it again, letting her go. I knew what her answer would be.

They were so sure it was Rika. Had I done such a thing, accidentally or otherwise, I would have been shaken, unable to face anyone. Was Rika so different? Would she have been able to come to my room afterward, chattering about records, complaining pettily about Isobel Bales?

And last night after a stormy session in the library with Stan, would she have come running up the stairs, tearful, bewildered? "I don't know how it happened, Beth. I hardly ever saw that dog. I had nothing to do with it, but he won't believe me!"

Was it an accident? Or was it something planned, something meant to look as if only Rika could have done it? The death of a cocker spaniel was a minor matter, perhaps, but the cause of it, the motive, if there was one, was not.

Stop thinking about it!

I went back to work. I had begun early, because I wanted to get done in the comparative cool of the morning; to get done before Rika came down. Not that I minded having her there. It was just that I had never worked easily when I knew someone was waiting and watching.

I finished the pile of papers Stan had left for me the night before, and went out into the kitchen. Isobel Bales was at the sink. "All through?"

"For the time being." I picked up a towel and began to dry the dishes.

"You don't have to do that."

"It feels good to stand up."

Stan and Debbie, coming up the path from the pool, let the screen door slam as they came into the kitchen, their suits already dry from the hot sun.

"We're thirsty," Stan said with a heartiness obviously false. "Any lemonade?"

"Just made." Mrs. Bales was busy with hand lotion. "Part lemon, part orange. There's some cold beer there too. Help yourselves."

He looked down at his daughter. "O.K., honeybunch. Lemonade for you; beer for me."

Debbie, at the refrigerator, handed a bronze can to her father, then poured a glass of the fruit mixture for herself.

"Do you want some, Beth?"

"No, thanks. I just had lunch."

She sat down at the table.

Except for the clatter of dishes as I reached up to put them away, the kitchen was quiet. Debbie's small face was full of grief. She had not touched her juice. Suddenly she pushed the glass away. "I like the puppies," she said unsteadily, "but I want Trixie back. I like her the best, and I want her back ——" She put her face down in the crook of her arm.

"I thought we weren't going to talk about it any more." Stan's voice was quiet. "You can't have her back. You told me you understood that."

Knowing that no dog could take the place of her Trix right now, I said, "Little Darling looks like her, Debbie. And she acts like her, too, always wanting to be cuddled ——"

"You don't care about Trixie." Debbie lifted her head. "You don't care if she died." She got up, started for the kitchen door. "You talk soft and nice like that when daddy's around, but you don't mean it. If you hadn't told Rika, Trixie wouldn't be dead right now."

"That isn't true. We still don't know ——"

"It is. It is!" She slammed the screen door, shouting back through it, "It's all your fault! You're just like Rika and it's all your fault——"

"Deb!" Stan started after her.

I reached out impulsively, stopping him, my hand on his arm. "Don't. She has to blame somebody."

I could feel the tautness go from the arm under my fingers, could see the concern going back into hiding in the bright blue eyes. "I thought she was all right. I thought she had accepted it."

"She will. But you can't help her. She'll have to do it all by herself."

I hung up the towels, then started for the front of the house. Stanley King and his household of women. I didn't envy him.

"What did she mean, you're just like Rika?" Carrying his can of beer, he had followed me, and now at the foot of the stairs he looked down at me. "Why did she say if it hadn't been for you Trix wouldn't be dead?"

I told him about the picture, and my promise not to mention it, and Debbie's report about Rika. Breaking all confidences. "I can't believe it," I finished, "but Debbie seems to."

"Why can't you believe it?"

"I don't know. I've spent so much time with Rika ——" I lifted my shoulders helplessly. "I just can't, that's all."

We stood for a moment in silence. I stared down at the first step of the stairs, feeling his eyes watching me. I said, "Out in the kitchen Debbie said I talked soft and nice only when you were around. That's what she called it, soft and nice." I looked up at him. "That isn't true."

"I know it. Beth?"

I had started to turn away.

"Beth, just a few minutes ago you reminded me that for now she has to blame someone, has to strike out at somebody."

"I wouldn't have cared if she'd struck out at me. But I don't like it when she says something about me that isn't true."

"I wouldn't either, but maybe right now she's fooled herself into thinking it is true. It's a funny thing about people, Beth; children included. They want to know who's on their side, and they want to be sure they'll stay there. Why don't you go talk to her?"

"I can't."

"Why not?"

"I can't talk to her any more. At first we had so much fun together, then all of a sudden ——"

"Sure." He looked down at the can of beer in his hand. "The same old pattern."

"What same old pattern?" Rika, crisp in beautifully fitted Bermudas, started down from the top of the stairs. "What are you two lovely people conniving down there?"

Stan turned. Then, flatly, "Did you take Debbie's picture?"

"What *picture?" She stopped where she was, her smile fading. "She won't let me take even one shot of her any more."

"That isn't what I mean, and you know it. Did you take the picture of Debbie's mother from Debbie's room?"

"No, of course not. Why should I?" She looked from him to me. "What's the matter?"

"Debbie said I was responsible for the dog's death, and Stan asked ——"

But Stan was going up the stairs, stopping below her, his eyes level with hers. "Did you threaten to destroy that picture if Debbie showed it to anyone?"

"No. I didn't even know she had it."

"Yes, you knew she had it. She showed it to you the first time she ever saw you."

"But I didn't know she still had it. I didn't know it until the other night when Beth and I were talking."

"Did you take that picture and destroy it when you found out Deb wasn't doing what you told her to do?"

"No." She leaned away from him, her back against the railing. "Why should I care about a picture?"

"That's what I'd like to know. But you do care, don't you? Anything that doesn't have Rika's name on it, Rika doesn't want. And what Rika doesn't want, Rika tries to get rid of! Right?"

Rika, both hands on the rail behind her, stared at him. "You don't believe me. No matter what I say, you don't believe me. It's always her word against mine."

"It's always your word against everybody's. Sure, I believe her. Why not? A child with no devious axes to grind?"

"That's the way you always are." Rika began to weep. "Always it's my fault. What about your daughter; have you ever thought about her? Or Isobel? Or Beth? Even Beth, here. Not one of them would be calling my home theirs if you treated me the way you should. I'm the one you should be thinking of—I'm your wife. I should be the most important person in your whole life. Am I? Was I ever?"

She cried that last out despairingly, and with a convulsive move tried to turn away. But Stan caught her wrist, holding her fast. "Every time you have a question to answer, you cry and get us arguing about something else. But you never, I've noticed, answer the question of the moment. Now ——"

"You don't love me—you don't trust me —— Why did you ever marry me?"

With a fresh flood of tears Rika tried again to pull away from him, then with a sudden frenzied movement threw herself against him, trying to push past him on the stairs. Off balance, Stan reached instinctively for her, dropping his can of beer as she started to fall. He caught her, his back thudding against the newel post as she jammed against him, her face hitting the railing above him.

He steadied her, his hands firm and hard on her arms. She pushed him away. "You're not anywhere near the kind of husband I'd thought you'd be. Not like my father or my stepfather ——" Weeping hard now, she put one hand to the side of her face that had hit the railing. "And if you don't believe me about Debbie's picture, you go up to Debbie's room and look! If it isn't there, I don't know where it is. Debbie can lie and lie about me, and you always believe her. But I didn't take it, you hear! I didn't take it!" Sobbing, she whirled and fled to her room.

We stood looking after her. Then Stan bent to pick up the can that lay in a puddle at the foot of the stairs. "You better go see if she's hurt."

Without a word I went past him and up the stairs.

Rika did not answer when I knocked, but I went in anyway. She was lying on the bed, a washcloth tight to her face, a box of tissues beside her.

"Rika?" I went over to the bed and sat on the edge of it. "Does it hurt?"

She had stopped crying, but now her eyes filled with tears. She turned away from me.

I reached down and turned her face back toward me, taking the hot cloth away, seeing the pink welt that started on the bridge of her nose, skipped, then finished on one high cheekbone. "We'd better put something cold on this. It's coldness that keeps the swelling down. Do you think I ought to call a doctor?"

She shook her head. "No. I thought it was warmth that took the swelling down."

"No. Cold."

She was silent as I went into her bathroom and ran the water until it came icy, then wrung out the washcloth and brought it back to her.

"I'm sorry about this," I said. "Debbie made a statement and Stan started asking questions and at the moment it seemed better to explain. I thought—well, sometimes if things are talked out everybody ends up understanding everybody else, and there's no problem."

"It doesn't work out that way here. You've seen how he gets ——"

I didn't say anything, and in the short silence we could hear Stan coming up the stairs.

"He's probably going to Debbie's room," Rika said bitterly, "to look for that picture. Why don't you go with him? Go on," she said impatiently, "show him where it is, or where it was. You know better than I do."

I didn't want to go, but she insisted, and when I went out into the hall, that was where Stan was. In Debbie's room, in front of the windows with all the little dolls, his back toward me.

"Rika wants me to help you find the picture," I said awkwardly.

"I found it." He turned, holding out one hand. The picture had been taken from its frame and torn across and across and across. Eight pieces.

It took me a minute. "Who did that!"

"I could tell you, but you wouldn't believe me. Or have you heard that song before?" He went over to Debbie's bed and sat down on the edge of it. "We know Rika didn't do it because she says so. Isobel didn't do it, because why

CONTINUED ON PAGE 107

"He looks just like Preston when I tell him I've bought a new dress."

Emotional Tensions

drain your skin of beauty oils — every day

Skin authorities say the emotional tensions of everyday life can drain your skin of its own beauty-giving fluids. That's why by evening, your skin looks drawn and dry.

The puppy tracks in mud...

Baby upsets the bath powder

. . . Your nerves jangle . . .

as the youngsters wrangle!

Pond's exclusive formula replaces the beauty oils that tension drains away

Oh—what a blissful feeling—when Pond's brings your beauty alive again!

As you cream and cleanse your skin with Pond's Cold Cream—you relax luxuriously—tension lines fade. Taut skin smooths out. A wonderful softness steals over your whole face.

Deep-cleanses to let beauty oils in

Today, your skin is thirstier than ever for Pond's rich "beauty oil" formula. As it deep-cleanses, Pond's replaces the softening oils your skin has lost through the "rush" hours of your day.

This is the beauty extra that Pond's Cold Cream gives you—the surge of excitement you feel as your skin glows with fresh renewed radiance. He'll notice it, too, when you're close enough to kiss.

You need never be too busy to be beautiful. Let Pond's Cold Cream work this magic for you—tonight.

Today—in 37 seconds—bring out the beauty that is naturally yours

You need never be too busy to be beautiful

Enter the 1958

SINGER $125,000 Sewing Contest

You don't have to be an expert! Every woman has a chance!

HERE's a wonderful chance to "sew up" a fortune . . . by entering the third annual SINGER Sewing Contest!

Simply enroll in the Home Dressmaking Course at your local SINGER SEWING CENTER. You'll make your contest entry dress while you learn to sew.

There'll be a prize winner at every SINGER SEWING CENTER, and winning dresses then will be judged on a Regional level. The Regional winners get a free trip to New York for the Grand-Prize "Sew-Off"!

At the "Sew-Off" each contestant will make a dress for a model. And grand prizes will be awarded at an exciting fashion show!

Don't miss out on the fun, friends and sewing thrills this big contest offers. Enroll at your SINGER SEWING CENTER starting January 2. (Complete course of 8 lessons . . . 20 full hours . . . costs only $20.) Enroll soon before the popular "contest" classes are filled . . . it may be your first step to the big Grand-Prize of $25,000.

NOTE: Contest is open to every woman 18 or over in U.S. and Canada except professionals in dressmaking or fashion, sewing teachers, previous "Regional" winners, persons (or members of their families) who are engaged in the manufacture, sale, advertising, or service of sewing machines.

Here are the 3 top '57 winners. Models in the front row are wearing the outfits that won (left to right) 1st, 2nd, and 3rd grand prizes. Standing behind each winning garment is the contestant who made it, wearing the dress she made while taking instruction in a SINGER SEWING CENTER. Winners are (left to right) Mrs. C. Bishop, Calif.; Mrs. M. Rasmussen, Ore.; Mrs. H. Chooljian, N. Y.

1st GRAND PRIZE.. $25,000

2nd Grand Prize . . . $10,000

3rd Grand Prize . . . $5,000

4th Grand Prize . . . $2,500

5th Grand Prize . . . $1,500

30 Honorable Mentions—$250 each

PLUS . . . Free trip to New York City for the 35 regional 1st-prize winners . . . to compete in the "Sew-Off."

35 Regional 1st-prize winners—A Cabinet-Model SINGER* Slant-O-Matic Sewing Machine.

Over 1,700 Local Prizes—4-piece set of SINGER* Pinking Shears and Scissors worth $30.

New Special Division

for ages 18 through 25

Young homemakers and homemakers-to-be!
Besides a chance to win the "Sew-Off" you also automatically compete in your own special division. You can win a Grand Prize and a Young Homemaker National Prize as well as a Regional and a Local Prize.

1st NATIONAL PRIZE $5,000

2nd National Prize $2,500

3rd National Prize $1,500

4th National Prize $1,000

Regional Prizes. SINGER Slant-Needle Portable Sewing Machines.

Local Prizes. Practical, luxurious, two-level, fitted sewing cases.

NOTE: Contestants 18 thru 25 are eligible to win both ■ Grand Prize and ■ Young Homemaker National Prize but are eligible only for one Regional, one Local Prize.

Don't delay. Get your entry blank with complete rules at your

SINGER SEWING CENTER

Listed in your phone book under SINGER SEWING MACHINE CO.

*A trademark of THE SINGER MANUFACTURING CO.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 104

should she? I know Deb didn't do it." He looked at me. "Maybe it was you."

"Stan, listen." I sat down on the bed next to him. "Has it ever occurred to you that your little girl has had a lot of upsets in her young life? Did you ever think she might be fibbing a little?"

"Do you call a thing like this a fib?" He opened his fingers over the torn pieces in his hand. Then: "Fib. That's Rika's word."

"No, it isn't. With children it's a word most everybody uses. Your Debbie—she was your whole life until you married Rika. Don't you think she just might resent that a little?"

"She never resented my marriage. She resents Rika."

"But you can't lose your perspective. You asked me before, and I think you're asking me now. Rika's not perfect. Who is? You think something ought to be done, and I do too. I don't know what, but somebody ought to do something."

"What? Name it."

"I can't. But certainly Debbie wants a mother. And certainly Rika wants to be a mother to her ——"

"Oh, for the love of heaven!"

The way he turned away from me! "Stan?"

"Beth, there are forms of cruelty that someone like you would never recognize because you couldn't bring yourself to believe it. You assume all the people you know are pretty much like you, and most of them are, but once in a while you come up against somebody ——" Leaning forward on the edge of the bed, his elbows on his knees, he looked down at the torn fragments in his hand. "Funny how you can get fooled, isn't it?"

"Fooled, or just plain stupid."

"Or just plain wanting love, the real kind, thinking you have it." He straightened, reaching into his hip pocket for his wallet. He put the torn pieces into it. "Maybe because you're a woman you know more about women and little girls than I do. But there's one thing I do know. Debbie doesn't remember her mother, but she loves her. And it isn't because I've been filling her full of my own memories. I've tried not to do that. I always answer her questions, but she has to live in the here and now, and that's the way I want it for her." His bright blue eyes were steady. "Deb never would have taken the photograph of her mother's face and torn it into eight pieces."

Eight pieces.

I had heard about his cruelty, and I had seen him in his rage. Now I wanted to put my arms around him. I did not move. "No," I said, "of course she didn't."

Although I had often longed for a leisurely, uninterrupted evening of reading, I grew uneasy when Rika did not come to my room for her usual nighttime chat. Her record player was going, but I had not heard her moving around in her room and I began to wonder if her fall had injured her more seriously than we'd thought.

At ten, after a string recording of the record "Diane" repeated itself several times, I knocked at her door.

"I heard that record playing over and over again," I told her. "I wondered if you were all right."

"I'm all right. I was just too lazy to get up and change it. Did it bother you?"

"No, not at all."

"Or maybe you don't like that record. Turn it off, if you like."

I turned the thing off and went over to her. She was lying in bed, curled on her side, the bruised side of her face cupped in the washcloth in her hand on the pillow. With her right hand she had been dating photographs in the big black album on the bed beside her.

"Has the swelling gone down any?" I took the cloth from her face. "It doesn't do any good to hold this to your face if it gets warm. I'll go down and make you an ice pack."

"No, don't. It won't do any good. Look how dark it's turning. I think I'm getting a black eye too."

She turned toward the lamp and I bent to look. "You sure are. Does it hurt?"

"It throbs, but not as bad as before," she told me. "Just half a headache now." She moved back on the bed. "Want to see some pictures?" she asked.

The phone rang as I sat down on the edge of the bed, and I stood up again.

"Don't go. I'll make it short, whoever it is." Then, into the phone: "Yes? . . . Oh, hello, Minnie. . . . No, of course I'm all right. Why should anything be the matter? . . . No, Beth is here. . . . Yes, I'll be down to see you as soon as I can. . . . Yes, good night, Minnie." Rika smiled as she hung up. "What did I tell you? Short but sweet."

"Things certainly get around in a hurry, don't they?"

"What things?"

"Your fall this afternoon. Wasn't that what she called about?"

She shook her head. "She's always like that. If she doesn't see me every day or so, boom goes her imagination and she's got me sick or dying or something." She reached for the album and turned it sideways so that we both could see. "Here," she said, starting at the beginning, "here I am as a baby."

"Cute. Who's that holding you?"

"My mother."

"My, wasn't she beautiful!"

"And here I am at three. Notice the Shirley Temple curls. Shirley's older than I am, but my mother thought Shirley Temple was —— And here ——"

The first few pages of the album were filled with pictures of Rika as a baby and then of Rika as a little girl. Rika with her beautiful stately mother; Rika with the tired little man who had been her father; Rika with the stout,

Nothing hurts more than the friendly letter that one never got around to writing. BRENDAN FRANCIS hearty-looking man who had been her stepfather. And always in the pictures the people next to the little girl, Rika, were smiling down at her as she smiled into the camera.

There were years of pictures missing of Rika around ten and in her early teens, then began inevitable boarding-school and college ones with a succession of "best" friends. "It was hard for me to keep a girl friend in those days," Rika said simply. "Boys are very important at that age, and you know how girls are."

I nodded, ignoring the small prick of annoyance that seemed to come lately when she made a remark like that. Rika was lovely, and probably there were some of her classmates who'd just as soon have her elsewhere when their favorite beaux came to call.

"Here's the first one I ever took of Stan." Rika pointed to a blurry snapshot of a man coming from a wide, flat-faced building. "I waited outside for him that noon and then I called to him and got him by surprise. How he used to laugh at me and my camera . . ." Her words trailed off, and as she continued to turn the pages, she grew more and more quiet.

Not that there was any need for her to talk, to explain. Every page was a record of her growing romance: the day she and Stan had gone walking and stopped to take turns with the camera, the picnics. And, farther on, the times they had taken Debbie to the zoo, to the beach, Debbie's face reflecting the glow in Rika's. Obviously they were close and loving companions then.

What happened to change all that? I wondered.

Rika seemed to sense what I was thinking and suddenly she pushed the big book toward me. "You finish it. I don't want to look any more."

"I will. Maybe tomorrow." I closed the album and stood up and put it on the table. "You better get some rest."

"Please don't go, Beth. I'm not tired, just kind of discouraged."

I hesitated. Now that I knew she was all right, I wanted to get back to my book. And because of her change of mood brought on by the photograph album, I knew that if I stayed I would be in for another evening of unhappy reminiscences. It was not that I did not sympathize. It was just that I knew there was nothing I could do or say that would help her.

Suddenly I thought of a little girl I used to play with long ago when none of the other children would. Such a lonely child, that one had been, wanting friendship so badly, yet refusing to share her toys, never knowing why the others had shut her out. And once when I had tried in my bumbling way to explain, she had thrown part of her building set at me and hit me on the cheek, and then she had cried.

I said, "I think I'll go down for something cool to drink. Can I bring you something?"

"All right. A little ginger ale, please, as long as you're going down."

I went to my room for an ice bag, then, holding on to the rail, went quietly down the dim stairs.

In the lower hall I saw a light coming from the kitchen. Stan was there in front of the windows at the kitchen table. There was the inevitable yellow pad in front of him, rye bread and cheese on a plate, and a can of beer.

He looked up when I came in. "Want some?" He nodded toward his sandwich. "Take half of that. It's my third."

"No, thanks. I just want something to drink." I went to the refrigerator. "Rika's face is terribly swollen. I'm afraid it's turning black and blue."

"That's too bad. She should have called a doctor." He went back to his writing and in silence I filled the ice bag, poured the ginger ale. He should be the one doing this, I thought. If it were Debbie whose face was bruised —— Then I thought, In all fairness, who got so busybodyish about Rika? Who took it upon herself to poke her head into that lonely-seeming room with cheery word of what-to-do?

I took the ice bag and the ginger ale up to Rika and after a little more depressing talk went back to my own room. Rika kept playing that record, "Diane," over and over again. Yawning, I puzzled over that. If I had been Rika, for Stan's sake and for my own, I would not have had that record in my collection.

I fell asleep wondering how she could like it so much.

Debbie had taken to calling me early again, but until Mrs. Appleblossom returned—to the shelf of my closet this time—I was not sure whether it was because she wanted me, or the supervision that was a must for her early swim.

Even then I could not be sure. Was she, as Rika once wondered, an unhappy, calculating child, wise beyond her years? Or was she just the normal, lovable youngster that she seemed to be?

She was devoted to the pups.

"Did you see the playpen daddy built for them, Beth? He used two-by-fours and chicken wire. Come and see it." She led me out to a spot under some locust trees next to the barn.

I looked down at the puppies, taking their afternoon naps. Round, they were; their coats gleaming. And as Debbie had often pointed out, their ears were fast becoming a respectable cocker length.

"Look how they eat." She pointed to an empty tin dish in one corner of the pen. "Milk and baby food and everything. They even like cod-liver oil," she added incredulously.

Mrs. Bales was just as enthusiastic about the pups, loved them almost as dearly, but she had her other moments too. Most of the time she was as easy to get along with as anyone I had ever known, but let Rika come into the room or let Rika's name come into the conversation, and immediately Isobel Bales was hostile.

One morning, coming out into the big hall with her dustcloth, she stood watching as Rika and I parted, as Rika went up the stairs. "Still the dearest of friends, I see."

"Her face looks terrible."

"For the first time in her life. Me, I think it will do her good." She eyed me sardonically. "You feel sorry for her, don't you?"

"Not exactly sorry. But she is young and probably a little spoiled, and she has no idea what ——"

"It looks to me as if you're going to be a big disappointment around here."

"What does that mean?"

Funeral Directors Say: THE Wilbert® BURIAL VAULT

Other Models Available

Used for over 1¼ MILLION interments. Made of thick, precast asphalt and reinforced concrete. Quality controlled! Guaranteed! It's true peace-of-mind protection! Send for FREE booklet, "Facts every family should know about funerals and interments". Write Wilbert, Box 147-J, Forest Park, Ill.

Wilbert—the Foremost Name in Burial Vaults

® Trade Mark of Wilbert W. Haase Co.

Callouses

Pain, Burning, Tenderness?

SUPER-FAST RELIEF!

Removes Hard, Thick Callouses

Apply soft, soothing, deeply cushioning, heart-shaped Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads on the sensitive spots and you'll have Super-fast relief. Used with the wonder-working separate Medications included, Zino-pads remove callouses one of the quickest ways known to medical science! Try them. Sold everywhere.

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

ENJOY YOUR VACATION IN ONTARIO

- Just across the Great Lakes
- Lakes and Rivers everywhere—over 250,000
- Fine beaches for the kiddies
- Good highways—accommodations—food

Send for FREE illustrated brochure now!

ONTARIO

Canada's Variety Vacationland

Denise McDonald, Ontario Travel Hostess, Room 257, Parliament Bldgs., Toronto 2, Ont.

NAME.....

STREET.....

CITY.....STATE.....

PLEASE PRINT

She shrugged, bent to her dusting. "If you haven't figured it out by this time, you're not the girl I thought you were."

"What are you trying to tell me? Why don't you just say it?"

"Because you wouldn't listen."

"I might, if I knew what you were getting at."

"No, you wouldn't. You believe what you want to. I don't hold that against you, but in a real crisis people like you aren't much help."

And that's all I could get out of her. Questions, and I tried all kinds—but that, or the equivalent, was all I ever got out of her after one of those remarks of hers.

The last week in July Stan left by plane to interview a young manufacturer in the Middle West. "I wish this thing had jelled a little sooner," he said, his blue eyes troubled, "or maybe later. I didn't want to leave right now."

"Why not? I thought you wanted this assignment."

"I did. I do." He sat on the edge of his desk, rubbing his thumb absently over the rubber-tipped end of a long yellow pencil. He looked at me. "Have you ever worried about—well, about anything, knowing you must be wrong, but afraid that maybe you're not?"

I shook my head. "I can't imagine you being afraid of anything."

"Well, I am, and I don't know what to do about it. Sometimes I think I'm the one who's going nuts."

"I wouldn't worry about that if I were you."

"You haven't the faintest idea what I'm talking about."

I hesitated. He looked tired. "You go on, catch your plane," I said. "There's no reason why you shouldn't."

It did not take long to finish up the work Stan had left for me and then, because Debbie had been invited to the Bensons' while her father was away, and because for some reason I was too restless to read, for the first time since I had come to the Kings' I found time heavy on my hands. Isobel Bales was not much company. She spent most of her late afternoons and evenings in front of the television set.

Rika, depressed and unhappy, was no bargain as a companion either. "I look awful," she said over and over again. "How long do you suppose it will take to go away?"

And, looking at the bruised cheek, the blackened eye, I could only shake my head. "I don't know. That swelling should have been gone long ago. And why is your eye still so black? I think you ought to see a doctor."

"It's too late for that now. I should have listened to you in the beginning. I hate looking like this."

"Why don't you try to hide it with make-up?"

I wondered what she found to do all day. I knew her schedule, of course: the leisurely scented baths, the manicures and shampoos, the carefully measured time under the sun lamp. But those activities did not seem enough to fill a day.

Late one afternoon as I passed her open door she called out to me. She sounded a little cheerier, but when I went in I saw immediately that she was still in her emotional low, and I felt again that faint curious nudge of disappointment. Rika gay was so different from a Rika not gay.

"Where are you off to?" I asked.

"A drive. A walk. I don't know."

She was wearing another of those crisp low-cut cottons that emphasized the line of smooth golden shoulders, that set off the smooth tanned legs to perfection.

"You look wonderful."

"Oh, yes. Just take a good close look at me." But she smiled a little.

"What's a black eye? Why don't you put on a pair of dark glasses and forget it?"

"Wouldn't dark glasses call attention to it? But it doesn't matter. I'm not going anywhere important, just down to see Minnie. She keeps calling and I thought I might as well set her mind at ease. She worries so."

"Minnie and her worries. I think I'd get pretty bored with that after a while."

She shrugged. "Minnie has considered herself my closest friend ever since we came here to live," she said, "but now you are here, and I suspect she thinks she isn't my closest friend any longer. Just between you and me, that's all there is to it, but there's no point in hurting her feelings."

"No, I suppose not." Minnie had not seemed that type at all. "Will you be able to drive all right?"

"Yes, thanks, Beth."

"Do you mind if I come along?" I asked impulsively. "I'd love a frosty chocolate malted right now."

Maybe she hesitated, and maybe it was my imagination. "I'd love it," she said. "And you drive. I know you've been dying to."

I checked to see that the puppies were where they ought to be before I backed the car out. "They're in the playpen. Let's go see them."

"Not now."

"They're awful cute, Rika. You should see how they've grown. And intelligent! I've never seen such ——"

But she shook her head, smiling. "You're incurable. Anything little and helpless."

I dropped it. There are people who like animals, and there are people who do not.

I had thought, as we drove, that she would continue to grow more cheerful. But the nearer we got to The Corners, the more quiet, the more dispirited she became. "Why can't I get enthusiastic about things the way you do? There must be something the matter with me."

"You don't even try."

"I do, too, try. I can't help how I feel. I know I have a lot of faults—I hear about them all the time—but I'm no hypocrite."

"Nobody said you were. You asked me a question and I answered it. Let's forget it."

The gray-haired sisters, all three of them, greeted her affectionately. And at first they laughed at the dark glasses.

"You're going Hollywood on us," Minnie Pruitt said, reaching out for them. "I've always said that's where you ought to be."

All three gasped as the glasses came away.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 110

How to Dress Well on Practically Nothing!

Fair the Forecast...

. . . and equally as promising the outlook for Barbara J.'s spring wardrobe. Until now, Barbara has dipped only gently into spring buying with her one investment of bright silk separates. Now . . . her fashion plotting thickens, and she concentrates on her next investment of important spring basics. Determined not to be led astray by a hasty purchase of the first glamorous confection she sees, she shops the stores, carefully considers colors and fabrics and takes into consideration what she already has in her wardrobe.

With her planning behind her, she goes straight ahead to spring and invests several fashion $'s. The purchase comes in parts, each part a definite basic in her wardrobe. Together, they form a costume (practically a whole wardrobe!) complete.

By BET HART

The three parts of Barbara's new investment? A beige jersey jacket fully lined in taffeta to retain the pretty shape; a black rayon-shantung pleated skirt made from Vogue Pattern No. 9336; and a white cotton blouse, a crisp spring touch. Here Barbara's accent is red—her velveteen bag she bought last September and the brightest flower imaginable.*

For back view, sizes and price, see page 135.*

The first springlike day, Barbara wears her new costume. If winter weather lingers, but Barbara feels like spring, the costume would look pretty under her red or her beige full-length coat from preceding seasons. Here Barbara carries her beige clutch bag, adds a yellow scarf—the color, a definite sign of spring.

Taking each part of her costume separately, Barbara has further ideas for all. Barbara combines her new separates with her pink-and-red print ones from last month. One of her very favorite combinations: her checked shirt and new black skirt. Over all and cinched in with her black belt, her cherry cardigan.

The shirt is tailored, but with a very delicate air. Barbara's new one is in white cotton, double-breasted and with tiny tucks down the front. Barbara likes the three-quarter sleeves and cuffs. This combination—one of the brightest of all—her new blouse and checked skirt from last month. Barbara wears her red belt, gold chain from December and feels it adds up to a very pretty party mood.

Barbara's fashion addition in $'s is as easy as one, two, three....

1.	Beige jersey jacket	$12.95
2.	Black shantung skirt	9.85
3.	White cotton blouse	3.95
		$26.75

Suit by Davidow ■ Hat by J. Frederics.

Red Cross Shoes

FEATURED IN CANADA AS GOLD CROSS SHOES

TWINKLE

SORRENTO

DRESSMAKER

The slender tapered pump is even prettier in patent

One look at their sleek, flattering lines and you're in love with these springtime pumps . . . so beautifully expressed in gleaming patent. Especially irresistible with their supremely feminine but serenely simple decoration. Any pair you choose provides a most becoming picture of your foot. And of course they fit as only a Red Cross Shoe can.

Largest selling brand of fine footwear in the world. Styles from 10^{95} to 13^{95}

THIS PRODUCT HAS NO CONNECTION WHATEVER WITH THE AMERICAN NATIONAL RED CROSS • THE UNITED STATES SHOE CORPORATION, CINCINNATI 7, OHIO

†TRADEMARK *PATENT APPLIED FOR

NEVER AGAIN NEED YOU SUFFER FROM LEG FATIGUE!

NOW! THE ELASTIC SHEER NYLON STOCKING* DESIGNED TO SUPPORT!

You've never worn a stocking like Supp-Hose! It's the first fashion sheer nylon support stocking designed to relieve leg fatigue—and it contains no rubber. Every stitch is nylon—nylon with a special twist that gives it a truly elastic quality to lift and support tired leg muscles.

LOOKS LIKE ANY FASHION SHEER NYLON!

Supp-Hose is a new source of fashionable support for housewives, expectant mothers, working women, and women who suffer from varicose veins. Try a pair—see how good your legs will look and feel. And no one will know you're wearing them!

A VERY ECONOMICAL STOCKING!

Supp-Hose costs just one-third what you'd expect to pay. One pair of Supp-Hose should give you 5 times the wear of ordinary nylons. Ask for Supp-Hose in your favorite brand at stores everywhere. Available in proportioned sizes: beige, natural, white.

4.95 pair

Supp-hose†

Available in your favorite brand

CHESTER H. ROTH CO., INC., SUPP-HOSE INC. • 200 MADISON AVE., NEW YORK 16, N. Y.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 108

Minnie cupped Rika's face in one hard square hand. "How did this happen?"

Rika, flustered at the older woman's intensity, pulled away, sending a quick glance to me. "It—it was an accident, Minnie. I ——"

"She fell on the stairs," I said.

"Fell? And she looks like this?" Minnie's hazel eyes were hard. She looked back at Rika. "What did you do, land on your face?"

"Well, no, not exactly. I was standing on the edge of ——"

I couldn't understand Minnie's anger. "She slipped on the edge of a step," I said, "and hit her face on the railing."

Minnie did not look at me. She was watching Rika. "Who else was on them stairs when you fell?"

Rika hesitated. "Stan," she said finally. Then, "Minnie, I told you, it was an accident. Come on, let's have a Coke." She scurried over to the square white box behind me. I heard her lifting the cover, reaching in.

Minnie did not move. "Was anybody else there when you had this fall?" Minnie wanted to know. "Besides you and him?"

"Yes. Beth was. She was right there at the foot of the stairs."

There was silence then, and I saw Minnie Pruitt looking past me at Rika, a long hard look. After a moment Rika said, "Beth wants a chocolate malted, Minnie."

The subject of Rika's fall was abruptly dropped. Minnie went behind the fountain to get my malted, and then we went back to the table under the white-globed light and sat down.

But it was not the way it had been that other time. The laughter now was forced, the talk punctuated with long silences. Each sister was busy with her own thoughts.

Their eyes on Rika's bruised face were full of concern, and as they realized her dejection their concern seemed to deepen.

"Alvin and his brother was in last night," Minnie said. "Alvin's brother has a new girl."

"Oh, dear," Rika said. "What happened to his old one?"

"I don't know. Last I heard she's planning to shoot herself."

"What a terrible way to do it." Rika smiled faintly. "Think how messy."

The three sisters, happy to hear her talking again, smiled back at her. "There must be a neater way," one of the older ones agreed.

"Electrocution," Rika said. "That's the best."

"Don't say it like that!" Minnie Pruitt looked at her. "We're supposed to be kidding."

"I'm not. I mean it. If I ever wanted to commit suicide, that's the way I'd do it. I'd drop a radio in the bathtub while I was in it, or an iron. Think how painless, how easy ——"

Minnie and her sisters were horrified. "You shouldn't even think such things ——"

Rika gave another faint smile. "Oh, I'm just talking. Ask Beth. We talk about things like that all the time."

I looked at her, my face full of nothing. When had we ever talked about that?

"Oh, Beth, you know!" She was suddenly impatient. "All that advice we're always getting from Stan about electricity. Don't you remember the time he compared the gas chamber to the electric chair?"

I shook my head.

"There, you see? You never listen." She looked around at the three women, then back at me again. "Stan distinctly told us one night—I think it was after a television story—that the gas chamber was the crueler of the two because it chokes people to death. Electrocution is just a matter of seconds."

"He never told me that," I said. "I didn't know that."

"But you were there," she said.

"No, I wasn't." I pushed my empty glass away from me. "You've got your stories mixed."

What I meant, of course, was that she had got her people mixed. But the sisters didn't like my saying that. I could tell by their silence, the way their mouths tightened.

Come to think of it, they had not liked much of anything about me ever since we had talked about Rika's fall on the stairs.

Rika reached out to me suddenly, touching my hand. "You're probably right, Beth. Maybe I do have it all mixed up." She glanced down at her tiny diamond-studded watch. "Goodness! It's dinnertime!"

The three sisters came to the door with us, urging Rika to come again soon, ignoring a group of young girls who waited, chattering, at the soda fountain.

I went out to the convertible while Rika paused with Minnie in the doorway.

"Was he drinking?" Minnie said, low.

"Yes."

Head down, my hand on the key, I paused.

"Was he drunk?"

"I don't know," Rika said. "He had a can of beer in his hand when it happened."

"As usual," Minnie said. "Why didn't you tell me all this on the phone?"

"Because I know you. I knew you'd worry."

"That's just like you. Always thinking about somebody else. Always trying to protect him." That last word was emphasized bitterly. "We've been so worried."

"You're a loyal friend, Minnie, and believe me I appreciate it. But I wish you wouldn't worry. I'm all right."

"I knew there was something wrong."

I couldn't hear the rest of it, whatever it was. She slipped into the seat next to me.

The number of people who will go hungry for the sake of their convictions is always relatively small.
HENDRIK WILLEM VAN LOON

I pulled away from The Corners, frozen-faced. "You fell on the stairs," I said.

"I know it." She looked at me. "Who says I didn't?"

"You didn't say you didn't."

"Well, that's a nice nothing statement! What are you so mad about?"

"I'm not mad. I'm talking about Stan. He didn't hit you."

"Who said he did?"

"Nobody said he did. But you made it sound that way back at the store."

"I did not!" She was indignant. "Sometimes I wonder if you're maladjusted, Beth. You must be—always looking for things."

"I can't help what I see and hear. All I know is that nobody hit you, but right now Minnie and her sisters think somebody did."

She leaned forward on the seat, twisting to look at me. "Do you think he didn't want to? Do you think he wouldn't have if you hadn't been there?"

"I don't know. But the truth is, he didn't. You just finished planting a nasty little thought seed back there at Minnie's, Rika."

"Thought seed! What an imagination you have!"

"Maybe I don't have enough. If I hadn't heard what you said to Minnie, I never would have thought of the things you should have said a little earlier. And didn't."

"You're just like all the rest of them. You're in love with him, so you stick up for him."

"I'm not in love with him, and don't try to change the subject."

"There! You sound just like him! I don't have to talk over my private affairs with you!"

"He wasn't drinking that afternoon, and certainly he wasn't drunk. He had just opened a can of beer. He hadn't had any of it."

"How do you know? Were you with him every minute?"

"I wasn't with him every minute. But I know that was the first can of beer he had all day. Why did you let Minnie think it wasn't?"

I turned into the drive, stopping alongside the library windows, halfway between the stone walk that led to the front door and the well-worn path that led to the back.

"Why don't you put the car in?" Rika asked me sarcastically. "Afraid you'll hit one of those precious puppies?" She got out, slamming the door like a child in a tantrum. She went running toward the house.

At ten when I went up to bed, her radio was going. At eleven, when I turned out my light,

CONTINUED ON PAGE 112

Advertisement

A man never likes to admit to a woman that he's wrong...even a Commander* in the Antarctic

Love Letter from the South Pole

By JANET STEPHENS

"I'm going along on Operation Deep-Freeze—to the Antarctic."

When the Commander told his wife this news, Muriel received it with mixed reactions of shock and pride. She knew what his trip would mean to her: 18 months of cruel separation—evenings alone and long waits between letters.

She knew what the trip meant to him, too: a rare opportunity to join a group that was probing the mysteries of an almost unknown continent.

He would have to endure extreme hardships—sub-freezing temperatures; raw, biting winds; and the constant need to lead his men through icy, desolate wastes. All she could do was send him off with love—and whatever help she could give. She remembered this when he was packing, and when he said, "I haven't room for this," of something she had ready, she quickly replied, "You'll need it down there." He made an unkind remark about women always overpacking but grudgingly let her tuck in the two bottles. They were plastic because glass would freeze and break in the Antarctic.

Now the letter in her hand told her that she'd done more than help—she'd saved his men from intense suffering. The men who'd been on two preceding expeditions to the Antarctic, he wrote, had been severely injured by the cold. Their hands had become so chapped that the skin cracked wide open and bled. Faces were burned raw by cold, wind and glare—so badly that some of the men had to be hospitalized. The men had grown beards, hoping to protect their skin, but this had only made matters worse.

The Commander had encouraged the men to stay clean-shaven and protect their faces and hands by using the preparation Muriel had packed with his other gear. Now their skin was in better condition than on any previous deep-freeze operation. The supply Muriel had packed would not last long, since everyone was using it.

© 1958, Campana Co.

"I'm sorry, darling. You were right. Please send more," he wrote. "It's 50° below zero—and we need it! I know your Mother always used this, and so did you, but I had no idea it could do a job like this."

The preparation that saved the Commander's men was actually discovered in Canada, and has long been a standby of Canadians in caring for skin under the most trying conditions. But it took a team of prominent doctors and skin specialists at a Boston Medical Center to write the latest chapter in the history of this lotion.

The urge to know, which sends men like the Commander to an uncharted continent, eager to make the icy wasteland reveal its secrets, moved these doctors, too. Two years ago, they began a comprehensive clinical study of seven leading skin-care preparations. Hundreds of men and women, with severely sore and damaged hands, were involved.

The Commander might have sympathized with any of these people, for their hands, too, were constantly exposed to the hazards of their occupations. One woman, a dressmaker, found her skin developing cracks that could easily lead to infection from fabric dyes. Some of the women have jobs not often thought of as "woman's work"—one is a solderer, handling hot irons and acids for an electronic products company.

As for the men tested, most of them thought, at first, that a hand lotion was "something for the girls." But they changed their minds when the tests were completed. Here's what happened: the lotion that won the test "hands down" was the same one that worked a miracle for the Commander in the Antarctic. It worked better than any of the others—in fact, it was 91% effective in overcoming chapping or dryness from all causes. You may recognize the name of this preparation: Campana Italian Balm.

In the clinical tests, Italian Balm's remarkable superiority was not matched by the leading silicone lotion, nor the leading lanolin lotion. In fact, Italian Balm was proved three times more effective for relieving chapping, dryness and roughness than even pure lanolin. (Copy of this clinical study available on request.) And yet—as many of the budget-conscious women in the tests pointed out—Italian Balm costs just about one-half as much as those other highly advertised brands.

What does this news mean to you? Well, cold, dry weather has the same disfiguring effect on hands as hot water and harsh detergents. In either case, lack of moisture causes skin to become dry, rough, cracked and sore. Moisture makes the difference, and that's why doctors credit Italian Balm's unusual effectiveness to this exclusive formula: glycerin, a moistening agent, combined with TR-1, a "breathing-barrier" agent that holds moisture in the skin.

Someone on the medical staff computed the probable number of times that the hands of a housewife came into contact with hot water or strong detergents. The figure he came up with was 142 times daily. Imagine—142 separate instances of contact with skin-damaging substances!

Count up the number of times your own hands are exposed to the dangers of hot water and detergents...the figure may be higher than you think! Just as a temperature of 50° below zero was a sure hazard to the Commander's hands, today's harsh detergents are a sure hazard to yours. The Commander, whose hands take a daily beating far worse than yours, relies on Italian Balm, which doctors now know is superior to any of the leading lotions, including the so-called "wonder" lotions of today. When cold weather or detergents threaten the beauty of your hands, you can perform a "Miracle in Antarctica" yourself by smoothing on Italian Balm, the lotion proved under the most extreme conditions.

U. S. Navy regulations prohibit use of actual names.*

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 110

she switched from radio to her record player, turning up the volume. By twelve I imagined I could see the wall vibrate between our rooms.

I wanted to charge into that room and shake Rika King until she rattled all over. She never would have dared this racket if Stan were home. At one o'clock I took my pillow and a cotton blanket and went downstairs to sleep on the couch in the library.

"Beth, wake up! Beth ——"

I opened heavy lids to the very beginning of dawn. Rika stood anxiously at the foot of the couch. "What are you doing down here?" she whispered. "Don't you feel well?"

"I feel fine," I said, "and you know darn well what I'm doing down here."

"Was it the radio? Beth, I'm sorry. I fell asleep with it on, and it must have gotten louder and louder. That's what woke me up a little while ago. The whole room was jumping. I feel terrible about it."

"I'll bet you do."

"Beth, please. You know what a deep sleeper I am. I'm apologizing to you."

"O.K."

"Stan will be home in an hour or so. He got a plane earlier than he planned."

I closed my eyes, turned halfway over. "Good."

Then she was shaking me. "Beth, please. He'll be furious. Please come up."

"O.K. All right." I dragged myself up, picked up my pillow, and went sleepily up the stairs.

It seemed like only a couple of minutes but it was three hours later when I wakened again to Rika's calls. She was standing at the foot of my bed, smiling, my breakfast on a tray in her hands.

"With Debbie away I thought this might be a good chance for you and me to have breakfast together. Sit up now."

Only half awake, I sat up. I looked at the cold juice, the cereal and the steaming coffee. Rika had never done anything like this before. "Why all the service?"

"Because I wanted to." She disappeared into the hall and came back with her own tray, settling herself at the foot of the bed. "I love doing things for people. The only trouble, around here, nobody seems to want me to."

I had not noticed her wearing herself out, but on the other hand after a series of rebuffs I suppose I would have stopped trying too.

"I have an apology to make to you, Beth."

"What for?"

"You said on the way home yesterday that I purposely tried to make Minnie and her sisters think Stan hit me. I didn't mean to give that impression, and frankly I don't think I did. But your thinking I did made me angry. And when I feel that way I get mean. I was over it in a flash; that's the way I always am. But that was why I was all ready to fight with you about whether Stan had been drinking or not. I mean, he does drink sometimes, but if you say he wasn't that day, then deep down I believe you. I hope you'll forgive me."

"I forgive you."

"You're being sarcastic. You're still angry, aren't you?"

"No. But I think you ought to be careful about what you say, and how you say it, down at The Corners."

"Don't you like Minnie?"

"That has nothing to do with it. This is a small town and probably everything you've ever said down there has been repeated and interpreted a hundred different ways."

She was quiet a moment. Then: "I think that's horrid!" She put her coffee cup down on the tray, went over to the door. "I'm going to call Minnie. I'll get this thing cleared up."

I crawled out to shower and dress.

Maybe Rika's trouble was not that she was lazy, as Isobel Bales maintained; or that she promised lies, as Debbie charged. Maybe her whole trouble was that she was still a child in many ways, lovable and loving most of the time, trusting and naïve part of the time, and—come right down to it—not too bright.

Piling the china on one tray, setting one tray inside the other, I went downstairs and out into the kitchen.

Mrs. Bales was reaching into the cupboard for the bowl where she kept her car keys. "I'm going over to get Debbie," she said. "She's missed the puppies and all she can talk about is getting home in time to feed them their breakfast." Turning, she saw the trays, and her colorless mouth thinned. "Now she's even got you fetching and carrying for her. What will it be next?"

"I carried them down," I said. "She brought my breakfast to me in bed."

That stopped her, but only for a second. "Well, if she did, believe me, she had a reason for it. I should think you'd know that by this time. How long is it going to take you to find out what everybody else knows around here?"

"I'm sorry you two don't get along," I said, "but why try to bring me into it? I have enough problems of my own."

"Who hasn't? Do you think I like living in somebody else's house? Well, I don't. I want to see my cousin in Ohio. I want us to take that trip we've been planning on before we're both too old to go anywhere."

I remembered Rika's resentment because Mrs. Bales had not done just that. I said, "Stan should be able to manage things here."

"I've stopped thinking about Stanley. But I can't go away and leave Debbie." She turned away, then back again. "Beth, she's trying to destroy that child!" She was not acting. Right or wrong, she believed what she said.

I said, "I don't think Rika knows what she's trying to do. She's just a kid herself. In more ways than one."

Mrs. Bales sighed and went over to the door. Pushing the painted green frame of the screen, she turned and looked at me. "What would you do if a child you loved reverted to infantile behavior all of a sudden? Especially when you knew that child to be quick and intelligent and sensitive? What would you do if you had cared for her ever since she was a baby, and you knew that she had been easily and completely trained ever since she was a little over a year old? Wouldn't that start you thinking? Wouldn't you be concerned?"

"Yes." I straightened, startled. "Yes, I would."

She left me then, and I went slowly, thoughtfully into the library. On my desk where Stan must have put them when he came in this morning was a pile of notes, and another chapter of the book. I knew he wanted the notes first, but I began instead on the latest chapter. By the time Rika came down it would be finished and she would not ask to see it. No reason why she shouldn't that I knew of, but I had noticed that she never reached for the typewritten sheets when Stan was there.

"I thought it would make the time pass faster," Rika said, "if I turned on the radio. But turned way down, you know? Just a little thing like that and he got mad. Told me to quit waiting around."

"What were you waiting for?" I asked her.

"I wanted to go for a drive. It's so hot and I thought it would be fun if just the two of us went off somewhere for a couple of hours."

"Tonight, you mean?"

"Yes, tonight. Why not?"

"He's trying to get some work done in a hurry."

"I know that. He told me. I was perfectly reasonable about it. I said all right, I'd wait. Then he said it would be too late to go anywhere, and I said I didn't care what time it was as long as we went."

It was eleven at night and I had been lying on my bed in a nightgown, reading to the whir of the fans, and the sounds of insects beating foolishly against the screens.

She stood for a moment at the foot of my bed, and then wandered restlessly to the open windows. "Wouldn't this be a wonderful night to go dancing, Beth? A cool place somewhere along the water, an orchestra playing ——"

"There's nothing as fancy as that around here."

"Don't I know it!" She leaned glumly against the tall window frame. "Oh, well ——" She sighed. "Maybe he thinks if I get bored enough I'll leave. Maybe that's his plan."

"Oh, Rika, for the love of Pete!"

"Well, he'd get a lot more work done if I weren't around. He told me that himself."

I said, "Why don't you sit down? Move the desk chair over to the windows if you like."

"I don't need a chair." She sank to the floor in front of the windows, her full skirt billowing out around her. "And I can take a hint. You won't hear another word of complaint out of me."

I reached over lazily and switched on the radio. Bing Crosby's voice came into the room with a melody I had all but forgotten.

"I can remember my mother listening to that one." Rika dropped her head back against the window frame, drawing her knees up. "My mother was pregnant, I remember; so big and balloony-looking. And every afternoon she would take off her high-heeled shoes—she used to call them spikes—and put them side by side under the sofa and then she'd lie down there in the living room, on her back, listening to the record player. That record was old even then, but she'd play it over and over ——" She moved her head, looking deeper into the night. "One thing about me I could never understand. Maybe it was because I was only in the fifth grade then, only ten or so. But whenever I looked at my mother lying there, and her stomach way up in the air like that, I used to feel a little sick." She hugged her knees tighter. "I suppose I should be ashamed to say that, shouldn't I?"

From the very beginning Rika had fascinated me. Later sometimes she had bored me (as no doubt I bored her) and once in a while she had made me briefly, hotly angry. Now I was curious. Her question, put almost casually, was not casual at all. For some reason—and I don't know why I was so sure of it—it was important to her.

"No, I don't think you should be ashamed," I said. "I imagine any girl, especially if she were very young, might feel that way."

She was quiet. Then she said, "I've been thinking about it a lot lately. I thought maybe I wasn't—well, you know . . . quite womanly."

Glancing over at her, seeing her so perfectly formed, so exquisitely beautiful, it was hard to suppress a smile. "You're womanly. Don't worry." Then I said, "You never mentioned a brother or sister."

"It was a little girl."

"How is it you never told me about her?"

"She died when she was six weeks old. I think that's why my mother is so queer. It was her fault." She hugged her knees a little closer. "I told you how our place in Maine was high up on a cliff with that porch all around it and the big gate in the railing at the top of the stone steps that went down to the rocks ——"

"I remember."

"My mother used to put the baby out on the porch in her carriage every day. One day she forgot to set the brake and the carriage rolled off the porch and down all those stone steps."

"Rika, how horrible!"

"Yes, it was." She was still staring out at the black sky. "The most awful thing I ever saw—that carriage turning over and over, and the baby tangled in the white net, and the mattress and blankets flying out all over ——"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 114

NEXT MONTH

"WHY I EXPECT TO LIVE AFTER DEATH"

There are some, says Bishop G. Bromley Oxnam, who believe there is evidence of man's immortality which stands the test of scientific inquiry. He gives the reasons for his own unshakable conviction of life beyond the grave.

IF YOU HAVE 5 FUR COATS, 11 EVENING GOWNS AND 225 PAIRS OF GLOVES . . .

You might be a candidate for the list of America's best-dressed women who spend $10,000 to $40,000 at least on clothes yearly, and with jewels have a $1,000,000 wardrobe. But money alone won't buy a place on the list. What else does it take? What happened when Mrs. Winston Guest and Ethel Merman appeared at a party in the same dress? Laura Date Riley sets down all the fascinating details in "America's Best-Dressed Women."

WHAT IS IT LIKE TO BE SIXTEEN— AND A DRUG ADDICT?

"I don't remember when or how I started sniffing horse," Manuel said. "I didn't know I was hooked until a girl I was going with told me to stop. I tried and couldn't." Manuel is handsome, intelligent and now he is frightened. What is behind—and what is ahead—for these boys and girls? The case-history story, largely in Manuel's own words, is told by Margaret Parton.

"LOVE IS A VERY REWARDING EXPERIENCE," HE SAID

Alix thought, this was a very strange evening—shimmering. He was a combat pilot on seven days' leave. She was a girl determined "not to hurt anyone—or be hurt again." "Search for Amelia," new novel by D. K. Findlay, is complete, condensed, in this issue.

ONLY BY MAKING A TRIP TO RUSSIA CAN YOU SEE THESE GREAT PAINTINGS

In Leningrad's Hermitage and Moscow's Pushkin Museum are some of the world's greatest art treasures: Rembrandts, Rubenses, Titians, an unsurpassed collection of the French Impressionists—Monet, Manet, Renoir, Gauguin, Matisse, Cézanne, Picasso, Van Gogh. Six pages in beautiful color, here shown for the first time.

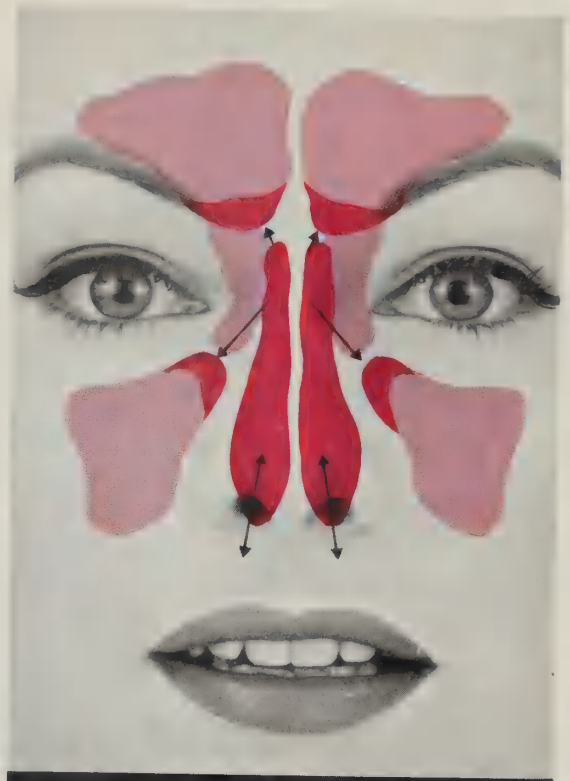
CHICKEN AS TENDER AS A LOVE SONG

Have you ever tried it pot-roasted? The stuffing is made with mushrooms, spinach and French-bread crumbs. Result: a moist, brown miracle with its own gravy. The recipe and other interesting ways to cook chicken: "A Bird in a Pan."

A HOUSE THAT GROWS

The JOURNAL's newest Portfolio House—a comfortable six-room dwelling; add a two-room wing (with kitchen and bath) for in-laws, young marrieds or to rent. The "Extra Dividend House" in nine pages of photographs and text.

Stories by Margery Sharp and others, Making Marriage Work, Dr. Spock's page for mothers and many, many other features, all coming



IN THE MARCH JOURNAL

How does your cold develop?

1 SORE THROAT

2. Coughing
3. Sniffles, Sneezing, Stuffy Nose
4. Tight Chest
5. Ache All Over

1 SNEEZING, SNIFFLES, STUFFY NOSE

2. Sore Throat
3. Coughing
4. Tight Chest
5. Ache All Over

1 ACHE ALL OVER

2. Sneezing, Sniffles, Stuffy Nose
3. Sore Throat
4. Coughing
5. Tight Chest

Coldene attacks all these symptoms in any stage of the common cold

Gives feelable relief in minutes . . .
Most powerful cold medicine you can buy without a prescription

The common cold is not a simple ailment. It is a disorder which attacks various parts of your system, bringing a variety of miseries to different parts of your body as it spreads. Some sufferers seem to feel one misery more quickly, others another.

Hence, Coldene is unlike any cold-and-cough medicine ever offered over druggists' counters. For it doesn't rely on the limited powers of one or two drugs, but unites the powers of several potent ingredients . . . all in proper balance.

When you take Coldene, here are the things that happen almost at once—within minutes. First: The instant Coldene touches your raw, inflamed throat, relief begins. Second: If you've been coughing, Coldene relieves that cough spasm. Right then and there! Third: Coldene goes to work to dry up and open your nose. You get feelable relief within minutes! Fourth: If your chest is tight and breathing is difficult—you breathe again! Fifth: If you ache and feel just plain miserable—Coldene relieves the pain, even reduces fever, gives the fullest possible help.

The reason? There's a powerful, specific, correct ingredient in Coldene for each of the miseries of the common cold. That's why Coldene can catch your cold at any of its 5 stages. Now available in its original Liquid form or in the new Coldene Tablets . . . Coldene, most powerful cold medicine you can buy without a prescription.

Copyright 1957 Pharma-Craft Company, Batavia, Illinois

NEW!

Quickly relieves chest colds without grease, strong odor or tears—COLDENE STICK CHEST RUB

For fast, localized treatment of head cold distress—COLDENE ANTIBIOTIC NASAL SPRAY

$1.00 EACH

If you're taking aspirin for colds, try COLDENE TABLETS for broader relief.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 112

"You saw it? You were there and you couldn't stop it?"

"I was sitting on the floor playing jacks. My back was toward the carriage. I heard a sound, but by the time I turned and saw what was happening, it was too late. I couldn't even scream."

"What a terrible thing," I said finally.

She sat very still. "I'll never forget it. Ever." Then, after a moment, "It was worse for me than it was for them." She didn't look at me. "To this day my mother insists the carriage brake was on, that the gate at the top of the stone steps was closed and locked."

"What's the matter?" Stan asked. "Don't you feel well?"

He had come in and caught me slumped over the typewriter, my head in my hands. I sat up. "I'm all right. Just a little tired, that's all."

"Why don't you go up and take a snooze? If you're tired, go up and rest."

"No, I'll ——" I turned back to my desk, then: "Thanks, I guess I will."

I went wearily up the stairs, hoping I could sleep, fairly sure I would not be able to. I closed my door and threw myself on my bed. I had not slept at all through the night. Every time I closed my eyes, there were those pictures. First Trix lying on the barn floor, that thin trickle of blood at her mouth. Then an unbraked baby carriage twisting and turning in the air, dashing to the rocky shore below. Then Trix again, bleeding at the mouth, and Debbie saying: "I told you something terrible would happen."

What a terrifying experience for the little ten-year-old Rika! An accident she could have prevented if she had been looking. Only she had not been looking. Who could ever forget a thing like that!

It was an accident. Just like what had happened to the dog Trix. Both had been terrible accidents. Wouldn't any mother have made doubly sure that the carriage was far away from the railing, far on the other side of the porch? Wouldn't any mother have checked the brake, checked the lock on the wood-slatted gate?

But Rika never would have told me about it if she had been in any way at fault. Or would she? Would she someday be telling someone like me about a little cocker spaniel found dying in a barn?

Was the brake on? Was the gate closed and locked?

I stirred on the bed, weeping—for whom? for what? I sat up, not quite awake, clothing damp and wrinkled from the heat.

"Beth ——" Isobel Bales knocked. "We've all had dinner. Don't you want something to eat? It's after seven. Beth?"

"Yes. Yes, thanks. I'll be right down."

I dragged myself off the bed, took a quick wash and changed, knowing that Mrs. Bales would not leave the kitchen until I got down there.

"I'm sorry I'm late," I said as I came into the dining room. "I fell asleep."

"Do you feel all right?"

"I feel fine." I pulled out my chair and sat down in front of the single place mat. "You go in and watch your programs now. I'll clean up when I'm through."

I finished my dinner, took my plates out to the kitchen, washed them and put them away. Then I told Isobel I was going for a walk.

Minnie Pruitt's sisters were sitting in front of the store, fanning themselves. They watched my approach coolly, unblinkingly.

"Nice evening," I commented.

They nodded almost imperceptible little nods and looked away.

So? I went into the store. There were only three girls there, trying to decide on a flavor as they rummaged through the cooler. Minnie, behind her cash register, did not look up.

I waited a minute and then said, "Minnie, will you save the Times and the Albany morning paper for me, please?"

She finally looked at me. "For tomorrow, you mean?"

"For tomorrow and every day until I tell you otherwise."

She blinked. She put aside her magazine. "Well, all I can say is good for you!"

"Really? Why?"

"I knew you'd be looking for something else. No matter what happened, I knew you wasn't like the rest of them."

"The rest of who?"

"All them others that worked for Mr. King. You know—so crazy about him, Lord knows why." She shook her head. "What's he got? What do you kids see in him?"

"I'm no kid," I said. "What did Stanley King ever do to you?"

"Nothing. I don't even know him. I just don't like the way he treats his wife."

"Why? What has he done?"

"You don't have to put no act on for me! She said you was like that—loyal. Rika likes you, thinks you're a real nice girl. That's why she was worried. She could tell you was getting to like him, always wanting to work alone with him ——"

"But that isn't ——"

"She just don't want you to get hurt. Believe me, she's a real friend of yours."

I waited a minute. "That's very nice of her," I said finally, "but I do not like Mr. King, as you so delicately put it. He does not like me, and I am not looking around for something else. The newspapers I ordered are merely for"—here, unfortunately, I stumbled an instant—"for research."

"Sure," Minnie said comfortingly. "I know what you mean. You want to hold on to the job you got until you find something else. How's Rika?"

"All right."

"How's her face? Cleared up any?"

"A little."

"But not much, hey?"

"She had quite a fall," I said, watching her.

"A what? Who are you trying to kid?"

"Rika didn't telephone you, did she? I mean after we were here the other night. She didn't call you to explain exactly how she happened to fall on the stairs."

"Happened to fall!" Minnie's eyes were hard. "Listen, nobody has to explain nothing to me! Do you believe that—that she happened to fall on the stairs."

"I know she did. I saw her."

"So that's how far it's gone! Rika was right! You're as bad as the rest of them!"

The boys came in then. "Hey, Min, a banana split with lots of whipped cream!" . . . "Same here, but really whip it, Min."

Shaking, I turned to go. "I'll be back, Minnie. I want to talk to you."

The draining of the pool had been put off as long as possible, but it was empty now and could not be filled again. "The well for the house has never gone dry," Stan said, coming into the kitchen one morning. "We'll have to go a lot easier on the water."

"Do you think I shouldn't use the washer?" Mrs. Bales asked.

"Not any more than you absolutely have to. And if the pump ever keeps right on going, won't shut off, let me know right away."

"It's too bad you're all such shower addicts," Rika said later. "A shallow tub doesn't take half the water a shower does."

So excusing herself, she continued with her two baths a day. But very, very shallow, she assured me. The rest of us set up a schedule, spacing our sparse showers.

Minnie Pruitt, without consulting me, had made arrangements for a local boy to deliver both morning papers at our door. Sometimes Debbie would bring them up to me; often Rika did.

She was being unusually thoughtful, going out of her way to do little favors for me.

There had been a time when I would have gone to Rika directly, asking questions, demanding explanations. Now I said nothing, waiting for a chance to talk to Minnie alone again. So far I had not had the chance.

Once as I started down the drive, Debbie came running after me. "Are you going to The Corners, Beth? Can I come?"

"'May I,' you're supposed to say."

"May I? I'm all out of licorice."

Another time, and the sun was blazing hot on the road that noon, Rika pulled alongside me in her gleaming convertible. "Why didn't you tell me you were coming out, Beth? You know I'd be glad to take you anywhere."

"I'm just on my way to The Corners. I felt like walking."

"It's too hot for walking. Come on, hop in. I have to go down anyway."

When we got there, the open hostility Minnie and her sisters displayed toward me very obviously distressed her. She did her best with pretended gaiety to make us all seem friends, but the three only looked on her with pity.

I watched the ads in the papers, finding nothing of interest. Going down the columns, one after another, I wondered what I ought to do. Maybe the reason those want-ad columns did not interest me was that I wasn't so sure I wanted to leave. Most of the time I wanted to, and then there were times when I did not. What was the matter with me?

One afternoon the daily papers under my arm, I wandered around the grounds trying to cool off. I settled in the shade at the foot of one of the trees, and opened the paper, turning unenthusiastically to the want ads.

"I take it you're planning to leave us," Stan said.

I had not heard him come and I looked up quickly. Then I saw his face. No longer homely to me now; that thin dark face and the blue eyes, though still quiet and watchful, would never seem withdrawn and impassive to me again.

I folded my papers and got to my feet. "I'm looking around," I admitted. "I don't think I should stay here."

"Has something happened?"

"Yes—no, not exactly." I hesitated. "Someone is doing something terrible to you, though."

"Me?" He was not surprised, only relieved. "What is it you've heard, Beth?"

"It's not what I just heard. For months—before I came, even—the town has been buzzing about the way you mistreat your wife. Now they think you're responsible for ——"

"—— for that bruise on her face," he finished for me.

"You knew all the time!"

"No, not for sure. You can't move into a town and be made to feel welcome, then have it all turn sour, without wondering."

I watched him. I said, "You had a cocktail party here once, and you wouldn't let Rika come downstairs and join you. Why?"

"Who told you that?"

"My sister. Before I knew you."

He thought a minute. "I remember that. It was an impromptu thing. Rika didn't like it because I asked them. Big row."

"And that was all?"

"That was all. She wouldn't come down. I didn't know what to tell my guests, so I didn't tell them anything."

I said, "It's an awful thing, to wonder—to be fairly sure, but not absolutely sure. Good or bad, I'd rather know."

He nodded. "I've been through all that."

"But who else would want to hurt you?"

He didn't answer.

"Why should she want to?" I asked, saying something I had been pondering over for days. "You're her husband. She loves you."

He leaned against the tree. "She doesn't love anybody. That's what makes it so bad. She doesn't even like herself."

"Oh, yes, she ——" I caught my tongue. I thought she liked herself very much. "I wish I could help you, but I can't."

"If you could stay just a little longer," he said. "I don't blame you for wanting to leave, but I have another trip to make. I can't ask the Bensons to take Debbie every time I go somewhere. Isobel is here, of course, but she goes to bed early; she's a heavy sleeper ——"

My heart turned over. "You're afraid she'll hurt Debbie!"

"I don't know." For the first time the blue eyes hid nothing from me. "She killed the dog. I'm sure of it."

"I didn't believe it at first. Now I do."

"Why? Why do you believe it now?"

"Her baby sister. Ever since she told me about her baby sister ——"

"What baby sister?"

I reached out impulsively, looking up at him, my hand tight on his wrist. "Didn't she ever tell you ——"

There was movement out under the trees. I jerked away from Stan in confusion, the feel of his wrist still at my finger tips.

"Now, what are you two up to!" Rika's voice was gay, but there was something off key about it. "Why, Beth!" Rika, coming closer in immaculate lettuce-green Bermudas, smiled teasingly. "I was right all along. You are in love with my husband!"

"We were just ——"

"Oh, yes! I saw what you were just ——" She laughed. Coming close to Stan, she looked up at him. "Are you being naughty again?"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 116

REFERENCE Library

REVERSIBLE WRAP-AROUND SKIRT

Why not treat yourself to a gingham-lined felt wrap-around skirt that can be made in a few hours' time? Tied in front or back, it will take 1¼ yards of 72" felt and 2½ yards of gingham. Wear it with your pullovers, plus maybe a gingham scarf, or make a gingham blouse to match.

To order, ask for Pattern No. 2595 and send 25c* to:
Reference Library, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL,
Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pennsylvania

*Pennsylvania residents please add sales tax.

Winter Sunshine Fiesta

with Cling Peaches from California

–and Betty Crocker Cake, Pie Crust and Macaroon Mixes!

Golden Treasure Upside-Down Cake—Cling Peaches always make superb upside-down cake, but here's a spicy new edition to try; Upside-Down Peach Cake made in a ring mold with Betty Crocker Honey Spice Cake Mix! Just melt ¼ cup butter in a 9″ ring mold. Stir in ½ cup brown sugar (packed). Arrange 1½ to 2 cups drained canned Cling Peach slices round the bottom of the mold. Pour in half of the Honey Spice batter (bake the rest in a layer pan). Bake about 35 minutes at 350°.

Sunrise Peach Pie—a golden peach beauty of a pie to dazzle your family! Follow directions on package of Betty Crocker Instant Pie Crust Mix for a 9″ two-crust pie. For filling: combine ¾ cup sugar, ¼ cup flour, ½ tsp. cinnamon, ½ cup peach juice. Cook, stirring until thickened. Add to 3½ cups drained canned Cling Peach slices. Pour into pastry-lined pie pan. Roll out top dough and cut a hole in the center. Fit over pie. Slash dough from hole to edge to form sun rays. Bake 35 to 45 min. in 425° oven.

Clings 'n Macaroons—so quick and easy and always good! First bake up a batch of Betty Crocker Macaroons (you'll want to try both flavors, chocolate and coconut). Heap two golden Cling Peach halves straight from the can in each dessert bowl, serve with Betty Crocker Macaroons for a bright and happy finish to any winter's meal!

Remember–only Clings hold their sunshiny color...their juicy-sweet peach flavor...their plump shape during cooking! When you shop, be sure you choose...

Cling Peaches

Sunniest way to brighten any meal

Canned Cling Peaches from California

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 114

Stan looked down at her, his dark face tight. Then he turned away.

"You see, Beth?" Still smiling, Rika moved toward me. "I always thought you had a lot to learn about men. You might as well let this be your first lesson. Oh, no! Not your first lesson. You've already had your first lesson, haven't you? Well, then, let this be your second."

With a sharp abrupt movement I went swiftly back to the house.

Maybe Rika was right about more things than I had thought. I didn't hate her, as she said I would. And I wasn't in love with her husband.

But I was beginning to know I could be.

It was nine-thirty at night. I had worked for a while after dinner, then come up for the time allotted me that evening for my shower. Outside there were streaks of heat lightning, the rumble of thunder in the distance. Inside there was the sound of a tub running in the bathroom next to mine.

Disappointed and hot and cross, I threw myself on the bed and switched on the radio. But the air was full of static and I turned it off again.

I could hear the thumping of the pump two floors below, and then the sound of water flowing in the next room stopped. But now the record player came on, loud. "Diane" again.

She was doing it deliberately, of course. Once I would have fooled myself into believing it was just carelessness. Now I knew better.

How long has she hated me? I wondered. Just these last few days, or right from the beginning?

Lying on the bed, hot and tired and unbathed, I listened resentfully to Rika's record player. She's nothing but a child, I thought; a child—spoiled, selfish, possessive—in a woman's body. A beautiful woman's body she has never grown up into.

I kept seeing the misery in Stan's blue eyes when he had asked me not to leave. I thought of the Diane in Debbie's picture, the calm, smiling dark eyes, the smooth dark hair. Every time Rika played that record I thought of her. Did Stan too?

A moment later the record player was silenced. Maybe it's broken, I thought hopefully.

I went into the bathroom and stepped out of damp clothing into my cotton housecoat, then came back to the bedroom to stand in front of the windows.

Then came the sound of a puppy yipping outside my door.

I went into the hall. Debbie in her nightgown was on her way to the stairs, the black puppy held out in stiff arms in front of her.

"What's your problem?" I asked her.

"Oh, Beth." She grinned sheepishly. "I think I better put him back."

"We always have to learn the hard way, don't we?" I reached for the puppy. "I'll take him. You clean up."

But Debbie held onto the wriggling animal. "Why can't I take him, and you clean up?"

"No, ma'am!" I shook my head. "That's good planning on your part, but I'm not buying."

I took the dog and went down the stairs, past the closed library door where Stan was working, and out into the kitchen.

In the dim light of one dusty overhead bulb I went through the shadows to the back of the barn, to the pen Stan had had to build higher every week so that it now was almost waist high. I leaned over the side and tumbled the puppy in with the rest of his family.

"What do you think you're doing!"

"Stan!"

He was coming toward me, his face cavernous and grim in the shadows.

"What's the matter?" Suddenly I was afraid. "Stan!"

He halted then, looking at me, blinking. "It's you." We stared at each other for an instant. I saw the grimness go from him. "Beth, I'm sorry. Did I startle you?"

"Startle me?" I laughed shakily. "You almost scared me to death!"

"You should have put some lights on. I didn't know it was you. All I could see was someone bending over the pen."

"Well, I could see you—and, please"—I took a deep breath—"don't you ever look at me like that again!"

"I won't."

The runt yipped and Stan came to look down into the pen. All the others were sleeping, but the little black was wide awake and frisky, wanting to play.

"Cute little guy, isn't he?"

"Awful cute. But we'd better go," I said, "or he'll have them all awake."

There was a series of clicks. All the lights in the barn blazed on.

"Well, aren't we cozy!" Rika, in her nightgown, her hair curling damply around her beautiful face, stood smiling in the doorway. "So we're meeting in the barn now! How terribly, terribly romantic!"

Stan leaned back against the side of the pen. "Go on back to bed."

"Darling, whatever made you think I wouldn't know if you came out here? And at this hour, too, in the dark. Don't you think I know you well enough by this time?"

"That's enough!" Stan, pale with rage, started toward her. "You get up to your room, and you start packing."

"Start packing, darling? Why?"

"Either you leave or I do. You be out of here by noon tomorrow, or I will."

Rika's smile vanished. "What do you mean, I will?" she mimicked. "Don't you mean you and your precious daughter, and precious Aunt Isobel, and your precious Beth?"

Stan's eyes narrowed. "Rika, this is it. I'm through trying to figure you out, trying to give you a break. From now on I don't give a damn about the mother and father who didn't understand you. I'm sick of your excuses, and furthermore I'm sick of my excuses for your excuses. I've had it. Either you get out, or I will." He turned away. Then, remembering me, he said curtly, "You'd better come along, Beth."

Rika gave a short laugh. "Yes, dear Beth, do come along! You're happy now, aren't you? You've been after him for so long!"

I came from the back of the barn, my heart pounding, my legs not quite steady under me. Just don't look at her. You'll be all right if you don't look at her.

"—— all those silly elaborate schemes of yours ——" Rika followed me. She looked after her husband, going out through the wide doorway. "You never heard about that, did you, darling?" she shouted after him. "Like that time when you were away and she came down to the library in the middle of the night to sleep on the couch, knowing all the time you'd be back, hoping you'd find her there when the rest of us were asleep upstairs ——"

I am persuaded that every time a man smiles, but much more when he laughs, it adds something to this fragment of life. STERNE

Stan kept on going, but just outside the wide doors I stopped and looked back at her, at the beautiful face that was now flushed with hate and jealousy. Hate and jealousy of a thing that did not exist.

"I don't know what's the matter with you," I said unsteadily. "You'll laugh, but you break my heart. I could have been one of the best friends you ever had."

"You?" And she did laugh. "You just wait. By the time I get through with you, you won't be able to hold your head up in your own home town! Everybody will know ——"

I followed Stan to the kitchen door, clasping my hands tight so the trembling would not show. "None of that was true."

"I know. Try and forget it." He opened the door and stood waiting.

I paused, not looking back. "Are you going to leave her out there all alone?"

"No."

"Is there anything I can do?"

"No, you go upstairs. I can handle her better myself." He sounded very tired. "And go to sleep. I won't leave her out there alone."

For the first time in many nights I had fallen into a deep sleep. No dreams. Sheer exhaustion, probably; mental—and emotional, too, I suppose.

Thunder crashed overhead. Windows, I thought sleepily. I reached for my housecoat and, half awake, groped for my slippers. There were windows all over the house that ought to be closed.

There was another flash of lightning. And outside my door: "—— back to bed now . . . nothing for you to worry about ——"

"No! Go away! Go away ——"

"—— all be over in the morning. It always is. Debbie, please ——"

The child is afraid of the storm, I thought. I went to the door and opened it.

Debbie, small and frightened, crouched at the top of the stairs. She was staring down into the darkness below. Behind her loomed the top-heavy outline of Mrs. Bales in curlers and wrapper.

"What is it?" I said.

Isobel Bales was wringing her hands. "She won't come with me. She should be in bed. Just a child, hearing this ——"

And then I heard it, too, the pounding, the cries: "Let me in, Stan! You let me in! I've been listening on the extension ——"

"Three By The Fireside." For an 8" by 10" full-color print of this original photo by Walter Chandoha, send 25¢ in coin and one Puss 'n Boots label to Cat Pictures, Dept. J-18, Box 6586, Chicago 77, Illinois. Offer good only in U.S.A.

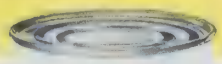
"Our mother cat and all her kittens have thrived on Puss 'n Boots"

Whole-fish formula . . . rich in proteins . . . is their day-to-day health diet

To the above quote from her letter, Mrs. E. C. G. of Fresno adds: "All three cats are so healthy and full of pep they're a real joy to own." For such healthy, playful cats this owner can take a lot of the credit for her own good judgment in feeding them nutritious Puss 'n Boots.

Puss 'n Boots benefits cats of all ages. It's made from whole fish (including protein-rich fillets) and supplies an abundance of vitamins, minerals, calcium and other vital nutrients. Puss 'n Boots also includes tasty cereals, plus essential Vitamin B_1 for energy, appetite, good digestion.

Feed your cat Puss 'n Boots regularly. You'll quickly see the difference this nutritious whole fish food makes in health, beauty and vigor!



The natural life balance of WHOLE FISH is Retained in Puss 'n Boots Costly Fillets, rich in essential high quality proteins. Usually reserved for human consumption, but retained in Puss 'n Boots.

Liver and Glands, for minerals and vitamins. Vital for health. Often extracted for medicinal use, but retained in Puss 'n Boots.

Bone Structure, for valuable calcium and phosphorus. Made soft, crumbly and digestible, and retained in Puss 'n Boots.

CHECK YOUR CAT against these characteristics of healthy cats fed regularly on Puss 'n Boots:

RAPID GROWTH from the high-quality proteins in Puss 'n Boots.
GOOD APPETITE from the extra Vitamin B_1 in Puss 'n Boots.
NORMAL REGULARITY from the selected cereals in Puss 'n Boots.
GOOD TEETH from the abundant calcium in Puss 'n Boots.
SILKY FUR from the vitamins and minerals in Puss 'n Boots.
LIVELY ENERGY from the all-round nutrition of Puss 'n Boots.

Packed in 8-oz. and 15-oz. sizes.

Coast Fisheries Division of The Quaker Oats Company, Chicago, Illinois

PUSS'n BOOTS

Rich in the nutrients that are rich in health

Isobel Bales moaned.

"—— and if you think all you have to do is call Lew Bannister in the middle of the night and tell him to arrange a separation and a settlement, you're mistaken! It's not going to be that easy—you hear! You hear me ——"

Lightning lit the house blindingly, once, twice. Thunder crashed. Rika's cries grew to a shriek. "I'll fight you ——" We could hear the foul words, the obscenities.

Mrs. Bales, shaking in distress and anger, put her hands on Debbie's shoulders. "Come on, Debbie, come to my room. Please, Debbie, you must come ——"

There was the sound of Stan's voice then, drowned out an instant later by another crash of thunder. Over the hysterical shrieks from downstairs came the most dreadful sound of all. The sound of a child's teeth chattering in terror.

Suddenly, with a strength and speed I never knew I possessed, I swooped down on Debbie, carried her struggling to my room. And while the storm broke wildly outside the windows, I sat holding her in my arms, crooning to her, rocking her in the light of the lamp.

In a little while, after she had wept wildly, after she wept tiredly, she slept.

Toward dawn the storm moved on with its violence, leaving us with a gray steady rain and a drop in temperature.

"One small consolation," I said to Debbie. "If this keeps up you'll be able to use the pool again."

We were lying in the bed, waiting to find out what time it was. The power had gone off sometime during the night and my electric clock was innocently proclaiming the hour of four.

"Let's go down and get some breakfast," I said, sitting up.

Debbie turned her head to look at me. "Aren't you afraid to go down?"

"No. Why should I be? Come on. Get up and we'll go down and have some bacon and eggs."

The kitchen was dark and gloomy and when we switched on the overhead light Mrs. Bales was not there. Seeing the puppy's harness hanging over the back of the chair where I had left it, I knew she had not been there.

"Could you eat two eggs?" I asked as I put the bacon on. "Two, Deb?"

"The puppies haven't been fed."

"Yes, they have. Look." I pointed to the empty baby-cereal box standing on the drainboard. "But go out and say good morning if you want to."

She gave me a quick grin and started to run, ducking her head against the rain.

"And don't stay too long," I called. "This isn't going to take more than ten minutes."

I turned the bacon lower and started the coffee. Then, switching on the little kitchen radio to check the time, I reset the clock on the range.

The door swung open from the hall and Stan came into the kitchen. He glanced at the bacon frying in the pan. "I smelled food and realized I was hungry."

"Well, good. I'll put some more bacon on. How many strips?"

"Four, but don't set a place for me. I'll eat in the library." He turned back into the hall and I stood looking at the swinging door, knowing why he wanted it that way.

If I were a man desperate enough to ask my wife to leave and she refused, what would I do? Pack my bags and leave her? And if she followed, creating scenes, as Rika undoubtedly would, what would I do then?

Stan's name would always make news, but something like this —— I thought of the publicity, the excitement. How Rika would love it!

Out in the yard Debbie was shouting and a second later she burst into the kitchen, breathless, turning to pull two excited little cockers behind her. "Look what I've got, Beth!"

"I see what you've got. And now that you've got them, what are you going to do with them?"

"Play with them here in the kitchen." She bent to untangle their leashes. "They're lonely out there."

"I'm sorry to hear that." I knew who the lonely one was. I said, "You better have your breakfast first. Your father is going to have his in the library. I'll put yours on the tray with his."

She looked at me uncertainly.

"That's all right." I reached for the puppies' leashes. "They won't be in my way. I'll tie them to the radiator while you're gone."

I handed her the tray and held the swinging door for her.

I waited until I heard her greeting her father, then prepared another tray and started up the stairs. It wasn't that I thought Mrs. Bales would enjoy breakfast in bed; I was sure she would not. But, remembering the wringing hands and the distracted air of only a few hours ago, it would give me an excuse to look in on her.

"I was just coming down," she said when she opened the door.

"I know." I moved past her into the plain, neat room. "I thought it might be fun to have breakfast up here for a change."

"But I have to go down."

"No, you don't." I set the tray on a square table in front of the windows. "Debbie's having breakfast in the library with her father, the puppies have been fed, Rika is still sleeping, and I brought enough for both of us." I drew up a chair for her, and the dressing-table bench for me. "Please come, Mrs. Bales."

She came reluctantly to the table, and reluctantly she tried to eat. "Did Debbie sleep last night?"

"After a while. I kept her with me."

"Yes, I know." She sighed. "She'll never leave, you know."

"Rika?"

"Rika. He can hire all the lawyers in the country, but she'll never let him go. She hasn't any friends; she never wanted any. And she hasn't seen her family in years."

I looked up. "Did she tell you that?"

"No, but I know it. We didn't even know she had a family until after she and Stanley were married. She told him her parents were

Now! A new idea in tea!

New NESTEA
INSTANT TEA
Equal Parts of Tea and Carbohydrates

No other tea gives you such hearty, delicious flavor . . . with no waste—no mess!

Magic Grains of pre-brewed tea instantly bring rich flavor to your cup. New Nestea® Instant Tea is pre-brewed from young, hearty Orange Pekoe and Pekoe tea leaves to capture all the wonderful tea goodness for you to enjoy.

All flavor — no waste. You just put a level teaspoon of Nestea in your cup, add boiling water and instantly those magic grains of Nestea burst into rich, hearty tea. You enjoy all the flavor, because you use all the tea . . . throw none away, as you always do with old-fashioned teabags and leaves. Make Nestea in the cup or in the pot . . . delicious either way. Ask your grocer for new Nestea today!

Double your money back Guarantee

You'll be delighted with new Nestea. If not, send unused portion of the jar to: The Nestlé Company, Inc., Box M, White Plains, N. Y. Include your name, address and the amount you paid for Nestea. We'll send you double your money back.

© 1957 The Nestlé Company, Inc.

dead, but when Mr. Bannister began to check ——" She put down her cup. "One Saturday night when Stanley and Rika were gone for a weekend, Mrs. Bannister came to see me. Finally she came right out and told me about the foul stories going the rounds about Stanley. She said she was sure Rika was responsible because Rika had hinted some terrible things to her. She said, 'I've known Stanley King for over ten years, and my husband has known him longer. Nobody can convince us he's a Jekyll and Hyde. There's something wrong with that girl. We're both convinced she's dangerous!' "

I put my cup down carefully. Ordinarily Mrs. Lew Bannister was a great one for minding her own business. "Is that when Lew started checking on Rika?"

"I suppose so. She said Rika's mother and stepfather were in Europe and nobody seems to know what became of her father."

"Does Stan know? That Lew checked on her, I mean."

"He didn't at the time, but I suppose he does now. The more upset he gets, the less he's inclined to talk."

A door opened out in the hall, and closed again. We could hear Rika singing as she went down the stairs.

I looked at Mrs. Bales. "You don't want your coffee?"

"No, I don't think so." How tired she looked.

"You better go back to bed." I stood up and started to load the tray. "I'll take care of whatever there is to do in the kitchen."

She moved heavily toward her bed. "What will he ever do?"

"I don't know. But it's his problem and I imagine he'll take care of it, one way or another." I went over to her, putting my hands on her shoulders, gently forcing her back to the pillows. "There's one thing we've been forgetting, Mrs. Bales. There are Lew Bannisters working on newspapers too." I picked up the tray and went out into the hall.

"Hi, Beth." Debbie came tiptoeing up the stairs, a squirming puppy under each arm, the leashes trailing. "I was trying to teach them to go up the stairs, but they wouldn't."

"They're too little," I told her. "That big flight of stairs probably looked like a mountain to them."

She put the puppies down on the floor, and one of them began to sniff at something small at my feet.

"Take it away from him, Debbie, whatever it is. He might choke. Here, put it on the tray."

Debbie knelt, reaching into the small dog's mouth, scolding, then put the small object—it looked like a tubular piece of rubber—on the tray. "I'm going to teach them tricks. I'll keep these two up here for a while, then I'll take them back and get two more."

"All right," I said, "but be sure you keep them in your own room. And don't forget, my little pie, you're solely responsible for everything."

She grinned. "Oh, Beth, I know that! I'll be careful."

How could anyone not love Debbie!

In the kitchen Rika was brushing something from her hands into the sink. Ignoring me, she strolled to the refrigerator, opened the door and stood peering into it. After a moment she made herself an eggnog. As she turned to leave our glances caught and held and slid apart. The gray of her eyes was as leaden as the morning's sky.

But wide those eyes were, smiling in triumph.

Stan had said by noon today. I looked at the clock on the range. Eleven-thirty.

But Rika was not packing. Rika was not getting ready to leave.

I stacked the dishes in the rack and went back to the tray. In the corner of it was the small dark thing Debbie had taken away from one of the puppies. I picked it up and looked at it. About three inches long, maybe about a quarter of an inch in diameter, it looked like a miniature hose, slit on one side, black, and probably rubber.

I looked at it, frowning, pulling it open in my hands, letting it fall into its tubular shape again. It was part of something I knew very well, part of something very familiar, yet ——

Yes, of course. I slipped the tube of rubber into my pocket. It was just a piece of casing, insulation, the kind that covers a heavy-duty lead or extension. But where had that piece of casing come from?

Outside the rain drummed gray and cold and steady against the windows. I paused to watch it, frowning a little, trying to think where in the house I had seen such a heavy lead.

Rika's room, I thought. That monstrous sun lamp of hers. I took out the piece of casing and looked at it again. Yes, it looked as if it could have come from there. Had it been a repair job of some kind? There was nothing wrong with her sun lamp that I knew of, but if there was, Rika should never attempt such a thing herself. She didn't know any more about electricity than I did.

And where were the bits of wire that should have come away with this piece of casing?

FULFILLMENT

By FLORENCE B. JACOBS

She always wanted a house to cherish,
silver to polish,
delicate Spode;
so she dowered her child with a chest of Irish linens, of damask
in sandalwood.

(The daughter's dream was of swift, clean wings riding the great skies, free from things*.) . . .

He gave his son release from the shadow of sterile meadow close-ribbed with slate which had wasted his own years, charged his widow
to sell the pastures and move down state.

(His whole life long, the boy's deep roots starved for an old land's stony fruits.)

I stood there uncertainly. Probably those clipped three inches of copper wiring were lying harmlessly somewhere. But what if they were not?

She wouldn't do it, I thought uneasily. She wouldn't take the chance.

But I started for the front of the house, at first slowly, doubtfully, then moving a little faster. I know what you're up to, I thought, my hand tightening around the piece of casing in my pocket, and nobody should fool around with this stuff. Not even you!

Outside her door I stopped in relief. I could hear the sound of a tub running, the sound of her radio. Surely if she planned anything foolish she would not be taking her usual leisurely scented bath, would not be listening to her favorite disk jockey.

I went to my room, only half hearing Debbie across the hall, shouting, commanding her pups. I sat down on the edge of my bed and took the tubular piece from my pocket and looked at it again.

The water had stopped running. In the tub, whether the door to the bathroom was open or not, she would be unable to see me if I did not move too far into her room.

Wouldn't it be better to go and look instead of sitting here wondering about it? Imagining all kinds of things?

I got up and went to Rika's door. I could hear her radio, the splash of water. I knew the bathroom door must be partly open, and I stood there hesitating. Then slowly I turned the knob, slowly I pushed the door partly open.

I saw first the radiator, and one end of Rika's dressing table with her green leather diary open on it, then the tall windows and the sun lamp in front of them. I tried to see whether or not the sun lamp was connected, but the ottoman blocked my view.

It must be connected, I thought, seeing the lead looping high from the top of the lamp as if the rest of it must be pulled taut, lifted off the floor. What I could see of the lead was intact. None of the insulation, or casing, was missing, and there was none of the black tape that would have marked a repair. But what about the part I could not see?

I slid through the door. Laid out on the wide bed was a nightgown I had never seen before—white and chiffony-looking, shot through with threads of gold—and a peignoir to match.

The phone rang.

There was a sudden surging of water and I went swiftly back to the hall, reaching hurriedly for the door. I had it almost closed when I heard Rika running lightly across the carpeting.

"But you said you'd call me right back . . . I waited and waited . . . I thought you were turning against me too."

I stood holding the door, as near closed as I dared.

"—— I'm going to do it, Minnie! I am, I am. . . . What else is there for me now? They all hate me—they want to get rid of me. . . . No, he did! . . . She met him out there again last night ——"

I pushed the door open hard. "Hang up, Rika."

Her eyes grew round, blank, but only for an instant. "Did you hear that, Minnie?" She sounded frightened. "Minnie, did you hear her?" With one hand, she held on to the darkly wet towel dripping from her bath. "Beth's been listening outside my door ——" Suddenly her voice rose. "Don't you come near me!"

I had not moved.

"Minnie, please come. Please! Just as soon as you can ——"

I could hear terrified squawks from the phone. I hated Rika King. I started toward her, stumbled, then caught myself. The blond puppy, waddling across in front of me, trailing her leash, kept going.

Suddenly Rika slammed the phone down. I followed her unblinking gaze to the puppy waddling toward the radiator, toward the wall plug where the sun lamp was connected.

And there it was: three inches of shining copper wire pulled taut from the floor in the heavy lead of the sun lamp.

"You must be crazy." Calm now, I watched her. "Bare wires. You could start a real big bonfire that way."

Her eyes glinted. "I intend to do more than that."

"Poor stupid Minnie. That's why you made sure she'd be down here this morning, isn't it? The perfect witness. You can count on her to call the doctor and the sheriff—to tell them how cruelly you've been treated, how despondent you've been ——"

"Why, Beth!" She smiled in mock reproach. "Are you suggesting I—ah—kill myself? Is that what you want?" She kicked savagely at the puppy lapping her damp ankle. "But of course that's what you want."

"I'm not suggesting you kill yourself. I'm suggesting that you're going to pretend to try."

Her small smile widened derisively. "Don't you know ——"

I darted for the wall plug, bending toward it, reaching. Rika caught me off balance. Her blow was savage. I sprawled backward on the floor.

"This is my house! Don't you forget it!" She reached down for the heavy lead, lifting it so that I could see the three inches of bare copper wiring. She looked down at me with hard eyes. "You get out of here. Out of this room and out of this house! Right now!"

I sat up, hearing Debbie out in the hall: "Little Darling, where are you? Come this minute ——"

"And don't try to take my husband with you!" Rika turned contemptuously. "Try that and ——"

"Little Darling!" That was Debbie.

"—— and I'll make you the sorriest ——"

"Watch the pup!"

But Rika did not hear. Half turned, she fell hard against the radiator, the towel wet from the tub sliding from her body, three inches of copper wiring clenched in a hand that was no longer golden-tanned.

I scrambled to my feet, hearing with part of my mind Debbie still calling her dog. I tugged at the plug. It seemed to take a long time. I yanked it out.

I saw Rika huddled over Little Darling on the floor.

I went to the door, out into the hall. I said, "Call your father. Right now."

Downstairs Minnie Pruitt was angrily demanding to see Rika.

I took the blanket folded at the foot of the bed, and went back to Rika. I pushed the ottoman out of the way, and dragged Rika from the limp body of the dog. Weeping silently, I began artificial respiration.

I'll save you, I wept. I hate you, and I'm sorry for you, but I'll save you.

But I did not save her. I guess everybody who reads the headlines knows that now. The fire department came with their Pulmotors and their oxygen tanks and for four hours they tried.

There was an inquest, of course, and of course there was the suicide note that had not been meant to be a suicide note at all. It was worded as I had known it would be, the final entry in Rika's diary: He told me to get out. He thinks he is in love with her now. This is not the first time he has done this to me, and I cannot go through it again. Now he will be free.

There were other pages in the diary, too, written as only Rika could have written them, twisted and distorted and ugly.

There was Stan, stern, withdrawn, tired-looking: "Yes, I wanted a separation. No, I was not in love with my secretary."

There was me: "No, I didn't know my employer before I came to work for him. Yes, I wanted to be her friend. No, I never threatened her."

There was Isobel Bales, deep circles under her eyes, but back in stride again: "She rarely told the truth. I'm sorry she's dead, but she was cruel to the child and I'm convinced she deliberately killed the child's pet. No, I didn't like her."

And there was Minnie Pruitt who loved the Rika she thought she knew: "What else could she do? They all hated her; they was all jealous of her. They wanted to get rid of her, and she didn't have no place to go. She told me all about it, the poor little thing. She didn't have nobody but me ——"

Afterward, after it was all over, and we were back in the big house and the door to Rika's room was closed and locked, Stan said it would be better for me if I went away. I didn't want to go, but I went—to a small town upstate, returning now and then for a brief, almost furtive visit.

Now I am here for the last time. Soon the vans will come; soon we shall be leaving. Just a little while ago Debbie came to my room. She had the small portrait of her mother I had commissioned an artist to paint for her.

"Will you put this in your suitcase, Beth? My trunks are all locked."

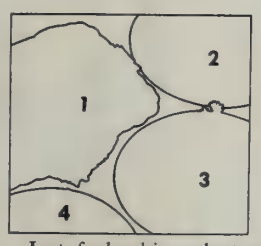
"O.K." I waved a hand toward the open bag on my bed. "Slip it under something and be sure it's lying flat ——"

I watched as she went toward the bed. How tall she has grown this past year; how beautiful she is.

I saw her pause, her hands lingering over a lacy slip, a pink silk scarf. I turned back to my desk, smiling. She was reaching that age now; now it was beginning. How many times had I watched my nieces doing that very thing!

"Beth?" She was standing beside me at the desk. "I'm glad you're coming back to live with us again."

"Thank you, Debbie. So am I."



"You're not ever going away from us again, are you?"

I had heard him coming up the stairs. I knew he was standing there in the doorway. I touched the smooth brown hair that always smelled of the sun. I looked up at the tall blue-eyed man in the doorway.

"No," I said. "I am never going away from you again." END

Chicken or ham, lamb or beef . . .

Brighten the plate with Ocean Spray

1. Cranberry Chicken-in-the-Basket. Just fork-whip velvet-smooth Ocean Spray Jellied Cranberry Sauce into a purée. Dunk crisp, eat-with-your-fingers chicken. (Or "spoon up" sauce with potato chips.) Perfect fireside supper, served in napkin-lined baskets—one for each guest.

2. High-Fashion Ham Dinner. Fashion's favorite colors come to dinner when you pair pink ham with ruddy Cranberry Sauce. Serve either chilled Jellied Sauce or hot Whole Berry Sauce with baked ham. You'll find today's mild-cured hams respond naturally to the tangy, bright fruit flavor of Ocean Spray.

3. Roast Lamb with Cranberry-Mint Sauce. Delicate lamb needs a bright flavor contrast—and sassy Ocean Spray Whole Cranberry Sauce (right from the can) is a thrilling new accent. Or make a mint-flavored sauce: heat 1 can Ocean Spray with ½ tsp. mint flavoring and grated rind of 1 orange.

4. Sweet-Sour Hamburgers. Exotic — and easy! In butter, brown 4 beef patties, and cook 2 tbsp. onion till transparent. Then add 1 can Ocean Spray Whole Cranberry Sauce, ½ cup vinegar, 1 lemon, sliced and seeded, and 4 gingersnaps crumbled fine. When mixture thickens, serve proudly.

Zesty! Cranberry Juice Cocktail

Drink like a dry red wine — claret-colored, full-bodied Ocean Spray Cranberry Juice Cocktail. Before dinner. Through it. Any time! Cook with it, too! At supermarkets.

JELLIED OR WHOLE BERRY

Now in Canada, too.

Wipe-don't rub!

...for the richest, longest lasting wax luster you've ever seen on furniture!

Beautifully waxed furniture can be yours without rubbing. Just apply Pride, let dry, wipe lightly.

As you whisk away the haze, you'll see a gleaming finish of genuine wax. One that won't trap lint and dust the way oily polishes do. A finish that stays shining bright for weeks without constant attention. All this without rubbing—or the name isn't Johnson's Pride.

Made by the makers of Johnson's Wax. Recommended for both light and dark finishes by 51 makers of fine furniture.

Get either the handy 8-ounce or thrifty 16-ounce size today!

"Pride" and "Johnson's" are registered trademarks of S. C. Johnson & Son, Inc.

Their house in North Brunswick, N. J., "was a lovely buy — only $18,000 for 8 rooms on nearly an acre." But they can't afford to fix it up.

MORE DREAMS THAN MONEY

The Haraydas want to be more, do more than $4500 a year permits.

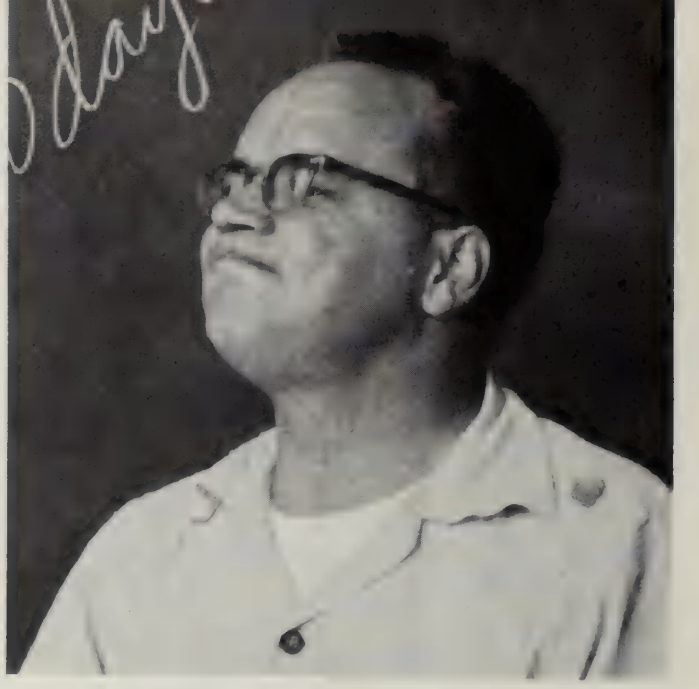
HOW AMERICA LIVES

"Welcome to Manderley!" Marel Harayda (pronounced Ha-ray-da) stands in the heavy oak doorway of 1185 Williamson Road, North Brunswick, New Jersey. The half-timbered Tudor house is built high and handsome in the style of thirty years ago. Marel's smile is big and warm, her dark eyes brilliantly alive.

She leads the way through a huge beam-ceilinged living room, spottily furnished in rose and blue, with a worn rug which is too small, to the dining room. Here homemade bookcases bulge with books on art, music and science; in the corner stands an impressive new set of the Encyclopaedia Britannica. The white-lace-covered dining table is heaped with sewing.

"I've got scale drawings of exactly how I'm going to furnish these two front rooms," says Marel, gesturing over a coffee table laden with papers and unemptied ash trays. "It's a period house, but my love is modern. Sectional pieces and marble-topped tables. Smoky green and violet and avocado. Everything new, of course. A grand piano instead of that old upright. Wall-to-wall carpeting for both rooms." She produces a small square box from an overflowing closet and carefully extracts a solitary Wedgwood cup from a nest of tissue paper. "This green is the key color. My whole dinner service will be Wedgwood someday.

"We own this little château together with the Howard Savings Institute," explains Mrs. Harayda, removing several dirty coffee cups from the top of the piano. "We bought it because we were both working and thought we could afford it and because it was a terrific buy—$18,000, eight rooms and almost an acre of grounds in a beautiful residential area. Now my husband feels we need a new roof, a little wiring, lots of paint, new plastering, some plumbing, new roof gutters and a new furnace, so he wants to sell it. But we'll get it fixed up somehow. In the meantime, I love it even if it is falling down."



BY BETTY HANNAH HOFFMAN

PHOTOGRAPHS BY RUTH ORKIN

The "erratic Harayda clan" . . . as Marel sees them

"Mamma Marel," says she, "has only practical talents and no artistic talents."
She gave up her decorating shop to be with her children, now does part-time decorating from home.

"Papa John," teacher.
"His talents include everything that has no practical value. He is the original man who has only thumbs."

Marel made curtains for all eight rooms—"for the outside effect." Janice got an all-pink bedroom.

Marel enters the kitchen at the rear of the house, a small cluttered room with dingy rough plaster walls and chipped woodwork. Moving with a vital grace, she finds two cups and saucers in the cupboard ("Nothing matches," she explains ruefully) and wipes off traces of breakfast cereal from the oilcloth on the table. "This is the house of accelerated living," she smiles, measuring instant coffee into the cups. "If it isn't fast, we don't do it."

A sleepy-eyed child with long, tangled blond hair comes into the kitchen in her nightgown. "This is Janice; she's eight," explains her mother. "She's my big helper. She reminds me of all the family birthdays and sets the alarm clock so we all get up in the morning. . . . My, look at your hair!"

"You haven't washed it in a month," says Janice accusingly.

"Is it really eleven o'clock?" exclaims Marel, glancing at the clock. "Run and get dressed, Janice, and I'll fix your breakfast."

As Mrs. Harayda, an attractive brunette of thirty-one, starts mixing eggs and melting butter, she continues, "The boys spend most of the summer at the seashore with their grandmother, Johnnie's mother. She just adores them and waits on them hand and foot. It takes me two weeks to get them pouring their own milk again. Billy—my problem child—is seven and Jackie's four. Sometimes I worry about them. Their grandmother's shack is in the pine woods with no telephone, and she's subject to fainting spells. She's somewhere between seventy and eighty.

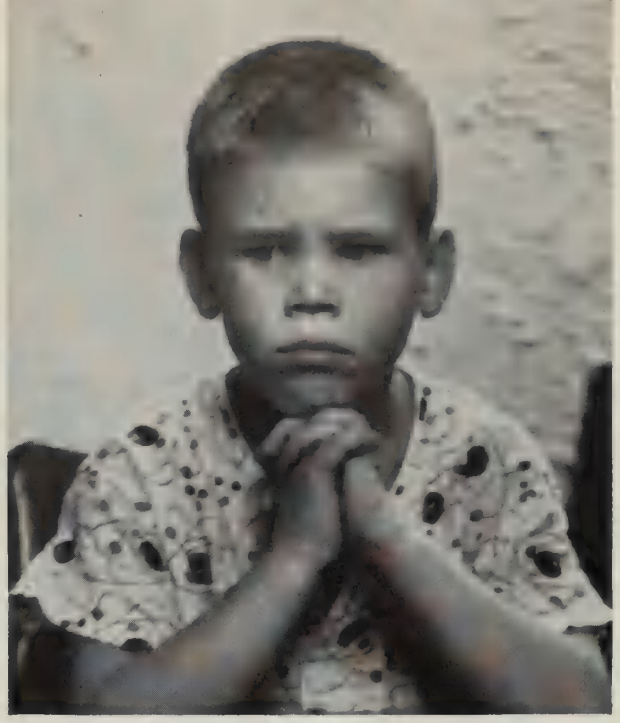
"Johnnie's mother is Hungarian and so clean you could eat off her floors," Marel goes on. "When she comes here, she marches through the house pointing and saying, 'There's no excuse for that!' My hit-or-miss housekeeping floors her, but luckily Johnnie never cares how much of a mess the place is in. At least, inside. He spent $250 this year for grass seed and topsoil and driveway gravel so the yard would look nice for the neighbors.

"I could go to a formal in dungarees," she adds, "but my husband worries a lot about appearances."

Her little girl comes back into the kitchen in a rumpled pair

CONTINUED ON PAGE 124

Jackie loves the vacuum cleaner. That's one reason why Marel wants wall-to-wall carpeting. Other reason: bad floors. "I can't possibly bring customers into my house the way it looks."



HOW AMERICA LIVES

"I send Johnnie out for moth balls and he comes home with a badminton set!" Marel complains. "There's no romance in buying moth balls," says Johnnie—and brings up the $90 she spent on a crèche one Christmas.

Janice—"not outstanding, but normal as blueberry pie. She is all woman—lies about her age, though she lies upward!"

Billy—"a problem to me. At times I think of taking him to a psychiatrist, but other times he is so lovable I feel I am the one who belongs on the couch."

Jackie—"every mother's dream child. He has not had a cranky day since the day he was born!"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 122

of shorts and a shrunken shirt showing three inches of bare middle. "But you never wash anything, mother!" Janice complains as her mother sends her out again.

"Look at the ironing basket," directs Marel. "I just never catch up. I've got four customers waiting for orders now and that means leaving the breakfast dishes in the sink and going right upstairs and sewing until dinnertime.

"Johnnie's a schoolteacher," she explains. "His take-home pay is only about $400 a month ten months of the year, and in the summer his pay stops. Our mortgage payments are $116 a month; usually in the summer we miss a payment and that means $232 out of his first pay check in September. I used to run a decorating shop for six years; I quit last January and have been taking orders at home for draperies and bedspreads. To get people to come way out here to Colonial Gardens, I do the sewing for nothing, and make my profit in the difference between the wholesale and the retail price of materials. So far, I've been making about $150 a month, but it's hard work and everything else gets neglected.

"This summer Johnnie looked for work for weeks. He could be a camp counselor, but then we'd never see him all summer. He tried a lot of factories, but they're unionized and won't take temporary help. The stores let their help go in the summertime; it's their slow season. Johnnie had to lie to get a job, finally. He's a trainee for a salesman's job with a roofing-and-siding company. He didn't tell them he was a schoolteacher and would quit in September. Anyway, it pays $75 a week."

Janice comes back in a new clean outfit and her mother places before her a delicious-looking omelet with currant jelly and crisp buttered toast. "Johnnie's high-strung and moody," she goes on. "He's very talented and creative and can't stand the monotony of a desk job. He speaks four languages fluently, German, Hungarian and French as well as English, and he's had a song played over the radio and sold several oil paintings, although he's completely self-taught. One night we wrote a musical comedy together until three A.M. I put down the tunes Johnnie composed and we dreamed up a plot and lyrics, but we couldn't get together on what Broadway theater to use," Marel finishes with a laugh.

A medium-sized man with a magnificent chest and shoulders and a gentle, self-deprecating smile comes in the back door and Marel introduces her husband. As he lights a cigarette, his big hands are shaking.

"I quit my job today," he says.

"And tomorrow's payday!" wails Marel. "Couldn't you be practical and wait one more day?"

Johnnie shakes his head, his gray eyes somber. "I lied to get the job—I didn't like that. And then all those poor little people, high-pressured into buying a $2000 roof they could never afford!" He sighs deeply. "It gave me a weak feeling across my stomach. I flipped. I couldn't do it another day.

"I know a high-school principal who tried to get a summer job as a bartender," continues Mr. Harayda. "Another friend of mine who teaches is selling tickets at a race track. I hauled lumber one summer, and put on weight just from the splinters. Anyway," he adds more cheerfully, "I got another job tomorrow."

"Selling new Buicks?" asks Marel hopefully.

Again Johnnie shakes his head. "Selling men's pants in a clothing store. Over the telephone."

For the past five years, Johnnie has taught at the Middlesex County vocational and technical high schools. "Our students don't go to a regular high school, because they want to learn a trade," explains Johnnie. "We get our share of the big, tough, dull ones or the guys with problems. There are no girls in school and discipline is our biggest headache. I don't stand for any horseplay," states Johnnie, expanding his great chest, "and at first the boys hate my guts. But after a few months they like and respect me. I can reach them."

Johnnie teaches the history of the labor movement, New Jersey history, freshman English, and runs the library. Last year he threw in some Shakespeare, the theories of Einstein, Galileo, Copernicus, and whatever else the boys showed any interest in. "One year they got all excited about the newspaper accounts of Arthur Godfrey's run-in with the CAA, so we ended up studying civil aeronautics," Johnnie says, and adds with a trace of pride, "I even persuaded fifteen boys to take up oil painting. It made a big splash in the papers."

"Johnnie loves anything that's a challenge," says Marel. "But he needs a job with more pay."

"I used to have a lot of self-confidence," muses Johnnie.

"You got idolized too much in high school. Big football hero. Too much of that is bad for a boy, I think," says Marel.

"A girl in high school wrote to the local paper that she had accidentally touched me in the hallway," recalls Johnnie, grinning. "Hip-hip-Harayda, they called me. All-state halfback."

Johnnie's parents were both Hungarian immigrants, his father a factory worker, and they lived in Hillside, New Jersey, near Newark and Elizabeth. "My father ruled the family in a heavy-handed, old-country way," says Johnnie of his awesome parent who rose at 6 A.M. and retired shortly after supper, after which no noise was allowed. "I don't think he exchanged a hundred words with me in his lifetime." When his older sister reached thirteen, his father ordered her to quit school and go to work. When she objected, Johnnie recalls his father's opening a second-story window and lifting her off her feet to throw her out.

"My father ruled the roost, but mother was just as strong-willed as he was and found plenty of ways to get around him. Once he took his razor strop to me and mamma got so mad she cut it to pieces with his own razor the next day. When he broke all my toys one time, she went right out and bought all new ones.

"We never had any money, but somehow I always had the biggest apple for the teacher, shined with the best butter. I got two-inch steaks for dinner, and beautiful, expensive clothes. Mamma could never understand why the kids in the flat upstairs who wore rags and ate once every two days were always in perfect health while I had colds constantly."

When Johnnie became a legendary athlete in high school, his mother saved the price of a ticket by watching through the fence. A Hillside town official promised to buy Johnnie a car if he helped win a particular game and Johnnie asked instead for a job for his widowed mother. So a spot was found for her in the local jail, cleaning up and escorting disorderly females to various houses of correction, a job she pursued enthusiastically for many years. When Johnnie won a full scholarship to Muhlenberg College, in Pennsylvania, she sent him so many cashmere sweaters that Hip-hip-Harayda was soon known off the gridiron as the Duke.

After three years in Muhlenberg, where he majored in psychology, Johnnie joined the Army and was sent to Harvard for a year's course in German and German culture. Afterward he served as interpreter at various prisoner-of-war camps throughout the Midwest. Marel was attending Western Illinois State Teachers' on a scholarship, with only the haziest idea of why she was there, when she met Johnnie at an Army dance.

Marel (a contraction of Mary and Elsie) had been raised in Peoria, Illinois, one of four children of the manager of the Brink's armored-car service in that city. Marel remembers an ugly, racket-ridden town, reeking of breweries, and parents who put a high premium on conformity and gentility. "Mother still boasts that we were the best-behaved children on the block," says Marel rather bitterly. "But at home we never could please her. She criticized everything we did. My father ignored us. I always felt like the black sheep of the family—maybe because I was so sloppy. In raising my own children, I've tried to do just the opposite of what my parents did. I try to reach inside them, to give them love and understanding and a sense of self-confidence.

"I had such a narrow upbringing I thought all Americans lived in five-room bungalows and ate pork chops and mashed potatoes. I want my kids to know how lots of different kinds of people live, both rich and poor. I want them to develop all their potentialities. I was so unaware that I thought the only possible careers open to women were teaching and office work. I had no self-confidence, a roomful of people terrified me."

But to Johnnie, Marel appeared a quiet, stable girl with a whistle-provoking figure. "Simplicity," he wrote soon after their first meeting, "that captivating grace in women, as rare as it is attractive."

Within two months, Marel knew that this was the man she wanted to marry. She was intrigued with Johnnie's mind and many talents, his apparent strength and independence. She sorely missed Johnnie when he went back to New Jersey to study at Rutgers University. So she followed him there. When she was twenty-two, and working as a waitress, she eloped in a bright red suit. The minister, on discovering that the groom was a G.I. student, refused a fee. Instead he pressed into Johnnie's hand a five-dollar bill. Johnnie slipped it into the poor box on the way out of church and then spent his last two dollars on a bottle of wine.

In fear and trembling the newlyweds told Mamma Harayda what they had done two weeks later. "We knew no girl was good enough for her Johnnie." The doughty police matron, a warm and volatile little woman, wept on the bride's shoulder. "You got a good boy. You take good care of him," she ordered.

Marel found a secretarial job at Rutgers and Johnnie got his B.A. degree and then a master's in education. He did his practice teaching in a high school with crackajack students. "Every night he came home in a glow," Marel recalls. "But after he got his master's, the best teaching offer he had was $2600. We had a baby on the way then. We couldn't live on that. So Johnnie, who is good at selling, drifted into the used-car business."

This was right after the war when "anything on wheels" would sell. "I'd buy a used car for $100 and sit playing cards on my car lot until somebody came along and paid me $150," Johnnie sums up the used-car trade.

But Marel didn't approve of the people in the business. "They got Johnnie into gambling and drinking hard liquor and going to the race track and they were always underfoot in the house. What's more, they were profane in front of the children; and if there's anything I can't stand," exclaims Marel, "it's profanity."

She added that money slips through Johnnie's fingers and that with his pockets full of cash sales he began putting $40 and $50 bets on the horses. One night he came home with cruise tickets to Bermuda. Marel returned them the next day and with $1500 she managed to scrape together bought a small sewing-supply business directly across the street from their house. Her divorced mother, who was then living with them, alternately baby-sat with their two children and helped out at the store.

Marel knew nothing about keeping records or inventories, or buying in the wholesale market, or where or how to advertise. The first day she took in twenty cents. When neighborhood people began to drift in, she waited on them dumbly. Johnnie, pressing his face against the glass, made gestures with his hands of a duck quacking. "Talk, talk, talk!" he mouthed. Marel, giggling, began to talk. And the customers who came in for needles and thread left with materials for dresses and curtains.

Then Marel came out of her shell in a big way. She sponsored an art exhibit and a baby contest, appeared on radio broadcasts, joined the League of Women Voters, and headed a Metuchen Chamber of Commerce committee.

"About this time I forced Johnnie to get out of the used-car business," Marel says. "He still had some education coming to him under the G.I. bill, so he went to a TV-directing school in New York for six months. Then I heard of a teaching job that was open, and remembering how much he loved his practice teaching, I made an appointment for him. I wish now that I had encouraged him to find a job in TV—he really loves creative things like that. You see, Johnnie won't make any decision unless I push him into it."

With Johnnie's teaching job and Marel's shop, the Haraydas were clearing over $10,000 a year, but they had no idea of where the money went. Marel assumed the family food and clothing and entertaining bills. She shopped for food each night on the way home. "I'd get a steak, chops, strawberries, anything that appealed to me. I paid as much as $50 for Janice's coat-and-legging sets. Then I was so tired and cranky at night I craved diversion. We were always going out to the movies or Hungarian night spots or to the races."

Janice was one year old and Billy an infant when Marel bought Milady Fabrics in Metuchen in 1950. After she discovered a third child was on the way two years later, she kept working until the last possible moment. She awoke one night at 3 A.M. and realized that she had better get to the hospital. She dressed in her best bright blue wool suit and high heels and stockings and added a rhinestone pin to her lapel. It seemed a shame to bother Johnnie ("I have my babies with three pains," explains Marel) and so, instead of waking him, she phoned the doctor and persuaded him to pick her up on his way to the hospital. When he arrived, she was incapable of travel.

"While the doctor phoned for an ambulance and then paced up and down wringing his hands and Johnnie boiled water in the kitchen, I had the baby all by myself on the sofa," recalls Marel.

With three children to support, Marel decided to expand into the decorating business and to sell custom-made draperies, bedspreads and slip covers. So she rented a $300-a-month Metuchen shop, added a pretty striped awning over the doorway, and Milady Fabrics began grossing $50,000 a year. Now her once-a-month buying trips to New York became twice-a-week. Three nights a week she returned to the store after dinner to labor over her books; Saturdays she worked all day. Still she managed to see the children at odd moments, since the store was only a mile from home.

Then she decided the Haraydas needed more living space, as none of the rooms in the $10,500 house they owned was much more than nine by nine feet. Johnnie had in mind (and still does) a new brick ranch home, but Marel dismissed this idea as too costly. North Brunswick appealed to her because it was near Johnnie's school (in New Brunswick), and because, with all the industry, property taxes are low. Colonial Gardens sits in a deeply wooded section of that town near busy Route 1 with good public schools nearby. Manderley, as Johnnie and Marel call their dream house, was sitting in a tangle of high weeds when they first saw it, but bright Virginia creeper covered the chimney and dozens of locust trees threw their light feathery shade across the white stucco and timbered gables. It was not until after their first year in Manderley that Johnnie, trying to fit screens, found that his eight-room mansion was not quite plumb; furthermore, that the heating bill ran to $350.

Now Marel's problems really began. The new home was ten miles from the Metuchen store, and shortly after they moved in her mother left to live permanently at the Jersey

CONTINUED ON PAGE 126

NEXT MONTH

■ Why does a young girl start taking narcotics? Or a boy turn junkie at 16?—the common age for becoming a drug user today. Stories of youngsters trapped by the dope habit help to explain the actions of

OUR TEEN-AGE DRUG ADDICTS

By MARGARET PARTON and MARY ANNE MACKAYE

HOW AMERICA LIVES in the March JOURNAL

The cleanest clean under the sun –

New Tide Clean!

NEW TIDE

with RESERVE CLEANING POWER

...wonderful extra cleaning power to get your whole wash clean and fresh as a wind-swept hilltop. What a beautiful sight when your wash is done! Everything, even problem wash comes out more than bright, more than white...really clean! So clean smelling, too...with a fresh air and sunshine cleanness you'll love. Yes, the cleanest clean possible is new Tide clean!

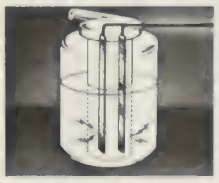
NEW GE "WORRY-FREE" VAPORIZER



Won't burn . . . shock . . . or rust!
It's the family vaporizer built to last!

- Full steam flow in 90 seconds! Full gallon capacity—operates all night without refilling.
- Makes steam in separate chamber. Jar never becomes too hot to handle.
- No salt needed! Uses ordinary tap water. Never rusts.
- Pushbutton control! So convenient and easy to operate.
- Automatic shut-off! Always safe. No need to disconnect after use.

Safest—even for baby! Here's why:

In uninsulated vaporizers, water is electrified—could cause shock.

In General Electric's vaporizer, heating unit is insulated—safe.

UL

* Manufacturer's recommended retail or Fair Trade price

Progress Is Our Most Important Product

GENERAL GE ELECTRIC

MORE PEOPLE USE
Sugarine
SWEETER THAN SUGAR
YET NO FOOD VALUE
Doctors recommend Sugarine for diabetics, overweights, lo-calorie diets. Pure, Harmless, Economical.
GUARANTEED NON-FATTENING 4 OZ.—75¢
AT FOOD STORES EVERYWHERE

FALSE TEETH
That Loosen
Need Not Embarrass

Many wearers of false teeth have suffered real embarrassment because their plate dropped, slipped or wobbled at just the wrong time. Do not live in fear of this happening to you. Just sprinkle a little FASTEETH, the alkaline (non-acid) powder, on your plates. Holds false teeth more firmly, so they feel more comfortable. Does not sour. Checks "plate odor" (denture breath). Get FASTEETH at drug counters everywhere.

Special spice offer available with Unicap* multivitamins

Start a spice collection while building your family's health.

Unicap—for 18 years America's leading vitamin preparation—now makes a special offer with every economy-size 250 bottle.

These handsome Unicap bottles make ideal spice jars. Now, a coupon offering you a set of 16 attractive spice labels—and a book with 150 enticing recipes for spice cookery—goes along with every Unicap 250 bottle. The labels and cookbook are yours just for the cost of handling and mailing. See your local pharmacist for your Unicap Multivitamins today!

*TRADEMARK, REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

For free booklet "Vitamins Do Make a Difference," write The Upjohn Co. Dept. 810A, Kalamazoo, Michigan

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 124

shore. The children were then aged three, five and six. Marel advertised for a housekeeper at $1 an hour, no washing or cooking. The first married helper gave the children some affection, but left when she got pregnant. The next had four children of her own and an alcoholic husband. There was a girl from Nova Scotia who lasted two days and a moron who lasted even less, and a woman who brought a child of two who kept falling down the steep stairs. "I told each one to concentrate on the children and let the house go," says Marel, "but they let the house go and the children too."

Responsible little Janice seemed to adjust to the situation, and Marel frequently took Jackie with her to work ("A doll—he's never had a cranky day since he was born," Marel crows about her youngest), but Billy in kindergarten soon developed violent moods and tantrums. When she tried to leave the house in the morning, he would cling to her skirts, screaming, "She doesn't like me! She doesn't like me!" upsetting his mother for hours. At four o'clock the housekeeper left and Johnnie, arriving home from school, took over the three children until Marel appeared at seven o'clock to fix supper. One afternoon Billy came home to a completely empty house. Sometime later his father found him crying, threatening to kill himself.

"Billy's teachers claim he has unlimited possibilities and ranks at the head of his class, but I am completely unable to cope with him or to understand why he adores Shakespeare's plays so much," relates Marel. "He watched Hamlet on TV three times, and The Taming of the Shrew and Richard the Third. He can take a lamp apart and put it back together and repair electric cords even though he's only seven. But when he comes home from school I can hear him blocks away, screaming and sobbing and shouting. I have to put him in a hot tub for an hour to calm him down. Sometimes I think of taking him to a psychiatrist, but other times he's so sweet and lovable I think I'm the one who belongs on the couch."

One of Marel's difficulties is showing affection. "I have the most romantic husband," she says, "even after ten years of marriage! When Johnnie tells me he loves me madly, I wish I could tell him sweet things—I really do—but I can't. The words just stick in my throat. And Billy, when I try to tuck him in at night and kiss him, giggles and hides his head under the pillow. Yet he complains to his father I don't kiss him enough. I never seem to know what Billy is thinking or brooding about until suddenly he explodes. I know he needs something from me but I don't know what it is or how to give it to him."

Under the double strain of worrying about her children and a business which took fourteen and fifteen hours a day, Marel's nerves began to give. Johnnie tried to help with advertising ideas, selling, and even going out to visit homes on drapery orders, but "Marel seemed to feel she had to carry the whole load," he claims. "It got so that at the slightest criticism she would burst into tears. You couldn't tell her the potatoes were underdone without her taking it as a personal affront. One night she was screaming and crying and carrying on until I picked her up by the armpits and literally dragged her to the doctor's. She was in the hospital two weeks."

"Other people live on a teacher's salary. Why can't you?" scolded Mamma Harayda. "You're the talk of Metuchen," said Marel's mother, "the way you neglect your children."

It was about this time that Marel sat down and wrote the following letter to the JOURNAL:

Running a full-time business and a family is the most satisfying and most frustrating experience any human could ever endure.

The satisfaction comes from watching the business grow and expand, from competing with men, living in a man's world, and knowing that you are succeeding.

The frustrations far outweigh the satisfactions. . . . Today one of my operators let me down on a set of drapes which must be finished for tomorrow. Into the workroom and work 11—12—1 A.M. Every stitch wondering how I ever got into such a situation. Midnight. Argue with my husband over the attention he doesn't get. And what do you say to a man who likes to teach? "Look, fellow, get another job so we can live like humans!"

Other frustrations: What do you do when you get an early morning call from the housekeeper saying she can't come in today, followed by a call from the girl who opens the store saying she can't come in? What do you do when the doctor says you must spend two weeks in the hospital?

This list could go on and on, but the most frustrating of all is the neglect of yourself. The book you'd like to write, the New York show you'd like to see, the friendships you haven't time for, the constant pressure that never comes off your back.

I'm only thirty and I keep saying to myself, "Is it possible I will ever see forty?" At this pace it doesn't seem likely.

Finally, Marel decided to give up Milady Fabrics, but she wanted to wait for the right time and the right buyer. "But Johnnie twisted my arm and made me sell right then, in December. It was a sacrifice price and I just about broke even. I was so furious at Johnnie and worried about our finances that I went to bed for six weeks with a splitting sinus headache."

When Marel recovered, she faced the situation with typical energy and resourcefulness. She was stunned when Johnnie informed her they would have to eat on $15 a week. She was used to spending $40. But by bargain-hunting in three chain stores and bulk buying ("A half a spring lamb costs us less than $8 and does for twelve meals, for instance") Marel is now managing to feed five people on about $20 a week. "And we almost never have a meatless meal, either."

Anger is a stone cast into a wasp's nest.
MALABAR PROVERB

She now sews most of Janice's clothes, the boys' shirts and shorts and slacks, and her husband's sports shirts. She made all the curtains for eight rooms and gave Janice an enchanting room with matching pale pink bedspread, vanity skirt and curtains. She and Johnnie patched, replastered and painted all the upstairs, as well as laying new tile floors, at an estimated saving of almost $700.

But since she has been home Marel has made little headway with what she considers the family's three prime problems: Billy, making more money, and getting Johnnie into The Job Perfect for Him.

Dr. Burr Coe, director of Middlesex County's three vocational high schools, says that Johnnie is a hard-working, conscientious and capable teacher. "We particularly appreciate his interest in art and the art classes he has conducted purely on his own time," says Doctor Coe. Johnnie can expect an annual raise of $500 until he is making $7000 as long as his work remains satisfactory. He is making $5000 in 1957–58, but Marel states, "If Johnnie stays in teaching, then I will have to supplement his earnings."

She would like to give up sewing ("too time-consuming") and is considering holding a nursery school in her home, since the downstairs TV room has its own outside entrance and toilet room.

"You could never stand all those screaming kids," comments Johnnie.

"Nonsense," replies Marel crisply. "I love children. When I yell at my own, it's not because they get on my nerves but because they need correction."

Marel feels that "things are too soft" for children today. The Haraydas both believe in spankings, clean plates, prompt obedience, required chores. "No dishwashing, though," rules Marel. "Most mothers palm off on their kids the job they hate doing themselves."

In the evening, the Haraydas often play word games with their children. Johnnie rigged up a couple of isolation booths for a quiz game which led to Billy's interest in Shakespeare and Janice's in the American Presidents. A great many discarded library books from the high school where Johnnie teaches find their way to the Harayda bookshelves. Marel has never allowed comic books.

She is especially proud of the fact that "we can take our children anywhere and they are

CONTINUED ON PAGE 128

Fragile... handle with Johnson's

Skin so delicate, you stroke it in wonder...
You know that only the finest skin care will do...
Only the purest powder...
Only the gentlest oil...
Only Johnson's.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 126

always well behaved." Billy's first-grade teacher says that in school he is exceptionally quiet and obedient. She was surprised to learn that he comes home from school near hysteria.

"He is a bright child, about sixth in his class," the teacher says. "If you are having difficulty with him at home, Mrs. Harayda, my suggestion is that perhaps you are treating him too much like an adult. A first-grader should not be breaking his brains over seventh-grade books or listening to Shakespeare. Just let him be the sweet, bright, lovable boy he is."

Marel replies rapidly, "I think Billy's trouble is that he's just too bright and eager for his age. Once he really learns to read all the big words in his science books he'll be much happier, I'm sure."

She occasionally feels that she should put all three children into parochial school (they are Catholic, along with their father) where "the work habits are stricter."

"Billy needs less, not more, pressure," believes his teacher.

When she is not stewing about Billy ("My other two are as normal as blueberry pie," says Marel), Mrs. Harayda is thinking of ideas to supplement the family income. Recently she organized a group of seven young couples into the Advance Club. She explained to them the first evening that perhaps they could buy their food co-operatively, or invest jointly in the stock market, or promote one another's inventions. "We all want to be able to live better, to send our children through college, and maybe take that dream trip abroad," Marel exhorted the group, tossing back her thick, uncombed black hair. "We want to advance ourselves, financially and culturally."

Johnnie hovered in the dining-room shadows, saying little. At midnight the meeting broke up with everyone promising to appear the next week with ten bright ideas. Afterward, looking stimulated and pretty, Marel sat up with Johnnie amid the debris of glasses and cigarette butts having a final cup of coffee.

"How many pairs of pants did you sell today?" she asked her weary-looking husband who finished his summer vacation working until nine o'clock at night six days a week in a clothing store.

"A hundred and one," replied Johnnie proudly. "The manager said I have a voice to sell. He thinks I'm sensational."

"I heard of a plasterer today who would plaster this whole kitchen for $50," said Marel eagerly.

"Paneling," replied Johnnie grandly. "I like a pine-paneled kitchen."

"Maybe we should send Billy to private school," worried Marel. "It would cost only $500 a year."

"Next summer we'll make two house payments in advance and take the kids to California," promised Johnnie.

"And instead of buying a tent and sleeping bags and all that equipment we could buy an old school bus and take out the seats and sleep in that," Marel joined in enthusiastically. "Jackie wants to see the Liberty Bell and Janice dotes on Williamsburg and Billy simply must see the Okefinokee swamp, he says."

"You have a beautiful mouth," said Johnnie. "and I hate to see you neglect your teeth the way you do."

"And sometime — Johnnie, listen to me! I've worked every summer since we were married. Some summer we'll just stay home and I'll write that novel and you can paint and we can finish that musical comedy and make a million bucks. And someday," Marel added softly, her eyes like stars, "we'll all of us—the whole family—fly to Paris!"

DUNDEE

for glamour towels that can take it!

Featured Towel Illustrated: TRIUMPH size 25" x 50" about $1.50
DUNDEE MILLS INC., GRIFFIN, GA. • SHOWROOMS: 40 WORTH ST., NEW YORK 13, N. Y.

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 59

"Ordinarily my disposition is mild as milk—my mother demanded harmony as well as absolute obedience from my sisters and me, and as a child I learned to control my emotions. On the occasions I do feel angry inside I hardly ever show it. But suddenly I was in such a rage at Tod I went and locked the doors on him, the front door and the kitchen door. Of course when I went back into the bedroom I immediately started worrying about how he would react to finding himself locked out. To tell the truth, I've always stood in awe of Tod and been a little—well—afraid of him. Although Tod is only two years older than I he has a brilliant mind and a quick, sarcastic way of speaking that flusters and scares me. Eventually I realized I couldn't stand the suspense and I jumped up and unlocked the two doors. I wasn't a minute too soon. Just as I hopped back into bed, Tod came in the front door. He slammed it behind him.

"There was no use my pretending to be asleep. Tod walked into the bedroom and turned on the lights. He had been gone nearly two hours. I forced myself to smile at him—my lips felt funny and stiff—and said I hoped he'd had a nice walk. My voice sounded pleasant and normal, not a bit scolding. Tod didn't answer me. I watched him undress and then he lay down on our double bed. He lay as far away from me as he could possibly get. By then I must have sensed that something was wrong, but I was determined I wouldn't ask questions and stir up trouble.

"I started to switch off the light. Tod said to leave it on, that there was something I should know. And then," Julie said incredulously, "Tod told me he wanted a divorce. He told me I didn't love him any more, that he had found a woman who did love him and that he had just come from seeing her. She had telephoned our home and he had gone to her at once. At first I was so stunned I thought he was just kidding and being sarcastic. Tod soon convinced me he was in earnest. The other woman—her name is Carol—is an engineer like Tod and she works with him. Carol is eight years older than Tod and I don't consider her as attractive as I am, although she is thinner. No doubt she is far more effi-

Fragile...handle with Johnson's

Skin so delicate, you stroke it in wonder...
You know that only the finest skin care will do...
Only the purest powder...
Only the gentlest oil...
Only Johnson's.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 126

lways well behaved." Billy's first-grade eacher says that in school he is exceptionally quiet and obedient. She was surprised to learn hat he comes home from school near hysteria.

"He is a bright child, about sixth in his lass," the teacher says. "If you are having difficulty with him at home, Mrs. Harayda, ny suggestion is that perhaps you are treating im too much like an adult. A first-grader hould not be breaking his brains over sevnth-grade books or listening to Shakespeare. ust let him be the sweet, bright, lovable boy E IS."

Marel replies rapidly. "I think Billy's trouble is that he's just too bright and eager for his age. Once he really learns to read all the big words in his science books he'll be much happier, I'm sure."

She occasionally feels that she should put all three children into parochial school (they are Catholic, along with their father) where "the work habits are stricter."

"Billy needs less, not more, pressure," believes his teacher.

When she is not stewing about Billy ("My other two are as normal as blueberry pie," says Marel), Mrs. Harayda is thinking of ideas to supplement the family income. Recently she organized a group of seven young couples into the Advance Club. She explained to them the first evening that perhaps they could buy their food co-operatively, or invest jointly in the stock market, or promote one another's inventions. "We all want to be able to live better, to send our children through college, and maybe take that dream trip abroad," Marel exhorted the group, tossing back her thick, uncombed black hair. "We want to advance ourselves, financially and culturally."

Johnnie hovered in the dining-room shadows, saying little. At midnight the meeting broke up with everyone promising to appear the next week with ten bright ideas. Afterward, looking stimulated and pretty, Marel sat up with Johnnie amid the debris of glasses and cigarette butts having a final cup of coffee.

"How many pairs of pants did you sell today?" she asked her weary-looking husband who finished his summer vacation working until nine o'clock at night six days a week in a clothing store.

"A hundred and one," replied Johnnie proudly. "The manager said I have a voice to sell. He thinks I'm sensational."

"I heard of a plasterer today who would plaster this whole kitchen for $50," said Marel eagerly.

"Paneling," replied Johnnie grandly. "I like a pine-paneled kitchen."

"Maybe we should send Billy to private school," worried Marel. "It would cost only $500 a year."

"Next summer we'll make two house payments in advance and take the kids to California," promised Johnnie.

"And instead of buying a tent and sleeping bags and all that equipment we could buy an old school bus and take out the seats and sleep in that," Marel joined in enthusiastically. "Jackie wants to see the Liberty Bell and Janice dotes on Williamsburg and Billy simply must see the Okefinokee swamp, he says."

"You have a beautiful mouth," said Johnnie, "and I hate to see you neglect your teeth the way you do."

"And sometime — Johnnie, listen to me! I've worked every summer since we were married. Some summer we'll just stay home and I'll write that novel and you can paint and we can finish that musical comedy and make a million bucks. And someday," Marel added softly, her eyes like stars, "we'll all of us—the whole family—fly to Paris!"

DUNDEE

for glamour towels that can take it!

Featured Towel Illustrated: TRIUMPH size 25" x 50" about $1.50
DUNDEE MILLS INC., GRIFFIN, GA. • SHOWROOMS: 40 WORTH ST., NEW YORK 13, N. Y.

CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 59

"Ordinarily my disposition is mild as milk—my mother demanded harmony as well as absolute obedience from my sisters and me, and as a child I learned to control my emotions. On the occasions I do feel angry inside I hardly ever show it. But suddenly I was in such a rage at Tod I went and locked the doors on him, the front door and the kitchen door. Of course when I went back into the bedroom I immediately started worrying about how he would react to finding himself locked out. To tell the truth, I've always stood in awe of Tod and been a little—well—afraid of him. Although Tod is only two years older than I he has a brilliant mind and a quick, sarcastic way of speaking that flusters and scares me. Eventually I realized I couldn't stand the suspense and I jumped up and unlocked the two doors. I wasn't a minute too soon. Just as I hopped back into bed, Tod came in the front door. He slammed it behind him.

"There was no use my pretending to be asleep. Tod walked into the bedroom and turned on the lights. He had been gone nearly two hours. I forced myself to smile at him—my lips felt funny and stiff—and said I hoped he'd had a nice walk. My voice sounded pleasant and normal, not a bit scolding. Tod didn't answer me. I watched him undress and then he lay down on our double bed. He lay as far away from me as he could possibly get. By then I must have sensed that something was wrong, but I was determined I wouldn't ask questions and stir up trouble.

"I started to switch off the light. Tod said to leave it on, that there was something I should know. And then," Julie said incredulously, "Tod told me he wanted a divorce. He told me I didn't love him any more, that he had found a woman who did love him and that he had just come from seeing her. She had telephoned our home and he had gone to her at once. At first I was so stunned I thought he was just kidding and being sarcastic. Tod soon convinced me he was in earnest. The other woman—her name is Carol—is an engineer like Tod and she works with him. Carol is eight years older than Tod and I don't consider her as attractive as I am, although she is thinner. No doubt she is far more efficient and intelligent than I am. Apparently she is sexier. Anyhow, Tod seems to think so.

"According to Tod, he and Carol have been having an affair for nearly six months. Perhaps I should have guessed the explanation of his frequent absences and long hours at work. I guess I was aware of growing tension between us—after little Joe's birth Tod very rarely made love to me—but I was too busy and overworked to be suspicious. I still can hardly conceive that Tod is willing to give up his home, his three sons and me, in order to marry Carol. I've cried such gallons of tears in the past three weeks that Tod finally agreed to come to the Institute for counseling, to postpone consulting a lawyer and to stop seeing Carol outside working hours for the next two months. I've already begun to fight to preserve my marriage.

To be successfully married, you've got to be prepared to give more than you take—and then you generally find that you don't have to.

STANLEY J. RUBINSTEIN

"Since the night I heard about Carol I've been struggling with all my might to be a better wife. The very next day I went on a diet and started taking reducing pills. I've lost eight pounds and intend to lose fifteen more, although I'm doing a great deal of rich cooking. Tod is fond of pies, cakes and puddings. Because of running after three kids—sometimes it seems to me none of my children will ever be old enough to enter school—I let my baking slip. Well, I picked it up in a hurry. Occasionally the smell of the baking nearly drives me crazy and I think I will faint from hunger and fatigue. Tod has always complained that I'm a poor housekeeper and don't keep the children clean. For three weeks now I've done two loads of laundry daily—we have an automatic washer but no dryer—and I've tried hard to keep up with the ironing. Yesterday I dressed all three children in clean clothes and scrubbed the woodwork and used the vacuum before Tod arrived in the evening, but I forgot and left a big basket of clothes I'd been sprinkling on a chair in the living room. The first thing Tod's eye lighted on was that basket of laundry. I snatched up the basket and whisked it out of sight, but Tod went into a long harangue on the subject of my untidiness. A few minutes later he wanted to wash his hands and we were out of soap. Tod does all the marketing and the driving—I have no license—and I'd neglected to put soap on his morning list. There was another sarcastic blast from him. I didn't hear a word of praise for his clean house, his three clean, well-behaved children whom I'd fed in advance so they wouldn't be whiny. I heard no praise for the good dinner on the table.

"Suddenly I couldn't keep from crying. Tears streamed from my eyes and wouldn't stop. I hid my face in my apron and went stumbling out to the kitchen. I felt the exact, desperate way I used to feel as a child when I would do my best at some task but would fail and my mother would make me stand and listen to her lecturing until I broke down and bawled like a baby. I cried for fifteen minutes before I could pull myself together and join Tod at the dinner table. I could tell from his disgusted expression that he was mentally comparing me with Carol and it nearly broke my heart. But by then I was in control of my feelings and I didn't let him know.

"I haven't nagged Tod about Carol. In fact, I've done my best to resemble her. Since she seems to be so sexy, I've tried to be sexy too. After I put the youngsters to bed last night I came out wearing a tight skirt and a sweater without a bra and I made the most provocative remarks to Tod that I could think of. Although Tod made love to me—in the past three weeks he's made love to me several times—he wasn't satisfied with the way I responded. He says I'm not in love with him.

"Tod is mistaken. He is the only man I've ever loved or ever could love. In the beginning—we met six years ago—Tod loved me, I know. On our second date he asked me if I believed in love at first sight and later confessed that he was already thinking of marriage. We met each other at a concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra; both of us were college students at the time and we were ushering for free so we could hear the concert. Tod is very talented musically. During our courtship he and I used to compose and play duets on the baby grand piano my parents gave me for my sixteenth birthday. Within three months Tod proposed and I had my engagement ring. My mother promised me a big fancy wedding if I would finish out the college year, but Tod wouldn't agree to the delay and so my mother bought my trousseau—I heartily disliked my wedding dress—and in March we had a very simple ceremony with just the two families.

"I'm sure our honeymoon was a disappointment to Tod; maybe that is a part of our trouble now. I received no sex education from my mother, who doesn't really approve of sex, in my belief. However, I took a marriage course in college. I tried to follow Tod and to be responsive and loving and to please him in every way he suggested. Perhaps the marriage course wasn't very good or else I misunderstood the rules. Anyhow, I know I wasn't an exciting bride.

"We were supposed to have a two-week honeymoon at the beach. On the third day, at Tod's suggestion, we left the beach and went to his mother's cottage in the mountains. We

OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERNS ON PAGE 80

Vogue Design No. 9421.	One-piece dress or apron; "Easy to Make." 12–20 (32–40). 75c
Vogue Design No. 2817.	Smock or smock dress; 4–14 (23–32). 50c.
Vogue Design No. 2819.	Robe; 6–14 (24–32). 50c.
Vogue Design No. 9409.	Robe; S (31–32), M (34–36), L (38–40). 60c.
Vogue Design No. 2758.	Suit; 2–10 (21–28). 40c.
Vogue Design No. S-4806.	Suit; 10–18 (31–38). $1.00.
Vogue Design No. 2818.	One-piece dress, bolero and apron; 6–14 (24–32). 50c.
Vogue Design No. 9420.	One-piece dress, bolero and apron; 12–18 (32–38). 75c.

NOW—Flavored

At the same price as regular

New Mint-Flavored Form Tastes Wonderfully Clean and Refreshing

As a laxative, Phillips' gives more complete relief than preparations which act only on constipation. Phillips' is actually more than a laxative. It also relieves the acid indigestion which frequently accompanies constipation. Works leisurely, too—without embarrassing urgency. Taken with water at bedtime when necessary, Phillips' brings relief by morning, so you start your day feeling bright and refreshed.

As an antacid, Phillips' settles your stomach in seconds! Scientific tests show that—in just a matter of seconds—Phillips' neutralizes the excess stomach acids which cause upset stomach, gas, heartburn and other symptoms of acid indigestion. Phillips' works with remarkable speed because it is one of the fastest, most effective stomach acid neutralizers ever discovered. Buy Phillips' Milk of Magnesia today—and keep it handy.

✓ Regular PHILLIPS' Milk of Magnesia continues unchanged!

spent the balance of our honeymoon in the mountains building a garage for my mother-in-law. Before the garage was finished Tod got a nasty case of oak poisoning—the worst case the doctor had ever seen—and was two months getting over it. During that period we couldn't make love. By the time Tod was fully recovered I was pregnant with Bobby and awfully sick; I suffered from pernicious vomiting with all three of my pregnancies. In a way, you might say Tod and I haven't ever had much opportunity to enjoy the sexual side of our lives.

"It seems to me there is more to marriage than sex, important though sex may be. It seems to me that I have proved my love for Tod by bearing him three sons. Tod wanted children too. Often during our courtship we spoke of our future family. It's true we hoped for two boys and a girl, and it's true our boys came awfully fast and are now at difficult ages.

"But I carry most of the burden of looking after them. I ask very little of Tod except that he drive us around occasionally; he begrudges us that pleasure. During the Christmas-holiday season last year he took the children and me to visit Santa Claus in the downtown shopping section, but only the one time. He gave me a coffee table for Christmas and I praised his taste, but I would have preferred to accompany him to the furniture mart and help with the selection. I hardly ever have the chance to set foot inside a big store—or any kind of store, for that matter. Weeks pass when I go nowhere except to our parents' homes.

"Tod complains bitterly when I give in to my mother's ideas, although it has always been impossible for me to stand out against her. My mother treats Tod with perfect consideration, as he will admit. His mother criticizes and picks at me whenever I'm in her company, which is something he either doesn't notice or doesn't mind.

"I've never complained to Tod about his mother. Indeed, I've never complained to him of any dissatisfaction I may have felt in our marriage. We've never had an outright quarrel. I've been the best wife I know how to be. I hope you can explain why my best isn't good enough. I will turn myself inside out, I will make any sacrifice whether it's reasonable or not, to hold Tod and prevent our sons from growing up without a father."

Tod Tells His Side

"I love my three sons, but I can't help believing they robbed me of my wife," said twenty-seven-year-old Tod, a tall young man with bitten nails and a handsome but scowling face. "In a sense I feel I've never had a wife—the warm and loving woman I dreamed of as a boy, the devoted homemaker, the real companion. When Julie and I had only two children our house was bedlam and I received very little attention from her. After the baby appeared I woke up to the fact that I mattered less to her than last year's calendar, which typically enough is still hanging on our kitchen wall.

"Since the night I told Julie about Carol there has been a sharp change in her manner, but I'm pretty sure it's only a surface change. Julie has been putting forth a monumental effort to make like a flesh-and-blood wife, but in her heart I'm certain she thinks of me mainly as the family breadwinner. I don't intend to evade my financial obligations to Julie. If she agrees to a divorce, she can have the house and furniture and the amount of alimony she thinks necessary. My present income is six hundred dollars a month and she and the boys are welcome to every penny. My salary is bound to go up. For the time being Carol and I can get along on her earnings. I don't consider that an ideal arrangement, although Carol herself proposed it.

"To tell the truth, I wasn't exactly ready to ask for a divorce, but Carol kept on pointing out that our irregular relationship was unfair to her and was ruining her health. I could see that myself. For several months Carol has been losing sleep and losing weight; she's drinking too much, her nerves are shot. There is something else I should add on the question of finances. There is no risk Carol and I might be faced someday with the expense of a second family. Carol can't have children; an automobile accident years ago ended her chances in that direction. Both she and I are satisfied with the situation.

"Proud as I am of my sons, I think three children are plenty for any man. During the major part of my marriage, largely because of Julie's lack of organization and her own childishness, I've been run ragged trying to be a good father. I've changed diapers, I've bathed the children, occasionally I've even washed the fancy clothes Julie insists on dressing them in. Often in the evening I've washed the children's breakfast dishes. Twice a week I drive to the supermarket and buy the family groceries, praying that Julie's list will be complete. Every weekend I devote hours to driving her and the boys to visit both grandmothers.

"The Christmas season last year is still a nightmare to me. I spent the holidays at the wheel of my automobile. Seemingly Julie can't learn how to drive—her mother used to lug her and her sisters everywhere—and so inevitably I was involved with the Christmas shopping. Suppose I describe our first trip. I suggested to Julie that we hire a sitter and leave the baby at home. Julie seemed to feel that an infant in arms—Joe was then barely three months old—was entitled to a peep at Santa Claus and I foolishly gave way to her.

"Little Joe was frightened out of his wits at Santa Claus, as any sensible person would have anticipated. He began to scream and his two brothers, not to be outdone, joined in the uproar. Hordes of female customers glared at me as though I regularly ate small children for lunch. A floorwalker came rushing up to investigate. By then three-year-old Billy, alarmed at Santa Claus himself, had dived behind a counter and was hiding inside a big cardboard carton that was filled with rubber beach balls. Billy had bitten holes in five of the balls before we finally located him and I paid for them. A sitter would have been considerably cheaper.

"I learned the truth about Quality Dry Cleaning from two little pieces of cloth"

They proved that repeated SANITONE® Dry Cleanings do not wear out my family's clothes

Two identical fabric swatches, one Sanitone Dry Cleaned 50 times and the other untouched, were presented to me by my Sanitone Dry Cleaner. Imagine my surprise and delight when I couldn't tell which one had been subjected to repeated dry cleanings. The color was the same, their feel the same and there was not the slightest indication of wear. Now, I'll never have any fear sending all of our clothes, even my most delicate fabrics, to our Sanitone Dry Cleaner, often.

Why don't you safeguard your family's clothes by taking them to your local Sanitone Cleaner. See the Twin-Swatch Test yourself to be completely assured that Sanitone Dry Cleaners everywhere will give you highest quality dry cleaning with maximum safety.

Look for the Sanitone "Fabric of Dry Cleaning" SANITONE SERVICE

Make a "Necktie Test" of Quality Sanitone Dry Cleaning!

Your Sanitone Dry Cleaner is eager to show you that Sanitone Dry Cleaning is the best you can buy! That's why he is offering you a February special on necktie cleaning. Let him clean one batch of neckties for you. Their crisp freshness and beauty will show how Sanitone Dry Cleaning will beautify and prolong the life of any garment you entrust to the expert care of your Sanitone Dry Cleaner.

Look for "Sanitone Approved Service" under "Cleaners" in the classified pages of your telephone directory. There you will find listed the Sanitone Dry Cleaner of your town. If you cannot locate one, please write directly to us.

Sanitone Dry Cleaning Service

A Division of Emery Industries, Inc., Carew Tower, Cincinnati 2, Ohio

"I took the baby away from Julie, left her with Bobby and Billy and went outside to wait in the parking lot. I waited for two hours and twenty-five minutes before Julie and the older boys showed up at the car. Julie hadn't bought one darn thing, not one thing. Instead, scattered over the five floors of the store she had staked out an array of toys, gimcracks, presents for my mother, my brothers, her sisters and her mother—my mother-in-law invariably exchanges anything you give her—that I was supposed to go inside and examine and help Julie decide among. Well, I blew my top and bawled her out and drove her and the three kids straight home.

"Afterward, of course, I was sorry. Julie didn't bawl me out, although I deserved it and I sort of wished she would. Instead, she was so teary and woebegone I felt like a complete heel. That evening I went back to the store by myself with her list. Half the things she'd picked were sold out and some of the others I couldn't locate. So the next day I took Julie shopping again, this time without the boys. For three days in a row I took Julie shopping in jam-packed stores and stood first on one foot and then on the other while she was making up her mind what to buy. Julie is the most indecisive person, bar none, I've ever met. Once—once was enough—she persuaded me to help her select a dress. The first dress she tried on was very becoming and I O.K.'d it, but Julie tried on nine other dresses before settling on dress number one.

"On Christmas Day Bobby had a cold, which he'd probably acquired on that shopping trip, and had to stay at home in bed and miss the festivities arranged by both my mother and my mother-in-law. Professional sitters were unobtainable, but Julie's older sister volunteered to sit if I would go and fetch her, which I did. For the rest of the day I ferried Julie, Billy and the baby between my mother's place, her mother's place and our place.

"When evening came and my chauffeuring was finished, our house was in chaos, with the living room knee deep in paper, ribbons, tinsel and stepped-on toys. I had the choice of straightening up the mess—as usual, Julie and the kids whizzed into bed—or going downtown and fooling around in the shop, a busy, productive place that is a miracle of order compared with our sloppily run, unproductive, inefficient home. I chose the shop. To my surprise, I found Carol there. Her reason for being in the shop, she confessed, was that her lack of family on the holiday had made her feel lonesome. It may sound odd, since I'd been buried in family since early morning, but I, too, felt lonesome. We went to Carol's apartment for a snack and cup of coffee; her apartment was as orderly and well organized as the shop.

"You can probably fill in the rest of the picture for yourself, but I'd like to supply a few extenuating circumstances. Julie hadn't actually listened to a word I'd said all day. I gave her a coffee table for a Christmas present, and though she thanked me sweetly I had a hunch she didn't honestly admire the table. I'm like most men: I prefer genuine appreciation.

"On the way from the shop to Carol's apartment, I stopped and bought her a carton of cigarettes. Carol thanked me as though I had handed her a deed to the Waldorf Towers. Making a cup of coffee in our house, what with locating the pot that Bobby and Billy are forever dragging somewhere, is a major production. In no time flat Carol whipped up grilled sandwiches and strong coffee. One of the things I first admired about Carol was her dexterity and quickness; she darted around her kitchen that night like a hummingbird. Unless Julie has nine or ten hours of sleep—and sometimes even then—she wanders around our kitchen like a somnambulant.

"I was hungry for love on that Christmas night. I'd hardly kissed Julie since Joe's birth; any time I tried she would obediently raise her lips, but I could sense that her true feelings were untouched. In staying with Carol that first time I broke my own moral code, and I knew it. At dawn I sneaked in home, feeling guilty and ashamed of myself. Julie didn't open an eye when I crawled into bed beside her. Since she was that uninterested in my comings and goings, I stopped feeling guilty. Until I told Julie there was a Carol, she was so preoccupied with our kids I doubt she noticed how seldom I was home, how late I stayed 'at work.' She never questioned me, never complained.

"Possibly she didn't care enough for me to be curious or possibly she decided to ignore the situation. I don't know which. After five years of marriage there are still many times when what Julie is thinking and feeling, what she likes and what she dislikes are a mystery to me. It does seem she would rather cry than laugh, rather meekly accept anybody else's opinion than form an opinion of her own.

"Back in the days I was courting Julie and we were composing duets I thought we understood each other and were ideally suited. I didn't know Julie would drop her music with the birth of our first child. I didn't know she was such a leaner that she would telephone my place of business to ask me what she should cook for dinner. I didn't know our sexual relationship would be unsatisfactory. Perhaps it's my fault Julie doesn't enjoy my love-making. Perhaps I'm just not adequate enough to please her. On the other hand, my guess is that my mother-in-law may be responsible for Julie's indifference to sex. When we took possession of our first home her housewarming present to us was a pair of bunk beds—an upper and a lower—that Julie and her young sister had used as kids. Julie and I were newlyweds, but my mother-in-law expected us to occupy those bunk beds.

"In her own way my mother-in-law is a good woman, but she orders Julie around as though she were still ten years old. I blame her for Julie's limp way of following the line of least resistance and for her sloppy housekeeping. My mother had to work—my father deserted her when my three brothers and I were very small—but she managed to keep a neat, tidy house.

"I want to be fair to all concerned. I don't want to hurt my sons. But my parents' divorce apparently did no harm to my brothers and me. And I'm doubtful that anybody's advice can straighten out my marriage."

The Marriage Counselor Says:

"Tod had been more damaged by his parents' divorce than he supposed. For one thing, he lacked a man in his boyhood home upon whom to model himself. For another thing, Tod grew up short-changed on affection and attention, and as an adult he demanded an inordinate amount. Psychological tests revealed as plainly as did our interviews that Tod was disposed to view marriage mainly in the light of his own comfort and convenience; that he was inclined to be selfish, unsympathetic, deficient in understanding the needs of others. He behaved like a petty autocrat at home, denouncing Julie for very trivial lapses. It was most unjust of him to expect grade-A housekeeping at a time she was looking after three active preschool youngsters. Tod's career-woman mother, whose meticulous housekeeping he so fondly remembered, had always employed a full-time maid. In this day and age, as I hardly need remark, live-in servants have practically disappeared. But I might point out that Julie failed to utilize such hired service as was available to her.

"In many ways, Julie was an exasperating person to deal with because she consistently refused to be herself. Despite her strenuous outward efforts to meet all Tod's wishes, she failed to satisfy him because he sensed the artificiality of her efforts. Julie's personality quite correctly seemed phony and unreal to him. She swallowed a college marriage course without attempting to adapt the teachings to her own special case; uncritically, she adopted Carol for a model, which was ridiculous. In her fear of displeasing, she completely smothered her own individuality.

"Bullied by her mother throughout her girlhood, Julie subconsciously invited Tod to bully her in their marriage. She reacted to him emotionally exactly as she had reacted to her mother. Instead of facing her problems squarely and voicing her candid opinion of Tod's rages and unreasonable expectations, she took refuge in self-pity, poured tears like a leaky faucet and turned into a human doormat. Most men quickly tire of doormats.

"The toughest-minded character in this triangle was thirty-five-year-old Carol, who fully intended to bully a man with three little children into the divorce court. In the midst of Tod's nervously explaining to me the advantages of a divorce, I could hear the echoes of Carol's firm voice. The fact was that Tod had been too weak to resist the pressures applied by the older, more experienced woman. Inwardly he was aware of this. Some weeks before the end of the two-month 'trial period,' he openly acknowledged that the welfare of his three small sons was important to him, that his duty lay to his wife and family. He then permanently broke his association with Carol, although it wasn't easy. She threatened suicide, she even threatened to come gunning for me, but Tod stood his ground.

"For several months he worked beside Carol, resisting her threats and declining her invitations to drop by her apartment in the evenings. From this uncomfortable experience he gained strength. Incidentally, he also gained the sure knowledge that Carol would have been a very poor wife for him. Today Tod works as the engineering supervisor in a large aircraft plant and he hasn't seen Carol for many months.

"A long course of counseling was necessary before Julie was able to comprehend the reasons for her distorted personality. She then was able to stop being a doormat that other people automatically trod on, lay aside her martyred airs and become the forthright young woman she was capable of being. In the beginning she and I studied the practicalities of her situation. Her inability to drive was an unnecessary nuisance. I suspect Julie may have been unconsciously appealing to Tod to treat her like a little girl, just as her mother had treated her, in limply expecting him to drive her everywhere. His objections on this score were natural. There was an obvious solution. Professional driving lessons were recommended.

"I believe Julie's driving license marked the turning point in the case. Relieved of chores he disliked, Tod plainly showed that he admired Julie's gumption in learning to drive. Julie acquired some badly needed self-respect and felt the thrill of pride in her accomplishment. On at least one evening a week Tod began to stay at home with the youngsters while she drove off to the shopping center. Less housebound, she became more stimulating company. On independent shopping trips, she practiced and slowly learned the art (so difficult for her) of reaching independent decisions.

"During her absences Tod had the opportunity to get well acquainted with his young sons, and when this occurred he became a willing and loving instead of a reluctant father. Also, he lost his secret jealousy of his children when he and Julie became a team and shared

A PHILOSOPHIC THOUGHT BASED ON INCOME, LACK OF

By ELIZABETH GRAHAM

A man who was rich (that is,
he had money)
Was envied by me, until he said, "Funny.

"Most everyone thinks pure joy is my lot,
Yet I can't go out on my fifty-foot yacht

"For a casual cruise, that fish boats don't come
And clutter my course. I'm ever so glum;

"The butler eloped with the cook—before dinner.
Despite all my money, my hair has grown thinner."

And, "Few understand," he said with a sigh,
And he went away, his face all awry.

•

May I never get rich! is my cry, low and steady.
I'm misunderstood well enough, already.

VARICOSE VEINS

Tired Legs, Leg Cramps Relieved By The NEW

Dr. Scholl's Super-Sheer

51 GAUGE ELASTIC STOCKINGS

NYLON • FULL-FASHIONED • FULL-FOOTED

So sheer, they look just like regular nylons. No over-hose needed. Give comfortable, uniform support to varicose veins, tired, aching legs. Help prevent leg trouble during pregnancy. Colors: French Nude, White, Black. Only $12.95 pair. At Drug, Dept., Surgical Supply Stores and Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort Shops. For booklet on Foot and Leg Care, write DR. SCHOLL'S, Dept. E-2, Chicago 10, Ill.

Learn FLOWER Arrangement and FLORISTRY Easily and Quickly AT HOME

FOR PLEASURE—please your friends and family with professional corsages, centerpieces, etc. Your church and club will welcome your assistance in arranging impressive floral designs. Win Blue Ribbons. Many earn good money while learning.

FOR PROFIT—prepare for tremendous money-making opportunities for trained men and women in the Floral Field. You can quickly learn how to make professional arrangements for the home weddings, social affairs, funerals—wherever flowers are used. Start your own profitable business or get good paying position. Excellent part-time money-making opportunities. Study and earn your diploma at home.

Write Today for FREE Book, "Opportunities in Floristry"

NATIONAL LANDSCAPE INSTITUTE

L-28, 11826 San Vicente Blvd., Los Angeles 49, Calif.

What Oh FUDGE!

Lynne White

fluff's Home Economist

Smooth, delicious — easy to make! See my simple recipe on Fluff label! This is the FUDGE you have read so much about.

COMMENDED PARENTS' MAGAZINE

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

MARSHMALLOW fluff

Which cook added *F.R.H.S.?

Adding just 5 drops of Frank's Red Hot Sauce to meats, fish, cocktail sauce, spaghetti, beans — almost every food — gives a saucy flavor that pleases the men in your life.

FREE! New 24 page "Fun To Serve Recipe Book" reveals secrets of achieving New Orleans flavor in your cookery. Write for your FREE copy — today.

THE FRANK TEA & SPICE CO.

Dept. J Cincinnati 2, Ohio

*Frank's RED HOT SAUCE

the responsibilities of rearing them. Julie was an oversolicitous mother. It was foolish of her to want to take three such young children into public places, foolish of her to dress them elaborately. She began to choose more simple clothing and her laundry burden was reduced.

"I am not an authority on housekeeping. Julie herself analyzed her technique—or, rather, her lack of technique—along with Tod's numerous criticisms. She decided his chief annoyance was the clutter and untidiness of their living room. Without undertaking any detailed scheduling of her time, virtually impossible in her circumstances, she discovered she could set aside fifteen minutes directly before his evening return to pick up the living room, remove any pots and pans carried in from the kitchen by the children, put their toys in the toy box, and so forth.

"Tod was grateful to come home to a picked-up living room, grateful for the change in Julie's whole attitude toward housekeeping and toward him. Her disorganization and her lethargy had been partly due to the fact that her psychic energies had been employed in feeling put upon and abused. In many subtle, subconscious ways she had let Tod guess that she considered him a tyrant. He felt the difference at once. When he rewarded the improvement in her with words of praise and saw the wonderful effect, he learned to curb his biting, sarcastic tongue. In criticizing Julie less, he learned to love her more and understand her better. She was naturally the lower keyed of the two and required more sleep to be effective; Tod taught himself to stop grumbling at something that could not be altered.

"The couple's sexual problem was neither serious nor deep-seated. It was merely a reflection of their unsatisfactory marriage. By nature Julie was an affectionate young woman. So long as Tod was inconsiderate, thoughtless and selfish, it is hardly surprising she couldn't be warmly responsive to his overtures. When Tod stopped browbeating her and became helpful with the children, when he showed her tenderness and consideration, she responded to him quickly and warmly enough.

"At my suggestion Julie and Tod cut down on the number of their visits to both sets of parents. These visits had weakened them as a separate family unit. At my suggestion, too, they hired a baby sitter and went out together once a week. It was their own idea to take up playing the piano again. This was another bond among the many bonds now binding them together. I haven't seen Julie and Tod for some time. When I telephoned asking permission for this JOURNAL article, I heard from Julie that Bobby is now in school and Billy is in kindergarten, but there is a new baby in the house—a little girl. She told me happily that four children are far less trouble than three. When I telephoned Tod at the aircraft plant, he assured me that his wife spoke the truth."

Editors' Note: This case history was compiled and condensed from actual records by DOROTHY CAMERON DISNEY

MOTHERS NEED A BREAK

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 33

panionship for their children and social life for themselves. The idea was to find a spot where the children were the right age and the mothers were enjoyable, and there were plenty of spots to pick from. When we went to live in other places we realized how few good parks there were and how few mothers used them. Perhaps it's only apartment dwellers who appreciate a park. Perhaps householders who can see grass out their windows are satisfied to stay indoors.

When we lived in Rochester, Minnesota, after the war, many of the fellowship men in training at the Mayo Clinic, having been in the armed services, were already married and had children or were having them. Most of them lived in a temporary housing development known as the Prefabs. And though the young mothers complained of the cramped and inelegant quarters and the long hours their husbands had to work and study, I had the impression that the majority were able to make the best of the confinement of child care and their low budgets because everyone was in the same boat. They were all close neighbors, there was lots of visiting around and there was sharing of everything. Similar housing developments for young married students were put up in many universities, and I think that most couples who were part of them look back on this as a hectic but very satisfying time of their lives. They were like South Sea Island communities in several ways. The huts were packed in close. There was so little room inside it was natural to go out on every occasion. The earth between the huts was worn down by flocks of children. Often the laundry was done in one public place.

There must be better ways, though, to make it easy for mothers to get together, without having to leave their children behind and without neglecting their other chores.

I keep wondering why none of the giant shopping centers that have mushroomed everywhere has included a large and glamorous Mothers' and Children's Club. There would be playgrounds outside and a number of playrooms inside for children of various ages and interests. There would be rooms or alcoves for block building and toy cars, for doll play, for coloring. When activities such as these are separated, children become more absorbed and quieter. There would be comfortable chairs for the mothers to sit in while they talked with one another and kept an eye on their children.

There would also be rooms in charge of nursery-school teachers where children who had got to trust them could be left for an hour while mothers shopped, had beauty treatments or took part in organized activities of their own. For mothers who were interested there could be art classes, sewing classes, fashion shows. There could be special clubs which met weekly for the discussion of books or current events or child care. The possibilities are endless. The essentials are that mothers have a place to gather and enjoy one another frequently where their children would be welcome too. I picture certain activities occurring each week on the same schedule and each woman making it a habit to come on those hours of those days when she could expect to do the same thing with the same acquaintances. Then her children would see their same friends too.

I don't know whether the lack of such a club means that no man who has developed a shopping center has thought of it, or whether he'd doubt that the increased popularity of the center would pay for these facilities. Maybe the mothers would pay dues or fees.

Why shouldn't churches be interested in providing meeting places for mothers and children, from Monday to Saturday? There could be swings and slides and sandboxes in the yard, with chairs for the mothers. In the church house or church basement could be rooms or alcoves for children's play. If there were enough funds or interest to engage a nursery-school teacher, she and a few of the mothers in rotation could supervise the play while the rest of the mothers carried on recreational or cultural or religious activities in scheduled groups. I realize that a few churches have organized regular nursery schools, and these are fine for the parents who can afford to pay for everyday nursery-school care. But I am thinking now of a meeting and play space that either involved no salary for a teacher, or one in which a teacher with the assistance of mothers could provide supervision for many children and sociable activities for many mothers, each of whom came perhaps only once or twice or three times a week, for an hour or two in the morning or afternoon.

I don't know what would be the best answer. There are probably a number of solutions. Anyway, I refuse to believe that we can't find ways to give mothers the companionship and fun and stimulation which women in more primitive societies get without the asking.

Dr. Spock regrets that it is impossible for him to answer letters personally. However, he is delighted to receive suggestions of topics of truly general interest.—Ed.

STOP ANNOYING NOISES AND WASTING WATER

GET THE GENUINE WATER MASTER

America's Largest Selling TOILET TANK BALL

Noisy running toilets can waste over 1000 gallons of water a day. Stop this annoying noise, waste and expense. The efficient patented Water-Master Tank Ball instantly stops the flow of water after each flushing, stops the flow everytime, not just some of the time.

75c AT HARDWARE STORES EVERYWHERE

Higher in Canada

LIVING FENCE

Amazing Fast Growing Rose Hedge

See the sensational Red Robin Living Fence (Gloire Des Rosomanes) that's sweeping the country! Surround your property with beauty and protection for as little as 12c a foot. Plant this spring; this summer have a vigorous living fence bursting with fragrant red roses. Grows to 6 feet if desired. Keeps out intruders, noise. Not available elsewhere. Send for free full-color book today!

GINDEN NURSERY CO.

161-2 El Camino, San Bruno, Calif.

CARNATIONS

3 PKTS. BEAUTIFUL, HARDY, MOST FRAGRANT OF ALL TO YOU for just 10¢

Our "new friends" offer brings you 3 pkts. of yellow, pink and red Carnations for just 10c. Bloom in your garden all summer long. Lovely as greenhouse varieties. Send 10c today —new, colorful catalog free! Limit one offer to a customer.

RED—PINK YELLOW Each color in separate packet

HENRY FIELD Seed Nursery Co.

1052 Oak St., Shenandoah, Iowa

"For Over 60 Years!"

OPPORTUNITY

IF YOU want extra money, and have spare time to put to use, this is for you! You can spend your spare time taking orders for magazine subscriptions—and earning generous commissions.

Just send us your name and address on a postal. In return, we will send you our offer with starting supplies. From then on, YOU are the boss. Subscription work of this type can be carried on right from your own home. As an independent representative, you may work whenever it is most convenient for you.

Write that postal today. Information and supplies are sent at no obligation to you.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY

291 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Penna.

NOW! EASY-TO-SEW

Factory Short Cuts give Custom Look to "Made-at-Home" Clothes

SAVE and EARN money while learning exciting NEW METHODS for Home Dressmaking. Write for FREE Booklet describing unique home study Sewing Course.

GOOD DRESSMAKING INSTITUTE

Dept. LJ-28, 11826 San Vicente, Los Angeles 49, Calif.

Weave Rugs EASILY AT HOME

MAKE BIG PROFITS—Full or spare time business right in your home. YOU can weave beautiful, serviceable rugs low cost loom that comes threaded, ready to weave—including necessary accessories! Just a few days' weaving will pay cost of loom. Send for FREE loom folder, sample card, and low prices warps and supplies. Get started now on this easy way to your around extra income.

OR. RUG CO. • Dept. 2857 • LIMA, OHIO

"WE CAN'T LIVE ON $25,000 A YEAR"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 48

my wife and I enjoy the most. This is a wealthy neighborhood; none of the houses cost less than $40,000 or $50,000 and some considerably more. Most of the Old Guard—people who built homes here in the heyday of the 1920's—have yachts and summer places and large domestic staffs. Many of them hold important positions on Wall Street and Madison Avenue, but they couldn't be friendlier or nicer. It doesn't bother my wife at all to return their weekend invitations with one of our informal steak grills around the swimming pool. Once we had twenty-five advertising men and their wives out from New York and she served baked beans and hot dogs. Everybody had a wonderful time. So we don't feel bound to "keep up with the Joneses." In the first place, we can't; and anyway, families here live pretty independently of one another.

We gave our first really big party this last fall—a cocktail party and housewarming to celebrate finishing the new wing to which we invited about 125 friends. My wife did most of the work herself so it cost us only about $400—and how often do you give a housewarming? Half of the guests were in some way connected with "business," so I intend to deduct half of the cost of the party on my income tax.

Both my wife and I are civic-minded and enjoy getting to know the community intimately. Right from the beginning we stepped forward and volunteered to work for various organizations. My wife helped spearhead two big charity drives to which we also contributed heavily. She attends the Garden Club, P.T.A., and last year headed a Junior League committee that took several mornings and afternoons a week. I volunteered to help put over a bond issue to improve the local public schools. It took several campaigns and a lot of time and effort to get a new high school, which incidentally raised our personal-tax bill by $200 this year. Now I'm busy with a Better Government committee; they've asked me to run for mayor on the Republican ticket.

I really enjoy getting to know the townspeople, but my job and long hours of commuting make my life a strenuous one, and full of harassments. When I get home at night at 6:15 or 7, my wife feeds the children while I sink down in front of television to look at the news and unwind a little. I don't feel like eating until at least 8:30. And if I have some local meeting to attend, my wife and I don't sit down to dinner until 10 or 10:30. Often I have a brief case full of work from the office.

Fortunately I have a strong constitution and not the suspicion of an ulcer, that familiar Madison Avenue complaint. Only sometimes it strikes me that life is slipping by very fast. Every time I see one of those great sleek white transatlantic liners pull out of her Hudson River berth I get a terrific yearning. I saw plenty of the Pacific during the war, but I've never crossed the Atlantic. "If I don't come home some night," I tell my wife, "I'll be passing the Nantucket lightship on the Ile de France."

Another thing I'm dying to do is to buy a boat. I learned all about navigation with the Navy. A friend of mine is having a new fishing boat built for about $45,000, and he's willing to sell me his older, slower one for $4000, which is really a steal. We could keep it near Montauk Point down the island, but my wife tells me we positively can't afford it. She says our most crucial need is a second car—next year our oldest son will be driving. Another of my dreams is to buy a sailing sloop with an auxiliary motor and quit the advertising business for two years and take the family around the world.

What are our total assets, besides four nice kids, a dog and a cat? So far we have invested about $50,000 in a home which I figure is worth $75,000. We have the usual automatic appliances—dishwasher, clothes washer and dryer, fourteen-cubic-foot new freezer-refrigerator, but no color TV and no hi-fi. Only one television set, just as we have only one car, a 1955 Chrysler station wagon. We have an "eating membership" at the local yacht club which costs only $120 a year, and for $12 a year we belong to a small family club in Florida where we sometimes vacation. We do not belong to a country club (the one nearest to us has an initiation fee of $1500 plus dues of $250 a year, plus greens fees) and we don't own a summer place or take family vacations.

For one thing, it's necessary to put chemicals into our swimming pool every day and so we can't leave in the summer. In the spring or fall my wife and I usually take a couple of the children down to Louisville, Kentucky, to visit her parents; then we park the kids there and continue to Florida for a week. That's the extent of our vacation.

The only fur coat my wife owns is a hand-me-down from an aunt and it isn't mink. The only diamond I've been able to give her is in her engagement ring. Although her family always kept servants, she manages a large ten-room house beautifully with the help of a cleaning woman. My wife shops for food at the chain stores and knows all the tricks with inexpensive cuts. Is this extravagant living? I see no way to prune our expenses, nor any solution to our dilemma except for me to earn more money.

THE WIFE SAYS:

(Slim, attractive and animated, she manages to appear very feminine in a well-tailored tweed suit. Gracious in manner and facile with people, she nonetheless shows in her fine-boned face some signs of strain.)

I'm the one who writes the checks and keeps the records. I guess I also do the worrying.

When my husband first left the Navy and started in advertising, he earned only $225 a month, and with a young baby it was pretty hard for us to live on that. So I started a system of paying bills I still use today. We haven't caught up with our bills since 1946, but we've kept our creditors happy.

First of all, I pay very promptly everything that becomes due on the first and the fifteenth, such as mortgage or loan payments, insurance, taxes—important things like that. Then during the month I make out about $500 worth of "cash" checks. With this money I buy food, newspapers, boys' haircuts, incidental gifts, and give my husband lunch money ($20 a week). Absolutely everything else I charge. Then when the bills come in, I pay some of them in whole, but most of them in part. Let's say I owe the plumber $100. I'll send him maybe $50. If the milk bill is $21, I might send them $15, or let it lapse a month. If I've charged $85 worth of clothing at a store, I'll send along $40 or $50.

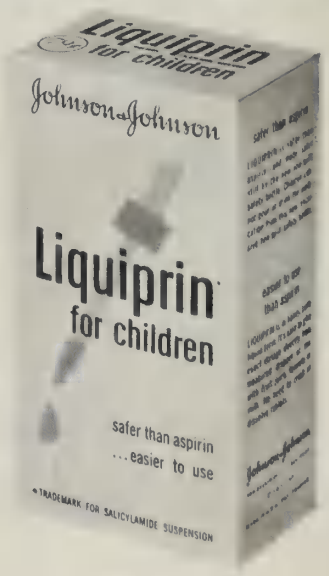
Right at the moment I owe the local liquor dealer $335, which includes $237 for our cocktail party last fall. I'll try to send him $250. I owe the dentist, the pediatrician, the doctor, the TV repairman, the upholsterer and six New York department stores. All these accounts I will pay partially.

As I said, we haven't caught up with our bills since my husband went into advertising. However, last year was even worse than usual. To begin with, we added on a wing to the house. Although we have four acres (worth about $8000 an acre as building lots) the house originally had only three bedrooms and a combination living-dining room; with six of us we felt very cramped. So last year we

New! Liquiprin* for children safer than aspirin, easier to use

Medical tests prove this new, easy-to-use liquid is gentler, less irritating than aspirin ...safe even for children who are upset by aspirin! Gets to work faster, too!

Mothers! Give your child these added benefits of LIQUIPRIN*—the new way to help calm the feverish, fretful child and ease discomfort of colds, minor aches and pains.



LIQUIPRIN IS DESIGNED ESPECIALLY FOR CHILDREN! LIQUIPRIN pediatric analgesic-antipyretic was developed to meet the special needs of children for something safer, gentler and less irritating than aspirin.

LIQUIPRIN IS BETTER THAN ASPIRIN FOR YOUR CHILD! LIQUIPRIN contains salicylamide, a pain-relieving and fever-reducing agent of the same type as aspirin ... BUT ... it is chemically different. This difference makes LIQUIPRIN basically safer and ideal for children's use.

safer than aspirin—medical tests and actual hospital use prove LIQUIPRIN does not upset or irritate the stomach ... safe even for children who are upset by aspirin.

gets to work faster—liquids work faster than tablets. LIQUIPRIN also leaves the stomach more rapidly, is more rapidly absorbed, gets to work sooner to relieve your child.

easier to take—children take tasty LIQUIPRIN directly from measured dropper or mixed with fruit juice, milk or formula. No more tablets to crush or dissolve. And what's more, you're sure of giving exact dosage.

non-spill safety bottle

LIQUIPRIN is safer than aspirin and made safer still by a special medicine-monitor in every bottle. Children cannot pour or drink from this exclusive safety bottle.

YOUR DOCTOR KNOWS ABOUT LIQUIPRIN Get a bottle today—at all drug stores— 79¢

*TRADEMARK FOR SALICYLAMIDE SUSPENSION

Johnson & Johnson

refinanced the house by taking out a new $25,000 mortgage plus a $4500 FHA loan. First we paid off our former first and second mortgages for a total of $17,000, which left us $12,500 with which to build the wing. Actually, it cost us $17,000 by the time we remodeled other parts of the house. My husband was going to borrow more from the bank, but luckily he happened to switch jobs at this time and received a $4000 check in profit-sharing funds from his old employers. We borrowed another $300 from my father-in-law (who happened to be visiting when the architect came pressing us for money) and we still owe the rest of the cost of the wing.

But to get back to our yearly budget. If only we could save $200 a month, or a little less than 10 per cent of my husband's salary, we could break even.

How could we do it?

In the seven items under "house expense" I see no spot to economize. We did spend some money on new curtains and furniture this year when we expanded from a six- to a ten-room house, about $500 worth under the item "House upkeep." However, next year we expect our heat and electricity ($46 a month) to double, since we doubled our living area, so the total cost of the house to us ($604 a month) probably won't change.

Our biggest item after making allowance for state and Federal taxes is payments for mortgage and home-improvement loans ($333.57 a month). This item includes payments on our new $25,000 mortgage and $4500 FHA loan, plus $252 a year which we still pay on a $5000 bank loan dating back to 1951 when we first bought the house, and payments for a vacuum cleaner and house awnings bought on time.

Bankers say that debt repayment should not exceed one third of take-home pay. Our take-home pay is $1667 a month. So we are really not overburdened with debts and installment buying.

The swimming pool actually costs $1300 for three months' swimming. We pay a crew of men $25 every week during the summer to vacuum it, and then there is the city water bill, cost of the chemicals, and two coats of paint every spring. However, we formed a friendly little neighborhood club with yearly swimming dues which pay for the cost of the pool except for about $100 which we pay ourselves. Our friends are most considerate about bringing their own refreshments, but when we're serving drinks to special guests, how can we ignore our other friends? As a result, our summer liquor bill shoots sky high. However, the pool is one of our greatest pleasures and really takes the place of a family vacation.

We spend only $6.66 a month for newspapers and magazines, another $31.60 a month for private school for one child, and another $2.90 a month for dancing school. These items seem rock-bottom to me.

Under "Recreation and entertainment" we do spend a lot—over $2700 a year—but here it is hard to distinguish between family entertaining and business expense. My husband would never say to me, "I'm afraid you won't like So-and-so, but I have to invite him to the house." We don't have to, and we don't, no matter how "important" he may be, unless we like him. Yet there is no denying that when a man starts to make a certain amount of money, how he lives becomes a matter of concern to his employers. And the advertising business is an Ivy League where clothes, manners and gracious living are an essential part of doing business.

The item "Meals charged out" means taking friends to the local yacht club or to other private eating clubs. Last spring while visiting my family down South we took eight people out to a dining club for $77—the only way we had to repay their hospitality.

Work is love made visible. And if you cannot work with love but only with distaste, it is better that you should leave your work and sit at the gate of the temple and take alms of those who work with joy.

KAHLIL GIBRAN
The Prophet
Alfred A. Knopf, Inc.

The vacation item includes three weeks for four of us, including car expenses, and the cost of a sitter at $10 a day for the two children left at home. We could save $65 a month by eliminating this annual trip down South, but I look forward all year to seeing distant friends and family.

The baby sitter at 75 cents an hour averages $10 a week (our oldest son helps out sometimes by sitting for nothing). This includes sitter's services when I make trips into New York shopping, and for daytime meetings as well as evening affairs. Quite often we entertain business clients at the theater in New York, or we attend business banquets at the Waldorf, or business weekends at Lake Placid. Then my husband needs a white dinner jacket and I need a pretty evening dress, and although we both enjoy such occasions it is expensive and we have to go.

With all the mouths to feed around here, I can't cut the food bill any lower ($40 a week). The car expense includes $444 in four final monthly installments (after two years of paying for it, the car is now ours!) plus gas, oil, insurance, registration and repairs. We spend only $32 a month for medical and dental care and for drugs for the six of us; this item also includes the $78 my husband spent last year for a complete medical check-up.

Six of us dress on less than $100 a month. I pay under $70 for a good wool suit, and no more than $22 for shoes. Summers I live in Bermuda shorts. Because his clothes have to "belong" on Madison Avenue, my husband spends more than I do. He keeps three suits going, for which he pays $135 apiece ready-made. His shoes cost $30, but he wears them two years. Our oldest boy now requires $16.95 shoes and $22 sports jackets. I do no sewing, Easy-do! Noodles and stew!

1 Choose Armour Star Beef Stew—the one with plenty of good Armour meat.

2 Lean, tender, juicy meat of good eating—the quality you'd choose yourself.

3 Blended with white potatoes and sweet young carrots. Simmered in its own rich brown gravy.

4 Just heat and pour over noodles . . . tonight!

You know it's good!
ARMOUR STAR
The Armour Star label is one of the world's great guarantees of quality!

25¢ REFUND IN SPACE STATION BANK proves you can bank on Armour for out-of-this-world beef stew! Save 25¢ when you try Armour Star Beef Stew. Buy two cans. Send labels along with your name and address to Armour and Company, Box 7767, Chicago 77, Ill. We will send you 25¢ in unique Space Station Bank. Offer expires December 31, 1958.

but even if I could it wouldn't help much with four sons.

There must be some place we could save money. That $164 item for "city expenses" for my husband includes railroad commutation ($288 a year) plus lunches at good restaurants ($960 a year), $52 a year for haircuts and $172.80 for taxicabs. It also includes $500 a year for "unreimbursed business expenses," which means signing for other people's lunches and drinks. He never takes clients to night spots or his daily expenses would be much, much higher.

We gave to twenty-two charities last year, including $30 to Community Chest and $150 to the church we attend regularly. Most of the other contributions were for $2 or $3 to solicitors who came to the front door. Altogether, we gave $466.70.

I suppose I could do without a woman to help clean and iron, but on $25,000 a year doesn't that seem ridiculous? When we were first married and living in the South, I had a maid who came five afternoons a week and cooked and did laundry and cleaned and stayed through dinner for $4.50 a week. We were both working then and have never lived so well. We had two cars—one of them a company car and the other a gift from my family—and on our joint salary of $53 a week we regularly saved $5 and $10.

BACK VIEW, SIZES AND PRICE OF VOGUE PATTERN ON PAGE 108

Vogue Design No. 9336.
Skirt; 24–30 waist measure. 60c.

But since the boom days after World War II we've always been behind.

The $92 "miscellaneous" item in our budget seems high, but includes my hairdresser and incidental gifts.

Where can we save $200 a month? If we gave up our yearly vacation, all baby sitters and household help, and dressed on half the amount we do, we could come out ahead. If we gave up all entertaining, and cigarettes, we would be in the black but probably not in the advertising business. Or we could sell the house, uproot ourselves and the children and move to a place where taxes are less and living costs lower, but then my husband would probably have to commute by helicopter and could we save $200 a month?

I don't know how typical we are, because our friends never discuss money except to complain about taxes. Our children hear us complain enough to decide we're dead broke and then they compare our house with their friends' in the village and conclude that we're rich.

"My mother is always running out of money," I heard my son tell a friend the other day as I ran about the house trying to find a dollar for a ticket for a church supper. It's so true. When we gave our big housewarming, I needed cash for the party food and extra help and so I cashed an insurance check which was supposed to pay for a big dent in our car. So the $85 is gone and the car door still isn't fixed!

THE HUSBAND SAYS:

Right now we're severely strapped for cash, but I regard this situation as temporary. When we made the big move to New York City, my salary as an advertising account executive jumped from $8500 to $14,000, and it's been increasing almost every year since. By now I've proved myself professionally and there's no reason why it shouldn't keep on going up. In a few years the house burden should be much less and I should have no trouble borrowing from the bank to send the boys to college.

The thought of another big depression doesn't scare me. If it should come—which I doubt—then advertising men will be in greater demand than ever to keep goods moving. If for any reason the firm I'm with doesn't grow as fast as I think it will, I'll find another job. Advertising people are constantly changing jobs, at higher pay. Talent is always salable.

I took my present job because it gives me a chance to share in company profits (about 15 per cent of my salary a year) and also allows me a stated amount of company stock each year, over and above my salary. This kind of compulsory saving will allow us to live on my full salary while accumulating capital. The former head of our agency—a man in his mid-sixties—just sold his company stock and retired with half a million dollars. I expect to do the same.

If some great calamity should strike us—if I were severely disabled, for instance—we have our families to fall back upon. I never expect the Government to support us. But why anticipate disaster? I'm well covered by health and accident insurance.

At the moment my life insurance is low, only $40,000, but that's because I lost some company insurance in my last job switch. As soon as possible I'll bring my coverage up to $80,000 or $90,000.

So although I dislike owing bills, just as my wife does, I feel that once we get through the next crucial fifteen years and put four boys through college we'll be coasting. I'm not disturbed.

ADDS THE WIFE:

I'm hoping that when we reach $60,000 a year we will be able to pay the milk bill regularly!

END

money-back offer!
PYREX®
RANGE-TOP WARE
Try it for 30 days—like it or your money back

PYREX Range-top ware
Teapot. 6-cup, $2.98

PYREX Range-top ware
Percolator. 4-cup, $3.50;
6-cup, $3.95; 9-cup, $4.95

PYREX Range-top ware
Double Boiler. 1½-qt., $4.95

PYREX Range-top ware
Saucepan. 1-qt., $2.75;
1½-qt., $2.95; 2-qt., $3.25

Guarantee

We guarantee that if you are not completely satisfied with PYREX Range-top ware, you may return it at any time within thirty days to the store from which you bought it and your money will be fully refunded.

THIS OFFER GOOD ON ALL PYREX RANGE-TOP WARE BOUGHT DURING JAN. AND FEB., 1958

We're so sure you'll like PYREX Range-top ware that we want you to try it without risking a penny. It's the modern way to assure pure, delicious, natural food flavor. Beautiful design; fast cooking; lets you see food; easy to clean.

At your favorite store. Try PYREX Range-top ware today.

THERE'S ONLY ONE PYREX® BRAND WARE, A PRODUCT OF CORNING GLASS WORKS, CORNING, NEW YORK
VISIT THE CORNING GLASS CENTER, CORNING, N.Y. CORNING MEANS RESEARCH IN GLASS

Mrs. Wizard ... that's You!

A week's tempting menus with Hungarian flavor for five— under $23.00.

By MARY JANE ENGEL

"Saturday morning is shopping time and the busiest morning of my week," says Marel Harayda. "Feeding my family of five on a $20–$23 weekly budget is a true challenge, and I consider marketing my specialty."

Marel wants the best for the least, and in her town knows where to find it. She knows the shops and markets well and where the best buys, the "Saturday specials," are to be found.

Marel always buys her weekly supply of meat first. If chicken fryers are at a good price, she will plan on having chicken. When the meat is purchased, she then builds her menu. She carefully selects vegetables and greens, using what is in season. Marel uses frozen vegetables often, as she has discovered that the markets have excellent sales. The week I shopped with Marel she bought 4 packages of frozen peas for 39 cents. She also found that frozen orange juice was selling at a low 10 cents a can. Buying potatoes and onions in 50- and 25-pound bags, from local farmers, cut prices considerably. Marel also keeps within her budget, as many women do, by buying and stocking canned goods, such as fruits and vegetables, when prices are low, and by using margarine and nonfat dry milk. Marel uses nonfat dry milk in cooking and serves it to the children in cocoa for winter breakfasts.

We have prepared a week's menus for five, typical of the Harayda family. They were priced in New Jersey and the costs will vary somewhat nationally.

7 Days of Menus and Costs*

Sunday $2.86

Breakfast	Lunch	Dinner
Orange Juice	Toasted Cheese Sandwiches	Sautéed Beef Liver
Hot Oatmeal—Milk and Sugar	Sliced Bananas	Baked Potatoes
Fried Eggs	Milk	Broccoli
Toast with Margarine	Coffee	Canned Plums
Hot Cocoa		Milk
Coffee		Coffee

Monday $3.51

Breakfast	Lunch	Dinner
Grapefruit Sections	Vegetable Soup	Pork Chops with Sauerkraut*
Scrambled Eggs	Crackers and Cheese	Parsley Boiled Potatoes
Whole-Wheat Toast with Margarine	Milk	Green Peas
Hot Cocoa		Lemon-Gelatin Dessert
Coffee		Milk
		Coffee

Golden pork chops simmered in sauerkraut, sour cream added.

$1.74

Pork Chops with Sauerkraut. Sauté 1 cup finely chopped onion in 3 tablespoons margarine until golden. Add 3 cups sauerkraut and juice (1-pound-11-ounce can), ⅓ cup water and 2 tablespoons paprika. Simmer gently. Salt 6 pork chops and brown them slowly in their own fat. When they are well browned, place them on top of the sauerkraut in the skillet. Cover and simmer for 1 hour. Five minutes before serving, remove the chops and stir in 1 cup commercial sour cream. Serve chops on top of sauerkraut, and garnish with chopped dill pickle. Makes 6 servings.

* Menus based on supermarket prices in New Jersey as of September, 1957

STUART

Frankfurter favorite—a savory dish of tomatoes, herbs and frankfurters, served with a crisp tossed salad, poppy-seed rolls and tall glasses of milk.

Tuesday $3.86

Breakfast	Lunch	Dinner
Orange Juice	Lentil Soup*—	Baked Macaroni
Hot Wheat Cereal with	Crackers	and Cheese
Milk and Sugar	Carrot Sticks	Tomato-and-Lettuce Salad
Boiled Eggs	Apples	Fruit Compote
Hot Cocoa	Milk	Milk
Coffee		Coffee

An old favorite—hearty, appetizing and nutritious.

33c

Lentil Soup. Soak 1 pound lentils overnight. Drain. In a large pot, cook the lentils with 6 cups water, 1 ham bone, ½ cup chopped celery, ½ cup finely chopped onion and 1 carrot, diced. Season with 2 teaspoons salt and a dash of pepper. Cook slowly until the lentils and vegetables are soft. Remove the bone. Strain the soup. Brown 2 tablespoons flour in 2 tablespoons bacon fat. Add 1 cup of the soup, stirring constantly, and cook until thick and smooth. Add the rest of the soup. Heat and serve. Makes 6 servings.

Wednesday $3.33

Breakfast	Lunch	Dinner
Grapefruit Juice	Tomato Soup	Tarragon Fried Chicken*
Fried Eggs	Crackers and Cheese	Whipped Potatoes
Whole-Wheat Toast	Milk	Green Beans
with Margarine		Tossed Salad
Hot Cocoa		Milk
Coffee		Coffee

Crusty, tender chicken with tarragon.

$1.21

Tarragon Fried Chicken. Have your butcher cut up a 3–4-pound chicken for frying. Wash well and dry on paper toweling. Salt and pepper lightly. Flour the chicken, using ¼ cup flour. Beat 2 eggs slightly with ¼ cup milk. Have ready 1½ cups fresh bread crumbs to which you have added 1½ teaspoons tarragon. Dip the floured chicken into the egg-milk mixture, then lightly in bread crumbs. Using ½ cup fat, brown well. Cover, lower heat and cook until tender. Cook, uncovered, 10 minutes more to crisp. Makes 6 servings.

Thursday $3.17

Breakfast	Lunch	Dinner
Stewed Prunes	Toasted Peanut-Butter	Veal Paprikas*—
Hot Oatmeal with	Sandwiches	Shell Macaroni
Milk and Sugar	Tomato Wedges	Tossed Salad
Scrambled Eggs	Milk	Cherry-Gelatin Dessert
Hot Cocoa		Milk
Coffee		Coffee

OVER

NOW!

Just add boiling water—

a home-cooked frosting is born right in your mixing bowl!

Real 7-minute-type frosting with no cooking! It takes just one step. You add boiling water—and your Betty Crocker Fluffy White Frosting Mix beats right up into stiff, snowy, glistening peaks! You couldn't make a better frosting if you did all the work yourself. And you don't ever risk costly failures, because...

"I guarantee a perfect* frosting every time!" Betty Crocker General Mills

*PERFECT! Yes, every mix we make for you is guaranteed to come out perfect, or send the box top to Betty Crocker, Box 200, Minneapolis, Minn., and General Mills will send your money back.

TRY ALL FOUR BETTY CROCKER FROSTING MIXES:

CHOCOLATE MALT | PEANUT CREME | CHOCOLATE FUDGE | FLUFFY WHITE

For weight watchers... new low-calorie D-ZERTA PUDDING

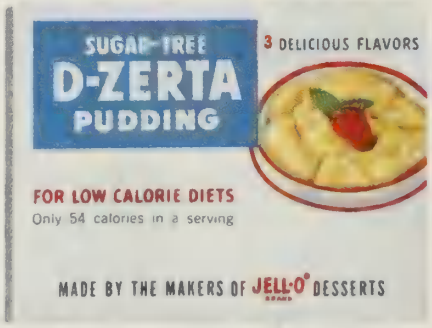
Now you weight watchers can have a delicious new pudding that's as sweet to your waistline as it is to your taste.

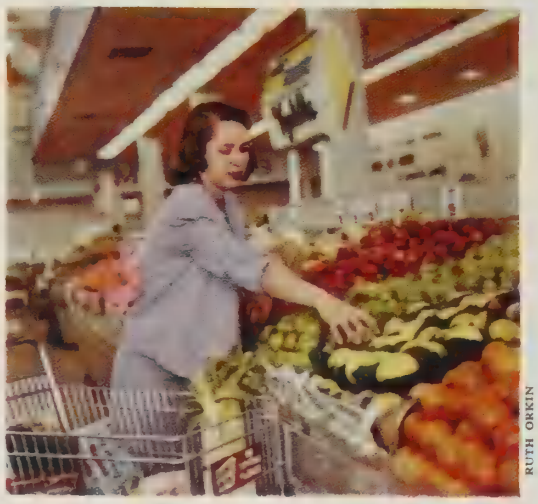


D-Zerta Pudding is made without sugar, but it has all the goodness of America's best-liked pudding.

Everybody in the family will enjoy D-Zerta, so get plenty. Try all 3 flavors: Vanilla, Chocolate and Butterscotch.

And try D-Zerta Gelatin, too. It comes in 6 flavors—makes bright, tempting desserts, and such refreshing salads!

D-Zerta and Jell-O are registered trade-marks of General Foods.



Compare the calories in one serving:
Cherry Pie	360
2 Brownies	282
Baked Custard	205
D-ZERTA PUDDING (with skimmed milk)	54
D-ZERTA GELATIN (all 6 flavors)	12

Made by the makers of JELL-O desserts . . . so you know it's good!

MRS. WIZARD, THAT'S YOU!

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 137

Marel shops with skill and careful selection.

Tender veal cubes in a rich paprika sauce.

Veal Paprikas. Cut 2 pounds veal shoulder, boned, into 1½" cubes. Flour them lightly. Sauté 3 strips bacon, cut into small pieces, in a large skillet. Then brown the meat and 1 cup onion, finely diced. When the meat is well browned, add 3½ cups water, 1 teaspoon salt, ½ teaspoon monosodium glutamate and 3 tablespoons paprika. Cover and simmer the meat until tender, about 1 hour. When meat is almost done, add 1½ cups shell macaroni. Cover and cook until tender. The macaroni shells absorb the gravy, so add more water if necessary. Before serving, stir in 1 cup commercial sour cream, more salt if desired, and cook a few minutes longer. Makes 5 servings.

$1.34

Friday $3.33

Breakfast	Lunch	Dinner
Orange Juice	Baked Beans	Creamed Sea Food*
Hot Wheat Cereal with Milk and Sugar	Bread with Margarine	Fluffy Rice
Fried Eggs	Celery Sticks	Green Peas
Milk	Milk	Salad
Coffee		Canned Sliced Peaches
		Milk Coffee

A "Quick and Easy" dish, colorful and hearty.

Creamed Sea Food with Rice. Heat a 10-ounce can frozen cream-of-shrimp soup according to directions on the can. Meanwhile prepare 2 cups medium cream sauce, using 2 tablespoons margarine, 2 tablespoons flour and 2 cups milk. Combine with the soup. Drain the oil from 2 small cans tuna, and break into bite-sized pieces. Add to the soup-sauce mixture. Cook 1 package frozen peas according to directions. Drain and add. Season with salt and pepper to taste. Heat thoroughly. Serve over hot, fluffy rice. Makes 5 servings.

97c

Saturday $2.81

Breakfast	Lunch	Dinner
Stewed Prunes	Toasted Lettuce-and-Tomato Sandwiches	Frankfurter Favorite*
Scrambled Eggs	Corned-Beef Hash	Tossed Salad
Toast with Jam	Cookies	Poppy-Seed Rolls
Milk	Milk	Coffee
Coffee		Milk

A distinctive dish in taste appeal and price.

Frankfurter Favorite. In a large skillet, sauté 4 onions, sliced thin, and 2 green peppers, finely diced, in a little salad oil. When onions are golden, add 2 No. 2 cans tomatoes and 1 small (8-ounce) can tomato paste. Add 4 potatoes, peeled and diced. Season with 1 teaspoon salt, 1 teaspoon orégano, ½ teaspoon monosodium glutamate and a dash of pepper. Cover and simmer gently for ½ hour. Slice 6 frankfurters into ½" slices and add to the tomato mixture after the first 15 minutes. Add more seasoning if desired. Makes 6 servings.

77c

DO AMERICAN EDUCATORS KNOW WHAT THEY ARE UP TO?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 16

I must read slowly if I am to grasp what I am reading, and often, in some fields, have recourse to a dictionary. There is the phenomenon of photographic memory, by which a reader can repeat back, word for word, what he has read even years earlier. But this, like some mathematical pyrotechnics, is a "sport" and not even an indication of superior intelligence. Speed in reading (or in anything else) is the result of long practice and the breadth of knowledge that enables the reader to grasp immediately what the writer is conveying.

Little Orlo has been the world's most abused guinea pig.

And so we ask, "Do American educators know what they are up to?" And we are compelled to reply: They are up to so many contradictory things, to the achievement of so many divergent and confused aims, that the answer, by and large, is—No.

I THINK I LOVE YOU

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 43

create—well, sort of—just like an actor; I get good money for it and, most important, the public wouldn't know me if it fell over me. People like you live in Macy's window—and only kids or cases of arrested development enjoy that foolishness."

Charley grinned. "Ah," he said, "but what do you think actors are, anyway? Kids and cases of arrested development. What other kind of man would paint his face and go on stage to play an empire builder—instead of going right out to be the empire builder?"

"You don't have to be so shameless about it," Mike said. "You almost sound as if you're proud of it."

And Charley, scratching his ear, had said very softly, "Proud? I don't know. I don't really know how I feel about it. I've just got to do it. It's as simple as that."

After which they sat silently for a few moments, watching the parade of performers, the grease paint wiped off, coming into the comfortable old hash house to—figuratively—take off their shoes. Celeste Holm. Edward G. Robinson. Paul Muni, virtually getting a standing ovation. Joe Ferrer, grinning and happy with his Rosie. Charley looked at the fair Miss Holm.

"There's a real one—a pro, a fine child," he said with youthful smugness—"but by and large, I give you actresses and six points. What a terrible species."

"It seems more fitting," Mike said, "that women go in for acting. Somehow it doesn't seem like man's work."

If I can advise you, as an old man, my advice is, in all your learning and science, to stick very close to the things you learned from your mothers.

FIELD MARSHAL SMUTS

"You get no argument from me there," Charley said blandly. "I'm not a man. I'm an actor. But I still don't like actresses. Of all the conceited, dreadful, witchy people on the face of the earth, they —— Hi, Kelse!"

Mike looked in the direction of Charley's wave. The girl coming in was—what? five five? five four and a half?—dark, brown-eyed, with a sweet face that was, simultaneously and unbelievably, intelligent and beautiful. She had to be an actress, but he didn't know which one. Probably movies. Mike didn't get to too many movies. She stood there with a petite blonde who looked like a press agent while Jimmy looked around for a table for them, and Mike just stared and for some reason remembered a brook in which he used to dangle his feet after playing tennis in the long ago.

In fifty years, a lucky man gets to feel maybe once the way Mike West felt at that moment. In a hundred years, maybe twice.

"Who's that?" he asked.

"Kelcey Banks. You know, the one who almost married Harry Barnes, the novelist."

"She's an actress." Charley looked at him sidewise.

"Sure she's an actress. A good one. She's on her way up right now, out of the B movies into the presentable ones."

"Bring her over here. Or bring me over there."

It was a good time for Charley Richards to renew the talk about what impossibilities actresses were, but he listened to the sound of Mike's voice and decided not to. He got up and called out to Jimmy to bring the girls to their table. When they had made it and were seated, everybody just smiled for a moment and then Mike turned to Kelcey Banks and gave her a lump of sugar.

"Eat it," he said. "You'll need energy. It's going to be a long night." She looked at him, taking the sugar and fingering it lightly. She smelled of good soap. Of course.

"For whom?"

"For us."

"Gee," she said, and the best thing about it for Mike West right then was that she couldn't stop looking at him, either, "you're serious, aren't you?" She looked at Charley. "All I want from you, Curt Wayne, is the assurance he isn't crazy."

"He's not crazy," Charley said, "but he's a writer. Let me tell you about writers. Boy, any girl that has anything to do with a writer is not only a fool, but ——"

"You're not married or engaged," Mike said to her. "You don't have the look about you."

"No, I don't. Are you?"

"No. I've been engaged twice."

"Why didn't you marry either of them?"

"It wasn't right. Were you at a play tonight?"

"The Tennessee Williams one. I was so impressed."

"I don't like Williams. He ——" Mike stopped. He shook his head. "Small talk. I don't feel like small talk."

"I never do," she said, "but we can't tell each other everything in one night. There wouldn't be anything left."

"Maybe, maybe not. I'm an old thirty-four. I have a thousand stories to tell you and five thousand arguments to pick with you. I grow on people. Honest." She looked at him almost gravely.

"I believe it," she said.

It was one of the strangest talks ever talked in Sardi's. Charley Richards and Phyllis Smith, who was the blond press agent, just kept looking at each other in a kind of startled fashion and raising their eyebrows and shaking their heads.

Mike offered her a cigarette and knew beforehand that she didn't smoke; when she shook her head, he nodded. "You want some black coffee," he said, "and maybe some scrambled eggs." It was naturally just what she did want, but when he went to order it, he stopped. "Wait a minute, I've got a better idea ——"

"Now look here," Charley cut in. "This is beginning to sound like a Saroyan play to me. It's all very well to ——"

Mike turned to him and managed to relax enough to grin a little.

"Charley," he said. He looked at the blonde. "And Phyllis. Dear Phyllis. Kelcey Banks and I are going out into the night to talk somewhere. I figure it's up to us to leave, because Phyllis' feet hurt ——"

"They sure do," the blond Miss Smith said.

"—— and I don't want to oust you two, so sit here and be polite to each other." He looked down at Miss Smith. "Are you press agent and chaperon?"

She nodded.

EVER GET "POWDER BURNED?"

Do you get burned-up—scouring, scrubbing—spilling and wasting with powder copper cleaners?

NOW SHINE IN ½ THE TIME WITH TWINKLE PASTE

...IT'S THRIFTY! Creamy TWINKLE can't spill, can't scatter—goes much farther—"There's no waste with paste!"

...IT'S SPEEDY! TWINKLE smooths away grease, tarnish, burner stains instantly—gets copper clean and bright.

...MORE BEAUTY! You shine copper to brand new luster, brand new beauty with creamy TWINKLE paste.

Made by the makers of Drāno and Windex.

Twinkle is tops for stainless steel too! At grocery stores everywhere.

NO WASTE WITH PASTE!

serve delicious DeJean's OLD SOUTHERN Oyster Stew ANYTIME!

. . . using only the natural oyster juices, captured as the oysters are open. Delicious, flavorful, easy to serve. Spark your meal with it . . . anytime!

Delicious Gulf of Mexico Cove Oysters known far and wide for their finer flavor

SHRIMP — fresh-packed from blue Gulf Waters, deveined and graded for best quality. Ideal for cocktails, salads, other seafood dishes.

Write for FREE recipe folder

DeJean PACKING COMPANY
DEPT. J-257, BILOXI, MISS.

If there weren't any RAISINBREAD you couldn't have RAISINTOAST for a breakfast TASTE SURPRISE

CALIFORNIA RAISIN ADVISORY BOARD
FRESNO, CALIFORNIA

"I don't know when she'll be home," Mike West said, "but don't worry. Her reputation will be the same as always. She's in good hands."

"I'm in good hands," Kelcey Banks said, getting up and slipping into the mink that the studio had lent her for the personal-appearance tour in the East. "Good-by, baby. I'll see you at breakfast. Good-by, Charley."

Then they were out in 44th Street, cold and clear in the New York night, with the pedestrian traffic beginning to thin out and even the customary cop's horse gone. He took her arm and looked at her, except it was really a question of still looking.

"Maybe some piano someplace," he said, "and a corner of a room and all that corny kind of thing, because it's the best kind of thing for talking."

"I don't drink," she said, "so be careful where we go, because this is your town and I don't want anyone laughing at you."

"You don't?" he asked softly. She shook her head.

"No, I don't. I'll laugh at you, if I want, but that's all."

"We'll go up to Cy Coleman's Playroom in Fifty-eighth," he said. "He drinks milk while he plays the piano. Maybe he has your brand."

So the night began there and it began in a fine way, because for one lucky break the little supper club wasn't too full, the way it usually was, and quiet nights always seem to inspire musicians somehow, so the elfin, amiable Cy started playing I Concentrate on You and he played it for about three quarters of an hour while they sat there. He played it fortissimo at first because he was a man with the joy of life in him, but then in a little while he looked at Mike West and Kelcey Banks and decided to throttle down and give them what he knew they wanted, so he played endlessly pianissimo. It was a good town, New York, with people like him around.

It was a great town, actually. They saw a lot of it. They saw Park Avenue bare and beautiful in the early morning and they window-shopped on Madison at 3 A.M. and found themselves in a church at 4 A.M., and so on. At 5:30 they were sitting in the living room of the suite she and Phyllis had in the Drake, drinking coffee, and at 6 Phyllis came in from her bedroom in a housecoat, with her hair in curlers, and said, "Listen, go home, will you? This is a respectable house."

At 7 A.M., Mike West put on his camel's-hair coat and Kelcey Banks walked him to the door and kissed him.

"Come by as soon as you want to, this morning," she said. "In about an hour, say. I'm young. I don't need sleep."

"I'm old," he said. "I do. I'll come by in two hours." He kissed her again and closed the door and went down to the street and flagged a cab. "I live at Two-thirty-five East Forty-fifth Street," he told Sol Gold, the cab driver. "I think." Then he leaned back and fellasleep in the taxi, after the best night of his life, the night that he had waited thirty-four years for.

From Wally Warner:

Does Kelcey Banks (pause for whistle) plan to abandon her rising moo'm pitcher career in favor of the ivy-covered cottage and the domestic life with writer Mike West? Many have tried it, dearie, but few have . . .

So that was the way it had begun.

Sometimes it does, you know. Not often, but sometimes. It depends a good deal on the people themselves. With more people than one might imagine, the hair rises suddenly at the nape of the neck at the sight of someone else, the sound of a voice or the look on a face—but people have a way of backing off from such things. People, many of them, become uneasy and frightened or their pride gets in the way and they fight the strong feeling that this person has a power over them. People like that too often end up alone, or with the wrong one.

Mike West and Kelcey Banks were lucky. They knew right away, or almost right away, what it was that had them by the scruffs of their necks, and they went along with it, magnificently, from the start.

That first night had been a Friday. Sunday evening Mike took Kelcey and Phyllis out to LaGuardia Airport and put them on a plane for Cleveland, the next stop on the personal-appearance tour. Just before she gave up her ticket to go through the gate and out to the plane, she turned and looked at him, very wide-eyed, a little scared.

"Look," she said, trying to make it sound offhand and just for kicks. "I think you ought to fly to Cleveland. We'll be there three days. What do you think of those potatoes?"

"I think they're fine," he said, "but I'm supposed to finish a piece by tomorrow afternoon for Era. A fascinating article on teen-age gangs in Chicago."

"Why don't you give up this writing for—for what's the name of that thing?" she asked.

"Era. It's a news magazine. It pays my rent. Listen, don't you read anything but Modern Screen or Photoplay?"

WHERE THOUGHT LEAPS ON

By MAY SARTON

I saw a man bend to a flowing stream
To drink where light and shadow made a fish
A leaping liveness: this was not a dream.
I saw the man bend down as if to wish,
And all around him the green leaves were still.
Leaf folded upon leaf, by the sun drenched.
I saw the man drink deep of miracle.
He made his wish. His dusty thirst was quenched.
And then I knew what I had only guessed:
How past flows into future every hour
And we are by the dead continually blest.
Their lives are a bright stream of power.
And we can drink there deeply if we will
Where thought leaps on although the mind is still.

"Why don't you become a great novelist? Then you wouldn't have to meet deadlines or things like that."

"I thought you'd have had enough of great novelists," he said. He took her shoulder and said he was sorry the moment he had said it. "Anyway," he added, "I make more money than great novelists. I'm really pretty good, you know."

The man at the gate took her ticket and she started toward the plane. Then she turned. "Come to ——" she began to say, but she stopped and hurried off before he could see the tears starting to come to the corners of her eyes.

Era got his story the next morning. At 2 P.M. he was on a plane for Cleveland and at 6 he was knocking on the door of her hotel suite. Phyllis Smith opened it.

"What took you so long?" she asked, because Phyllis Smith was the absolute salt of the earth. "She's inside. Don't smudge her lipstick. She has to be on a television program in three quarters of an hour."

Don't smudge her lipstick. Indeed. In the center of the living room he held her so near to him that she came close to breaking at the waist, and when he had kissed her enough for a starter, he looked down at her and just wallowed in the shine of her eyes.

"It's got away from us, I guess," he said. She nodded.

"What can you do?" she asked philosophically. "That's the way the ball bounces."

"Is that what you always say?" he asked.

"Always," she said. He kissed her again and she put her cheek close to his cold one and talked softly into his ear.

"Stay here until I come back," she said, "which will be in about an hour, and while you're waiting—and watching me on Channel Five—remember this: I'm an actress. That doesn't make any of this easy. Not easy at all, my darling."

"Don't be an ass," he said. When she and Phyllis had headed off for the TV station, in the company of a local press agent, he sat back on a sofa and lighted a cigarette and looked at the drama pages of the Cleveland papers. One of them carried a picture of Kelcey at the airport, and when he looked at it closely, he saw that she was holding prominently a copy of Era.

"That's nice," he said aloud to nobody.

After Cleveland came Chicago. That was where the cold sweats came first.

He had got up early and come and knocked at the door of her suite, which was just down the hall in the Blackstone, and she opened it, yawning and lovely. "What do you want for breakfast?" she asked, so he told her and she got most of it right except the soft-boiled eggs were poached, which didn't matter, because he wasn't hungry. He hadn't been hungry for nearly a week.

Phyllis sat with them and just looked. "I like to look," she said. "It reminds me of my man, who's back in Santa Monica, and I get terribly unhappy and wish I was back there, which is all right, because everybody knows that women just love to be unhappy."

"Bear with us, Smith," Mike said. "This is young love."

"As practiced by an old goat," Phyllis said, grinning pleasantly. "This child is twenty-three. She deserves some clean-cut beardless youth showing her how fast he can drive his Jaguar."

"This child," Mike said, "is older than time."

"Say something very sweet right now," Kelcey said, "because I have to go and be on two radio programs and then we have to go to the theater where my picture is playing, so I can meet people and sign autographs and like that there."

"How's this?" he said. "I love you."

"It's all right for an opener," she said. "What's your next-best card?"

When they had rushed off, this time with a Chicago press agent, he meditated the prospect of a whole morning without her. That seemed a pretty silly thing, so he went downstairs and took a cab to the Primrose movie house and watched the early-morning performance of her movie. It was in Technicolor and in it Kelcey Banks looked just plain beautiful. Or about as she did off-screen.

The cold sweats came when he watched her do a love scene with the leading man—and it cut into him like a very sharp bread knife: She's like that offscreen too. When she looked up at the leading man, clear-eyed and candid, it was—or it seemed as if it was—just as she looked up at him, Mike West.

For a swift moment he gripped the wooden arms of the seat. Wait a minute, now, he told himself. Just hold on and wait a minute, because this isn't the way it is at all. If anyone is going to tell you that she was playing a performance when she held her face up to you at Madison and 56th and asked you to kiss her—well, anyone would be out of his fat head.

I'm thirty-four, he told himself. I know what's real and fake. Up there on the screen, it's fake. A very good fake, because this girl I love is a very good actress—but a fake. The real part is with me, at night, when the cameras have stopped. The moment of truth, as Hemingway put it, was when she was with me and ——

But in a few minutes he got up and left the theater and walked through the cold streets of Chicago's Loop, filled with dirty snow, until he tired a little and went to get his shoes shined. Afterward, he stopped by a bookstore and bought her a Debussy record album and a copy of Graham Greene's The End of the Affair. The cold sweats had gone, but as you see, there was some residue left.

"Hollywood and Broadway" item, courtesy Wally Warner:

Say a quiet little prayer for Mike West, the personable wandering correspondent for Era. He's definitely headed for the altar with starlet Kelcey Banks. All right, brave Michael, you tell us where you plan to live, and on whose money.

In his general frame of mind, as opposed to the small specific, thoughts like that couldn't hang on, of course. He was too rolling in love. Early that afternoon back at the hotel they came together again and the sadness went—whoosh!—away like that. That was the afternoon she had told him about Harry Barnes. He had thought it might make him feel a pang of jealousy, although he wasn't a jealous-type man, but it didn't; there had been, it appeared, less to the relationship than the newspaper headlines would have had you believe. "He's a fine, dear, sweet man," Kelcey said, "only not for me."

They sat up almost until dawn that night, sitting close to each other on the sofa by the window and watching Chicago slow down and get as close to sleep as the noisy old town ever did. Phyllis had said good night about one and gone into her bedroom—"I wouldn't leave you alone like this, but I trust Kelcey. Not you, West. Only her"—and they had settled on the sofa and, for a few hours, given themselves over to the luxury of unending talk and wonderful silences, and soft, tender kisses.

Somewhere in the night he told her how he had felt in the movie house that morning. He couldn't explain it too well, but she knew what he meant. She turned away from him a little suddenly, and her voice became heavy and almost flat.

"That should do it," she said. "I knew something like that would happen. That'll fix us up before we even begin, Mike." She held her head in her hands, shaking it slowly.

"You'll always wonder," she said.

He got a little panicky then, and took her by the shoulders and held her to him and tried to reassure her.

"That's silly," he said. "This is just something I felt today. It went away the minute I saw you again. It doesn't mean a thing, Banks; don't be an ass."

"You'll have to stop saying that to me," she said. "I'm not used to being called an ass."

She got up and went to the window and turned to look at him. In the winter moonlight she was unbelievably beautiful and Mike West knew that it didn't matter if she was Mephistopheles reincarnated; he had to have her for his own. Nothing else mattered. Nothing.

"Darling," she said, "I've wanted to be an actress since I was three."

"All right," he said. "So be an actress."

"To be a good one," she went on "—and I would hate to be anything but a good one—you have to give up some of your self. It hurts. You have to get it up to the surface and put it out for all the world to see; you have to take the world inside for a look around."

She was right, of course.

"I'm an actress, Mike," she said; "and to be what you must be, the piper must be paid. It's as simple as that. All of what you see when you watch me on the screen isn't fake. Some of it's me. It has to be. Don't you see?"

"Yes," he said, "I see," and he got up and crossed to her and took her in his arms and, for a while, it didn't matter whether she was an actress, a circus clown or the American ambassador to Italy.

"When everything is said and done," she said into his shoulder, standing by the window, "the only thing you can do is trust. Trust what I say to you, as I do with what you say to me. That's all people have, really, trust—and love."

They let it go at that. When she cleaned up her publicity work in Chicago the next day, he started to put her on a plane for Los Angeles—but instead of leaving her this time he got on the plane himself. "It wouldn't be the same without you," Phyllis said, and after he had kicked her gently in the shins, he and Kelcey Banks settled back in a couple of seats in the tail section and they soared happily across the Rockies while he explained how his great-grandfather had crossed them in a covered

CONTINUED ON PAGE 142

FREE . . . your first box of New Modess® Tampons

Here's your chance to discover the advantages offered only by new Modess Tampons—the tampons you can trust even on "first" days.

They're flexible—conform to inner body contours, leaving no area unprotected. Twice as protective—provide more absorbency than any other tampon.

Buy a box of 10, and we'll pay for it. Mail front panel from box, with name and address, to: Personal Products Corporation, Box C-67, Milltown, N. J.

By return mail, we'll send you your full 45¢ refund! (Refund of 45¢ on purchase of larger package, too.) Offer expires March 31, 1958.

...for Beautiful Rooms!

Start at the windows for room effects that win applause. Look to Kirsch for help AND hardware! Send coupon today for the big new Kirsch book, "Window Decorating Made Easy."

And when you shop, insist on KIRSCH drapery hardware throughout, for lasting beauty and smo-o-oth dependable performance!

Cafe treatments gain new stature with "massive" Kirsch rod sets in gleaming solid brass. Adjustable lengths; ⅝", 1" and 1⅛" diameter. Choose cafe clips or rings by Kirsch.

Treat yourself to this big NEW "how-to" book by Kirsch

A fascinating collection of smart window treatments. All types; every room. Shows how to make curtains and draperies, with tips of the experts. Includes a unique and practical color-selection kit!

32 BIG PAGES FULL COLOR! only 50c

KIRSCH COMPANY
16 Prospect St., Sturgis, Mich.

Gentlemen: Enclosed ☐ 50c for one copy of "Window Decorating Made Easy" or ☐ $1.00 for two.

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ State_____

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 140

wagon. "Or," he said, "a model-T Ford, I'm not sure which."

He stayed a week in smogbound L. A. It was the clincher. By the end of the sixth day, after he had painted the walls of her little apartment in gold, beige and white, he told her that there weren't any two ways about it, they would be married. As soon as possible. She rattled like a diamondback one final time.

"I'm an actress, Mike," she said in a small voice.

"In spite of which," he said firmly, "you'll marry me."

"Yes. I'll marry you."

Seven weeks and thirty-four letters later, he was back in California more or less to stay. "Thank the good Lord," he said when he got off the plane this time and piled into her shiny little blue car, "that I'm a writer and can hang my hat anywhere and work."

"Why don't you write movie scripts?" she asked, and he shook his head.

"Because I don't want to," he said. He looked at her and grinned. "You can get all the ulcers in this family. I've got three months' free-lance work ahead of me for the magazines, including a comprehensive piece on why Mesopotamia ultimately will have complete control of the Suez Canal."

"Writers," she muttered, kissing his ear and almost causing a three-car collision. "I never did have any respect for them." He looked smug.

"Save your respect for them as needs it," he said. "I just want your passion. Your good, clean passion."

"That," she said, "you can have. Pull over to the side of the road and kiss me. You ass." Which, of course, he did.

From Wally Warner:

Dreamland is buzzing about the way Mike West, Kelcey Banks' intended, is giving the cold brush-off to the paragraphers who've been poking into his and Kelcey's private life. Listen, dad, you can't play that way out there, you know that, don't you?

It was one thing to fall in love with a movie actress and follow her to Cleveland and Chicago and California—to be amused at the autograph fiendies following her and to kid about the artistry of her efforts on the silver screen, to look at her with tremendous and deep emotion and to look around at the world and say proudly, "You see her? Well, she's mine."

It was another thing, Mike West learned, to live with it. The—what do the writers say?—tinsel. The make-believe. The half-world.

He got a dose of it the first time they went to Mocambo. "Not because I have to go to Mocambo to be seen," she said, "but because it's a nice enough saloon and the dance band is good. You ought to get used to being a gigolo to a movie queen, anyway." So they went to the place and it turned out to be dark and pleasant and they had a corner to themselves and nobody bothered them. There was even Lana Turner on hand with a group of friends, and Mike West arched an eyebrow and said, "Hey, that's for me," and Kelcey Banks said, "Over my dead body," and so on.

When Frances McKay, the syndicated film columnist, stopped at their table, everything changed a little.

"Miss McKay," Kelcey Banks said almost demurely after she'd introduced Mike, "I think that little paragraph you had about me the other day was just the kindest thing you possibly could do for me. Really, Miss McKay, I mean it."

Mike looked sidewise at her. There wasn't the trace of a smirk around her lovely mouth. How could anyone say something like that—to Frances McKay, a harridan if ever there was one—without at least a small smirk?

The battered, slightly unsteady newshen patted Kelcey's arm.

"You're a sweet, sweet child and I predict you'll go far in the profession, dearie," she said. She looked over at Mike. "You've got a big armful of talent at your side, young man. Treat it preciously." He bowed from the waist, a pretty good feat sitting down.

"She's so precious," he said, "that I find it a little hard to believe sometimes." Frances McKay tottered off in the direction of Lana. Mike just looked straight ahead, toying with a packet of matches, and Kelcey put her hand on his arm.

"Don't, Mike. Don't," she said.

"I'm not doing anything," he said. "I'm ——"

"Mike—it's my business. There are things I have to do, and being nice to Frances McKay is one of them." She was almost pleading. "Don't you have to do things in your business of which you're not overfond?"

He finally sighed and turned to her with a faint smile, shaking his head.

"Yes, I do," he said. "And you have to do them too. I know that, Kelse. Maybe Garbo can say anything she wants to about anyone, but I know you can't, darling, and . . . ah, I'm sorry. I don't mean to needle." He looked at her seriously.

"It's just," he said, "that I've got to get used to it. Bear with me." He sounded almost grim. "I'll get used to it. Believe me. Nothing like this is going to lick you and me. You can count on that."

"Dance with me, Mike," she said softly. "I want you to hold me in your arms." So they did and, the way it always seemed to, the trouble went away in a moment. That was one thing they had going for them, anyway.

There was one other thing that night.

Even with the subdued lighting, it was easy to recognize Valerie Lytton, who was sitting with a man in the nearest corner to Kelcey and Mike. "Statuesque" probably was the word for Valerie Lytton, and had been for a long time. A hundred million movie-goers had seen her over the years, with the exotic tangle of blond hair and the high cheekbones. You wouldn't call her an actress, exactly. She was more like Jean Harlow or Clark Gable. A Personality. In Hollywood, actresses go for a penny a hundred. You can find Judith Anderson in Westerns. Personalities—they come much higher.

Since primitive times, virtually all religious or social systems have attempted to maintain themselves by forbidding free criticism and analysis either of existing institutions or of the doctrine that sustains them; of democracy alone is it the cardinal principle that free criticism and analysis by all and sundry is the highest virtue.

CARL L. BECKER
Freedom and Responsibility in the American Way of Life
Published by Alfred Knopf, Inc.

It was only when you danced near her table—and even then you had to look closely—that you saw Valerie Lytton wasn't twenty-one. She wasn't even forty-one.

Kelcey and Mike weren't dancing when the man got up and started to leave Valerie Lytton's table. They were just watching.

You couldn't help hearing the conversation. After twenty-five years in movieland, an actress grows used to projecting the voice.

"Darling," Lytton said, reaching ever so imperceptibly for the sleeve of his jacket, "I wish you'd stay. Just for a little while, anyway."

He was dark-haired, broad-shouldered, heavy-set. Mike knew he was somebody in films, but which precious leading man he wasn't sure. Valerie Lytton, he remembered, was between husbands.

Dark hair and broad shoulders stood there and looked down at Lytton. "What for?" he asked almost brusquely.

"Well," she said, "for one thing, Frances McKay still is in the place—and I wouldn't want this to go out for four hundred newspapers tomorrow morning. Please stay a moment, Jeff."

He stared down at her. Then he laughed, very mirthlessly.

"Four hundred newspapers? Listen, Mabel—where did you get the idea that the people of America are waiting breathlessly for news of you?" He looked across the room at Frances McKay and her entourage. "McKay doesn't even know you're in the joint," he told her.

"Thanks," she said. "Thanks a lot." He shook his head impatiently.

"Oh, come off it, will you? Don't hang it on me just because you've had your little day in the sun and it's all wrapped up and at the cleaners now. Boy, if there's one thing I can't stand, it's watching some old broad being sorry for herself."

Valerie Lytton let her hand trail away from his sleeve. "Well," she said, her voice a little lower now, "I always did pick them. I have to say that. If there's a stinker in sight, little Valerie will find him." She had half a highball in front of her; now she picked it up and drained it quickly.

Dark hair and broad shoulders began to go. Then he turned and looked back at her.

"Tom Mix is dead, honey," he said. "So are Alice Joyce and Fatty Arbuckle. They have talking pictures now. So why don't you go off into a quiet corner and knit socks for the rest of your life?"

Then he was gone. Valerie Lytton sat there, her face strained and yet impassive, for a few seconds after he left. Then, with a straightening of the bare, fleshy shoulders, she held her head up again and lighted a cigarette. As she blew out smoke, she looked briefly in the direction of Kelcey and Mike, and smiled a professional smile. What the smile was supposed to say was, Aren't men all children, really now?

Then Valerie Lytton finally pulled her wrap around her and got up and left. For a little time later, a haze of cigarette smoke still seemed to envelop the table where she had been sitting.

"Let's go home," Mike said.

It didn't get any better.

He didn't get used to it. He tried, but he didn't get used to it.

He watched her on the set one morning, doing a love scene with Pike Hunter, one of the newer curly-haired matinee idols, and he couldn't stay. He went off to a corridor and drank soda pop for an hour until she was through. He sat in on a luncheon interview she had one day at the Beverly-Wilshire with a fan-magazine writer, and listening to her being cool and friendly and charming, utterly self-possessed although he felt certain she wanted him to kiss her—and that troubled him too. There were other things she did in her work, other ways she behaved, that—well, which he likely exaggerated beyond their real importance. Come off it, Kelse, he wanted to say; come off it and be my love and forget this foolishness.

He knew he was being condescending, the way writers always seem to be with actors—they always felt that a scrubwoman could play Juliet and be believable, because the words were all that mattered—and he knew he was being unfair to Kelcey and to her profession. But he couldn't help it.

"The whole thing," he said to the wall of his hotel room one morning, while working on one of his masterpieces, "is bigger than both of us. We can't fight City Hall."

And that was how it had been—Mike West, adrift in lotusland, lost in a world he never had made. Shaken and mixed up. In love with a face that was eight feet high and meant to be looked at thoughtfully over a bag of popcorn from the tenth row.

He sat for a long time on the sofa in the dimly lighted little apartment, with his feet on the coffee table. He smoked cigarette after cigarette and he thought about as hard as the human brain allows, and when he could think no more he got up and walked over and sat on the edge of the opened window. In the long, endless valley stretched below, the lights of Hollywood and, farther on, of Los Angeles formed a blanket of man-made daisies in the night.

Mike West looked down at it. A city built on The Great Train Robbery. On the antics of John Bunny and Flora Finch. On the elder Doug Fairbanks' jumping over walls, on Mack Sennett bathing beauties, and on Ginger Rogers, as Puff Randolph, saying "Cigarette me." On Ronald Colman being so dashing as Beau

Geste and Tom Mix riding off into the sunset on Tony, and ——

He shivered a little. Then, half-aloud, he said, "It isn't real." He rubbed his eyes, then shut them and opened them again, but the blanket of lights, the field of daisies, still covered the darkened valley below. "It isn't real," he said dully. "None of it is real."

After a while, he sighed and walked back to the television set and snapped it on. The awards program was over and Ken Maynard was riding after some Indians in the prairie country. Mike fiddled around with the dial and came up at last with a fairly new movie. It couldn't have been more than seventeen, eighteen years old. The women's skirts were a little longer than those of the Clara Bow era and there were no belts on the backs of the men's suits.

There was something familiar about the slender blonde in the black suit who was playing the career woman who lived alone and was pretty darned tired of it. The high cheekbones, the mop of hair ——

So that was how Valerie Lytton had looked.

Mike West had been in his early teens then; he had spent his Saturday afternoons playing tennis or fishing, and he wouldn't have known Valerie Lytton if she suddenly had appeared at the end of his fishing pole.

He backed away from the screen slowly to the sofa and sat down. Then, an unlighted cigarette in one hand, he watched the girl with the high cheekbones act. She was pretty good. And there was something about her that was different. Not just the fact that she was thinner and there were no crow's-feet around the eyes and the voice was softer and warmer.

There was something in her face.

It was the face of somebody who just had been delivered to Hollywood, California, from Butler, Pennsylvania, or Akron, Ohio. In the movie, it was acting, but when you forgot the lines it was saying, the face said, Gee, look—isn't life absolutely wonderful? It's so good to be alive!

Mike didn't know how long he sat there, just watching. He looked away from the screen, in the darkened little room, only when he heard Kelcey Banks' voice from the doorway. She was standing there and must have been for some time, looking at Valerie Lytton in the days when the world was young.

"Do you remember what he said?" she asked. "He said, 'Why don't you go off into a quiet corner and knit socks for the rest of your life?'"

Standing there, she looked the way he imagined her when he lay awake at night, staring at the ceiling. Dark and beautiful, with her eyes shining, filling the room with Kelcey Banks, which was all he had felt he ever would want for the rest of his life. Her hair was up in the new chignon, and the green dress that Wardrobe had lent her fitted her magnificently. She was a woman and you couldn't mistake her for anything else. He went over and took her in his arms.

"Kelse," he said, "listen to me." She put a hand over his mouth.

"No."

"I've got something to ——"

"No you haven't. Not to me."

She slipped out of her stole and put something on the coffee table. Then she walked over to the TV set, watched it for one more moment, and then gently shut it off. She came back and pulled Mike West to the sofa so that he lay with his head in her lap.

"The thing on the table," she said. He looked at the big, impressive silver plaque.

"That was given to Hollywood's most promising young ex-actress," she said. She smiled. "Ah, the parts that girl could have played. The hearts she could have broken."

He reached up and drew her lips down to be kissed. When she looked down at him, she was almost irritable.

"Why didn't you lock the door before you turned on that darned thing?" she said, nodding her head at the TV. "I think you planned it. I think you wanted me to see it."

He shook his head no, and she leaned down and kissed him again and then cradled her cheek against his.

"I don't want anyone to tell me to go into a corner and knit socks, Mike West," she said.

"Maybe you're being a little melodramatic," he said.

She shook her head. "No. I just didn't want to see it before. It didn't have to be Valerie Lytton's old movie tonight. I could see the same thing six nights a week, with six other women like her."

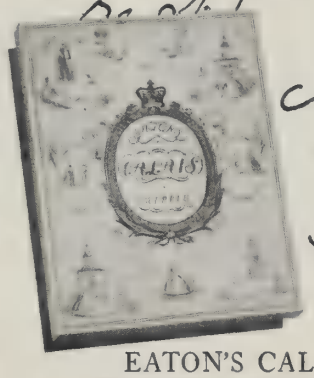
"That doesn't mean you have to end up like that."

"I know, I know," she said. "But there's a chance I might—and I don't want to take the chance." She leaned back and sighed. "I sat at the banquet tonight and was being more charming than I ever had been. And then I looked around—at all the other promising young actresses. Do you know what, Mike? They were all trying so desperately to please. To charm everyone within twenty feet. They were so anxious to have everybody love them." She shivered.

"And suddenly I realized I didn't have to," she said. "All of a sudden I only had to make happy a man sitting back in a tiny apartment in Hollywood Hills, unhappy because of the strange business I was in. So I left. I took the plaque and at the door I looked at Don Allison and said maybe he'd have to get himself another girl and ——"

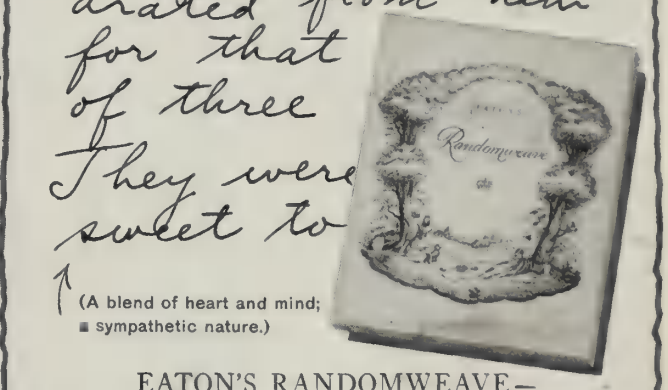
Mike West kissed Kelcey Banks very long and very thoroughly. "I feel terrible," he muttered. "You'll remember this all your life and we'll both be unhappy about it."

"No," she said, shaking her head. "No, we won't. Just don't ever tell me to go into a corner and knit socks for the rest of my life."



And he never did.

From Wally Warner:



By the time you read these deathless lines, Kelcey Banks and Mike West will have made it legal—but the big news is that Miss B. has tossed her promising career into the ashcan, to be Mrs. W. This is no Betty Hutton retirement, either. Well, maybe she's a fool—but it's six, two and even she's ■ happy fool. END

DISCOVER the Eaton's Open Stock Letter Paper that suits your personality!

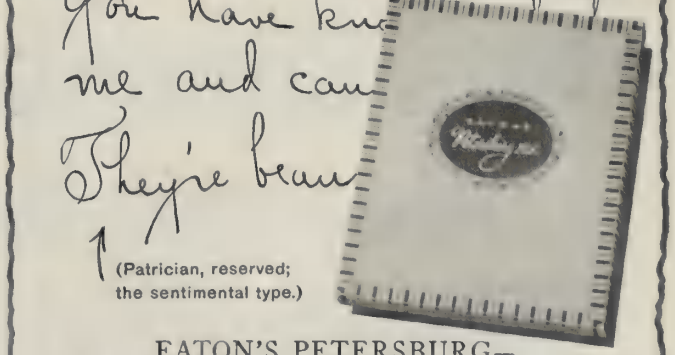
A letter is a personal visit—let the paper you use convey the individual you, your personality, as definitely as your handwriting does. You can choose the letter paper that "becomes" you from Eaton's Open Stock selection. Use it always; these papers are always available, always match. Paper and envelopes sold separately.



EATON'S CALAIS RIPPLE—
Characterful colors, luxuriously deckled

EATON'S RANDOMWEAVE—
Fabricked: clear linen-like tints

EATON'S POST PREFERRED—
Lightweight, for airmail and regular post

EATON'S PETERSBURG—
Distinctive texture, feminine color choice

What type are you? Find out!... SPECIAL! HANDWRITING ANALYSIS OFFER—$1.

1. Send a pen-and-ink sample of your handwriting.
2. State whether written by man or woman and if written with left hand.
3. Enclose one dollar (no stamps) and your name and address.

DOROTHY SARA, renowned Graphologist, will make an individual personality analysis of the writing and will also send you a generous sample package (10 sheets, 5 lined envelopes) of the Eaton Open Stock Paper she recommends as most becoming.
Please allow three weeks. Offer limited within the U.S. Expires April 30, 1958.

If your quest be Beauty EATON'S Fine Letter Papers

EATON PAPER CORPORATION PITTSFIELD, MASSACHUSETTS

New Simoniz Floor Wax - childproof because there's vinyl in it!

Vinyl—tough, brilliant vinyl—makes new Simoniz® Floor Wax the toughest, glossiest floor wax ever.

Now, kids can spill on your floors. Romp on them. Track on them. Vinyl, the miracle ingredient, means childproof protection.

Floors never shone so mirror-bright. Never stayed so bright, so long . . . even with frequent damp mopping. Yet, when it comes to re-waxing, new Simoniz Floor Wax removes evenly—no blotching.

New Simoniz Floor Wax polishes itself. You don't need to buff. You don't need to rub. Try it.

For all floors—linoleum, rubber, asphalt, vinyl tile and finished wood

SIMONIZ MAKES IT

HAROLD FOWLER

Ample space for storage in this bright and cheerful dining room; a perfect background for the family's activities.

When not in use, this ingenious small desk folds neatly back and looks like a drawer.

THE ROOM THAT WAS

INSPIRED BY A COLLECTION

OF SAGE-GREEN WEDGWOOD

HOW AMERICA LIVES

DOUBLE FEATURE Dining Room

By CYNTHIA McADOO WHEATLAND Interior Decoration Editor

"Our dining room works between meals and overtime," said Marel Harayda. "The family has too many projects that require working space to allow it to be used solely for dining."

Marel's plan for the 11′ x 13¾′ room demanded that it look like and function as a dining room without its other activities' dominating the scene. Her business as an interior decorator gave her knowledge for planning, and her love of sage-green china inspired the coloring. The first step was to scrape the dark green rough-plaster walls to ready them for fresh willow-green paint, and the installation of white built-in cabinets and shelves. These at once made the room appear larger and provided cupboard storage for linens, china and silver. Even a small desk for Marel's own use was included. Bookshelves in the dining room were a must: "Each evening after dinner," Marel explained, "we hold a round-table discussion, lasting about an hour, and it is usually necessary to resort to reference books to settle the point in question." The shelves also provide space to display her budding collection of Wedgwood china.

Simple colonial furniture in a mellow wood finish was chosen for this small room. The extensible dining table with its matching chairs will become even more of a blessing when the children reach the homework stage, allowing plenty of room for books and papers. With their library at hand, this is an ideal setup for the homework crowd.

Durable plastic tile replaced the old and worn linoleum which had become a problem to keep clean, and a bright cotton-and-fiber rug adds warmth to the room, echoing the coral of the chair cushions. The same canvas duck, a long-wearing and sturdy fabric, covers the small cushions atop the louvered bench which screens the old-fashioned radiator. The green plaid curtains, light, crisp—and washable, of course—repeat the color of the walls, pointing up Marel's treasured collection of china.

APPLEYARD CHURCH SUPPER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 63

MRS. APPLEYARD'S MEAT PIE

Mother begins by buying 4 pounds chuck steak and having it cut into 1½" cubes. Then she mixes 5 tablespoons flour, 1 teaspoon poultry seasoning, ½ teaspoon pepper, and ¼ teaspoon each nutmeg, cinnamon and ginger. Put the seasoned flour in a paper bag and shake the cubes of beef in it until they are thoroughly coated. In a large frying pan, melt 5 tablespoons butter. Reduce heat and brown the beef slowly, turning occasionally. Cover meat with 2 cups tomato juice and 1 cup beef bouillon or consommé. Season with 2 teaspoons salt and ½ teaspoon each thyme and orégano. Cover and let meat simmer gently—never let it boil—for 2 hours. Meanwhile, peel and slice enough tender carrots to make 2 cups, and peel 16 small white onions. About 45 minutes before meat is done, cook the carrots and onions in 1 cup beef bouillon or consommé and 2 cups tomato juice. After 10 minutes of cooking, add 2 packages frozen green peas to the vegetables. Cook for 5 minutes. Transfer meat to a large pan or casserole. Stir in vegetables and 1 tablespoon sugar. Set over medium heat on top of range. Make a roux of 2 tablespoons melted butter and 2 tablespoons flour. Stir into sauce until well blended. Let sauce come to a boil and arrange buttermilk biscuits on top.

BUTTERMILK BISCUITS

Sift together 2⅔ cups flour, 2 teaspoons baking powder, ¾ teaspoon salt and ½ teaspoon baking soda. Cut 6 tablespoons butter into flour until mixture is the consistency of coarse meal. With a fork mix in 1 cup buttermilk just enough to moisten dry ingredients. Flour your hands and shape into biscuits—do not roll—and drop onto bubbling gravy. Bake pie in a hot oven, 400° F., until biscuits are delicately brown, or about 30 minutes. Makes 8 large or 12 medium servings of pie and biscuits. Mother always makes an extra batch of biscuits to serve separately with the pie, as there never seems to be enough.

The East Hill Church can be seen from most parts of Appleyard Center, rising from uncompromising squareness into a delicately turned spire, and crowned with a fish-shaped gilded weather vane. The outside is white—what other color is there for Vermont churches? Inside, the church kitchen is a characteristic blend of the modern and the traditional: there are a mammoth old black wood stove, and a shining white modern range; a soapstone sink for pots and pans, and a big new white enamel one for dishes and silver. On the sparkling day of the supper, the roads have been freshly plowed; I get to the church well ahead of time, having promised to help in the kitchen. Some of my neighbors are there already, setting the long trestle tables, which can seat forty people, with blue-and-white-checked cloths, heavy white china, thick tumblers and much-polished silver.

Cynthia, my eldest daughter, just fifteen, is filling big bowls with bright red apples and nuts, which will serve for decoration, and the more practical purpose of munching as well. I see that mother's meat pie has arrived and is keeping warm on top of the range. Alma Vincent, who leads our church choir, is just sliding mother's pan of potatoes into the oven for a final warming. "I'd like the rule for these, if your mother wouldn't mind," she says; Alma is one of Appleyard Center's finest cooks, and it's a compliment to have her ask.

POTATOES MRS. APPLEYARD

First mother butters the bottom and sides of a 12"x8"x2" baking dish. Wash and peel 4 large baking potatoes. Slice them thin as a newly minted dime and put in ice water a little while. Drain. Put a layer of potatoes into the dish, dot with butter and sprinkle thickly with shredded sharp Cheddar cheese, finely minced onion, minced parsley, salt, pepper, savory and paprika. Do this until you have four layers. (You'll need altogether ¼ cup butter, ½ pound Cheddar cheese, 1 cup minced onions, ½ cup minced parsley, 1 tablespoon salt, 1 teaspoon each pepper and savory, and enough paprika to redden each layer.) Save ¼ cup Cheddar cheese for the top of the dish. Now, pour in a mixture of milk and light cream, half and half, enough to cover the potatoes (about 2½ cups). Bake in a hot oven, 450° F., for 10 minutes. Then reduce heat to moderate, 350° F. Sprinkle on the ¼ cup cheese and continue baking until potatoes are tender, or for about 2 hours. By this time they should be brown on top, a sort of well-polished American walnut underneath, and soft and creamy white in between. Makes 8 servings.

I ask Alma what she has brought, and she shows me a handsome roast loin of pork already in the oven, brown and crisp outside, with a hint of spice in its rich, savory fragrance. I suggest to her that we'd like to know

CHAPERON

French noblemen of the early Middle Ages adopted a special type of hood. Because it resembled the shape (mantle) worn by priests, they called it the chaperon. It crossed the English Channel with the Norman Conquest, and was long worn only by men. Edward III made the chaperon part of the full-dress costume worn by members of the Order of the Garter when he founded it in 1349.

In the same spirit which has led modern women to adopt slacks, the medieval lady began to wear her lord's chaperon. For more than a century, the garment was fashionable. Then it fell into disuse; only old ladies who cared nothing about fashion continued to wear it.

It was ladies of that sort who were usually asked to watch over young girls. As late as 1830, it was a stock joke that any attractive miss was likely to be guarded by an old witch wearing a chaperon. Eventually the garment disappeared. But its name stuck to guardians of conduct, with the result that the chaperon is not extinct.

just what she did to make it smell so good, and in just about a minute I'm copying down her recipe for

ROAST LOIN OF PORK

Alma takes a 7-pound loin of pork and has it cut almost all the way through along the bone so that it can be carved easily into chops. Sift together ¼ cup flour, 1¾ teaspoons cloves, 1 teaspoon each salt and poultry seasoning, ½ teaspoon paprika and ¼ teaspoon cinnamon. Rub this mixture well into the surface of the roast. Put the pork on a rack in a large roaster pan and roast for 10 minutes, uncovered, in a very hot oven, 500° F. Reduce heat to slow, 300° F., add about 1 cup water to the pan: cover and roast pork 3½ hours. Remove roast from pan. Now for the gravy: Skim drippings of excess fat: brown ⅓ cup flour in a skillet over low heat, stirring until it tans lightly. Stir into drippings and gradually add 1 cup milk. Heat, stirring constantly, until thickened and smooth. Serve the roast with the gravy. Makes about 15 servings.

Now the waitresses arrive, among them my eleven-year-old daughter, Laura, and we tie blue-and-white-checked aprons around them, to match the tablecloths. Alma gives them strict instructions not to hurry the guests before they've had time to think about second helpings. "Let them sit and visit if they've a mind to." . . . "And don't pour water down anyone's back," cautions Cynthia, veteran waitress of many suppers. Alma tells me that her other contribution came about because she had some pork fat left over that she'd cut off the roast. That's how we happen to have some big, steaming bowls of

GREEN BEANS WITH PORK CRACKLINGS

Cut off ¼ pound outside fat from a pork roast, and cut into ¼" cubes. Sauté slowly, stirring occasionally and pouring off excess fat until they are crisp and delicate brown. Drain on absorbent toweling. Cook 3 packages frozen green beans in a small amount of boiling water until crisp-tender. Season with 3 tablespoons butter or pork drippings, 1 teaspoon salt and ½ teaspoon pepper. Scatter cracklings over beans and serve. Makes 8 servings.

Over on the salad counter sits a big cut-glass salad bowl that I recognize as Mary Flint's. She's the kind of cook that can turn out 200 homemade rolls for a supper, each of them light, buttery, melt-in-your-mouth, and all alike. Today, however, she has brought a salad, and is adding something to it at the last minute. "Chopped almonds?" I ask, sampling a few. "And what else went into it?"

ALMOND, GRAPE AND PINEAPPLE SALAD

Brown ½ cup blanched slivered almonds in butter. Drain on paper toweling. Mix together 2 cups diced celery and 1 cup each canned or frozen pineapple chunks and red or green grapes cut in half and seeded. Make a tart dressing by adding the juice of ½ lemon to ½ cup of your favorite French dressing. Pour dressing over salad and toss lightly. Stir in browned almonds. Serve in lettuce cups. Makes 8 servings.

The waitresses have folded napkins, filled tumblers and set out glass dishes of Mrs. Appleyard's red-pepper relish as made by her eldest daughter—in other words, me. A great advantage to this particular relish is that you can usually get the materials for it in winter as well as summer. I made this batch just a few weeks ago so when Mary asks me for the rule I can say it off just about by heart.

RED-PEPPER RELISH

I begin by splitting 12 sweet red peppers and removing the seeds and doing the same with 6 green peppers. Dice fine. Cover with boiling water. Let stand 10 minutes. Drain. Add more boiling water. Let stand 5 more minutes. Drain again. Chop 3 large onions and 6 peeled ripe tomatoes and add to the peppers. Add 2 cups chopped celery and 1 lemon and 1 orange, peeled, sliced thin and quartered. In a large pot heat 2 cups sugar and 1½ tablespoons salt with 1 quart cider vinegar. Boil 5 minutes. Add the chopped vegetables and bring to a boil. Simmer for 10 minutes. Pack the relish in sterilized jars. Makes 6–8 pint jars.

Everything is ready now. The kitchen is full of steam and delicious smells. The mingled fragrances drift out into the vestibule and make the waiting customers press longingly against the doors that lead to the dining room. Alma casts an experienced eye over the tables; "Center table needs another dish of butter," she says to Laura. Somehow a pattern of unrehearsed teamwork always takes over at this point, as we set out casseroles, platters and vegetable dishes. Making coffee, cutting cake and pie in equal portions, washing and wiping dishes as soon as they are cleared away—if someone comes to help, she helps! Crises come and go. The hot dishes threaten to run out, and Alma dashes home across the road to get an extra pan of beans she'd made "just in case."

What a serious lot the diners always are! A meal is a solemn business when you've braved snowdrifts to get to it, and the people who come are always intensely devoted to the matter at hand. Not until the dinner plates are cleared away, and the desserts and coffee have come on, is there much conversation beyond, "Would you please pass the relish . . . and the salad too."

"A man wants to know how to make our icebox cake," says Cynthia, bursting into the kitchen. "He calls it 'that cold chocolate pudding.'" Cynthia is delighted, as she is the one who made it.

CHOCOLATE ICEBOX CAKE

In a saucepan melt 2 packages semisweet chocolate pieces with 4½ tablespoons hot water. Add 7 well-beaten egg yolks and cook over hot water until thick, stirring constantly. This will take about 7 minutes. Remove from heat and add 1 teaspoon vanilla. Cool. Line a glass loaf pan with waxed paper. Use 2 wide strips of paper, one laid lengthwise, the other crosswise, leaving enough paper to cover the top from both ends and sides. Beat 7 egg whites until stiff but not dry. Fold egg whites carefully into the chocolate mixture. Pour into the paper-lined loaf pan. Layer the top of the mixture with ladyfingers, about 18 (or 2 packages if they are small ones, fewer if larger: if ladyfingers are unavailable, use strips of sponge-cake cut to fit). Fold over the waxed-paper ends, and fasten with paper clips. Refrigerate for several hours. When ready to serve, cut away the top paper and turn out on a platter. Remove the rest of the paper. Just before serving, whip ½ pint cream and frost the loaf. Garnish with semisweet chocolate shavings. Makes 6–8 servings.

I'm hoping for a piece of Mary Flint's lemon-meringue pie—such a pie, a good four inches from the feathery crust to the cloud of meringue above it! The kitchen help and the waitresses get to eat after the customers are through, but I don't stand a chance tonight. My Tommy got there first, and the last gold-and-white triangle is rapidly disappearing. A proper mother should be happy to see her child enjoying himself so. Here's how Mary makes it:

LEMON-MERINGUE PIE

Mix together 4 tablespoons cornstarch and 1¼ cups sugar. Add ⅓ cup lemon juice, 1 tablespoon grated lemon rind and 4 slightly beaten egg yolks (save the whites for the meringue). When well mixed so that there are no lumps of starch, pour in 1¼ cups hot water. Place over simmering water and cook, stirring constantly, until thickened. Cover and cook for 20 minutes more, stirring from time to time. Taste to make sure no taste of starch remains. Cool slightly and pour into a baked 9" pie shell.

Beat egg whites until quite frothy. Gradually add 8 tablespoons sugar and continue beating until peaks will form. Add a pinch of salt. Spread over the filling, being sure it is well sealed to the shell. Bake in a very hot oven, 425° F., until delicately browned, about 4–5 minutes. Set on a cake rack or trivet to cool.

"Why can't you make lemon pie like Mrs. Flint?" Tommy rebukes me as we're trudging home down the snowy road with a basketful of empty dishes.

"I can," I answer. "I've got the recipe."

Behind us the church kitchen is swept and tidy, the tables scrubbed and the chairs straightened. And in the cashbox are seventy-five dollars toward a new furnace.

"The best cooks are men," Tommy proclaims, and runs ahead to take a long slide down the snow-packed hill to our cedar-lined driveway.

Men are good cooks when they're cooking, I think to myself. Only mostly they don't. The best cooks are people, and a lot of them live right here in Appleyard Center. As I reach home, our dog barks a short welcome. The pony whinnies from her warm stable. Northern lights are rippling and crackling over the house. "Why do you live in the country?" people sometimes ask me. On nights like this, after a successful church supper, the answer is clear. END

ONE WONDERFUL CLEANER

CLEANS HOUSE WITHOUT WATER!

WONDERFUL— Jet Bon Ami does away with pail, powder, soap, mess!
Hands don't even get wet!

WONDERFUL— Lacy froth sprays on, dirt wipes right off with a dry cloth!
A stingy little bit cleans better than a lot—spreads as you wipe—very economical!

WONDERFUL— Cleans woodwork as well as windows
No worry about sloppy run-down that stains frames or sills.
Glass glistens crystal clear—no hazy after-film.
Painted woodwork wipes clean and bright.

WONDERFUL— Cleans porcelain, chrome and tile all through the house. Glossy surfaces just sparkle and gleam.
No waxy build-up! No water streaks or spots! No cloudy, day-late haze.

WONDERFUL— New "Anti-Film" Formula makes Jet Bon Ami hazeproof! Defeats the problem of after-film on glass—even if you live in a moist, foggy atmosphere!

REPLACEMENT OR A REFUND OF MONEY
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

New better-than-ever JET BON AMI

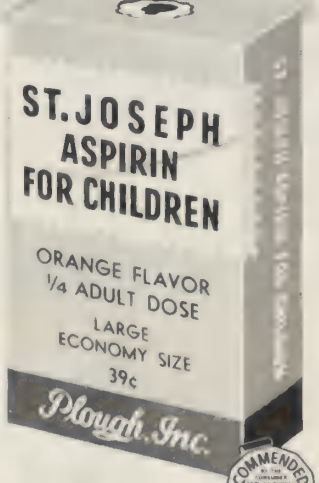
©1958—The Bon Ami Company

JAN STERLING (Mrs. Paul Douglas) Famous Motion Picture Star, and son Adams

"With St. Joseph Aspirin For Children I'm sure of giving dosage "just as the doctor orders"" — Jan Sterling



St. Joseph Aspirin For Children speeds safe, comforting relief to headache, colds or muscle aches. It's approved by more doctors for fever and pain than any other medication for children.

Mothers trust its accurate 1¼ grain dosage—no oversize tablets to cut or break, no messy liquids to measure. Youngsters like its pure orange flavor. America's mother-and-child favorite. Get St. Joseph Aspirin For Children today, your child may need it tonight.

ST. JOSEPH ASPIRIN FOR CHILDREN
Is Approved By More Doctors
Than Any Other Brand

For my family's adult aspirin needs, I always buy regular St. Joseph ASPIRIN

Can't Use MILK????

If for any reason you cannot use regular milk, don't miss all its pleasures and benefits! Join the thousands who have discovered a new, highly nutritious all-vegetable milk—Soyamel® —an instant powder. A delicious drink! Fine in recipes! Has no allergy reactions. Trial 12-ounce can $1.00 ppd. in U.S. (money back if not satisfied). Worthington Foods, Inc., Worthington, Ohio

New DANDRICIDE Rinse Stops Dandruff Longer Than Any Shampoo or Tonic

. . . or your money back!

Shampoos or tonics merely dissolve dandruff scales, only to have them return in a few days. New Dandricide rinses loose dandruff OUT, really cleans the scalp, fights the fast return of unsightly, itchy dandruff as no shampoo or tonic can!

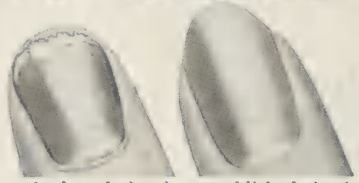
Concentrated to last longer! Easy to use!

Because it's concentrated, you get 12 Dandricide rinses in a $1.00 bottle. Just mix with water as directed, rinse and that's all! Good for men, women and teen-agers.

Get Dandricide at beauty and barber shops, drug and department stores. $1.00 bottle lasts for months! Dandricide is money-back guaranteed to keep dandruff away longer than any shampoo or tonic you have ever used. Buy a bottle today!

For trial bottle of Dandricide, mail your name and address plus 25¢ to Dandricide Co., Dept. LH2, 114-12th Street, Brooklyn 15, N. Y. and you will receive a generous three-rinse size bottle. Do it now!

$1.00 For a 3 months supply



NEW MEDICAL RESEARCH ON

SPLITTING NAILS

AGAIN SHOWS EFFECTIVENESS OF

KNOX Gelatine

AT YOUR GROCER'S

Now a fourth doctor-supervised study has been published. Again with Knox Gelatine, and only Knox, 7 out of 10 women restored brittle fingernails to normal by drinking daily one 5¢ envelope (115-120 grains) of Knox in bouillon, fruit juice or water. Directions in package. Ask your doctor.

TO DOCTORS: For reprints of clinical reports published in medical journals, write Knox Gelatine, Johnstown, N. Y.

© 1958 Knox Gelatine Co.

1 THE DISAPPEARING DOLLAR 1

By MARGARET DAVIDSON,
Homemaking Editor

HOW AMERICA SPENDS

Only at the bottom of the scale do any sizable number simply break even.

Every income group allots the biggest part of its budget to groceries and the house. But note that the bigger your income, the smaller the share that food and shelter demand.

Some percentages stay fairly level—personal care, for instance, and recreation. But as income climbs, the same percentage equals more dollars.

Some proportions fall when income goes up—for instance, the share going to medical expenses. Others increase with income: the more you make, the larger the share you give away, for example.

Take a look at those savings and deficit figures. Did they raise your eyebrows? If you're a $2000–$3000, did you howl to see Mr. $5000–$6000 spending an average of 2 per cent more than he takes in? If you're a bill-hounded $7500 family, did you wince to see that 45 per cent of the $3000–$4000 families save money?

Well, those savings and deficit figures are tricky. Any big buying on loan or installments in a given year (houses excepted) is likely to throw a family over onto the red-ink side, for the total price is written into the expense. But the year afterward, assuming that they don't borrow more, they'll probably show up in the black again, as they pay off. A planned withdrawal of savings will show up as overspending. Also the average amount people borrow is likely to be larger than the average amount they save in a black-ink year, which pushes the average of the two sets of figures into the minus column. Finally, most people have some untabulated savings hidden, as cash values in the insurance figures.

Actually, the more helpful data are probably those lower down on the table—the percentages of each income group who save as against the percentages who go in the hole. Every income group, you'll notice, has its savers; good income helps, but so does good management. Once over the $3000 hump, the division is pretty much 50–50 until you hit the big money.

This article is condensed from Changing Times, W. M. Kiplinger's monthly magazine, with table based on surveys by Bureau of Labor Statistics, Census Bureau, Dept. of Agriculture and private researchers. Mr. Kiplinger also publishes the Kiplinger Washington Letter for businessmen.

HOW THE HARAYDAS SPEND

You can change spending patterns—but only before, not after, the money goes.

Marel and Johnnie Harayda never quite know where their money goes. So when Marel saw us looking over a chart on average incomes, her curiosity was piqued. The first thing that surprised her was that the Harayda income was above average. The second: that in the $6000–$7500 income bracket (although Haraydas are at the low rung of it), 57 per cent save, 43 per cent end the year with a deficit.

The Haraydas have to cope with income that is unevenly divided through the year. Johnnie's take-home teaching salary for the ten months of 1957, including his raise, came to $4125. Marel's income fluctuates, averages around $1800 a year. So planning is hard. Savings are nonexistent at the moment. Looking at the chart on how others spend, Marel noted that their house and its upkeep is the biggest imbalance in their budget (43 per cent). "We figure that we are putting something aside in a way as we buy the house." Spur-of-the-moment buying for the grounds and recreation are other top-heavy items.

Even getting the figures together was a chore and an eye opener. "Johnnie and I never keep track of money—except for knowing it runs out." Many of the check stubs were illegible, not filled out, or made to "Cash." So Marel phoned three local utility companies to find out what her bills came to. The reason behind last year's plumbing bill, several hundred dollars, is lost in mystery. The price of a hot-water heater is lost, too, in the household records. Recreation is high, but the $565 total includes many books and magazines Marel considers good for the children.

Even a year's income is guesswork, and bumpy for a budget. The two summer months are lean. Johnnie's earnings drop to about half his winter average, are $440 when all goes well, but July and August jobs are unpredictable. "We sometimes have to skip the mortgage payment. Then we take out too much from his teaching pay later, and have to skimp on other things." Marel's income is vague as well. Her decorating can bring in from $25 a week up. As a working figure for the year, she thought a clear $1800 might be realistic. Her supplement, added to his earnings, brought their income to $6365 last year.

To ease the unknown months, the Haraydas decided they needed a clearer plan for income and outgo. Income in the flush winter months would have to be divided and a sum banked to cover the summer and also start an emergency fund, now lacking. Outgo would also have to be figured on a yearly instead of spontaneous basis, they decided. To meet fixed bills, such as yearly auto insurance, they would have to set aside a regular amount during the ten teaching months of the year.

Food and clothing expenses have never been a problem. Marel is a canny shopper, seldom spends more than $5 for a dress, makes many of her own and the children's clothes and slip covers, draperies. Johnnie buys some of his clothes at factory outlets and Marel picks up bargains for him too. She waits to do the back-to-school shop-

RUTH ORKIN

HOW AMERICA LIVES

Marel and Johnnie Harayda, whose story appears on page 121, shop thriftily for food, spend 8 per cent below average. Clothing bills run 8 per cent below average too. But in big categories—such as impulse buying for the house and grounds last year—outgo runs high (19 per cent above average).

HOW DOES YOUR SPENDING COMPARE WITH THE NATIONAL AVERAGE?

income after taxes	$2,000 to $3,000	$3,000 to $4,000	$4,000 to $5,000	$5,000 to $6,000	$6,000 to $7,500	$7,500 to $10,000	$10,000 and over food	38%	32%	30%	27%	25%	22%	17%
shelter
housing and utilities	20%	16%	16%	13%	13%	12%	12%
household operation	5%	5%	5%	5%	5%	5%	6%
furnishings and equipment	6%	6%	6%	7%	7%	6%	5%
clothing	12%	12%	13%	14%	14%	13%	10%
automobile	7%	8%	10%	10%	8%	10%	6%
other transportation	1%	2%	1%	1%	2%	1%	1%
medical care	8%	6%	5%	5%	4%	4%	3%
personal care	2%	2%	2%	2%	2%	2%	1%
recreation	3%	4%	4%	4%	5%	4%	4%
tobacco	2%	2%	2%	2%	1%	1%	1%
other expenses	2%	2%	2%	3%	2%	2%	3%
insurance	4%	4%	4%	5%	5%	5%	5%
gifts and contributions	2%	3%	2%	4%	4%	5%	8%
savings (+) or deficit (—)	—12%	— 4%	— 2%	— 2%	+3%	+8%	+18%
per cent who save	27%	45%	52%	46%	57%	66%	74%
average amount saved	$260	$416	$472	$696	$769	$1,718	$6,000 per cent with deficit	56%	51%	45%	52%	43%	32%	26%
average amount of deficit	$666	$679	$788	$953	$1,235	$1,456	$1,615
per cent who broke even	17%	4%	3%	2%	0%	2%	0%

HOW THE HARAYDAS CAN AFFORD THEIR BIG HOUSE

The Haraydas compare their spending with the average for their income group.

1957—income after taxes, including Marel's earnings and Johnnie's summer work—$6365

1957—outgo	Dollars	Per cent	Variation from Average Per cent
food	$1100	17	—8
shelter
housing and utilities	2053	32	+19
household operation	104	2	—3
furnishings and equipment	604	9	+2
clothing	368	6	—8
automobile	257	4	—4
other transportation	10	0.2	—1.8
medical	216	4	Same
personal care	52	0.8	—1.2
recreation	565	9	+4
tobacco	190	3	+3
other expenses	242	4	+2
insurance	200	3	—3
gifts and contributions	404	6	+2

ping until the term has started and clothing prices have dropped. Food sales on Thursdays have always stocked the larder, and the Haraydas have saved by buying bulk (for instance, 20 cans of tomatoes at a sale price of 10 cents a can).

It would be worth while, the Haraydas decided, to settle on a working budget, to stabilize some of their heights and depths through the year. Then they would be more assured of getting what they really want from the money available.

2 of our Lovely NEW Tweeds.

FREE
Scatter Rugs
. . . with orders for room size rugs—for limited time.

Save up to 1/2 . .

Get Finer RUGS
the Magic OLSON way!

REVERSIBLE for Double Wear. Thicker! More Luxury! Almost ½ inch thick.

"IF you will send me Your Old Rugs, Carpets, Clothing at my expense, I GUARANTEE to send you the Finest, Longest-Wearing Broadloom Rugs or Carpeting you ever had for so Little Money. Monthly Payments if you wish."—Walter E. Olson, Pres.

IT'S ALL SO EASY. WRITE for beautiful, New FREE Olson Rug and Decorating Book in color—and Free Scatter Rug Offer.

The Valuable Wools and materials in discarded carpets, rugs, clothing, etc., are scientifically reclaimed like new, sterilized, shredded, bleached, merged, redyed, spun with CHOICE NEW WOOLS, and woven into thick, deep-textured New Two-Sided Broadloom with the twist-weave beauty of luxury-priced wool rugs—at ½ the cost.

Choice of 47 Colors, Patterns, regardless of the colors in your material. Any Size in a Week—up to 18 feet wide, seamless, any length:

Lovely Tweeds · Solid Colors · Modern Casuals · Embossed Effects · Early American · Oriental Designs · Florals · Scrolls · Ovals

No-Risk Trial Offer.
We guarantee to please or pay for your materials. Over 3 million customers. Our 84th year! Factory-to-You Savings. Pay as little as $2 a week.

2 RUGS IN ONE
Use Both Sides
LIKE GETTING ONE RUG FREE

Mail This Coupon or a Postcard—Now!

FREE New Money-Saving Rug Book—Gift Offer
49 Model Rooms in Full Color

Name_____
Address_____ © ORC
Town_____ State_____

OLSON RUG CO. Dept. A-16
CHICAGO 2800 N. Crawford | NEW YORK 15 W. 34th St. | SAN FRANCISCO 209 Post Street

Make French dressings to suit your taste

...and make them better with Golden-Light Mazola Corn Oil

From one basic recipe—approximately two parts Mazola Corn Oil and one part vinegar —you can make a wonderful variety of salad dressings. Add your own spices to suit your taste.

Naturally lighter, more delicate in flavor, "Golden-Light" Mazola Corn Oil makes all salad dressings better. Dressings made with Mazola stay pourable even when stored in the refrigerator.

Use Mazola Oil for frying, too—you'll love the "golden lightness" it gives to fried foods. Easy to measure, convenient to use—that's why so many homemakers use Mazola Oil, made from golden corn, for all their frying, baking and salad dressings.

Corn Products Refining Company

MAZOLA®
CORN OIL
... unsaturated ... not hydrogenated
... nutritionally unexcelled

Corn oil has a place in well-balanced meals

Everybody needs fat in their daily diet—and the kind of fat is important, too.

You may have read some of the many articles about the importance of unsaturated fats in our daily meals. Many well-known nutritional authorities recommend that from one-third to one-half of all the fats we eat should be in the form of unsaturated fat such as corn oil. And Mazola is natural corn oil ... made from golden corn!

You don't have to change your family's eating habits, just use Mazola Corn Oil in your everyday cooking—as a natural and delicious part of your meals—in salads, frying, baking.

Send for your free copy of 32-page recipe book on how to use Mazola in your daily meals. Write to Mazola, Box 1754, New York 46, New York.

CONVERSATION PIECE

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 86

white pepper and salt to taste and bind with about 5 tablespoons mayonnaise. If you like, you can substitute finely chopped chicken for the salmon—the other ingredients will be the same. Dry mushroom caps thoroughly inside and out, and fill with the salad. Sprinkle tops with paprika. These look attractive and taste even better. The salad can be prepared the day before, all but adding the mayonnaise.

CEREAL COCKTAIL SNACKS

In a large flat baking pan spread 1 package crisp, oven-popped rice cereal, 1 package bite-size shredded wheat, 1 package pretzel sticks and 1 can cashew nuts (or peanuts). Dot all over with ½ pound butter. Place in a very slow oven, 200° F., 2 hours, tossing occasionally with a fork. Serve hot, in small bowls, as you would salted nuts.

BOUILLABAISSE

Buy 1¼ pounds cleaned, shelled and deveined shrimp (about 18), 1¼ pounds scallops (about 16), three or four 1½-pound lobsters (or an equivalent of frozen lobster tails if fresh lobster is not available) and 3 fillets flounder or sole. Put flounder or sole in top of double boiler, over boiling water; cover and cook until fish is white and firm, about 30–40 minutes. Set aside to cool. Split the lobsters in half. Cut off tail and claws. In a heavy kettle put ½ cup olive or salad oil, and when hot add 2 cups chopped onions, 1½ cups chopped celery and 2–3 cloves garlic, minced. Cook until delicately browned. Add ½ cup chopped parsley, 2 No. 2 cans tomatoes and 3 cups beef bouillon. Season with 4 teaspoons salt, ¾ teaspoon each thyme, paprika and saffron, 1 teaspoon monosodium glutamate, ½ teaspoon fennel, ⅛ teaspoon cayenne pepper. If you like, substitute 1 cup sauterne for 1 cup of the bouillon. Bring to a boil. Put in the shrimp, scallops, lobsters. Cover and simmer 30 minutes. Take out the lobsters. Remove lobster meat from shells and add to the mixture. Break flounder into bite-sized pieces and add these with the broth that has accumulated while they cooked. When the mixture again comes to a boil, it is ready to serve. Makes 8 servings. For second helpings, increase proportionately. (In season two dozen mussels may be added.)

CAULIFLOWER SALAD

Break and cut 1 head cauliflower into small flowerets. Cover with water and ice cubes and store in refrigerator. Let celery cabbage stand in cold water for a while and put in refrigerator. (If celery cabbage isn't available, any kind of salad greens can be used.) These are day-before jobs. To assemble salad, drain cauliflower and dry thoroughly, shred celery cabbage fairly fine and cut 1 can pimientos into cubes. Rub salad bowl with garlic, put in ingredients and toss with French dressing. To make it look prettier, you could save some of the cauliflower and pimiento for the center. I don't like a sour French dressing—four parts salad oil to one part vinegar is my choice—but that's up to you.

GARLIC FRENCH BREAD

Order slender French bread from your bakery. Cut into slices about ¾" thick almost but not quite through the bottom crust. Press slices away from one another and spread on both sides with softened butter mixed with minced garlic. (If you don't have a garlic press, I advise getting one. It takes the curse off this garlic-mincing chore.) Wrap the loaf in brown paper and tie with string. Before serving, heat 15 minutes in a medium—350° F.—oven. The bread can be prepared for the oven in advance and frozen.

CRÊPES AUX FRAMBOISES

Crêpes. This recipe will make 18 pancakes. Beat 4 eggs until light; add 3 tablespoons melted butter, 2 teaspoons sugar, 1 cup flour and 2 cups milk. Beat until smooth. In a small skillet, about 5½" bottom diameter, heat a little salad oil; pour in a small amount of batter and immediately tilt skillet from side to side to distribute batter evenly. When I make crêpes I measure 3 tablespoons into a ladle, observe the level and from then on I guess at quantity. When bottom of pancake is delicately browned, turn over with a spatula and brown other side. Use medium heat. Transfer to a baking sheet covered with waxed paper. The pancakes can be stacked if each layer is covered with waxed paper. Two skillets will speed the job and you can easily watch two pancakes at a time. These can be made the day before if wrapped airtight, with waxed paper between the pancakes so that they won't stick together. And I have made them far in advance and frozen them.

Filling. Blend together 1 pound creamed cottage cheese and 9 ounces cream cheese. The morning of the party day, spread each pancake generously with the cheese mixture, roll and place side by side in an oblong cake pan or baking dish. They mustn't be stacked and you may have to use two baking dishes. Cover tightly with aluminum foil.

Raspberry Sauce. Thaw four 10-ounce packages frozen raspberries, buzz in electric blender and strain through a fine sieve to remove seeds. If you don't have a blender, press them through a sieve. Add 3 tablespoons butter, 2 tablespoons grated orange rind, 1 tablespoon lemon juice, and sugar to taste. Bring to a boil and stir in quickly 2 teaspoons cornstarch dissolved in a little cold water. Boil 1 minute.

Sometime in the afternoon, spoon about half the raspberry sauce over the crêpes and cover again with aluminum foil. Before serving, give them 20 minutes in a moderate—350° F.—oven. Heat remaining sauce in a double boiler. If you like, ¼ cup brandy can be added to the sauce. To serve, put 2 crêpes on each heated dessert plate, spoon on more sauce and put a good glob of cold sour cream on each serving.

Service. This meal should be eaten at the table, but the form of service can be elastic. The important thing is to be sure that the bouillabaisse is eaten while it is piping hot. I suggest that you have the tureen of bouillabaisse and the soup plates on a buffet or table and let your guests serve themselves. While this is going on you could serve the salad and put it at each place. It would be difficult for people to juggle both the soup and salad at one time, and it would be awkward and time-consuming if they had to make two trips to the buffet.

"WE'RE DOING FINE ON $8,400 A YEAR"

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 49

"It's all been a matter of deciding together what things were most important to us," says the financial expert, "and then planning our outgo to fit our income." She produces budgets and records of actual spending from past years to demonstrate exactly how the Collinses' income has been used. "It's duck soup now that we're so rich," she adds, "but we've always lived on whatever we had."

Chuck and Virginia had been high-school friends in Massachusetts, but not sweethearts, Va. insists. "He walked home with me, but I carried my books! He'd tell me about his girl friends, and criticize my boy friends. I kept waiting for him to ask me to go steady, but he never did." He joined the Navy (radarman) in 1944 and Virginia, in nurses' training, wrote him long, frequent letters. She liked nursing, but left after fifteen months ("When I mixed up the diets and served steak to a woman due for an operation, I decided I was too scatterbrained to fool around sick people") and got a job with the telephone company. By the time Chuck came home in 1946, she had been promoted to traveling supervisor. He came to see her on his first night home, but they were still "just friends," and soon he was again objecting to the boys she went out with. "I finally realized," he grins, "that the only way to stop worrying about her was to marry her myself."

They were married in June, 1947, and went to New York on their honeymoon; but after three days they came home, threw some dungarees in a bag, and spent the rest of the two weeks at a camp in the Adirondacks.

They had agreed that Virginia would keep her job when Chuck entered technical college that fall, but the traveling involved meant that the newlyweds could spend only weekends together. She resigned and for three months, while she looked for work locally, they lived on Chuck's G.I. allowance of $90 per month, "but we got awfully tired of spaghetti!" Then she found work as a doctor's office assistant at $120 per month, soon got a raise. Expenses were low—rental for their college quarters was $30—and they saved most of the G.I. $90 each month. "We kept it all in a checking account at first, but soon learned the fallacy of that—it's so easy to write another ten-dollar check!" Chuck graduated in 1950 (he gave Virginia her sewing machine as a "graduation present"), found a job at $45 per week. Their first "real home" was a small apartment for which they bought furniture, range and refrigerator with the money they had saved.

The nine-cubic-foot refrigerator was too large then; they are still using it, and now wish it would stretch. The original living and bedroom furniture is still in use also—sturdy brown-toned maple, which glows with the reflection of loving care. Virginia made colorful slip covers for chairs and sofa last year. When they moved into the new house they bought (and painted) bunk beds and chests for the boys' rooms, and a new living-room rug; lately a table and chairs have been added to the dining alcove, which held the TV until they could afford the table. The living room is an inviting spot with its growing plants, gay café curtains, books and magazines, record player, and a parakeet that sings.

Since some months before Charles was born in 1950, Virginia has not worked outside the home. She says firmly, "My function, as I see it, is to keep our home running and to try to furnish the things my family needs or wants. I don't see any excuse for a man's reaching into a sock drawer and there are no socks, or needing a clean shirt and there are none! Chuck likes a clean, comfortable house and good meals; and I like to think that my being here is worth something to the children, even if they don't realize it now." She tells you about the day last year when she and the boys went to the park, taking with them a little boy whose mother had to work during the day. He looked up at her and said, "Do you mind if I call you 'mother' while we're here?" She adds, "That nearly broke my heart! When my children need to call somebody mother, I want to be available."

You can read much of the Collinses' personal history between the lines of their outgrown budgets. Chuck and Virginia have never considered that simply being sheltered, clothed and fed was really living. Even during what they now call "our real poverty days," they found room for a few white hyacinths. For instance, the budget for September, '53 (salary $363.48), was so closely figured that the final entry read: "balance left, $0.24"; yet that same budget allotted $7.50 per month for "encyclopedia." "I never went to college," Virginia explains, "and some of the happiest times I can remember were when I was curled up in bed reading straight through the encyclopedia. We wanted to have this one handy whenever the boys might reach for it. So far, though, Charles is the only one who's shown much interest." Since Jon and Pat are only

The truest help we can render to an afflicted man is not to take his burden from him, but to call out his best strength that he may be able to bear the burden. PHILLIPS BROOKS five and four, there seems some possibility that they may develop interest later.

The record of daily expenses for that same month of September, '53, carries such careful notations as: "Buttons and toy, $1.39; bread, $0.42; movies, $0.60; stamp, $0.02; Salvation Army, $2.00."

One item conspicuously missing from those former budgets is an allowance for medical and dental expenses. "We're outrageously healthy," explains Virginia, "and the only medical expenses we had back then were for the birth of the children. We had enough of our college cash left to bail Charles out, and Jon and Pat came out of the Christmas Club. But with three small children, we realized that we were living in a fallacy-type world—and had been awfully lucky!" Since 1953 they have included Med. & Dent. in the budget; they also have group health insurance. But aside from regular checkups, and the time when Charles broke his arm, they have not seen a doctor in two years.

The Collinses have recently subscribed to a food-freezer plan, whereby they are buying the freezer and regular deliveries of foods for the amount formerly spent on food alone. "I thought at first it was just high-pressure sales talk," Virginia says frankly, "but I told the man I knew exactly what I spent for food, $160 a month, and I wouldn't be interested unless he could show me that his plan would work on that figure. Well, he did—and it does!"

A great many things which are not edible come out of the food budget. Since she buys cigarettes, drugs, paper napkins and towels, soap, tooth paste, and so on, at the grocery store, Virginia includes them all. The freezer cost is $68.15 per month, of which $26 goes to pay for the freezer and the rest for food. With $28 for milk, $12 for bread and bakery products, and $52 for supplies not available under the plan, the total food expenditure (including cost of freezer) now is $160.15 per month. Virginia orders from the freezer company about every four months, the order varying ("Next time more steak, less hamburger") as she learns more about their normal four-month wants. All meat, fish, poultry, frozen and canned vegetables and fruits, jams and jellies, and juices come from the plan, which offers a wide selection. She is pleased with the system. "It's more convenient, and we eat better."

Bakery products and milk (seven gallon jugs per week) are delivered and paid for at the door. A pint of half-and-half comes with each milk delivery. "It costs thirty-three cents and is sheer luxury," says Virginia defiantly, "but Chuck never before could have cream in his coffee, and I'm determined that he's going to have it now!" She drinks coffee black.

She shops locally right after payday. "When you live far away from relatives and shouldn't afford a baby sitter, you take your children with you," she says. "You go through the trials of teaching them how to behave in a store, trying to keep track of all of them, and trying to remember what you came for. Once in two weeks is plenty! I make careful lists—both Chuck and I detest running out of things—but they don't vary much: 3 pounds coffee, 6 pounds oleo, 3 cold cereal, 2 hot cereal, 3 cartons cigarettes—Hit him back

Pat; if he hits you, hit him back!—fresh fruit and vegetables, shampoo, tooth paste, and so on. We don't run out of things." Then she adds, with clear logic, "But if I do run out, I don't admit it. Chuck's favorite meal is meat, potatoes and salad, but if I have to serve a potatoless dinner, why, I'm serving noodles because I wanted to!"

Since Chuck is paid on the first and fifteenth, Virginia plans her actual expenditures on a semimonthly basis. Payments on the mortgage, food freezer, washer and dryer, fuel, life and accident insurance, and medical and dental bills are made by check, so $127.34 (half the monthly total for these items, plus $5 extra, just in case) goes immediately into the checking account toward first-of-the-month bills.

House taxes are paid yearly, so Virginia keeps a special savings account to cover those and the insurance. She calls it the "Tax Account" and says, "Those are the only taxes we pay." Reminded of income tax, Social Security, and so on, she says firmly, "Oh, those come out before I see the money. All I count is the $301 Chuck brings home twice a month. Money we don't get just isn't money to me."

The day after payday, she goes to the bank to make seven separate deposits, including the checking account and Tax Account; they have five other savings accounts. One, in their joint names, receives $15 per payday; this is for general savings and a sort of emergency fund. ("I stole $120 from it to pay for lumber for the basement," the financial expert admits sadly, "and $10 to pay for Pat's birthday. We have only $10.27 in it now.") They started a college savings account for each son at birth, and punctiliously add $2 each payday, although Virginia insists that she does not regard the funds as sacred. "In a real crisis, I wouldn't hesitate to use the boys' money," she declares. "After all, they're members of the family too." The Christmas Club at $10 per payday adds up to $240 per year—just what they have put into it. Virginia realizes the money would draw some interest in a regular savings account, but says, "That wouldn't do for me. I could walk right up and present my book and get the money out again! This way I can't touch it all year."

The Christmas Club seldom goes for Christmas, since they usually have their presents bought by Thanksgiving. Twice it paid for babies; a year ago it furnished a family trip back East to see Virginia's parents, a trip for which she is doubly thankful now. Her mother died suddenly just two weeks after their return home. "Mother always said, 'Give me my flowers while I can smell them,'" she says quietly, "and I'll always be glad for one thing: after we got home, Chuck and I had sent her red roses."

Church contributions ($1 each Sunday, $3 per month toward the church debt) add to $7 or $8 per month, but the budget allows a bit more because something unexpected may come up. "Last month," Virginia says, "we gave $15 to missions. I had about $7 in the church fund, but the rest was 'hurt' giving—it had to come out of house money."

Chuck receives $40 a month as spending money. "That's one of the things I like best about being so well off," Virginia remarks proudly. "When we used to have to make the money stretch so far, Chuck would have to go with literally pennies for pocket money. His cigarettes and so on are figured in the budget, so except for filling the gas tank about twice a month this is just for incidental spending. But a man needs the feeling of money in his pocket!"

WHO CAN SAVE MONEY?

To stay in the black, the best place to live is where the nicest people have a little less money than you do.

Of course, spending money you can't afford gives you a terrific emotional lift. And it's true that more men have become rich trying to keep up with their living expenses than any other way. But when you live strictly within your means, you feel satisfaction and security.

The woman who likes income and outgo to balance should have an engineer or an accountant for a husband: they're the most saving.

For the man on his way up, the biggest single blessing is a saving wife.

JOHN L. HANDY
Management Consultant

She was spreading seven-minute frosting on a two-layer chocolate cake, out of the oven just long enough to cool. She bakes frequently, uses mixes for convenience, but says, "I couldn't bring myself to use, say, pastry mix, until I had proved that I could make it just as good. Same with Chuck's white shirts—I had to do them at first, just to prove I could. That's the only laundry I send out now, so I pay for them from my house money and don't budget for laundry."

Virginia works with quiet efficiency and at a speed appalling to less energetic souls, yet she never seems under pressure. "Anything you have to do over and over is simpler if you work out a system and follow it," she comments. "But I enjoy housekeeping, especially any chore where there's a mess, and I can make it sparkle." She vacuums the whole house, including moldings, every morning while the washing churns in the basement; twice a week she scrubs the vinyl-tile kitchen floor on hands and knees—"I can't poke around with a mop; it takes longer and doesn't get the floor as clean." Spots on the kitchen floor and woodwork all over the house are wiped up every day. Even with time out for reading the mail, comforting small fry and sipping a cup of coffee with a neighbor, her house is sparkling by 10:30. Mention the term "compulsive housekeeper," and Virginia laughs out loud. "When I was working, I used to shovel the joint out once a week! But this house is nice and clean to start, and it's easier to keep it that way than to do heavy cleaning by spurts."

Housework done, Virginia has time to romp with the boys, or telephone new members of the New Neighbors Club, of which she is now chairman, before starting lunch. Charles has lunch at his parochial school for $1.25 a week, but Chuck comes home, so lunch must be substantial—soup and salad, with sandwiches from the roast, or maybe stew. If Virginia wants the car for the afternoon, she has dishes washed and is ready to take him back at one. Otherwise she does dishes after he leaves. "My afternoons," she says firmly, "belong to me." She may take the boys to the park, or catch crawdads with them in the meadow, sew, read, work at the oil painting for which she shows real talent, solicit for a charity drive, do heavy chores such as cleaning cupboards or outside windows, or maybe just take a sweeping run through the meadow for the sheer fun of it. At least part of most afternoons is devoted to the club-work she enjoys, calling on or telephoning newcomers to the community. "It's so good, when you're new, to find friendship offered," she says. "When we lived in the city and couldn't afford a baby sitter, I could count my friends on one hand; but two weeks after we moved here, I had thirty-five good friends!"

One of the good friends says of Virginia, "She is—how to say it?—loving, thoughtful, but more than that. She's a positive, stimulating, active influence. Certainly others are kind and thoughtful; but Virginia didn't just think or say someone should help Mary when she came home with the new twins. She wasn't afraid of embarrassing Mary, or upsetting Mary's schedule—who has a schedule with five kids?—she just went ahead and had the other children over for lunch and after school for a week, and went to Mary's every day and brought home the diapers to wash!"

No matter what she is doing, Virginia tries to be free at 3:30, when Charles' school bus drops him off. "The younger boys have me around all the time," she explains, "but this is almost his only chance to get to me privately." Charles has a snack and milk, and Virginia settles down across the kitchen table with a cup of coffee and a cigarette. They talk about what went on at school, and what has happened at home in his absence. Sometimes, when there is something really serious to talk over, Virginia pays tribute to her oldest son's dignity by asking if he'd like a cup of coffee; then they have an "adult-type discussion."

Chuck and Virginia think seriously about the sobering fact that they will have three boys in college at the same time, and are making the best provision they can for that major expense. The college savings funds are growing. Chuck's parents pay premiums on three $500 insurance policies, payable at age eighteen, which they started for each boy at birth. Chuck and Virginia have a $1000 policy for each, payable at age twenty. When Charles reaches third grade next year, they plan to start buying a savings bond each month for him, and will do the same for the two others. "And," says Virginia serenely, "their father is a mechanical genius and a born leader. By the time they get to college, he'll be making a lot more

Get the full treatment

Give CUTICURA a Chance to Give You Lovelier Skin

You take no chances when you try Cuticura . . . hundreds of doctors, thousands of men, women, teen agers from all over the world report sensational results. See for yourself how much softer, smoother, brighter your skin can be in just 5 days when you give it the full treatment. That means—

1. Lather-massage a full minute twice daily with mild, superemollient Cuticura Soap. You'll be thrilled at the almost immediate improvement.

2. Smooth on creamy Cuticura Ointment nightly. Notice how it softens, gently stimulates, improves your skin as it eliminates blackheads, helps relieve dryness and pimples.

3. Apply greaseless, fast-acting Cuticura Medicated Liquid during the day to trouble spots to cleanse antiseptically—soothe instantly—remove excess oiliness—check blemish-spreading bacteria—speed healing—cool and refresh your skin. At leading drug counters.

Available in Canada

Cuticura

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Cuticura has said for years—
Wishing won't help your skin, Cuticura will!

money." But even if they can afford the $2500 per year which they estimate college will cost for each son, they don't plan to provide it all. Each boy will have to work to help out with his expenses. "We believe that what you attain for yourself is more lasting."

Insurance takes a good bite out of the budget, for the Collinses believe in it strongly, both for protection and for savings. In addition to the college policies they carry:

Straight life (Virginia $1500, Chuck $5000)
Sickness and accident (provides $1000 hospital care, $25 weekly benefits)
House insurance (comprehensive. $15,000 liability, $15,000 total loss, $6000 furnishings. "It covers everything," says Chuck; "fire, theft, liability. It even pays if our kids break a neighbor's window.")
Car insurance (provides $50,000 personal liability with limit $100,000; $10,000 medical payments; $10,000 property damage. They have no collision insurance. "If I bust up the old wagon, I'll hammer out the dents myself," Chuck declares.)
Mortgage insurance ("We'll get a lump payment back on this when it's paid up.")

These are in addition to the group health insurance and a special $100,000 accident policy on Chuck, paid through his company. Payments for both are withheld from his salary, so they do not appear in the budget.

"We're lucky about clothes." Virginia, busy with dinner preparations, explains the small clothing allowance. "Mother Collins likes to sew for the boys. She makes most of their shirts and pajamas, and she and Dad Collins practically keep them in clothes. Jon Collins, get your cotton-picking hands out of my biscuits! If we had to buy winter jackets and gloves and pants, we wouldn't be as wealthy as we are." Major clothing expense is for shoes; the boys used to outgrow them, but with more room to run and tear, they now wear them out. Each has a good pair for church and two older pairs for play. Charles averages five pairs a year, and the others four—if they don't lose any. Virginia checks carefully for fit, pays from $3 to $5 per pair. She buys one pair a year for herself; and Chuck, who wears safety shoes at work, needs dress shoes every two years. He wears khakis at work, too, saving wear on his suits. Virginia makes almost all her own clothes, likes skirts and blouses for casual wear. Her favorite dress is a pretty gray-and-yellow drip-dry cotton, made last year for $2.50. Her dressiest costume is a smoky gray lace with full skirt, deep décolletage, and rose velvet sash, which she bought ($22.95) in 1953. "Luckily, I stay the same shape," she comments.

The older boys had disappeared into the basement; soon talk of budgets was interrupted by a howl of mixed injury and outrage. Charles had fired his BB gun at the floor and the ricochet had struck Jon in the seat of the pants. Their mother administered swift justice: "Charles, you know your daddy's rule that you can't fire that gun in the house, except on the range he built you in the workroom; and you can't fire with another child there unless an adult is present. I'll have to take your gun, and your father will decide when you may have it back." She gave him a sharp spank, and sent him to his room to think seriously about the fact that he might have blinded his brother. Then Jon, thus far consciously righteous in the role of wounded innocent, was surprised by being sent to his room, too, because he also knew the rules!

There are other rules in the Collins family, which are understood—and mostly obeyed—by all members concerned: Grace is said before meals. Clothing is hung up, not strewn on the floor. ("Daddy, you left your pajamas in the bathroom!") Anything talked about in a family conference is private and not to be discussed with others. Nobody may use another's personal belongings without his permission. Certain tasks are to be done cheerfully because they're "family jobs"—others merit pay. The children, however, do not have assigned chores, because Virginia thinks, "It must be deadly dull for a child to know he has to do the same old thing every day! We tell the boys to do specific things—make your room neat, police the yard—and they get done."

Their system seems to work, for all the children are eager to help. Jon likes to iron handkerchiefs; Pat wants to wash dishes, and does a remarkably good job with the cutlery he is permitted to wipe. Charles empties trash, likes to mow the lawn, sometimes washes dishes by himself. Last year when Virginia had flu and Chuck was tied up at the plant, Charles, six, picked up the house and fixed meals for his brothers. Breakfast was orange juice, dry cereal and toast. Unable to handle the gallon milk jug, he resourcefully gave them water on their cereal! By lunchtime, he had figured out how to tip the jug without spilling, so lunch was peanut-butter-and-jelly sandwiches and milk.

The Collinses entertain often, but informally; they invite friends for dinner or for dessert and coffee, and the cost is absorbed in the food budget. A baby sitter is needed for the infrequent times when Chuck and Virginia go to a movie or out to dinner. Sometimes Virginia plays bridge or bowls with her women's league while Chuck stays home with the boys. He likes an occasional poker game for small stakes. But both say that their best times are quiet evenings at home, reading, watching TV, playing duets or just talking.

The absence of repair bills is explained in one sentence: "We're lucky; Chuck can fix anything." Virginia, however, is not a one-sentence girl when the subject is close to her heart. She eyes you oddly for a moment and then confides, "You know, when we were first married, I secretly thought I was smarter than my husband—it's such a comfort to know I'm not! I am so lucky to be married to Chuck."

One expense which does not show on the budget is the new typewriter. Last month the old typewriter they'd had since college broke down. Virginia was lost without it—she used it constantly for the creditable poetry and short stories she likes to write (she has never

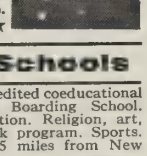
SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES

THESE ADVERTISERS WILL BE GLAD TO SEND BULLETINS AND ARRANGE PERSONAL INTERVIEWS. IN WRITING, MENTION YOUR REQUIREMENTS.

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL, 555 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 17, NEW YORK

Boys' Schools

STAUNTON MILITARY ACADEMY
In Beautiful Shenandoah Valley. Thorough college preparation; fully accredited. Individual guidance. Band. All sports. 2 gyms. Pool. Fine health record. Fireproof buildings. Separate Junior School. Illus. Catalog write Supt. S.M.A. Box J2, Staunton, Va.
BASIC COURSE R.O.T.C. BY U. S. ARMY INSTRUCTORS.



Founded 1860

The Sewanee Military Academy
Division Univ. of the South. Fully accredited. Grades 8–12. Small classes. Individual attention. Boys Taught to Study. ROTC Highest Rating. All sports; gym, indoor pool. 10,000-acre mountain domain. Episcopal. 91st year. Catalog.
Col. Craig Alderman, Supt., Box L, Sewanee, Tennessee

Riverside Military Academy
Outstanding record. ROTC. Winter at Hollywood, Fla. Accredited college preparation. Outdoor sports year round. Progress guaranteed. Reasonable all-inclusive fee. Separate Junior High, grades 7–8. Illustrated Catalog, address:
Gen. Sandy Beaver, Pres., Box 501-L, Gainesville 5, Ga.

Greenbrier Military School
146th yr. The School of Achievement. 7th & 8th grades & H.S. and P.G. Dept. ROTC. 2300 ft. elev. White Sulphur Springs' golf & swim pool. Modern gym & new Rifle range. Athletics. Band, Glee Club. Summer Camp. For Catalog write
D. T. Moore, Box J-602, Lewisburg 6, W. Va.

McDonogh A leading preparatory school for boys. Grades 1–12. Accredited. Prepares for all colleges, service academies. Small classes. Individual guidance. Music. Dairy and animal husbandry. Semi-military. Sports. 80 horses; 2 gyms, indoor pool. 835-acre country campus near Baltimore. Est. 1873. Catalog.
Robert L. Lamborn, Ed.D., Box 117, McDonogh, Maryland

FORK UNION MILITARY ACADEMY
★ Our ONE SUBJECT PLAN of study in Upper School (grades 9–12) has increased honor roll 50%. Develops concentration. Fully accredited. ROTC highest rating. 17 modern buildings, 2 completely equipped gyms, 2 indoor pools. Splendid environment, excellent health record. Junior School (grades 4–8) has separate buildings, gym, pool. Housemothers. 60th year. For ONE SUBJECT PLAN booklet and catalog write:
Dr. J. C. Wicker, Box 862, Fork Union, Va.

Coeducational Schools

Oakwood School An accredited coeducational Friends Boarding School. Grades 9-12. Strong college preparation. Religion, art, music; shop, typing. Guidance. Work program. Sports. Social activities. Country campus 75 miles from New York City. Founded 1796. Catalog:
C. J. Hutton, Principal, Poughkeepsie, New York. GLobe 4-9400

Wayland Academy Near Milwaukee, Chicago. Coed. College prep. Grades 9–12. Fully accredited. Limited enrollment, individual attention. Christian environment. Graduates in leading colleges. Drama, music, speech. Athletics for all. 2 gyms, pool. Winter sports. Ice Carnival. Dorms. Est. 1855. Catalog.
R. A. Patterson, Hdm., Box 87, Beaver Dam, Wisc.

Home Study Schools

Calvert School You can educate your child at home with famous Calvert School-At-Home Courses. Kindergarten—9th grade. Accredited. Easy-to-follow teaching manual; lessons, books, supplies. No experience needed. Guidance by Calvert teachers. Start any time. 52nd year. Catalog. Give age, school grade.
Calvert School, 852 E. Tuscany Rd., Baltimore 10, Md.

National School of Dress Design
Approved supervised home study training. Fine starting point for career. No classes. No wasted time. Text and work kit furnished. Diploma awarded. Low tuition and payments. Send for free booklet.
835 Diversey Parkway, Dept. 1372, Chicago 14, Ill.

HIGH SCHOOL at HOME
You can still finish High School—at home, in your spare time. No interference with job, or social life. Win more pay, a better job, social recognition. Take only the subjects you need. Complete lesson and answer service. Personalized instruction. Low cost. Diploma to graduates.
I.C.S. is oldest and largest (257 courses). Write today for 3 free books: (1) 36-page "How to Succeed," (2) sample lesson (Math), (3) Career Catalogue—indicate course desired.
INTERNATIONAL CORRESPONDENCE SCHOOLS
SCRANTON 15, PENNA. DEPT. 39196A

Chicago School of Interior Decoration
Home study training. Approved and supervised. Fine starting point for career. No classes. No wasted time. Text and work kit furnished. Diploma awarded. Send for free booklet.
Chicago School of Interior Decoration, 835 Diversey Pkwy., Dept. 1372, Chicago 14.

American School High School at Home. Many Finish in 2 Years. Go rapidly your time and abilities permit. Prepares for college entrance exams. Standard H.S. texts supplied. Diploma awarded. Credit for H.S. subjects already completed. Single subjects if desired. Free Bulletin.
American School, Dept. H23, Drexel at 58th, Chicago 37

VALLEY FORGE MILITARY ACADEMY
"At the Nation's Shrine" Prepare your boy to enter leading colleges and at the same time be trained for a commission in the Armed Services. Small classes, highest academic standards. Prep, School and Jr. College, fully accredited; ages 12-20. All sports. Arty., Cav., Infantry, Band, Senior Division ROTC. Catalog. Radnor Rd., Wayne, Pa.

Worcester Academy Boys prepared for increasingly difficult college entrance exams. Graduates in engineering, scientific schools. Grades 8–12. Preference given younger boys college pressure requires thorough prep. Only few 1-yr. boys accepted. Nat'l. enrlmt. Est. 1834. Sports. Headmaster.
William S. Piper, Jr., 105 Providence St., Worcester, Mass.

Tilton School Thorough college preparation. Grades 8–12. Builds character, responsibility, leadership. Small classes, understanding masters, stimulating instruction. Large gym. Extensive sports program for all. Outing Club, Glee Club, Debating, Mod. tuition. Est. 1845. Early application advised. Catalog.
J. Gordon Jeffries, Dean, Box D, Tilton, N. H.

Carson Long
Military School. Educates the whole boy—physically, mentally, spiritually. How to learn, how to labor, how to live. Prepares for college and life. Grades 6–12. 122nd year of character building. Rate $1275.00.
Box 10, New Bloomfield, Pa.

New York Military Academy
Develops today's Youth for tomorrow's world by building mind, body, character, leadership. R.O.T.C. Graduates all colleges. Infantry, Aeronautics, Artillery. Band scholarships. Grades 1–12. Catalog. Est. 1889.
17 Academy Ave., Cornwall-on-Hudson, N. Y.

Ohio Military Institute Ohio's only military academy. Brings out the best in your boy. Large faculty—small classes. Upper school certifies to colleges. Lower school for boys 7–11. High, healthful, wooded 52-acre campus. Est. 1832. Sports, music, rifle club. Moderate tuition. Catalog, write:
5571 Belmont Avenue, College Hill, Cincinnati 24, O.

Missouri Military Academy and Separate Junior School. 69th year. Grades 5–12. Fully accredited. Essentially College Preparatory. Senior ROTC. Friendly and inspiring teachers. Small classes. Strong guidance program. All sports. Riding. Golf. 5 athletic fields. 226 acre campus. Catalog.
Col. C. R. Stribling, 128 Main Street, Mexico, Missouri

Medical Technology

Franklin School of Science & Arts
Nationally famous for thorough training in Medical Technology—12 months; X-Ray Technology—6 months; Medical Secretary—12 months. Top paying positions waiting. Coed. Free Placements. Approved. Founded 1919. Send for Catalog A.
251 S. 22nd St., Phila. 3, Pa.

Fine & Applied Arts

Ray-Vogue Schools
Fashion Merchandising with Modeling. Dress Design, Fashion Illustration. Interior Decoration, Commercial Art; Photography. Coed. Attractive residence for girls. Enter Feb. 3; Mar. 3. Write Registrar, Room 706. Specify course.
Ray-Vogue Schools, 706 North Michigan Ave., Chicago 11

Choosing the right school takes time and careful consideration.

If you have a school problem, or one arising in the near future, you are invited to send for catalogs now.

The next step is to arrange appointments with the schools that seem to meet your requirements, visit them, meet members of the staff and observe the student and campus activities.

Parents and students will find it most helpful to begin investigations well in advance of entrance dates.

Schools and Camps, Ladies' Home Journal, 555 Fifth Ave., New York 17, N. Y.

Junior Colleges

Nichols Junior College For Men, Executive Courses in Business Administration, leading to degree. Conservation Forestry Courses. 1500-acre forest. An investment in Education. Unexcelled location. 200-acre country campus. Modern dorms. All sports. Limited enrollment. James L. Conrad, Pres., Nichols Junior College, Dudley 6, Mass.

Vermont College A two-year college for 300 women. Terminal, transfer courses. Associate degrees. Liberal arts, pre-professional, home ec., art, nursery teaching, secretarial, medical sec'l, medical tech., general. Spacious hilltop campus in Vermont's winter recreational area. 16 bldgs. Glee Club, choir. Est. 1834. Catalog.
R. H. Noble, Pres., Montpelier, Vt.

Cazenovia Junior College Awards A.A. and A.A.S. degrees. Liberal arts, science, merchandising, nursery school, medical illustration; chemical, foreign, legal, medical and general secretarial; physical education, music, art. Year 'round sports. In lakes region near Syracuse. Founded 1824. Catalog.
Director of Admissions, Box A, Cazenovia, N. Y.

Pa. School of Horticulture
Stimulating careers for out-of-door girls. H.S. grads study Floriculture, Landscape Design, or Agriculture. Jr. College level. Lib. Arts plus tech training & experience. Greenhouses, gardens, farm. Nr. Phila. Social activities, riding, etc. Job aid.
J. W. French, Box L, Ambler, Pa.

Greenbrier College Junior College & 2 yrs. High School. In healthful Alleghenies. 146th year. Liberal Arts and Career Courses. Sec'l., Mds'g., Music, Art, Dramatics. Sports and recreations at famous Greenbrier Hotel. Personal guidance. Fireproof suites.
Addah Belle McClaskey, Director of Admissions, Box L, Lewisburg, W. Va.

SULLINS
Distinguished Junior College for Young Women
Accredited. All major liberal arts and career courses. Outstanding social program. All sports. Own stable. Lake. Indoor pool. Golf. Est. 1870. Catalog.
Wm. T. Martin, Pres., Box J, Bristol, Va.

Girls' Schools

Mary A. Burnham School For Girls, 81st year. Graduates are mature, poised, thoroughly prepared for college. Fully accredited. Music, art emphasized. Traditional campus life. National enrollment. Riding, skiing, swimming, all sports. Summer School. Newport, R.I. Catalogs. Mrs. George Waldo Emerson, Box 43-X, Northampton, Mass.

Oak Grove A Friends' School for Girls. Emphasizes Preparation for College and Gracious, Purposeful Living. Music, Art, Speech. Grades 7–12. Broadening interests of international enrollment. Riding included. Indoor ring. Winter Sports Featured under Experts. Beautiful new fireproof Quadrangle.
Mr. and Mrs. Robert Owen, Box 128, Vassalboro, Maine

Penn Hall Junior College
192 acres in Blue Ridge Mts. Terminal or transfer courses. Lib. Arts, Home Ec., Music, Art, Merchandising, Radio, Sec'l. Lab. Tech., Med. Sec'l. Also Prep School Division. Modern buildings. Pool, riding, golf on campus. Trips.
Dr. C. Gordon Frantz, Pres., Box W, Chambersburg, Pa.

Music School

Sherwood Music School Train for a successful music career. Two- and three-year certificate courses and four-year degree courses. Faculty of distinguished musicians. Member Nat. Assn. Schls. Mus. State accredited. Coed. Well-equipped building on lakefront. Dormitory for women. Founded 1895. Write for catalog.
1014 S. Michigan Ave., Chicago 5, Ill.

Business & Secretarial

BRYANT COLLEGE B. S. DEGREE IN 2 or 3 YEARS
Business Administration: majors in Accounting, Management, Marketing. Executive Secretarial: majors in Administrative, Legal, Accounting, Medical. Business Teacher-Education: 4 years. Also 1-year Secretarial Diploma. Coed. Campus life in attractive environment. 25 buildings. Dorms. Veteran approved. 95th year. Register early. September and February entrance. Professional training for business leadership. For catalog write: RUTH WEST
BRYANT COLLEGE, PROVIDENCE 6, RHODE ISLAND

Wood Secretarial School
Courses for H.S., Private School grads and College women. Air-conditioned. Accredited by State Educ. Dept. Guidance, placement service. Dorm. 79th year. Enroll now for Feb., July or Sept. Catalog.
Enrollment Sec'y, 125 Park Ave., (100 E. 42 St., opp. Grand Central), N. Y. 17. OX 7-1290

Chandler School For women. Professional secretarial training combined with advantages of living-in-Boston available to H. S. graduates. 2-yr. Medical, Legal, Executive courses. 1-yr. skills course. Resident facilities with cultural, social program at Franklin Square House. Write for catalog.
Dr. G. I. Rohrbough, Pres., 440 Beacon St., Boston 15, Mass.

Katharine Gibbs Secretarial. Outstanding training. Three practical courses: One-Year Secretarial, Liberal Arts-Secretarial (two years), Special Course for College Women. Residences. For catalog write:
Admissions Dean, Boston 16, 21 Marlborough St.; New York 17, 230 Park Ave.; Montclair, N.J., 33 Plymouth St.; Providence 6, 155 Angell St.

Children far from home?

The telephone keeps them close

With the children grown up and no longer at home, regular telephone visits will help keep them close to you.

There's something so reassuring about hearing their voices, to find out if all is well with them.

Don't wonder. Don't worry. Call today and be sure.

LONG DISTANCE RATES ARE LOW

Station-to-Station Calls

For example:	First 3 Minutes	Each Added Minute
Newark, N.J., to Boston	60¢	15¢
Minneapolis to Chicago	80¢	20¢
Milwaukee to Pittsburgh	90¢	25¢
Atlanta to Cleveland	$1.00	25¢
Kansas City to New York	$1.45	40¢

These rates apply nights after six and all day Sunday. Add the 10% federal excise tax.

BELL TELEPHONE SYSTEM

Call by Number. It's Twice as Fast.

sent any to a publisher), and for frequent long letters to friends and family. She investigated renting a typewriter, found rental would cost $6 per month, while she could buy it for $8.66 monthly. "I can't afford it," she says, "but it's such a joy to use, I bought it anyway. Now I have to find that money—maybe I'll sell another painting, or if I have to I'll use the 'extra' in the checking account."

Asked "How do you feel about installment buying?" she says vehemently, "It's a booby trap, an additional price tag, a godsend! We were booby-trapped in our early innocence by one of those time-pay plans, where you pay so much a month and your credit keeps extending. Well, it took us forever to get out of that, and never again! But when you're realistic about your limitations, installment buying can be a blessing. Without it I couldn't have a washer and dryer, freezer, typewriter, dining-room table—all items I can do without, but which make my life more pleasant. Please notice that I said my life—Chuck gets no direct benefit from any of those things, but, bless his heart, he insists that they're important."

There was a bang as the garage door below opened, and the car drove in. Then the door from the basement was thrown wide—Chuck was home. From three directions, boys launched themselves at him, while Virginia smiled from the range. Pat had an important drawing to show him. "What is it?" Chuck asked. "It's a fnake." "What's a fnake?" "Oh, daddy. You know. It's a fnake!" "Would it," asked Virginia, stepping into the breach, "be a caterpillar-type fnake?" Pat beamed, "Yeah! It's a cattyfiller-type fnake."

Pretending to struggle against overwhelming odds, Chuck allowed himself to be dragged into the living room for a roughhouse. In no time at all he was pinned firmly to the rug, with Charles holding down his shoulders, Pat sitting on his head, and Jon straining to take his shoes off so he could tickle his feet. "Try" as he would, Chuck couldn't move; then with a sudden twitch, he sent boys tumbling in wild laughter. This was repeated until Chuck said, "That's enough. You boys get washed for dinner. I want to tell your mother something." He had hardly begun his story when they were back from their bathroom with clean hands, itching for action. Chuck, trying to talk through a wriggling swarm of boys, finally gave up. "Oh, skip it," he told Virginia. "I'll tell you after they're married!"

A SERMON

By JOHN CIARDI

As a fish slips water; a hawk, air from unwavering fin and wing.
As rain shapes to its falling. As tiger and mantis blend to the natural world, self-stealing, self-defending—

I will believe theologies of fern and systems of great flowing.
How shall earth
cool from its sun and Mozart not arrive?
I preach inevitable sky.

And the foregone naked children brought to the purity of their own thought from the great imperfections of the race,
whose parents are self-murdered and self-maimed.

Dinner at the Collins home is usually a family affair. Sometimes, however, Virginia feeds the boys early, with Charles presiding and saying grace; then they play quietly in their rooms (Charles does homework) while their parents enjoy dinner alone. "Virginia thought that one up," says Chuck appreciatively, "but I like it! And the boys understand perfectly—after all, they don't want us messing around every minute either! Virginia and I have almost as close a private relationship as we did before the boys were born."

Tonight is a family dinner, and with the chocolate cake in view, plates are cleaned with no prompting. Chuck and the boys do some important work in the basement while dishes are cleared. ("A man's place in the kitchen," Virginia thinks, "is sitting at the table talking to his wife!") Virginia finds a moment with each son at bedtime; soon the boys are asleep and their parents are relaxed in the living room—Chuck in the rocker and Virginia on the sofa with shoes off and feet tucked under.

They enjoy talking about ideas and ideals, about problems and hopes, about future plans and present activities. Both say stanchly that they never quarrel.

"Words said in anger can be so hurtful, so scarifying," Virginia says, "and they can never be taken back. If I'm just burned up I slam a door! And you should have heard what my ever-lovin' husband yelled at me the other night. He was painting the basement stair wall, and I forgot and tossed down a soiled tablecloth for the laundry—smack against his fresh paint!" She giggles. "But it cleared the air, and we laughed about it a minute later. Neither of us is capable of holding a grudge."

"I should have swatted you one!" remarks her ever-loving husband.

Asked what they want their sons to be, Chuck says, "We'd like them to know their religion, have a good education, with discipline, grow up to be intelligent, good men. I think of what they'll be as teen-agers. I know one thing! I won't stand for duck-tail haircuts and smart-aleck stuff! But I think if respect and righteousness are instilled in them now, it will grow with them."

"If you mean professions," Virginia adds, "what right have we to assume that we have a doctor, lawyer, Indian chief in the making? That's up to them."

(The youngsters themselves have clear ideas about the future. Right now, Charles wants to be an engineer on a locomotive. Jon's highest ambition is to live in a tree. Pat, at this stage, is a great "me too" man; he wants whatever the others want.)

Next question: "If you had young friends about to be married, what advice would you give them for achieving a happy marriage?"

Virginia chortles, "I'd tell them that a bed with a plastic headboard is a very foolish buy for a teething baby!"

"We probably should not tell them anything," Chuck comments. "What works for us might not be right for them. But in our marriage—we think it's a good one!—everything is fifty-fifty, and each has an equal standing. I respect Virginia's wishes and judgment and she respects mine. We live as equals." He eyes his wife fondly. "We're suited to each other."

"You can call it fifty-fifty," puts in Virginia, "but it's more eighty-twenty; we each give more than we expect—and get more than we give! I guess if I were defining a happy marriage it would be about like this: each one being completely self-reliant—and having the other to lean on! It means having three wonderful boys close together—and being glad when they finally go to bed. Oh, and looking forward to five o'clock, when Chuck comes home. He sits in the kitchen and tells me about his day and really wants to know about mine. And the quick wit and humor of the man. We've always had so much fun! Maybe that's the essence of a happy marriage—having fun together. I don't agree with that expression the JOURNAL uses: 'Making Marriage Work.' Marriage isn't work—it's fun!"

"We're lucky," Chuck sums up. "We've never had any serious illnesses, nor any money problems. No real trouble. Real trouble is something you can't handle, and we've always managed to handle whatever has come up."

"We're lucky," is a frequent expression when Chuck and Virginia talk about themselves. But to the interested observer it seems clear that through their optimism, humor, courage, and deep faith in each other, the Collinses largely make their own luck! END

Printed in U.S.A.

LADIES' HOME

JOURNAL

MARCH 1958
35c

FE 17
SURLI E
UBLIC ARY

THE MAGAZINE WOMEN BELIEVE IN

CHANEL CREATES SUITS, HATS, ACCESSORIES FOR THE JOURNAL
COLOR PAGES By WILHELA CUSHMAN

EXTRA-DIVIDEND HOUSE THAT GROWS
WITH THE FAMILY ... 9 PAGES
OF THE JOURNAL'S PORTFOLIO HOUSE

SEARCH FOR AMELIA
CONDENSED NOVEL
COMPLETE-IN-THIS-ISSUE

RARELY SEEN PICASSOS, GAUGUINS, MATISSES
FROM RUSSIA'S ART MUSEUMS
6 PAGES IN COLOR

HOW MANY CLOTHES DOES IT TAKE TO BE ONE OF AMERICA'S 10 BEST-DRESSED WOMEN?
All the fascinating details ... d e

NOT A WHISPER OF BAD BREATH WITH NEW IPANA

...its distinct taste tells you so

• New Ipana® Tooth Paste with germ-killing WD-9 prevents bad breath. Use it regularly. Ipana's distinct taste and refreshing after-taste tell you it cleans your entire mouth.

• Ipana with WD-9 actually has twice the decay-germ killing power of any other leading tooth paste. So it can help your children fight tooth decay effectively, too.

ipana® TOOTH PASTE

Look for the BIG cap— only on NEW Ipana

Another fine product of Bristol-Myers

New Palmolive Soap Gives New Life to Your Complexion!

BECAUSE NEW PALMOLIVE SOAP BRINGS OUT BEAUTY WHILE IT CLEANS YOUR SKIN!

There's never been a beauty soap like this before . . . not even Palmolive. Think of the softest, creamiest lather. It's yours in New Palmolive. Rich white lather that soothes as it cleans . . . helps your true complexion beauty come through. And daily Palmolive care gently washes away dirt and make-up . . . cleanses so thoroughly, it actually gives your complexion new life.

Think of the most fabulous French perfumes! They inspired New Palmolive's haunting fragrance which leaves your skin so fresh, so clean, so heaven-scented.

Best of all, New Palmolive's mildness and gentleness make it right for every age, every type of skin!

All New! lather fragrance color wrapper

Today's Palmolive is the Dream Soap of Tomorrow

Ladies' Home Journal

CONTENTS

VOL. LXXV NO. 3

March, 1958

JOURNALITIES

Margery Sharp

MARGERY SHARP is not new to these pages, but this photograph, in which she looks like one of her own heroines, is. The author of such delightful novels as The Nutmeg Tree, Cluny Brown, The Flowering Thorn and Britannia Mews is usually up to something, and this time it's The Amethyst Cat, the short story on page 60. "My childhood was spent in Malta," she reports. "I was a virtuous infant, good at all kindergarten studies. Once when I blotted my copybook I was kept in to write twenty times, 'I must not play with ink.' I have been playing with ink ever since. At college in England I failed to win the First Class Honors expected of me because of total ignorance of Medieval French, for which I had no use at the time—I can't think why."

D. K. Findlay

"I have been married for twenty-seven years," D. K. FINDLAY tells us, "to the same wife who says it seems like twenty-seven years. There are days when I am tidy, polite and industrious, and there are days when I am not. We live in Ottawa, Canada, in sight of the Gatineau Hills where we have a ski cabin. We have four children, two of each kind, and we are a snow-and-water family. In the summer we are on the water or in it and in the winter we are on the snow or under it." At other times he is about to write a story, or is writing it, and Search for Amelia, on page 58, is one he says, "just got going and turned out to be a novel."

M. H. Davis

A terse but informative note from M. H. DAVIS (Don't Get in My Way, page 62) reads: "Maggie Davis was born in Norfolk, Virginia, went to school in New York City and now lives in Jonesboro, Georgia, on a forty-acre farm which is part of a Civil War battlefield. Her husband, an engineer, is employed in Atlanta. The rest of the Davis family consists of Stuart, twelve; Richard, ten; David, four; and Cambren, two. The implement covered by the children in the picture is a hayrake."

Condensed Novel Complete in This Issue

SEARCH FOR AMELIA, D. K. Findlay . 58

Stories

THE AMETHYST CAT, Margery Sharp . 60
DON'T GET IN MY WAY, M. H. Davis . 62
THE GREENGAGE SUMMER (Conclusion), Rumer Godden . 82

Special Features

IS MORALITY "NORMAL"?, Dorothy Thompson . 11
"KEEP HIM IN BED FOR A COUPLE OF DAYS LONGER"—BUT HOW?, Benjamin Spock, M.D. . 26
VOLUNTEERS BRING FUN AND ART . 37
MUSEUMS FOR EVERYBODY, Margaret Hickey . 37
HOW NEUROTIC ARE YOU?, John E. Gibson . 47
AMERICA'S BEST-DRESSED WOMEN, Laura Date Riley . 64
ART MASTERPIECES FROM RUSSIAN MUSEUMS . 66
CAN THIS MARRIAGE BE SAVED?, Dorothy Cameron Disney . 95
HOW AMERICA LIVES:
OUR TEEN-AGE DRUG ADDICTS, Margaret Parton and Mary Ann MacKaye . 173
THE WAY DOWN . . . AND BACK Margaret Parton . 176

General Features

OUR READERS WRITE US . 4
UNDER COVER, Bernardine Kielty . 34
THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE, Harlan Miller . 44
MAKING MARRIAGE WORK, Clifford R. Adams, Ph.D. . 50
FIFTY YEARS AGO ▪ JOURNAL ABOUT TOWN . 57
THIS IS A GRUBBY, Munro Leaf . 153
ASK ANY WOMAN, Marcelene Cox . 158

Fashion and Beauty

CHANEL CREATES FOR THE JOURNAL, Wilhela Cushman . 72
EVERY INCH A FASHION, Ruth Mary Packard . 76
YOUR PRETTY HEAD TURNS TO ACCESSORIES, Wilhela Cushman . 78
PRINTS FROM HEAD TO TOE, Nora O'Leary . 80
STRETCH FOR BEAUTY, Dawn Crowell Norman . 84
HOW TO DRESS WELL ON PRACTICALLY NOTHING!, Bet Hart . 147

Food

SWISS STEAK, SAVORY AND TENDER . 96
COLLECTOR'S ITEMS: FISH . 98
A BIRD IN THE PAN, Irma Goodrich Mazza . 127
CANDY EASTER EGGS . 136

Architecture, Gardening and Interior Decoration

JOURNAL'S PORTFOLIO HOUSE No. 7: EXTRA DIVIDEND HOUSE . 86
OUR LIVING ROOM'S PROFIT: PORCH AND GARDEN EXTENSIONS . 88
OUR DINING ROOM'S DIVIDEND: LIBRARY AND STUDY ROOM . 90
OUR KITCHEN'S ASSET: 11 FEET OF CONTINUOUS COUNTER . 92
OUR HALL'S GAIN: LAUNDRY, WORK AND PLAY SPACE . 94
WHAT DOES THE GARDENER DO IN SPRING?, The Gardener's Assistant . 186

Poems

HOUSEBROKE, Georgie Starbuck Galbraith . 20
TO A LOST CHILD, Hannah Kahn . 120
ON THE TIP OF THE TONGUE, Suzanne Douglass . 140
I, BEING WOMAN, Nancy Hunter . 163
VISITOR, Marjorie Lederer Lee . 183
THE SOUND OF GREEN, Paul Engle . 188
SONG FOR A SECOND CHILD, Gladys McKee . 200

Cover Photograph by Wilhela Cushman

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

At least 30 days before a change is to take effect please send your complete name, new address and a mailing label from a recent issue. If this is not possible, write out your old address and send it with the new one, including zone number. Address the Ladies' Home Journal, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. The post office will not forward copies unless you provide necessary postage. Duplicate copies cannot be sent.

Ladies' Home Journal, © 1958 The Curtis Publishing Company in U.S. and Great Britain. All rights reserved. Title registered in U.S. Patent Office and foreign countries. Published on last Friday of month preceding date by The Curtis Publishing Company, Independence Square, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office at Philadelphia, Pa. Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa, Canada, by Curtis Distributing Company, Ltd., Toronto, Ont., Canada.

The names of characters in all stories are fictitious. Any resemblance to living persons is a coincidence.

Subscription Prices: U.S., U.S. Possessions and Canada—1 Yr., $3.50; 2 Yrs., $6; 3 Yrs., $8.50; 4 Yrs., $11. Costa Rica, Cuba, Dominican Republic, Guatemala, Haiti, Mexico, Nicaragua, Panama, Republic of Honduras, Salvador, Spain and South America (except the Guianas)—1 Yr., $4. All other countries—1 Yr., $7. Remit by Money Order or Draft on a bank in the U.S. payable in U.S. Funds. All prices subject to change without notice.

Unconditional Guaranty. We agree upon request direct from subscribers to the Philadelphia office, to refund the full amount paid for any copies of Curtis publications not previously mailed.

The Curtis Publishing Company. Robert E. MacNeal, President; Mary Curtis Zimbalist, Sr. Vice Pres.; Cary W. Bok, Sr. Vice Pres.; Benjamin Allen, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Circulation; Donald M. Hobart, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Research; Edward C. Von Tress, Sr. Vice Pres. and Director of Advertising; Brandon Barringer, Treasurer; Robert Gibbon, Secretary; Richard Ziesing, Jr., Vice Pres. and Advertising Director of Ladies' Home Journal. The Company also publishes The Saturday Evening Post, Jack and Jill, and Holiday.

Now...for the first time

A special laxative for women!

Sure, gentle, more normal relief... even after childbirth and during menstrual periods

Correctol is an entirely new type of laxative...developed to meet women's special constipation problems in a special way.

The secret of Correctol is a non-laxative, miracle regulator—with a wonderful, harmless action that simply softens waste. Along with this, Correctol contains a small amount of mild laxative—just enough to give regularity a start.

Correctol acts promptly, but unhurriedly. It gives the relief a woman wants and needs...in a gentle, more natural way.

Try this new feminine laxative. Get Correctol today—to have these tiny pink tablets when you need them. 30 tablets, $1.00—at any drug store. Also available everywhere in Canada.

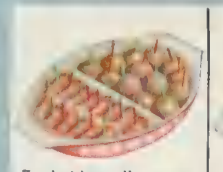
Correctol®

SATISFACTION OR A REFUND OF MONEY
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

the first laxative especially for feminine use

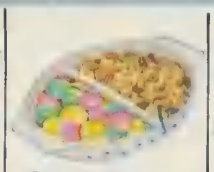
new!
2 beautiful, useful PYREX® dishes!

Use DISH AND COVER for entertaining (candied crab apples and relish in cover, vegetables and mashed potatoes in dish)



CINDERELLA DIVIDED SERVING DISH

with divided clear Pyrex top!



At your favorite store now! Lets you serve 4 different foods!

Decorator colors: turquoise, white or charcoal with snowflakes; pink with daisies. 1½ qt., $2.95

Look at all the wonderful uses for this unusual new PYREX dish!

For hot hors d'oeuvres (cocktail sausages; chili balls)

For nuts and candies, all kinds of snacks

For desserts (fresh berries; whipped cream)

For cocktail shrimp (with Tabasco type sauce and lemon)

LOVELY CINDERELLA OVAL OPEN BAKER

cook, serve, freeze with this graceful new Pyrex dish. A gay new note for your table—a wonderful convenience for all your meal-making. Food cooks better, looks better in Pyrex beauties!

Pink with white daisies; turquoise, white or charcoal with snowflakes. 1½ qt., $1.95

THERE'S ONLY ONE PYREX® BRAND WARE, A PRODUCT OF CORNING GLASS WORKS, CORNING, NEW YORK

VISIT THE CORNING GLASS CENTER, CORNING, N.Y. CORNING MEANS RESEARCH IN GLASS

OUR READERS WRITE US

When is Love Wrong?

Columbus, Ohio

"When is Love Wrong?" moved me very deeply. As I read the story—safe, happy, loved and secure behind the socially accepted cloak of domesticity and a normal married life—my heart kept whispering, "There, but for the grace of God, go I." I could only look at my three small children and breathe a prayer of thankfulness for God's goodness to me . . . and at the same time ask Him to comfort and guide that girl and all girls who find themselves in a similar position. Although my husband and I did not have an illicit affair, I remember how much in love we were and how "right" it might have seemed.

MRS. JIM LONG

Grandview, Missouri

I would point out that the title is as wrong as is the girl of whom you write. Sex is not necessarily love. It is within recent years that the expression "making love" has been used for sexual intercourse, and I fail to see how any honest adult can agree that the expressions are synonymous. My generation tried to teach our daughters what we were taught—that no man could really love a girl and ask her to ruin her life to satisfy his lust. These are old-fashioned phrases today, and they didn't always work. But I sincerely believe that older generations were less confused.

MRS. ALFRED R. MUNDAY

Somewhere in New Jersey

In our back yard at the moment is a baby girl fast asleep; and down in the playroom is a little boy just three years old. The two reasons why our life is so much more worth while than it was a few years ago—our two adopted children. I can't help believing that any unmarried mother might feel a little better if she knew how much happiness her child was bringing to someone else, and how much the child was loved.

Name Withheld

Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania

I am an unwed mother who kept her child. And I fear no hell after death, for I've had mine here on earth. Let no man or girl deceive herself—hell hath no punishment like the treatment people give a "fallen woman." The heartache, tortured thoughts, recriminations, fear, loneliness could not be put on paper. Neither can the scorn, insult and actual hate of self-righteous and ignorant people. I am not writing for sympathy. But I do wish people would understand that not all women are fortunate enough to be born in really good, God-fearing families. And that there is nothing so heartbreaking as to hear a child say, "Mommy, don't I have a daddy?"

Name Withheld

Encino, California

It is not so easy to keep a child. You cannot get a job, for example, without previous data on yourself and a Social Security card and number. Then, too, the world is small. In a city of millions you will run into a familiar face on the street. Someone is always around to tell the child—no father! Born out of wedlock! To get around all this is an insurmountable problem—and especially to those who are already worried, feeling guilty, and unable to think straight.

Name Withheld

A small town in New Jersey

I, too, gave up my child for adoption. And there is just one thing I want to say to some of your editors: being an unwed mother is a deep problem full of emotional conflicts; and one point so often overlooked is that we who give our children up for adoption do so out of love. I loved my son enough for him to have a father and mother and a happy, secure life. If your love is great enough, you are willing

CONTINUED ON PAGE 53

Pamela's Common-Sense Book of Baby Care

Our youthful author, famous for her emotional approach to the problem at hand, has devoted her life to research in the field of child-parent relationships.

ELIZABETH SHERMAN SWING

"Comfort a miserable baby if you can."[1]

"You need only wash the outer ear, not the canal."[2]

"If you treat him nicely, he won't take advantage of you."[3]

"You aren't going to wean him to the cup right away."[4]

"You get the bubble up by holding him against your shoulder."[5]

1. Benjamin Spock, Pocket Book of Baby and Child Care, p. 112. 2. Ibid., p. 88. 3. Ibid., p. 18. 4. Ibid., p. 175. 5. Ibid., p. 79.

The cleanest clean under the sun –

New Tide Clean!

NEW TIDE

with RESERVE CLEANING POWER

. . . wonderful extra cleaning power to get your whole wash clean and fresh as a desert sky. What a beautiful sight when your wash is done! Everything, even problem wash comes out more than bright, more than white . . . really clean! So clean smelling, too . . . with a fresh air and sunshine cleanness you'll love. Yes, the cleanest clean possible is new Tide clean!

"Lose 5 pounds in 5 seconds? How?"

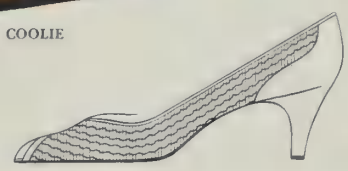
Easy, darling! Just slip into TRU-LIFT by Warner's

First girdle ever to act the way tummy muscles should but don't

You don't want to be fashion-model skinny—but you would like to lose 5 pounds. Especially from your (dare we say it?) tummy. Why not make the least of it, darling—with Warner's® new TRU-LIFT?

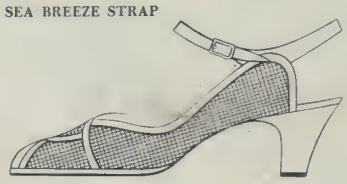
TRU-LIFT, you see, is the first and only girdle that lifts tummy-bulge up, then holds it in. How? With three darts placed on either side of the girdle's front panel. They slant from straight-across to on-the-bias. That's how they lift, control, position . . . banishing bulges . . . freeing you from the tyranny of added inches.

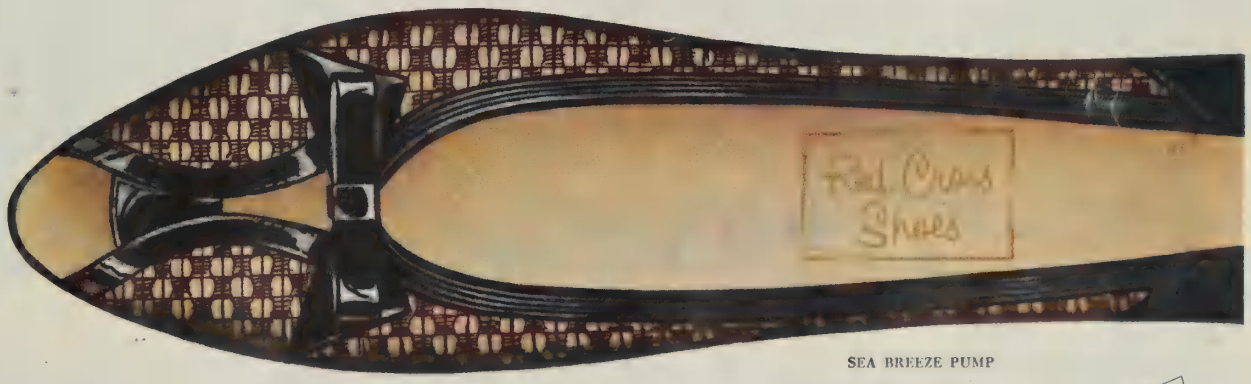
Why ever eat cottage cheese again when you can lose 5 pounds in 5 seconds with TRU-LIFT? And a-h-h, the airy ease of it!—light as a little girl's laugh, gentle enough to keep you comfortable through the longest committee meeting. At your nicest stores. If not, just write Warner's at Bridgeport 1, Conn.



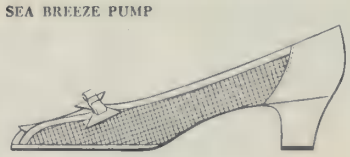
#562-563. Tru-Lift girdle with stretch back; all power net. White $10.95. #565. Matching Tru-Lift pantie. White. $12.50.

Suit by Davidow ■ Hat by Mr. John





COOLIE



SEA BREEZE STRAP

SEA BREEZE PUMP

Red Cross Shoes

FEATURED IN CANADA AS GOLD CROSS SHOES

Spring magic with lace

You're so right to love the flattery of pretty lace. It's so much a part of spring . . . and so feminine, so fashion-wise in these light and lovely Red Cross Shoes. Here are not only new and exciting designs, but new slender lines and shapely silhouettes—all with that simply fabulous fit you find only in beautiful Red Cross Shoes.

Largest selling brand of fine footwear in the world. Styles from 10^{95} to 13^{95}

THIS PRODUCT HAS NO CONNECTION WHATEVER WITH THE AMERICAN NATIONAL RED CROSS • THE UNITED STATES SHOE CORPORATION, CINCINNATI 7, OHIO

BUFFERIN® relieves painful cold miseries twice as fast!

Di-Alminate makes the difference

1. All leading pain remedies, including other compounds, rely on aspirin! But . . .

2. Aspirin without antacid is relatively slow-acting. It is acid and can irritate your stomach.

3. Only Bufferin adds to aspirin an exclusive combination of antacids called "Di-Alminate." These speed the pain reliever into the blood stream twice as fast as aspirin. So Bufferin relieves pain twice as fast as aspirin!

Won't upset your stomach as aspirin often does!

Drippy days are minor discomforts compared to the aches and pains that plague a cold sufferer.

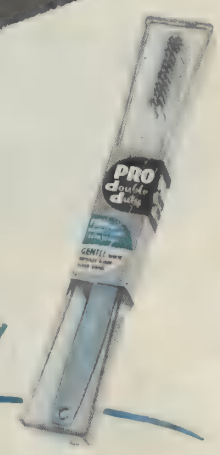
Bufferin, the modern pain reliever, brings really fast relief of painful cold miseries. Because Bufferin adds to aspirin an exclusive combination of antacids called "Di-Alminate," it brings relief twice as fast as aspirin.

What's more, you can take Bufferin from the start to the finish of a cold. You can use it continually—as directed—without fear of stomach irritation.

Next time a cold strikes, start and stay with Bufferin for "twice as fast" relief.

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

If you suffer from the pain of arthritis or rheumatism, ask your physician about Bufferin.



More than a new tooth brush – a major advance in dental care!

THE NEW PRO double duty TOOTH BRUSH

No other type of tooth brush polishes teeth so bright while massaging gums so safely!

Out of a famous dental clinic comes a totally new type of tooth brush—a revolutionary new concept in dental care! The new Pro Double Duty Tooth Brush offers you the advantages of a hard brush and a soft brush in one. No hard-bristled brush can polish teeth brighter. And the Pro Double Duty helps massage and strengthen gums as gently as any soft-bristled brush. Unconditional money-back guarantee. Get the Pro Double Duty Tooth Brush today.

THE PRO double duty TOOTH BRUSH Your smile will say it's better!

PRO-PHY-LAC-TIC BRUSH CO., FLORENCE, MASS.

Opening new doors for your children? Dancing class is only one of the many possibilities when you have your own car.

Volunteering often enough for hospital work? You can if you drive your own Plymouth.

are you this woman?

Supporting the women's club benefit bridge? It's important—and easy—to get out and do things.

Why forfeit your chances of doing and giving because someone else has the family car? Be free to go where and when you need to go—in a beautiful new Plymouth that's yours alone! Touch a button and you're in gear. Go smoothly from a standstill, stop gently when you must without a frightening squeal or lurch. Chauffeur the youngsters knowing your Plymouth is safe as the living-room sofa. All doors have safety latches. Parking is less tedious, too. The new wide windshield and well-behaved wheel make it easy to maneuver into any space. Don't wait another day! See that Plymouth dealer now who knows what it can mean to you to have a Plymouth all your own!

you'll be a happier woman with a Plymouth all your own

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL
BRUCE GOULD
BEATRICE BLACKMAR GOULD
EDITORS

COLIN SIMKIN COLLECTION

NEW ENGLAND WINTER SCENE. Lithographed by Currier & Ives in 1861 from a painting by George H. Durrie, whose canvases depict farms within a few miles of his studio at North Haven, Connecticut. He has caught that suspenseful moment when a visitor stops at the gate—a welcome break in the routine chores and possibly an extra plate on the table by the lady peering out the kitchen window.

IS MORALITY "NORMAL"?

By DOROTHY THOMPSON

It is a common saying that we live in a time of moral crisis. When, however, one seeks an explanation, one usually gets only descriptions of symptoms, such as that the crime rate is shockingly high, especially among juveniles; personal and social disciplines are lax; marriage and family life are unstable; patriotism is on the decline although nationalism flourishes; values are almost exclusively materialistic; the religious instinct is largely moribund and revivalism and increasing church membership indicative only of a frantic search for security and social acceptability.

Sociologists, admitting the crisis, do try to explain it. They say that the evolution from an agricultural and craft economy to an industrial-technological and urban society has changed the whole life pattern that moral standards only reflect. Most of them deny that there are any absolute moral standards. Morals, they say, are useful only as they contribute to the survival of the individual and his society and in a democracy they cannot be imposed anyhow. Morality, they argue, is largely determined by the way people earn their livings. Thus self-reliance, independence and thrift are dubiously virtuous in a world of great productive organizations and resultant interdependence which calls for co-operation rather than self-assertion, and spending rather than saving. The stability of marriage, they say, was essential to the very survival of women in a world where lucrative occupations were closed to them and in a time when they could not legally own property. Then women endured the most wretched or even degrading marital relationships because there was no escape but death or an even more degrading condition.

Chastity, they say, was enjoined upon women by the danger of bastard children. Since the invention of safe contraceptives the case for chastity hardly holds, they contend. Through these and other arguments they maintain that a constant readjustment of moral values is implicit in all progress and change.

But if our society were making a satisfactory reappraisal and adjustment, why should there be any consciousness of a moral crisis?

If we study the crimes that are being committed, they can hardly be explained by changes in the occupational life pattern, unless that pattern, as it presently exists, is profoundly unsatisfactory. Homicide and larceny are not, one would think, implicit in the fact that men work for wages instead of owning their own tools or working their own land. If the economic structure requires more rather than less voluntary co-operation, why are there so many manifestations of exactly the opposite trend? Actually the agricultural and craft societies showed more free co-operation than the industrial, despite greater self-reliance and independence, with which co-operation is by no means incompatible. They had a very strong sense of community. Much of their work was communally performed, both in old-established settlements such as New England, and in the frontier communities of the West, where, without organized government social security no one was allowed to starve and where mutual aid was taken for granted.

What strikes one in the modern world, and despite its many organized charities (contributions tax exempt), is precisely the lack of sympathy or spontaneous aid by anyone for anybody else.

Just before last Christmas there was a subway strike in New York that affected nearly five million people. It occurred during inclement weather, one day being marked by a rainstorm of near-hurricane vehemence. A man recording his experience in a letter to a newspaper described the people, workers who had to get to and from their jobs, huddling drenched and bedraggled in the shelter of buildings, rushing forth to have bus doors slammed in their faces while private cars and taxis rolled by containing only one passenger. Not one driver or rider offered a lift to a miserable fellow creature.

One notices in modern urban life innumerable signs of human callousness. A young person almost never offers his seat in a public conveyance, even to an old woman or a mother carrying a baby in her arms. An accident on the street seldom causes anyone to offer personal aid; at most he will notify the nearest

CONTINUED ON PAGE 20

Executive Editor: Mary Bass
Special Projects Editor: Laura Lou Brookman
Associate Editors: Hugh MacNair Kahler, Wilhela Cushman, William E. Fink, Louella G. Shouer, Mary Lea Page, Dawn Crowell Norman, Margaret Davidson, Nora O'Leary, Glenn Matthew White, Donald Stuart, Tina S. Fredericks, Helen Everitt, Peter Briggs, Anne Einselen, Margaret Parton, Cynthia McAdoo Wheatland, Geraldine Rhoads, Nancy Crawford Wood
Contributing Editors: Richard Pratt, Bernardine Kielty, Gladys Denny Shultz, Margaret Hickey, Ruth Mills Teague, Barbara Benson
Assistant to the Editor: Nelle Keys Perry
Editorial Associates: John Werner, Ruth Mary Packard, Ruth Shapley Matthews, Alice Conkling, Joseph Di Pietro, Elizabeth Goetsch, Jean Todd Freeman, Eileen Sharpe, Betty Coe Spicer, Virginia Price, Joyce Posson, Neal Gilkyson Stuart, Elizabeth Hart
Assistant Editors: Victoria Harris, Alice Kastberg, Dorothy Anne Robinson, Albert Serwazi, June Schwartz, Liane Waite, Ruth Imler, Elizabeth McFarland, Alberte Wright, Corinna Wildman, Abbot Mills
Editorial Assistants: Lee Stowell Cullen, Patricia Martin, Flora Kerestedjian, Simone Smith, Hazel Owen, Isabel Blythe, Helen Olchvary, Olivia Donovan, Sally Platt, Marley Marseilles, Dorothy Markinko, Mary Jane Engel, Jean Anderson, Joan Cornog, Jean Hartman Culp, Grant Harris, Mary Tinker Hatch, Mary Duncan Wright.

New... no lotion

Look...No Lotion!

The permanent's in the end papers

Costs no more than lotion permanents—$2 plus tax.
Choice of 3 strengths: Regular... Gentle... Super home permanent

Procter &

FROM PROCTER & GAMBLE

The end papers do the waving for you

Every end paper contains its own waving ingredients—just the right amount for each curl

Because the end papers themselves measure out the waving action, your PACE wave will be perfect

Easiest, fastest way yet to a really lasting permanent—just wind, wet with pure, clear water, and neutralize

Why didn't somebody think of this before? A home permanent with the wave in the end papers instead of a bottle of lotion. That's Procter & Gamble's new PACE.

Guesswork taken out. Because each paper contains just the right amount of waving ingredients—never too much, never too little—you get a perfect permanent automatically.

No more waves that take in one place, don't in another. No more stragglers or strays. No more "first week" frizz.

No messy, strong-smelling lotion. Just wind your hair as usual, wet with water, neutralize, and look! An even, lasting wave that looks like a gift of nature.

So now there's no reason to leave the house for a permanent. Not when it's next to no fuss at all to get one at home. That's with PACE—the worry-free way to a perfect wave. How about today?

Wind curls as usual. Any home permanent curlers will do. (End papers do the waving.)

Squeeze on plain, clear water with PACE's handy plastic bottle. No messy, strong-smelling lotion.

Look what you get—a soft, lasting wave that looks like a gift of nature.

Gamble's Pace no lotion permanent

P & G 1958

O promise me Reed & Barton sterling

Sweet nothings are nice, but there's a time when a girl has to lead up to sweet somethings like Reed & Barton sterling. How else can she reap the rich and rosy life? Reed & Barton is the fairest silver in the land and has been since 1824.

Classic Rose, $35.00; Silver Sculpture, $36.75; Rose Cascade, $36.75 per six-piece place setting. F.T.I.

For special booklet, "How to be a Successful Hostess" and the name of the store nearest you write, Reed & Barton, Dept. J-38, Taunton, Mass.

The sophisticated lady chooses her accessories in a matched set with a look of tailored elegance...carried out in handsome, slashed leather.

The Smart Set by LADY BUXTON

best for your money

IN MATCHED SETS OR INDIVIDUALLY: FRENCH PURSE, $5.95. CONTOUR® KEY-TAINER®, $2.95. CIGARETTE LIGHTER, $2.50. SNAP-TOP CIGARETTE CASE, $3.95. SPEC-TAINER®, $2.50. CONVERTIBLE® BILLFOLD $5.95. ALL PRICES PLUS TAX.

Things look different when you have a child

There he is. Your shining share of the future. Heir to all your dreams and plans.

How fervently you want for him a safe and beautiful world to grow in!

One thing's sure. You want him to grow up a free and independent American! With the right to the opportunities and rewards his own mind and efforts can bring him.

This is his birthright, you believe. And you must be on the watch for ideas that could deprive him of it. The idea, for example, that government should own and run more and more businesses, services, institutions. Even though it has been shown that the more things government runs, the less freedom and independence the individual has left.

Here's one way to save your dreams—and your son's chance for independence. Listen with your heart when you hear people say, "the government should run it." Remind them that the loss of anybody's independence is a threat to everybody's freedom.

Very much aware of this danger are the independent electric light and power companies, because government already runs part of the electric business, and powerful people are pressing it to take over more.

America's Independent Electric Light and Power Companies*

*Company names on request through this magazine

"Freedom is a woman"

Why are so many modern women switching to carpet?

It's true – carpet only looks expensive! You can do two rooms wall-to-wall, in good quality carpet like this for as little as $18 to $20 a month, including installation and padding – and take as long as 24 months to pay. Two room-size rugs with padding cost as little as $13 to $15 a month.

It's so easy to shop at home! Your store's decorator-salesman will be glad to bring swatches to your home to help you and your family choose your carpet where you'll use it. And in your own home, he can give you much better advice on which carpet best suits your needs.

There's a rug or carpet for every decor! Now with modern American machines and methods you get more value – plus a tremendous choice of fiber, color, and design. Your store will be happy to apply their decorating knowledge to help you choose the perfect rug or carpet.

Thousands of families are enjoying the beauty, comfort, warmth, quiet and easy care of rugs and carpet on budgets just like yours

Why put off having the added beauty that the rug or carpet you want will bring to your home? Start now to enjoy the extra warmth and comfort, the welcome quiet, and the relief from scrubbing and waxing that rugs and carpet bring you. Designed for the way we live, American-made carpet is backed by the skill and the facilities of the leading names in carpet manufacturing. All this can be yours for monthly payments so small you'll hardly notice them.

For further information to help you in your choice, send for your free copy of "How to buy your rugs and carpets wisely." It answers all of the questions women ask most about rugs and carpet – how can I judge quality? Should I buy wall-to-wall or rugs? How can I estimate what my carpet will cost? Clip and mail the coupon today.

For your protection, be sure that the rug or carpet you buy is backed by the knowledge, the facilities and the integrity of an American manufacturer. Look for the label of:

ARTLOOM • BARWICK • BEATTIE • BIGELOW • CABIN CRAFTS-NEEDLETUFT • DOWNS FIRTH • GULISTAN • HARDWICK & MAGEE • HIGHTSTOWN • HOLMES • KARASTAN LEES • MAGEE • MASLAND • MOHAWK • MONARCH • PHILADELPHIA CARPET ROXBURY • SANFORD • ALEXANDER SMITH

CARPET INSTITUTE, INC., 350 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK 1, N. Y.

CARPET INSTITUTE, INC., Department 1,
350 Fifth Avenue, New York, New York

Gentlemen: Please send me my free copy of "How To Buy Your Rugs and Carpets Wisely."

Name_____

Address_____

City and State_____

Home means more with carpet on the floor — more comfort • quiet • safety • beauty • easier care

Just arrived..

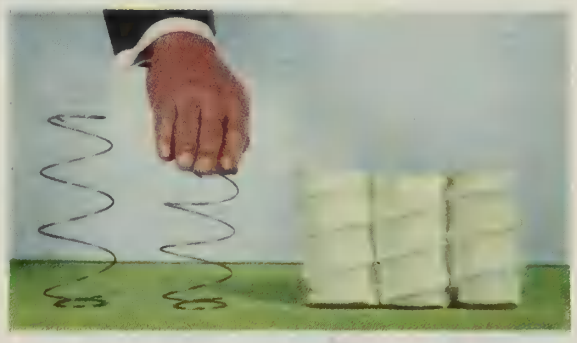
THE ALL-NEW 1958 BEAUTYREST

...with more buoyant firmness than ever before!

New resilience! New firmness! 12% greater spring support! And this newest, most restful of mattresses actually costs least to own!

HERE IS important news for all who treasure their rest, their comfort, their budget. The world's finest mattress has been made finer, firmer—and designed to last longer and cost less than any mattress you can buy. Let the illustrations on this page show you how:

New power-packed springs, pocketed under compression, have now added 12% firmness to the new 1958 Beautyrest*. And it's the right kind of firmness—buoyant firmness—best for your back, your comfort and your rest.

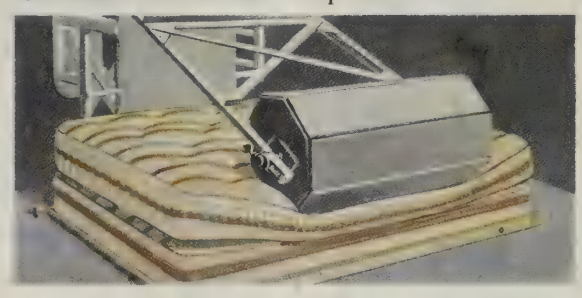


See, too, how Beautyrest independent spring construction gives single-bed comfort to double-bed sleepers—so important to the 7 out of 10 married couples who share the same mattress.

See how, in torture tests made by United States Testing Co., Beautyrest has been proved to last 3 times longer than the next best mattress tested—and why this means that the world's finest mattress actually costs least to own.

Two choices of firmness! The new firmer Beautyrest for all normal requirements. And the new Extra-Firm Model Beautyrest for those who need or prefer even more support. Each only $79.50. King-Size and extra-wide models also available.

Be sure to get the matching Beautyrest box-spring—to bring out the best in your Beautyrest mattress.



Important: After a small down payment, Beautyrest terms can be arranged as low as $1.50 per week.

New Beautyrest springs are power-packed by compressing each one under tension. This adds 12% greater buoyant firmness that pushes back up under you.

Single-bed comfort in a double bed! Beautyrest alone has separate springs. No rolling together. The heaviest husband cannot disturb his partner's rest.

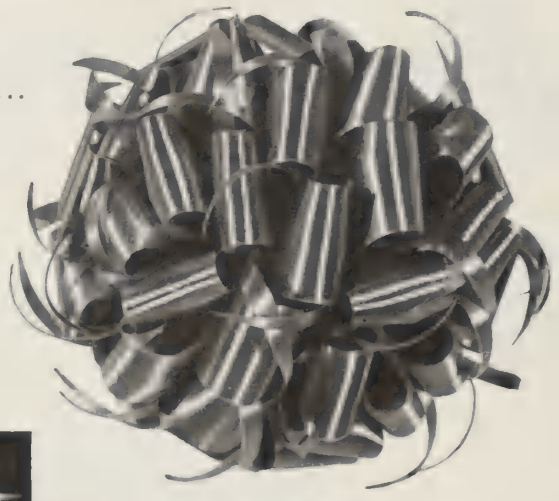
Outlasts other mattresses 3 to 1! Under the pounding of the heavy roller, Beautyrest lasted 3 times as long as any of the 20 leading mattresses tested by the U. S. Testing Co. So, in the long run, the best costs least!

Wake up wonderful

BEAUTYREST by SIMMONS

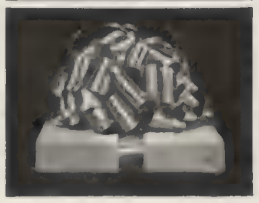
Prices slightly higher in Canada.

Ordinary mattress is made with about 200-300 springs. Wired together, they sag together under your weight. When you push down on one, you push down on all. They're not free to push up and correctly support the shape of your body. This "sagging support" is bad for your back, your comfort, your rest.



Beautyrest mattress is made with over 800 separate springs. Not wired together, they can't sag together. Each is free to push up under you. Together they firmly support the weight and shape of your whole body. In the new Beautyrest, springs have been power-packed to give 12% more firmness.

*Trade-mark Reg. U.S. Patent Office, Copr. 1958 by Simmons Co., Mdse. Mart, Chicago, Ill.



Can you tie this ?

You certainly can . . .
with gleaming
SASHEEN®
the ribbon that makes the one and only
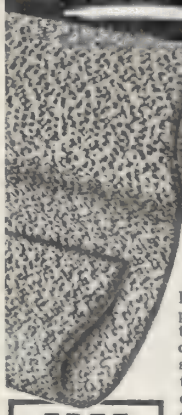
"Magic Bow"

This one's called the "Frou-Frou"

Here's an exquisite bow that does any gift proud! It's an easy-to-make variation of the famous "Magic Bow". Next time you're wrapping a birthday gift, use this gay and glamorous Sasheen topper to make the package "almost too pretty to open"!

Making the "Frou-Frou" is fun. Just follow "Magic Bow" instructions but, before pulling out the loops, snip the edges as shown at left. And there you are!



"Magic Bow" instructions are on every roll of Sasheen®, Decorette® and "Magic Bow"™ Brand Ribbons.

PRODUCTS OF 3M COMPANY RESEARCH — MINNESOTA MINING AND MANUFACTURING COMPANY
St. Paul 6, Minnesota

"Magic Bow" and method of making patented U. S. Pat. No. RE. 23835 © 3M Co.

Send Your OLD Materials...Get NEW OLSON RUGS

SAVE up to ½

MAIL COUPON or postcard for beautiful, New, Free full color OLSON RUG and Decorating Book . . . plus FREE Rug Offer! The famous OLSON plan is pure magic . . . your material is picked up by Express or Freight at our expense and sent to Olson Factory where the valuable wools, etc. are reclaimed like new, sterilized, shredded, bleached, merged, spun with choice New Wool and woven within a week into luxurious, deeper-textured, Reversible OLSON Broadloom. Nearly ■ million customers. Our 84th Year.

FREE Accent Rugs (up to $16 Value) . . . just for trying room size Olson Rugs. If not delighted, return for refund and you keep the Scatter Rugs as a Gift!

MONTHLY PAYMENTS

CHOICE of solid colors, Tweeds, Embossed effects, Leaf, Floral designs, Early American, Oriental patterns, Ovals. Any size up to 18 ft. wide, any length!

FREE! COLOR CATALOG 49 MODEL ROOMS

FREE! to Every Reader

Rug and Decorating Book, Free Rug Coupon.

Your Name ..... ©ORC
Address .....
Town ..... State .....
Write to nearest address

OLSON RUG CO. Dept. E-14
CHICAGO 41, ILLINOIS | NEW YORK 1, NEW YORK | SAN FRANCISCO 8, CALIFORNIA

HANG FIXTURES SECURELY

USE MOLLY SCREW ANCHORS

THE PERFECT FASTENER to hold anything in walls, floors, ceilings

150,000,000 IN USE

With Molly you can install fixtures exactly where you want . . . not just where studs are. Won't pull through. Spider backing reinforces area in which used. Fixtures can be removed and replaced in same anchor. Easy to install without disfiguring wall. Inexpensive, guaranteed. Ask your hardware dealer for genuine Molly . . . the name is stamped on the cap.

SEND $1.00 FOR SAMPLE BOX OF 12

EXPANDS BEHIND THE WALL
MOLLY

217 N. 5th ST. • READING, PA.

Enclosed is $1.00 for which please send me a sample box of 12 Mollys postpaid.

NAME
ADDRESS
CITY ZONE STATE

IS MORALITY "NORMAL"?

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 11

policeman. Vandalism being visibly committed, even by children, calls forth no interference by adults. As in the Bible story, nearly everyone passes by on the other side. The attitude is, "It's none of my business and the safest thing is not to get mixed up in it."

Yet we are all mixed up with one another as never before, even mixed up with people of other nationalities, not only through the institution of the United Nations but in the technological age with other countries upon which we depend for part of the food we eat and for raw materials to feed the machines. The richest countries are no longer self-sufficient. Parts of the world swim in oil far beyond their own needs while heavily populated and highly industrialized regions, such as Western Europe, have none. Access to oil becomes a matter of life or death for such societies, which, if threatened with deprivation, will risk war to secure it. But this interdependency does not create a climate of peace but of militant anxiety.

Science, having discovered the secret of the universe, forecasts an age of unexampled abundance, but a mounting armaments race with thermonuclear weapons presents the world with the possibility of the worst disaster in human history, the effects of which will be passed on to generations yet unborn. Both the American and the Russian general staffs see the logic in these weapons: that if war is imminent or seems inevitable the advantage, even the possibility of survival, lies with those who strike first. The anxiety is mutual and justified, yet no statesman has arisen to solve this dreadful dilemma.

Within countries, also, interdependency creates continual class struggles, as workers fight for their jobs—their property rights in them—and owners and managers for profits without which there will be no investment capital or even solvency. The result is either depression or inflation, from either of which everybody suffers. The concept of "fair price" hardly exists, for the price of labor or capital is not determined by "economic justice" or even by reason, but by the exercise of economic and political power.

The nationalization of the means of production (socialism) also does not solve this problem. The split of interest persists whether the state or multiple corporations are the depositories of capital. In Communist countries the struggle is suppressed by police power, but the conflict is still there. It is of the greatest significance that all rebellions in Communist countries—in East Germany, Poland and Hungary—were sparked by workers, who will remain a "class" as long as there are propertyless wage earners and propertied or otherwise privileged bosses. In all industrial-technological societies both exist.

These are only a few of the huge moral issues that confront all societies today, and which so far have defied solution. They influence, I think, moral attitudes toward everything, in the more limited spheres of the personal and social.

It is certainly true that as external conditions change, so do moral attitudes. But it is by no means true that moral attitudes adjust themselves adequately to the changed conditions, from the viewpoint of the welfare of the individual and society. Some say that there is a time lag in moral readjustments. But reading their works, one finds a singular ambiguity about exactly what should be changed in "traditional morality." Conceding that moral standards have always been as honored in the breach as in the observance, all civilized societies to date have had remarkably uniform standards about right and wrong, regardless even of religion. Homicide is outlawed everywhere, except the group homicide of war, and even that is outlawed in the United Nations except for "defense"—which has not yet been satisfactorily defined. All societies, including the Communist, protect public and lawfully acquired private property. All, without exception, regulate to some degree the relations between the sexes and legally establish marital and parental duties.

But legal bases are less important than the moral climate in which they operate. The origin of legal codes can usually be traced to religious compulsions and taboos. But they are also founded in practical experience.

In the early days of the Russian revolution the institution of the family was declared "bourgeois." Marriages could be dissolved at the will of either party and the state was prepared to bring up children collectively. The result was social anarchy and a burden beyond the power of any state to carry or administer. So there was a throwback to quite puritanical ideas, official opposition to sexual promiscuity, and full responsibility of both parents for their offspring. And much of this change was nurtured and promoted in the public schools.

This raises the question of morality and education. From time immemorial the inculcation of moral principles and the encouragement of moral behavior in the young have been integral, indeed primary, considerations in their education. I do not know, today, any school of educators, including the most progressive, who deny this or advocate shirking this responsibility. Yet the modern educators are extremely vague in defining what that behavior should be. Children, they say, must be brought up to adjust to a "changing world." But what, in actual educational practice, does that mean? Its advocates cannot read the future! Since children will grow up to live, they say, in a co-operative democracy, they must learn from the beginning to "co-operate." But co-operate for what? Child hoodlums and street gangs are highly co-operative among themselves. It is as possible to co-operate for the ruin of a society as for its advancement.

One simply cannot escape responsibility for deciding what is right and wrong for children from the viewpoint of their personal and social welfare. This question cannot be left to social scientists, clergymen and other professional moralists, or even teachers. It is a problem of the whole community. Historians can throw light on it, for the decline of civilizations is a fact and has always been accompanied by certain moral phenomena. Biologists and anthropologists can throw light. The question of what is physically desirable enters into it. And common sense, the fruit of communal experience, can, perhaps, contribute most.

At any rate, no education can transmit to children anything except the fruit of human experience to date. The only experience that exists is what one has had for oneself or learned from the history of the race—insofar as it has been accurately recorded. In this sense, education is compelled to be conservative, or turn children into laboratory experiments.

All sorts of societies have existed in man's experience and exist today, so it would seem reasonable to inquire what virtues, if any, have been cultivated by advanced civilizations and have contributed to the happiness and creativity of the individual and the survival of his civilization, and then to seek to establish the practice of these virtues as normal to man.

Much of modern social science consists of statistical studies of behavior. The sociologists

CONTINUED ON PAGE 169

HOUSEBROKE

By GEORGIE STARBUCK GALBRAITH

A man is tamed for domestic life
When, lifting his feet to allow his wife
To sweep beneath 'em, he merely grunts,
Not losing his place in the paper once.

BEDROOMS '58:
Brighter than ever!

EVERFAST FABRICS AND FURNISHINGS FROM LORD & TAYLOR.

Surf adds brightness (to colors, to whites... yes, even to perfect whiteness)

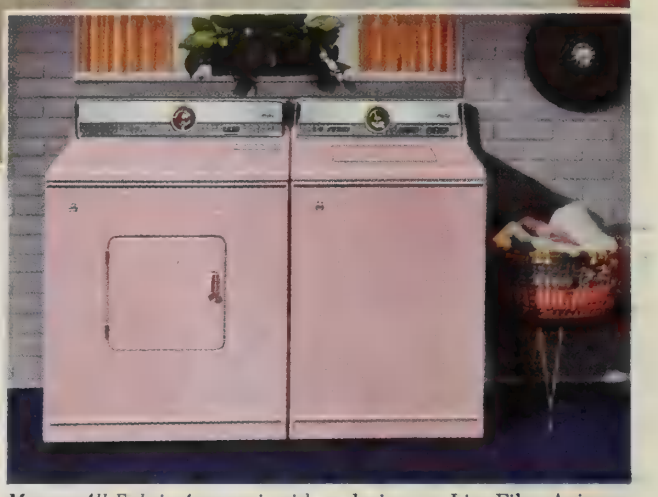
Today's trend is a beauty blend of the traditional past with the light, airy look of the present. And it's so easy to keep this brightness blooming with Surf. (Try it for everything you wash, from bedspreads to blue jeans!) The new brightener in Surf gives the finest washing results you've ever had from any detergent or Lever Brothers returns every penny you paid. Speaking of pennies, watch for Surf on "special" at your favorite store.



so nice to your nice things

YOU CAN TRUST EVEN YOUR MOST DELICATE NEGLIGEE TO YOUR MAYTAG AUTOMATIC

The things you treasure . . . your really nice things, get special consideration from a Maytag Automatic. For it can be both as gentle and as thorough as your own two hands. Yet it can be vigorous too, without getting rough. It has every feature you've ever wanted in an automatic washer plus striking beauty and utter dependability. Inevitably you'll find it costs you less to own a Maytag Automatic because it lasts so long.

The Maytag Company, Newton, Iowa.

Maytag All-Fabric Automatic with exclusive new Lint-Filter Agitator, 2 wash speeds, 3 water temperatures. In pink, green, yellow, white. With matching "Halo of Heat" Dryer, as little as $3.50 a week. Sold in Canada and throughout the world.

THE LUXURIOUSLY DEPENDABLE

MAYTAG

New deodorant preferred by 7 out of 10 women!

ban® rolls on protection that stays on!

More effective than messy creams*, easier to apply than drippy sprays! Not a crumbly stick!

Stops odor—checks perspiration round the clock!

- ✓ Won't irritate normal skin!
- ✓ Won't harm delicate fabrics!
- ✓ No mess, no drip, no waste!
- ✓ Exclusive patented applicator can't clog or freeze!
- ✓ Rolls on just the right amount!

*IN A SURVEY AGAINST THE LEADING CREAM DEODORANT, 7 OUT OF 10 PREFERRED BAN.

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

Only *maidenform makes

Nice to come home to? Heady as wine? Dangerous? American Beauty? Willing to gamble? Apple of his eye? Woman of mystery? Which are you?

TWICE-OVER Here's light fantastic elastic coupled with silky, shape-making broadcloth. So comfortable! From 3.95 bras for all the dreams you are!

How many dreams are you?

CHANSONETTE*
Dream of excitement? These famous spoke-stitched cups flatter you so, they seem to make exciting things happen! From 2.00

CHANSONETTE LACE
Dream of luxury? This is your bra! All misty lace and magic satin... and it has such a wonderful way with your figure! 3.50

CONCERTO* TRI-LINE*
Dream of comfort? This bra lifts away strain while it lifts up your curves, for a new high in comfort and looks. From 3.00

PRE-LUDE* SIX-WAY*
Dream of being a fashion plate? Try this bra! Straps stay secret under every neckline...curves stay in model form. From 3.95

PRE-LUDE SIX-WAY ONCE-OVER*
Dream of living dangerously? You're perilously pretty with nonstop curves poured into the lithe lines fashion loves. From 8.95

CONCERTO SHELL
Dream missing? There's a whisper of foam rubber lining to fill the gap between you and the figure of your fondest dreams! 3.00

ETUDE MINOR*
Dream of abundance? Cups padded with foam rubber, then tic-tac-toe stitched, make wishing so . . . so very shapely! From 3.00

©1958 MAIDEN FORM BRASSIERE CO., INC., NEW YORK 16, N. Y. PAT. PEND. *REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

And ask for a Maidenform girdle, too!

Helena Rubinstein solves your beauty problems

The first lady of beauty science helps millions of women

HELENA RUBINSTEIN has had more experience with skin problems than anyone in the world. Since her medical student days she has been working to keep young skins beautiful . . . to correct bad skins . . . to make aging skins look younger.

Today dry skin, aging contours, large pores, blackheads are no longer tragedies. With the help of Helena Rubinstein's scientific skin care every woman can solve her own beauty problems. The first step is knowing what to do. The second step is doing!

DULL, DRY SKIN? Helena Rubinstein has just created remarkable new BEAUTY DEW. In one quick step at bedtime this delightful lotion cleanses pore-deep, moisturizes your skin and helps sweep away blemish-breeding bacteria. You wake up to a complexion that is noticeably brighter, softer, clearer . . . completely refreshed! There's never been anything like BEAUTY DEW. And it's greaseless, too. 160 beauty treatments only 1.35.

AGING SKIN? Now women over 35 can look younger! The oil glands that keep your skin smooth and unlined in youth can now be reactivated! The miracle is Progesterone, the most feminine sex hormone of all. For the first time, Progesterone and Estrogens are available in Helena Rubinstein's medically-approved ESTROGENIC HORMONE CREAM so you can correct wrinkles caused by dryness, bring natural moisture back to aging skin. 3.50.

FACIAL HAIR? NUDIT is a new scientific formula that wipes off facial hair! It is safe, quick, easy. It is the only hair remover that comes with SUPER-FINISH, the medicated cream that eliminates redness or rashing. NUDIT melts off hair below the surface of the skin for more lasting effect. 1.50.

CRACKED, CHAPPED LIPS? Helena Rubinstein's new DEW-KISSED LIPSTICK helps heal while it beautifies. It actually releases moisture to the lips all the time it is on. The luscious sheen lasts as long as the color! In new Convertible Cases, 1.35 to 5.00. Refills .90.

DEHYDRATED SKIN? SKIN DEW is the remarkable new beauty discovery created in Helena Rubinstein's Paris laboratories. A fragrant pink lotion, SKIN DEW® sinks deep into the skin's under layers replacing moisture. It is instantly absorbed without a trace of grease. For a fresh young look, use it as a foundation under make-up, also as a glamorous night cream. 3.00, 5.00

BLACKHEADS? Now you can actually wash away blackheads and correct oily skin problems with BEAUTY WASHING GRAINS. These miraculous little granules combine with water to clean out pores, turn greasy shine to pretty glow. 1.35.

PIMPLES? For skins that "break out," Helena Rubinstein has formulated new greaseless MEDICATED CREAM. Its medicated ingredients dry surface blemishes and actually help the skin heal itself. A boon to teenage boys and girls. 1.25. Prices plus tax

Helena Rubinstein beauty products are available at leading department and drug stores or write Helena Rubinstein®, 655 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. 22, N. Y.

DR. SPOCK TALKS WITH MOTHERS

"Keep him quietly in bed for a couple of days longer"—but how?

By BENJAMIN SPOCK, M.D.

"A young child is apt to think of illness as punishment, and probably holds the parent partly responsible."

SUZANNE SZASZ

Playthings don't have to be bought at a store.
Creation is soul-satisfying (as well as time-consuming).

March is often the peak of the illness season. Colds, grippe and sore throats are still prevalent, the contagious diseases like measles are becoming more frequent.

Two problems which mothers quite often face are keeping the convalescent child contented and keeping themselves from being harassed. There may be psychological as well as physical reasons for the crossness and demandingness that so often occur.

We've learned from psychiatric work with young children that they often interpret an illness or an operation as punishment for having done something bad or for having had antagonistic thoughts toward another member of the family. A child feels as guilty about a mean thought as about an act. He assumes that in a magic way his thought can do real harm. As a matter of fact, most older children and adults carry over, unconsciously, some of this belief in their own black magic and have various superstitions for warding off the effects of dangerous thoughts. The child who is guilty about hostile feelings toward his mother says, "Step on a crack, break your mother's back." A mother knocks on wood when she says her child hasn't been sick this winter. We parents frequently suggest the idea that illnesses are induced by naughtiness. We say, "If you'd worn your rubbers as I told you to, you wouldn't have caught cold"; or "Your quarreling has given mother a headache."

While a child is sick he's probably feeling at least a bit frightened by the punishment factor, by the symptoms, and by the danger of the illness itself. This last fear he may get from his mother, who shows it in her face as she reads the thermometer, in her tone when she telephones the doctor, in her solicitousness as she cares for the child. When the worst of the illness has passed, the child begins to perk up, and this is when he's apt to become difficult. One of the human reactions to a fright which has passed is to get mad at the person who caused it. This is frequently shown by the angriness of a parent toward a child who has almost fallen out a window or nearly got himself run over. Since a young child is so apt to think of disease as a punishment and since the parent is usually thought of as the punisher, it's probable that unconsciously he holds the parent partly responsible for the illness. He may also blame her for not having protected him from any painful things the doctor had to do. A normal mother often reinforces his idea that she is somehow guilty by her unaccustomed concern, her readiness to accommodate his whims, her tolerance of his disagreeableness. Of course one of the reasons she acts this way is that she may imagine that the child became sick or had an accident through some slight carelessness on her part. The doctor wouldn't usually agree with her, but that's the way a good parent is made.

If a child thinks his mother gave him the illness for punishment and if the mother thinks she gave it to him through negligence, you can see that their misconceptions reinforce each other. As soon as the child begins to recover, he feels better in his conscience. He has paid for his sins—real or imaginary—and he sees that he's still very much alive. Whatever guiltiness the mother may have had doesn't go away quite so fast. For one thing, she realizes that the illness isn't entirely over yet. This is where a psychological imbalance may exist for a few days. To the degree that she acts guilty—in the sense of kowtowing to him or permitting him to be tyrannical—it encourages him to blame and to punish her.

Perhaps you think I'm being too morbid. I don't mean that, if feelings of guilt and blame are present, they are necessarily intense. Certainly there are plenty of illnesses in which the parents remain matter-of-fact and the child remains sweet-natured. I'm only suggesting the possibility of psychological factors for those parents who regularly have trouble during convalescence.

It is wise for a mother to remind herself during any illness or injury how easy it is for her to blame herself, so that she can be on guard against acting submissive. She can inquire about the child's symptoms in a matter-of-fact tone such as the doctor uses, and not ask too often. I don't mean that she should seem indifferent or hard-boiled. It's possible to be sympathetic without being anguished.

When the child begins to be a bit demanding of service, she can put him in his place with a firm reminder that she doesn't like to be spoken to in that manner and that she has lots of other work to be done. If he scorns a drink which he asked for himself a short time before, she can suggest that he make the best of it until it is time for her to prepare something else.

If he begins climbing out of bed against orders or otherwise horsing around, it's much better for the mother to get as emphatic and masterful as she would if he were well, rather than to be too patient or to warn him anxiously about the possible worsening of the disease. A threat gives a child a choice of obeying or of taking the consequences, so is always weaker than a command.

A very practical matter is how much time the mother can spend with the invalid. Even if she is hard pressed with work, she will want to set aside at least brief periods through the day when she can sit with him. Children (like adults) when sick are not just bored if left alone. They can't help feeling more dependent than usual. I can still remember how glad I was when my mother came to the hospital, to sit in my room and give me sips of water, after a tonsillectomy when I was twenty years old.

If the child begins to demand more attention than the mother can possibly give, then it might be a good idea for her to lay

CONTINUED ON PAGE 28

Separates by Adelaar

only Sta-Flo® BEAUTY-STARCHES so easily

Cuts ironing time in half!

d receive a color-it-yourself place mat you can frame. Have fun and horts, slacks, Eton suits and such in sizes 6 months to 8 years. Nice
t. J-1, STANDARD ROMPER CO., 1350 Broadway, New York 18, N. Y.

Each Time You're A Guest At One Of These Famous Parties You Get A Real Shopping Thrill

You're always sure to have fun at a STANLEY Hostess Party. You like the enjoyment of shopping in a hospitable home with a group of your friends and neighbors. You like the genial STANLEY Dealer who sees that you all have a good time. You like the convenience, the freedom from downtown parking problems. You like the pleasant break in your daily routine. Best of all, you like the ease with which you can choose what you need, or desire, from among STANLEY'S wide lines of Quality-Plus housekeeping and personal grooming Products, many of which your STANLEY Dealer demonstrates for you dramatically under actual use conditions. STANLEY Parties, you know, are by far America's most popular shopping Parties. More than 20,000,000 have been held to date in American homes. Why don't you attend, or give one soon?

NEW!

Stanley's wonderful new Baby Oil and Baby Powder are now being featured at Stanley Parties.

At these Parties, you'll always find the newest and the best in Products to guard health and improve personal grooming, and in Products to save time and work in housekeeping. For information, phone your Stanley Dealer, your nearest Stanley Office, or write Stanley's Main Office in Westfield, Mass.

ORIGINATORS OF THE FAMOUS STANLEY HOSTESS PARTY PLAN
Stanley Home Products, Inc., Westfield, Mass., Stanley Home Products of Canada, Ltd., London, Ont., Stanhome de Mexico, S.A. De C.V., Mexico City, Mexico.
(Copr. Stanley Home Products, Inc., 1958)

Send For FREE Home Service Literature.

greaseless MEDICATED CREAM. Its medicated ingredients dry surface blemishes and actually help the skin heal itself. A boon to teenage boys and girls. 1.25. Prices plus tax

Helena Rubinstein beauty products are available at leading department and drug stores or write Helena Rubinstein®, 655 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. 22, N. Y.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 26

out a rather arbitrary schedule of when she can visit and when she can't. More important than the number of minutes is the tone of voice—when she announces the schedule or later when the child tries to get her to come to him outside of schedule.

When a mother is pulled two ways in her feelings about a child's demand, not wanting to give in to what seems like an unreasonable and inconvenient request but still wondering guiltily whether perhaps she ought to, her indecision is apt to show up in a hesitant or petulant or angry tone as she says "No." The child instantly detects the fact that she's not sure of her ground and he sets to work to undermine her with repeated pleas, new symptoms, self-pitying descriptions of his plight, even artful tears. The mother should try to sound cheerfully, confidently definite.

Now for some practical suggestions. A couple of years ago, in an article on travel with children, I quoted extensively from a letter full of ingenious suggestions from Helen Thomas Irwin. Now she has sent me a similar one on convalescence. She starts by saying, "Just as mamma breathes a sigh of gratitude to hear that her child is going to be all right, she is faced with two statements: 'Keep him quietly in bed for a couple of days longer'; and 'What'll I do now, mamma?' The child is soon tired of TV, crayons and games. He wants you to read him stories or to tell him again all the ones about when you were a little girl. Reading a series of children's books, especially comics, has the same effect as morphine on me. I fall asleep. I have to think of other solutions.

What is instinct? It is the natural tendency in one, when filled with dismay, to turn to his wife.

FINLEY PETER DUNNE

"Change beds often. Let him stay for a while in your bed, then the couch made into a bed, then back to his own. The change of scene is restful and makes old toys seem more interesting.

"Give him a bell. This relieves his temptation to leap out of bed to find you and you can usually hear it above the sound of the vacuum or running water.

"No matter what time of year it is, give him the box of Christmas ornaments. He can admire each one separately, fill his head with happy holiday thoughts, and possibly make a few new additions to the collection.

"When we were traveling, ornaments were a particular problem because they had to be flat and unbreakable. On the cover of favorite comic books there were usually large drawings of 'friends,' such as Little Lulu, Fox and Crow, Donald Duck. I traced some of them (using a sheet of carbon paper) onto the white cardboards which came from the laundry in shirts. Then my child colored them, cut them out, attached loops of thread and carefully put them away for the Christmas tree. They have been an enormous success. For a small child, you can cut large cardboard stars, squares and circles. These, also, can look pretty on the tree and can give him the pleasure of having made them himself.

"Give the child a pile of old magazines, not just to look at, but with a definite plan in view. He can 'build' a house, or a hospital. For a hospital he's going to go through the magazines and cut out all pictures of nurses, doctors, babies, medicines, flowers, beds, clocks, or anything else he'd like to have in his hospital. When he has collected a pile of pictures, you can pin them to an old screen, or to a curtain near his bed. A boy can pretend he's the head doctor giving orders from his 'office' on the pillows, a girl can be the head nurse. It's the same game with building a house, except that he finds pictures of a living room, bathroom, bedroom, food, car, and so on. A boy can build a garage.

"The button box! There are many things to do with buttons, but you will have to watch

CONTINUED ON PAGE 31

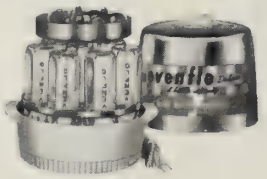
Best for Baby—evenflo

Give a gift she wants evenflo® baby gifts

New! evenflo Hot Water Faucet Bottle Warmer $2.50 Gift-Packaged

Attaches to any faucet. Flow of hot water rotates bottle so formula warms thoroughly, speedily. Economical, easy to clean, wears and wears.

evenflo Food Warmer $2.99 Gift-Packaged



Strong plastic dish has Walt Disney characters, Sure-Grip—No Slip suction cup base.

evenflo Deluxe Electric Sterilizer

Eight-bottle sterilizer saves space on the range, shuts off automatically. Other models as low as $3.98.

$10.95

evenflo

See these and other Evenflo gifts at your favorite baby counters everywhere.

EVENFLO, RAVENNA, OHIO

CORNS also Calluses. Quick, easy, and economical. Just rub on. Invisible. Jars, 35¢ and 60¢. At drug stores.

REMOVED BY MOSCO

Your money refunded if not satisfied. The Moss Company, Rochester, N.Y.

DISCOURAGE THUMB SUCKING
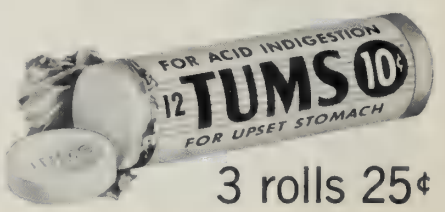
NAIL BITING



THUM TRADE MARK

Just Paint on Fingertips
60c at your drug store

EXPECting?

Heartburn and acid indigestion are often a problem during pregnancy. Tums gives total relief in just 4 seconds from excess stomach acids. Tums are high in calcium—convenient to carry in pocket or purse.

3 rolls 25¢

This page is to color Health-tex is to wear

How many of our 27 pets can you name? Mail in your list and receive a color-it-yourself place mat you can frame. Have fun and wear Health-tex. Diaper sets, crawlers, knit or woven shirts, shorts, slacks, Eton suits and such in sizes 6 months to 8 years. Nice stores have them at the prices you like. Write Health-tex, Dept. J-1, STANDARD ROMPER CO., 1350 Broadway, New York 18, N. Y.

"EASTER EGG" COOKIES

ORANGE-BLENDED OATMEAL

HAM BALL KABOBS

Easter fun foods:

New kind of breakfast and timely new recipes enriched with Quaker Oats

Quaker Oats and Mother's Oats are exactly the same

"EASTER EGG" COOKIES

High-protein Quaker Oats adds nourishment and nut-like flavor to cookies.

- 1 cup butter or margarine, soft
- ½ cup brown sugar
- 1 tsp. almond or vanilla flavoring
- 1 egg
- 3 cups sifted flour
- ½ tsp. salt
- 1 cup Quaker or Mother's Oats (quick or old fashioned, uncooked)

Beat butter and sugar until creamy; add flavoring and egg. Sift together flour and salt; thoroughly mix with butter mixture. Stir in oats. Shape dough to form 36 eggs. Bake on ungreased cookie sheets in slow oven (325°F.) 20 to 25 minutes. Cool. Decorate with confectioners' sugar frosting. Makes 3 dozen.

ORANGE-BLENDED OATMEAL

Here's a brand new kind of oatmeal! And a new taste delight! It's an intriguing new way for youngsters (and grownups) to get the high-protein benefits of good hot oatmeal. The flavor of frozen orange juice—blended into the oatmeal in the pan—deliciously flavors every spoonful of creamy oatmeal. Try it!

Follow oatmeal recipe on package for 4 to 6 servings. Cover and let stand as directed. Then stir in ¼ cup frozen orange juice, undiluted. Each serving may be garnished with toasted coconut.

WATCH "SGT. PRESTON OF THE YUKON" ON CBS-TV

HAM BALL KABOBS

Quaker Oats makes meat balls and meat loaves juicier, tastier—cuts down shrinkage.

- 1 lb. ground ham
- 1 lb. ground pork
- 1 tsp. dry mustard
- ½ tsp. garlic salt
- ½ tsp. onion salt
- 2 eggs, beaten
- ⅔ cup milk
- 1 cup Quaker or Mother's Oats (quick or old fashioned, uncooked)

Thoroughly mix all ingredients together. Shape into 32 balls; place in shallow baking pans. Bake in slow oven (325°F.) 1 hour. Refrigerate. For each kabob, alternate 4 ham balls with pineapple chunks and green pepper squares on metal skewers. Place in broiler or over open fire about 15 minutes, turning only once. Makes 8 kabobs.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 28

out if the child is small enough to put them into his mouth. They can be sorted and put into cups according to their ability to be jewels, or according to their color or shape. They can also be stirred with a spoon and served in doll dishes. (A gravy ladle is fun to use in serving.) They can be strung into a huge necklace or they can form designs on the bed table. Have you a wide, soft piece of elastic such as might be left over from a worn-out pajama bottom? The child can sew (or pin with safety pins) buttons on this elastic to create a fabulous button belt.

"Buttons can also serve as 'money' for points in a game or, placed in a tin candy box, become a lovely rhythm instrument for shaking while playing a phonograph record.

"Have you a junk-jewelry box into which you tossed the summer jewelry you'll never wear again and the series of lone earrings after you'd despaired of ever finding mates? Or you can give him your regular box of jewelry, removing anything of real value. My child has spent hours looking over each piece, peering inside lockets, and finally becoming an emperor by wearing all the jewelry at once plus my bed jacket and an aluminum-foil crown. This idea may not sound like much, but it has given me hours of peace.

"The silverware chest. I'll never know exactly why, but taking all the silverware out of the chest and putting it back again is fun for children.

"A box of old photographs or albums or scrapbooks. The child enjoys seeing pictures of himself especially, so his own baby book provides entertainment. You must be prepared, though, to have him look at a beautiful and youthful picture of yourself and say, 'Who's that? You? It doesn't look like you!'

"If it is near a holiday, there are cards to be made. These can be Christmas cards, Valentines, Easter cards, Happy St. Patrick's Day cards, or any kind of cards. We are usually near some kind of holiday. These cards can be fancy, or just a suitable picture on a large sheet of paper—for instance, a large egg for Easter. The important thing is that they are to be considered of value and actually mailed to the people on his list. An old stand-by is to 'make lace.' He takes a plain sheet of paper and folds it a few times, then cuts out slices and half circles. When he opens the sheet, it is 'lacework' which you help him paste onto colored paper.

"Taking medicine has become unpleasant by now. He's well enough to resist, to threaten to vomit. He no longer wishes to take liquids, but you're required to make him get them down. I found it a huge help to wear a paper nurse's cap.

"The next two suggestions my child thought of himself, so they are right out of the horse's mouth. The first consists of building a theater in miniature. He used an empty carton as a stage, and it was covered with a reasonably good-looking rag. He then arranged scenes in the box, using small plastic furniture, blocks, Christmas-tree ornaments or toys. His actors were those miniature dolls and comic characters from the dime store. He played one of his records for the sound effects and the dolls were supposed to be acting or singing. For a spotlight he used our color-slide projector, but a flashlight would do just as well, or a lamp aimed at the stage.

"The other idea also makes use of cardboard cartons, and those cutout magazine pictures. Now he can paste the pictures into a big box, placed with the open part facing him so that he has three walls, a floor and a roof for his building. A second box sitting on top of the first provides an upstairs.

"If pictures of cars are pasted in the box, toy cars can also be used to go into and out of the garage. If the boxes are to be a house, people can live there and small furniture added. Now he can paste down rugs or paste pictures of windows on the sides of the box.

"A cigar box full of tiny dolls is an excellent toy in sickness and in health. These 'people' are small enough actually to ride in toy trucks, or to fit into block or cardboard buildings, and are very inexpensive. They can march in long parades, have adventures in toy airplanes or fire engines, and ride in some cars of an electric train. (The gondola, the dumping car, the hopper, the refrigerator car, or in a boxcar if it has a sliding door.) They can be affixed on top of the engine or passenger car with a strip of cellulose tape.

"We were amused to notice some of the wild adventures of a tiny rubber doll whose name was Tiny Baby. Tiny Baby rode in planes alone, jumped off high buildings, ran trains at breakneck speed and did, in fact, anything he pleased. Asked what Tiny's parents thought of his experiences, my small son announced that Tiny Baby had no parents, and was allowed to eat whatever he wanted and never go to sleep. I realized that Tiny Baby was a projection of my son's dreams of freedom and I imagine he worked out a lot of frustrations by this means.

"If none of these suggestions pleases you or your child, think how much better it is to be a mother during an era of antibiotics! How was it to face ear infection aboard a covered wagon? We've got a lot to be thankful for."

What I envy in Mrs. Irwin is her imagination. I could never embroider a story of my childhood to make it seem worth telling and I can't think of activities for children aside from those I remember loving myself. Boys can spend hours with a collection of miniature cars and there are dozens of fascinatingly realistic ones which can be bought at a good

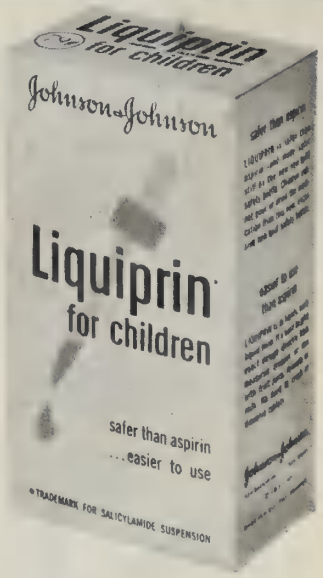
CONTINUED ON PAGE 191

"Just thought I'd ask—I hear they sometimes get mixed up in the hospital."

New! Liquiprin* for children safer than aspirin, easier to use

Medical tests prove this new, easy-to-use liquid is gentler, less irritating than aspirin ...safe even for children who are upset by aspirin! Gets to work faster, too!

Mothers! Give your child these added benefits of LIQUIPRIN*—the new way to help calm the feverish, fretful child and ease discomfort of colds, minor aches and pains.



LIQUIPRIN IS DESIGNED ESPECIALLY FOR CHILDREN! LIQUIPRIN pediatric analgesic-antipyretic was developed to meet the special needs of children for something safer, gentler and less irritating than aspirin.

LIQUIPRIN IS BETTER THAN ASPIRIN FOR YOUR CHILD! LIQUIPRIN contains salicylamide, a pain-relieving and fever-reducing agent of the same type as aspirin ... BUT ... it is chemically different. This difference makes LIQUIPRIN basically safer and ideal for children's use.

safer than aspirin—medical tests and actual hospital use prove LIQUIPRIN does not upset or irritate the stomach ... safe even for children who are upset by aspirin.

gets to work faster—liquids work faster than tablets. LIQUIPRIN also leaves the stomach more rapidly, is more rapidly absorbed, gets to work sooner to relieve your child.

easier to take—children take tasty LIQUIPRIN directly from measured dropper or mixed with fruit juice, milk or formula. No more tablets to crush or dissolve. And what's more, you're sure of giving exact dosage.

non-spill safety bottle

LIQUIPRIN is safer than aspirin and made safer still by a special medicine-monitor in every bottle. Children cannot pour or drink from this exclusive safety bottle.

YOUR DOCTOR KNOWS ABOUT LIQUIPRIN Get a bottle today— at all drug stores— 79¢

*TRADEMARK FOR SALICYLAMIDE SUSPENSION

Johnson-Johnson

NEW IDEA! Add flavor to your KRAFT Jellies

Use them as ingredients to add true flavor of fresh-picked fruit, captured the special KRAFT way!

New Kraft Jellies and Preserves are the ones to use—because they're made to be extra flavorful. Even when Grandma made her wonderful jelly, much of the good fruit flavor boiled away. But Kraft makes jellies and preserves a new, flavor-saving way. They're "cool-cooked" . . . at temperatures 'way below boiling . . . to keep the flavor and color of the fresh-picked fruit! Doesn't using new Kraft Jellies and Preserves as ingredients sound delicious, and easy? Try it!

Tennessee Jam Cake

Cream ½ cup Kraft DeLuxe Margarine. Gradually add 1 cup packed light brown sugar, creaming until light and fluffy. Add 3 egg yolks and mix well. Sift together 2 cups sifted cake flour, ½ teaspoon soda, 2 teaspoons baking powder, 1 teaspoon nutmeg, ¼ teaspoon cloves and ½ teaspoon cinnamon, and add alternately with 1 cup Kraft Pure Seedless Black Raspberry Preserves and ⅓ cup buttermilk, which have been combined. Fold in 3 stiffly beaten egg whites. Pour into 2 waxed paper lined 9-inch layer pans. Bake in a moderate oven, 375°, for 30 to 35 minutes. Frost with Caramel Frosting.

Caramel Frosting. Cream ¼ cup Kraft DeLuxe Margarine. Slowly add ⅔ cup cooled Kraft Caramel Sauce. Gradually add 5 cups sifted confectioners' sugar and stir until well blended.

Kraft Caramel Sauce. Place ½ pound Kraft Caramels (28 caramels) and ½ cup water or milk in top of double boiler. Heat, stirring frequently, until caramels are melted and sauce is smooth. Makes 1 cup sauce.

Jelly Omelet

To 6 beaten egg yolks, add 2 tablespoons hot water and ¾ teaspoon salt, then fold into 6 stiffly beaten egg whites. Pour mixture into well-greased 10-inch skillet. Cook over low heat until the bottom begins to brown, then place in a slow oven, 325°, until top is firm. Crease in the middle, spread Kraft Pure Strawberry Jelly on half, fold other half over it, and place on a platter. Serve at once.

Jewel Bread Pudding

Place 3 cups day-old bread cubes in a greased 1-quart casserole. Combine 3 slightly beaten eggs, ⅓ cup sugar, dash of salt and ½ teaspoon vanilla. Gradually blend in 2 cups scalded milk. Pour over the bread cubes.

Set casserole in a pan of hot water and bake in slow oven, 325°, 1 hour, or until a knife inserted halfway between center and outside edge comes out clean. Top baked pudding with spoonfuls of Kraft Pure Grape Jelly. Serve hot or cold.

3-D Triangle Sandwiches

For each sandwich, spread one slice of whole wheat bread, crusts trimmed, with Kraft Pure Elderberry Jelly. Cover with a second slice of bread spread with Philadelphia Brand Cream Cheese. Cut diagonally into quarters and place, points up, on a plate.

favorite foods with and Preserves!

In all your favorite varieties

Strawberry Coffee Cake

Spread ¾ cup Kraft Pure Strawberry Preserves over bottom of a well-greased 9-inch round cake pan and sprinkle with ¼ cup chopped pecans. Separate the biscuits from 2 packages Ballard or Pillsbury Biscuits and dip in ½ cup melted Parkay Margarine. Place 15 of these biscuits, overlapping, around outer edge of pan. Use remaining 5 biscuits to make an inner circle of overlapping biscuits. Bake in hot oven, 425°, for 20 minutes. Turn out upside-down immediately. Peach Preserves may be substituted for Strawberry Preserves.

Here are many ways to add flavor to baked goods, desserts, main dishes. Write to Kraft Jellies and Preserves, Dept. L3, Box 522, Chicago 77, Illinois.

FREE RECIPE FOLDER!

Is Your Car Crowding Your Budget?

"It could be wrecking it,"
says George Romney,
President, American Motors Corporation

Not long ago we had some young married friends in for dinner. Like most people, they were having "budgetitis."

"I just don't know where the money goes!" Martha exclaimed. "I'm sure I keep household expense down." "Well, I don't overspend on lunches!" said Bill.

"How about your car expense?" I asked. "Have you ever figured what it costs you a year?"

"Why no," they both said. So we figured. Their big new car had cost $3900. They drove about 10,000 miles a year. They average about 12 miles to the gallon. Figuring their original cost, depreciation, gas, oil, servicing, insurance, etc., Bill and Martha were spending close to $1600 a year to keep that big car going.

"But that's more than a fourth of our spendable income," said Martha, flabbergasted. "No wonder we're always broke. What'll we do?"

A New Kind of Car That Saves You Money

"I'd part with that big outsized car," I suggested. "And I'd get a new Rambler AMERICAN, a new kind of car that costs least to buy, own and operate. A Rambler AMERICAN with overdrive just set a new Official NASCAR Economy Record of 35.39 miles per gallon on a cross-country trip from Los Angeles to Miami."

"Why," said Martha, "with that kind of car we'd cut our costs in two, or even better. But is the AMERICAN a little car?"

"No," I told them, "it's just compact. Inside, it's roomier than any small European car, and rides five adults in comfort. It's so simple to service that Bill could do much of it himself."

"When can we look at one?" Martha asked. "Tomorrow," Bill said. "We'll get our budget back on the track again—at our Rambler dealer's."

Why don't you figure your car costs? You may be as amazed as Martha.

George Romney

UNDER COVER

By Bernardine Kielty

DRAWING BY WHITNEY DARROW © 1953 THE NEW YORKER MAGAZINE, INC.

"It certainly makes one realize how insignificant you are."

WOMAN: THE DOMINANT SEX, by Hendrik de Leeuw, I have not read. But the title alone should sell it, besides the fact that the author has been happily married for twenty-seven years. It reminds me of the man about to sail for Italy. He was being seen off by a friend. "It gets very cool in Italy sometimes in the winter," the friend warned him. "Aren't you afraid the climate might disagree with your wife?" The man looked at him levelly. "It wouldn't dare," he said. (Yoseloff, N.Y.)

●

"If he'll only turn out a brave, helpful, truth-telling Englishman and a gentleman and a Christian, that's all I want." These were the words of Squire Brown when he was about to send his son Tom away to school.

I thought about his formula when I read COLLEGE IN THE YARD (Harvard Univ. Press). This is a little book of short essays by Harvard alumni—what they remembered about their years at Harvard, what it meant to them, the people of their day, the life—and it is firmly reassuring. In this day of nationwide uneasiness and discouragement and frequent ill temper, these voices of seasoned active men bespeak the kind of American on whom we can depend. They range from Judge Learned Hand, who graduated in 1893, through the years of John Marquand, Lewis Gannett, S. N. Behrman, Ed Streeter, down into the generation of World War II. These men of parts have written thoughtfully, not hastily, with humor and balance. Harvard at least never stood in the way of making them brave, helpful and truth-telling.

John Harvard, whose name the university bears, was the son of a butcher. He died of tuberculosis in 1638, at the age of thirty-one, and left to the new college of the Puritans his 400-book library, and his estate of about £800. As Charles Eliot once said of him: "One disinterested deed of hope and faith may crown a brief and broken life with deathless fame."

YOUNG MR. KEEFE, by Stephen Birmingham (Little, Brown), is a novel of the younger generation, a 1958 version of Scott Fitzgerald's rich, bright, reckless, unhappy youth. The four protagonists are about twenty-three, and married.

"Look at us!" they say. "When the First World War was fought we weren't even born. When the Second World War was fought we were children. When the Korean War was fought, we were going to football weekends. . . . Anzio Beachhead, Heartbreak Ridge—they're just quaint romantic names. They have no real, personal meaning to us. We weren't even aware! We've contributed nothing. We're a generation that feels the world owes us a living."

This is a good novel of its kind. It's The Beautiful, but not altogether The Damned.

●

What a relief to turn from the modern world to ancient Greece! THE VOYAGE HOME, by Ernst Schnabel, is a breath of youth in the springtime of the world. A man has been shipwrecked, and has swum sixteen hours before he is thrown on an island by the waves and lands in the mouth of a brook where he lies among the grasses exhausted. Morning comes and he opens his eyes to find a maiden gazing at him. . . . Maybe you've guessed. The girl is Nausicaä, and the man Odysseus. On the island there is a near-sighted man who watches Odysseus with kindly interest. He is fast going blind. His name is Homer. . . . This is delightful imagining, especially well written and well translated. (Harcourt Brace.)

●

JOURNAL readers who well remember Katherine, sister-in-law of Chaucer, will be interested to read about Elizabeth, heroine of THE WINTHROP WOMAN, by Anya Seton (Houghton, Mifflin). It is the vitality of both these women that has carried their personalities down through the centuries. Elizabeth, niece of John Winthrop, bigoted governor of the Massachusetts Bay Colony, came to this country as a young widow. Her stormy life reflected the modes and morals of the seventeenth century, not only in Massachusetts and Connecticut but in England, where at least a third of the story takes place. The re-creation of that period has never, that I know of, been so thoroughly done. Every situation and all but two minor characters are true, and in the actual records, in some cases down to their very words. Add to this the grace and glow of a good interpretative mind, and a skillful novelist, and you have a topnotch historical novel.

●

At every tick of the clock, somewhere in the world, a child is born with a crippling disability. . . .* The National Society for Crippled Children and Adults (11 So. La Salle St., Chicago) is distributing, for 25 cents, a pamphlet of especial interest to parents: DID THIS HAVE TO HAPPEN? by Earl Schenck Miers.

●

PUT OFF THY SHOES, by Elizabeth Hamilton (Scribner), is a journey to the Holy Land, in which the author somehow manages to brush aside politics and relive the Bible—both New and Old Testaments—on the hard dry earth trod by its people. It is a short book written in gentle lyrical mood.

●

Jean Kerr's oldest child, Christopher, offered to review his mother's book, Please Don't Eat the Daisies, in school. "Mrs. Kerr has written a book," he read aloud to the class,

THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

"I'm back. The principal doesn't know what to do with me either."

"about herself and her four delightful children. It is very funny, but it is exaggerated to the point of outright lying."

●

And last, NORTH FROM ROME, by Helen MacInness (Harcourt Brace): an American in Rome, a drug ring in the Machiavellian hands of a handsome Italian aristocrat, a tie-up with the Communists, a thwarted love story righted by a swift turn in events, a sense of the continuity of brutality produced by the portrait of an earlier handsome young man of the Renaissance . . . this is a book for both the mystery readers and those who cherish the Italian scene.

It's New! It's Easy!

TUNA PIZZA

Made with Ballard Oven Ready® Biscuits and Pet Milk®

A New Kind of Pizza The Whole Family Will Go For!

Another quickie using Ballard Oven-Ready® Biscuits! Not too highly seasoned for the small fry, yet tangy enough to tempt the grownups! Heat oven to 450° (very hot). Mix ½ cup PET Evaporated Milk, ¾ cup grated Parmesan cheese and ½ tsp. onion salt. Let stand to thicken. Arrange 1 can Ballard OvenReady® Biscuits close together on ungreased baking sheet. With fingers press biscuits together to close spaces, making one big thin biscuit-crust, about 12 in. across. Bake 5 min. at 450°. Remove from oven and loosen crust with spatula, but leave on baking sheet. Spread cheese mixture almost to crust edge; cover with ½ cup tomato sauce or catsup. Drain 1 can (7 oz.) tuna, break into large chunks, and arrange over top. Sprinkle with ½ tsp. oregano. Return to oven for 7 min. or until crust is brown. Serve hot. For variety: In place of tuna, try canned shrimp, sardines, anchovies or mushrooms . . . or cooked sausage or hamburger . . . or strips of salami, thuringer, pepperoni or bologna.

Try these other Ballard quickies: Use Ballard Biscuits on top of meat pies and casseroles. Try 'em for fruit and berry shortcakes—or as a base for canapes. Or just love 'em hot and brown with jams and jellies. There are ten perfect unbaked biscuits in each can. Just a few cents per can. Keep several on hand in your refrigerator.

More biscuit lovers reach for Ballard than any other brand

Just open and bake in 9 easy minutes Sweetmilk or new Buttermilk!

at your grocer's dairy case

Only silver shows you care . . .

Community shows how much!

(Above, top to bottom)

South Seas*, a striking, new idea in silver design. Truly daring, different!

Twilight* has classic grace, with shell motif, tapered handles, curving tips!

White Orchid* is truly feminine. Perfect with your prettiest china, crystal, linens.

Morning Star* is sophisticated, modern, inspired by a priceless jade carving.

* * *

Ballad* (main picture), newest Community pattern . . . elegance in today's manner!

Watch what happens when you set your table with treasured, sparkling Community. The first time, and every time—family and guests will respond to the special warmth that silver alone conveys. Only silver takes, and holds, designs of true beauty for a lifetime. Only Community, extravagantly plated with pure, enduring silver, offers these five beloved patterns in services that cost far less than they look. Choose yours today from the elegant Community collection, at jewelers and fine silverware departments, and start living beautifully tonight!

crafted by
ONEIDA SILVERSMITHS makers of distinctive tableware for your way of life

HEIRLOOM* STERLING
COMMUNITY* SILVERPLATE
ONEIDACRAFT* STAINLESS

*TRADEMARKS OF ONEIDA LTD., ONEIDA, N.Y. © 1958, ONEIDA LTD.

"Dream come true"—new quarters for Children's Arts Program in Milwaukee War Memorial.

VOLUNTEERS BRING FUN AND ART

. . . To Milwaukee Youngsters

Museums for Everybody

By MARGARET HICKEY

The word "museum" in its earlier connotation is about as out-of-date as a suit of armor in the space age. For today's museum does far more than simply preserve and exhibit the great works and truths of history—it also makes them come alive in ways to fascinate even a modern hooky-playing Tom Sawyer.

In Evansville, Indiana, for example, people think of their museum as a "living room": a warm and friendly place to which they enjoy coming time and time again—and where the latchstring is always out. Visitors flock to join the special volunteer-led tours that dramatize the great art achievements of Italy, or the many classes and interest groups designed to include the whole family. There are, for instance, the Frisky and Blossom Club (nature study for preschoolers), Junior Star Gazers, adult astronomy club, photography, stamp and coin clubs—to inspire inquiry into some phase of man's history and environment. A drama group, a music-and-rhythms class, open-house events also are part of the educational program.

Museum Director Siegfried Weng credits women of the Junior Service League, a local group of civic-minded women, for helping make the museum what it is today—a living force in the community. League members initiated the first tours for school children in 1948, agreed to underwrite the education-department program in 1951 with an initial pledge of $4600 plus volunteer help in planning classes, registering children, leading tours and teaching children's classes. (Since then the League has given $40,900 to the museum.)

The people of Evansville in turn have responded. Local organizations and businessmen have contributed money for the planetarium, the only one in the state, and an army of some 250 women volunteers helped collect $600,000 in a fund drive for a new building. Now volunteers and museum staff together are planning for a new sculpture garden, animal shelter, an old steam locomotive that will give two-penny rides to "Nowhere."

In Connecticut, Stamford's Museum and Nature Center has gained a similar reputation simply by living up to its name. To the new $140,000 building (purchased with community contributions) come not only art lovers for tours and lectures and showings of local artists and loan exhibitions, but busloads of boys and girls, teachers and youth leaders for explorations of the 80 acres of beautiful woodland surrounding the museum. Numbers of these youngsters are learning actually to care for animals, wild and domestic, in the "Junior Curator" program. As attendance goes up, many volunteers are offering to help—including a young mother of two who has promised to milk the cow twice every Saturday, the farmer's day off. Director Ernest Luhde sees the museum now as a place where one can "meet both the works of nature and the arts of man." END

It's a crisp Saturday morning in Milwaukee and children from city and suburbs are converging on a big new building on the shore of Lake Michigan. From excited little five-year-olds to poised high-schoolers, they arrive by car, bus, bicycle and on foot. And as they troop in, the strikingly modern lake-front building comes abruptly alive. There's a touch of awe in a fifth-grader's voice as he looks around. "Golly, this isn't much like the old building, is it?" A teen-ager behind him inquires, "What floor for music rehearsals?" Another asks, "Which for art classes?"

The building may be new to the children, but this Saturday activity is not. Saturdays just naturally belong to Milwaukee's Children's Arts Program, familiarly known as "C.A.P." Sponsored by the Junior League of Milwaukee and the Milwaukee Art Institute jointly, it has been called "currently the country's liveliest, most enthusiastically supported children's program in its field."

The new $2,500,000 building is Milwaukee's tribute to her war heroes. "Being here is a dream come true!" enthuses one of the program's volunteer workers.

To C.A.P.'s full-time director, soft-voiced Mary Elizabeth Jones, it is fitting that the program now shares this memorial building Milwaukee is so proud of. "The memorial was built to honor the dead and serve the living," she says. "How better could we do that than by opening the world of the arts to our children—by offering through them a culturally enriched future?"

A towheaded eight-year-old comes hesitantly into the director's office.

"Hi, Janie," Mrs. Jones says. "Lost? Come along and we'll find your teacher."

To Janie and others like her, the Children's Arts Program doesn't mean anything so adult as cultural enrichment. To Janie, C.A.P. simply spells fun. When she visits the children's gallery, pictures are hung at her own eye level (sometimes she herself is the proud creator of work on display). Every object is placed where she can "see" with eager, reaching hands as well as her eyes. If she loves a particular picture in the rental library, a 25-to-50 cent fee makes it hers to enjoy for two weeks. (She takes good care of it too. None has ever been damaged.) She learns how a picture feels as well as how it looks—and the lesson stays in her mind after she draws a "picture" of a favorite song. She learns dimension by molding an object in clay, or by shaping colored paper, cardboard, bits of bright foil, feathers, even twigs and ice-cream-bar sticks into her own mobile. She may giggle as she draws a funny picture of her own face reflected in a shiny curving bowl of a spoon, but as she does it she learns that distortion is part of art too.

After classes and lunch, there's the Saturday matinee which brings together art, music, drama and dance groups. "Art is not one-sided," C.A.P.'s teachers believe. "Each of the arts adds knowledge and appreciation of the others." Today it's a musical puppet show, The Wizard of Oz. Other popular Saturday-afternoon fun programs include plays, concerts, story hours, movies, art, music and dance programs. "And the children are encouraged to participate, not just watch."

"You must see the special show in our gallery," Janie's teacher said. "It is work the children did in response to our experimental television show during the summer."

Janie looked up. "Miss Chris showed us how to make things on TV. Miss Chris and Cappy, the puppet. Cappy lived in a paintpot."

A favorite with the children, "Miss Chris"—talented young teacher Joan Christopherson—conducted her fifteen-minute television show with a studio audience of two children who worked with her on the day's special project. Throughout the city other youngsters worked at home. Closing each program, Miss Chris told the children what next week's project would be and what materials they would need to join in the fun. "Easy-to-come-by materials—plus imagination."

Fifty of the children's creations were chosen for the fall show—first in the handsome new gallery. "But it wasn't easy to narrow the choice. The children were gratifyingly responsive."

The Art Institute's spectacular inaugural show—including works by Rembrandt, El Greco, Goya, Cézanne, Van Gogh, Picasso—was also available to the children via guided tours. (Helpful note to volunteers guiding groups of very young children: "A box of paper handkerchiefs and a map to the bathrooms are musts!") CONTINUED ON PAGE 39

PHOTOGRAPHS BY GEORGE P. MILLER

Beauty in familiar things: Miss Chris exhibits some gay leaves ironed between two sheets of wax paper.

Beauty in music—to the 300 children of C.A.P.'s orchestras, ensembles, chorus "and just listeners."

FARM-FRESH TASTE

from the heart of America's farm lands...

captured by

Stokely-Van Camp!

AMERICA'S SWEETEST-TASTING CORN—lightly flavored with sugar and salt!

- Stokely's Finest Cream Style Golden Corn — Naturally creamy corn from the very heart of the kernel.
- Stokely's Finest Corn on the Cob — 4 hand-picked ears of tender, young corn, vacuum-packed to insure freshness!
- Stokely's Finest Whole Grain Golden Corn — Plump kernels of golden corn. Fresh-from-the-cob flavor!

Advertisement

The Picture of Health for March

by MAXINE DAVIS

At this season of the year, resistance to infection is usually lower, even in the young and healthy. This can affect the feet as well as any other part of the body. Consequently people are likely to be subject to athlete's foot as well as to colds or flu. This became evident when some eminent doctors conducted experiments to determine the efficacy of sanitary measures to prevent the spread of this extremely trying disease. Their tests showed that exposure to infection plays only a small part in causing acute attacks but low resistance is more important. The scientists stressed the advisability of building up local resistance, i.e. individual hygiene, especially care of the skin of the feet.

Even so, I ought to insist that our teenagers buy their own drugs. But I'm spineless. I want to be sure that each has a good supply of OCTOFEN.

Joe's pretty careful; he learned the hard way. OCTOFEN Liquid stopped his athlete's foot infection after he'd been careless, so now he sprinkles OCTOFEN Powder in socks and shoes, and dusts it between his toes after showering, to prevent a recurrence.

Janie knows how miserable her brother was, and that the fungi that cause the trouble are co-educational. She too uses OCTOFEN routinely, because no other fungicide has ever been more successful for preventing or stopping an attack.

Now that Janie and Joe are off to college I'm assuming they also clean their teeth three times a day. I hope I've succeeded in training our progeny to brush their teeth properly. Our dentist taught each one, because the best brushing methods vary with each person.

But I don't trust them to spend their allowances on tooth powder; I give each of them a semester's supply of CALOX when they pack to go back.

We raised them on CALOX. A powder is best simply because it cleans best. Its ingredients are in such excellent balance that you can count on CALOX to clean and polish the teeth and keep the gums stimulated. It makes the mouth feel fresh and pleasant too.

Sally's birthday's this month— the first of her teens. We're giving her her first real party, with mailed invitations and favors. She's also—poor baby—found her first pimple, right on the end of her nose. She showed it to me, in tears.

"Don't you fret, Darling," I told her. "I'll get you some UTOL. You know—that salve your sister uses all the time. It's an antiseptic antibiotic ointment. It'll relieve that itching and irritation and guard your skin against re-infection. Put it under your new foundation cream; then you won't be able to see it yourself. With UTOL you'll have a wonderful time at your own party."

I whirled around my preparations like a satellite in outer space, because I wanted to make Sally's party a memorable one. The weather was bitter and blustery but I was wet as if it were mid-July. I couldn't have enjoyed it without YODORA. The germs that grow in perspiration produce that unlovely smell, but the new YODORA, a deodorant compounded with an antibiotic, stops them effectively. It's a light delicately-fragrant cream, soothing, healing, and, thank goodness, lasting! So I knew I wouldn't embarrass our Sally.

© 1958 McKesson and Robbins Inc.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 37

Three years ago, when the Milwaukee Junior League voted to accept the Children's Arts Program as its new five-year project, many were dubious. Earlier League projects in the social-service field—the Blood Center, the Curative Workshop—had proved their worth. But C.A.P. was a cultural program. Could a cultural program succeed as the others had? Would it duplicate work Milwaukee's public schools were already doing? Would the children themselves respond?

A hard-working League committee answers those questions. "We felt that there was no reason why a cultural program could not be as permanent and rewarding to the community as the social-service projects had," says committee member Anita Webster.

C.A.P. supporters also made it clear that the program would supplement, not duplicate, the work in the city's schools. The children themselves answered the last question: "Would they respond to C.A.P.?"

One October Saturday Milwaukeeans paused, blinked and looked again as they passed gaily decorated roadblocks cutting off the busy downtown street in front of the usually quiet, sedate old Milwaukee Art Institute. A carnival had come to town. A calliope blared toe-tapping circus music. There were gaudy clowns, animals, a carrousel, a magician. There was all the traditional circus refreshment—hot dogs, popcorn, peanuts, pink sugar candy and lemonade. Inside the Art Institute was a Circus Arts show. Wisconsin artists were busily demonstrating their art to fascinated onlookers. Tables of do-it-yourself materials tempted children to try their own hand at creating.

Not only strike while the iron is hot, but make it hot by striking.
CROMWELL

This gala Circus Arts party served a double purpose. It introduced C.A.P. to the public and it marked registration day for the program's first semester. (There are three each year. The $13 fee helps cover instruction and materials. Fifty free scholarships go each semester to children recommended by school principals. Arts for the Visually Handicapped classes are free.)

In its first year 10,000 children enjoyed C.A.P. activities—classes, shows, school gallery tours, movies, parties. "They were learning, having fun, making friends," sums up C.A.P.'s first president, Mary Lou Cook. "And we learned, had fun and made friends right along with them."

Perhaps most rewarding of all the program's birthday plaudits, an expression of gratitude from the mother of a ten-year-old who is totally deaf: "One more way for Bobby to enjoy a well-adjusted, normal life." And from a child's own pen: "Dear Art Lady, thank you for the big enjoyment we get by coming to the art place. We are so happy we will say a prayer for you every day. Love."

For its first two and a half years, C.A.P.'s home was part of the old Art Institute building. It was crowded. Some classes were forced to meet in the basement of a building four doors away. It was gloomy, for all the hopeful brightening accomplished by bucket-and-paintbrush brigades of blue-jean-clad volunteers. "Nothing bothered the children, though. They came early, stayed late," smiles C.A.P. worker Barbara Dexter. With children of her own aged 2 and 3½, trim blond Mrs. Dexter might personify the program's more than 350 volunteers. Most of them are busy homemakers, but to them C.A.P. is so important that if necessary "We just leave the crumbs on the breakfast table." Their enthusiasm has converted husbands into willing "Saturday baby sitters, advisers, toters of heavy objects and car parkers for special events." ("We knew we had to sell our husbands on C.A.P., too, or we were sunk.")

For some time C.A.P. volunteers—singer, teacher and young mother Mrs. Stuart Hoyt was one of the first—talked eagerly of adding

RECAPTURE THAT "RARIN' TO GO"

21 year old feeling!

Prevent secret starvation due to lazy foods.
Bexel "Prime of Life" Program...only pennies a day!

Bexel Vitamins and Minerals help you win against fatigue...played-out nerves.☆

WHAT is the Bexel "prime of life" program? It's daily vitamin-mineral insurance. Even with plenty on your table, you can suffer secret starvation if favorite foods lack proper vitamin-mineral nutrition factors. Without these, you can feel below par—played out—a prey to nerves and minor ills. But when your system gets all the vitamins and minerals it needs every day, you will look fresher, may even look a little younger. As you look better—you feel better—more alive.

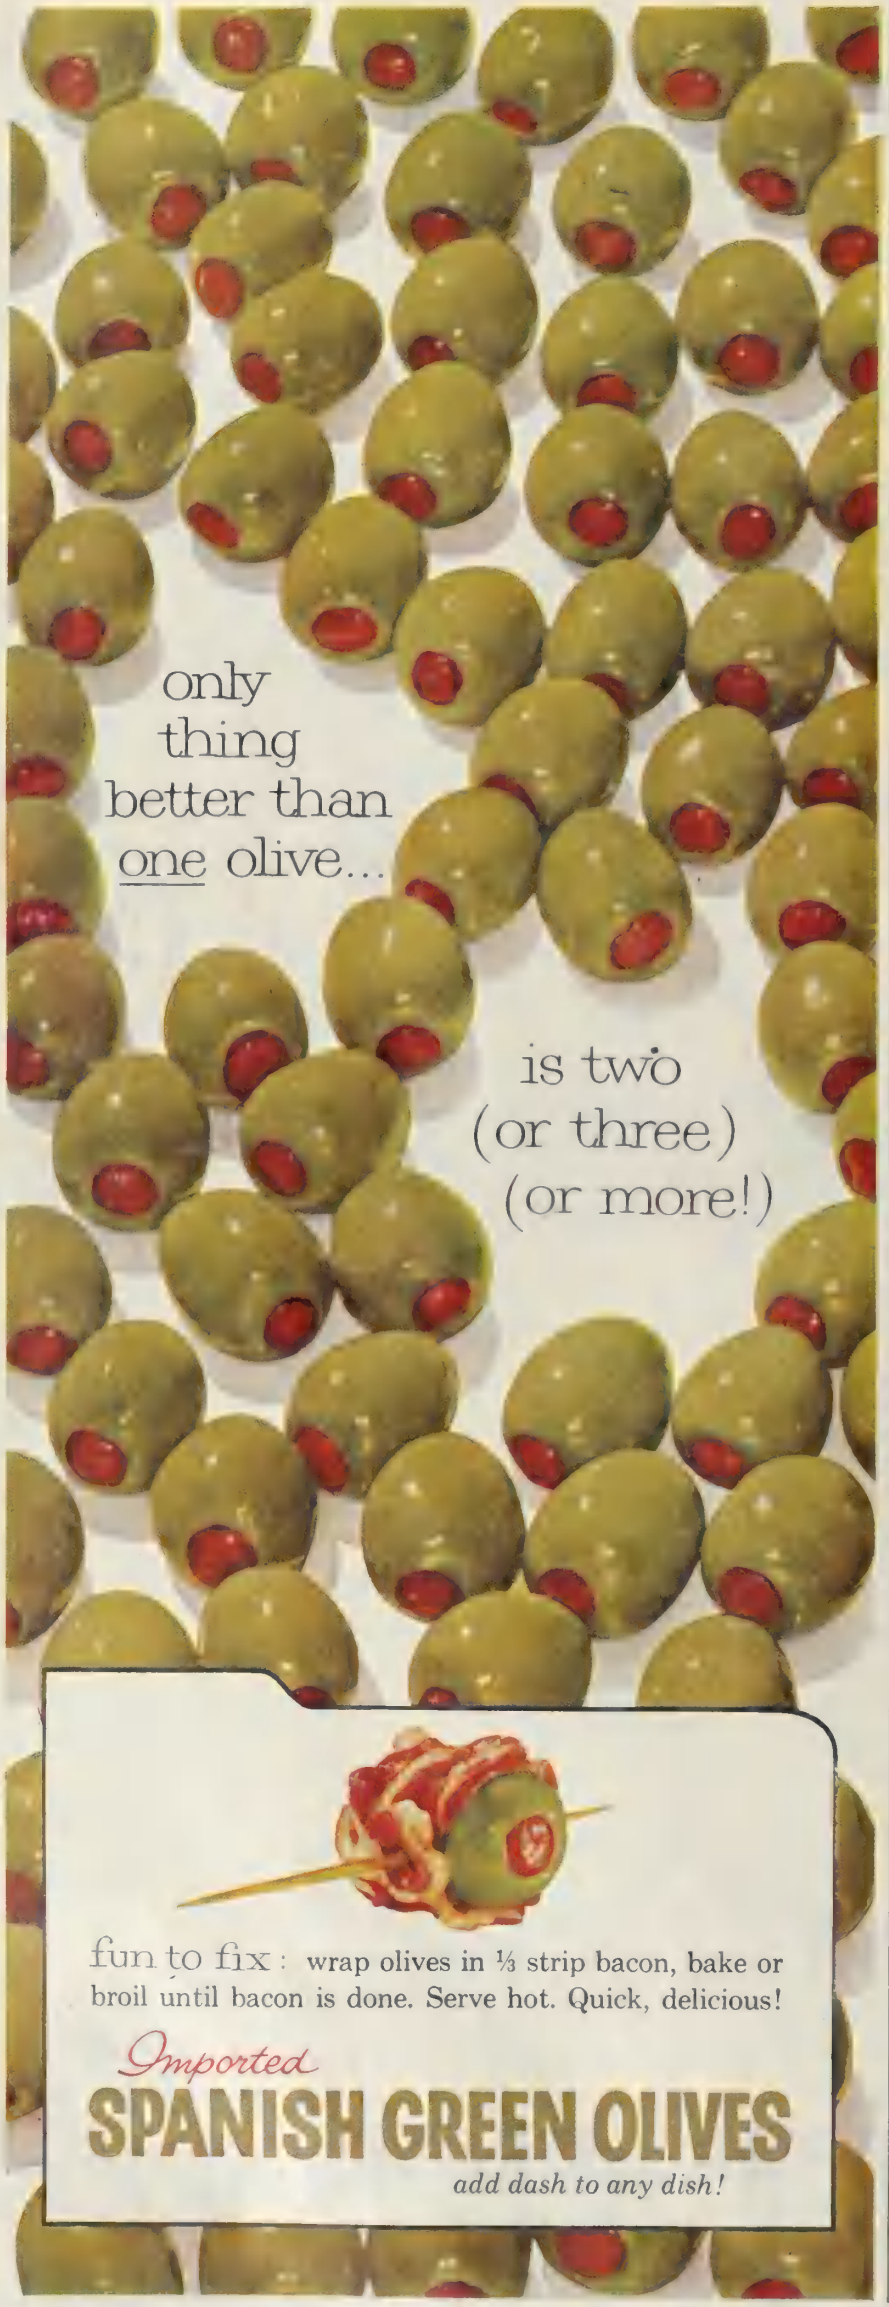
No other vitamins are more carefully controlled to guarantee their full potency.

McKesson controls offer a remarkable integrity in vitamin preparations. Putting full potency into vitamins is our first step in manufacture. Keeping it there requires McKesson's most exquisite care. So McKesson controls make sure that Bexel Vitamins will not "fade" or lose potency on their way to you.

This is why McKesson can guarantee to you, Bexel Vitamins with full potency —Vitamins that really do work toward giving you that wonderful 21 year old feeling!

There's a Member of the Bexel Family for Every Member of Your Family!

Not only for grown-ups—but special Bexel Vitamins, in tiny capsules or delicious syrup, for the Children too! Ask your registered, local druggist about the different vitamin preparations under the Bexel name, made for specific needs and people. Like all McKesson products, Bexel fulfills the pledge: Better... by McKesson.



☆ Don't endure nerves, fatigue, sleeplessness, poor appetite! These symptoms, when due to a vitamin deficiency, occur only when daily intake of vitamins B_1, B_2, and Niacin is less than the minimum daily requirement over a prolonged period. In themselves they do not prove a dietary deficiency, and may have other causes due to functional disturbances. Bexel Special Formula Vitamins contain B_{12} and other essential B vitamins, plus 5 times your daily requirement of iron!

GUARANTEE:
Feel wonderfully better! Either you do, in a month's time or less, or your money will be refunded!

BEXEL BETTER by McKESSON

Available in Canada

music to the program. Their ambitious aim: a youth symphony. "It could well be the foundation of a permanent symphony orchestra. Milwaukee is ready for that now. But"—a warning note—"we'll have to make it just as good as our art program!"

The brand-new music committee included Mrs. Hoyt and sixteen other young women who gave thirty or more hours a week to the job of auditioning children from the city's schools. (Again, C.A.P. stressed that the intent was "not to compete, just to extend opportunities for children." No child was accepted for the youth orchestra unless already enrolled in music classes at his or her school.) Members of the committee gave their time generously, eagerly. "Kids and music," says pretty, enthusiastic Mrs. Hoyt. "What more could you want?"

Discussing the proposed new program over cups of tea one afternoon, four suburbanites, Jane Doud, Alice Klug, Jane Hall and Avis Steinman, decided, "A youth orchestra would be a wonderful thing for Milwaukee. Why don't we raise the five hundred dollars needed to start them off?"

As the 1958 national Easter Seal Child of the National Society for Crippled Children and Adults, Mary Lynne Dunnuck of Yuma, Arizona, represents the thousands of crippled children throughout the nation who are helped through Easter Seal contributions.

The 1958 Easter Seal appeal opens on March 6 and continues through Easter Sunday, April 6.

Their first major fund-raising effort, a fair called Artists at Work, was held at a lakeside estate 30 miles from Milwaukee. Admission, $1. Fifty Wisconsin artists, designers and craftsmen were recruited to exhibit their work. Twenty-five per cent of sales were to be donated to C.A.P., as were refreshment-stand profits. Volunteers sold tickets, acted as hostesses.

"Our wonderful husbands said they'd park cars and direct crowds," brisk, friendly Jane Doud says. "Not that we really expected crowds. We hoped for perhaps a few hundred people."

Almost 1500 swarmed in. "We had a traffic jam. We ran out of food. Youngsters manning the refreshment stand began watering down dwindling supplies of soft-drink syrup 'to make more money for C.A.P.' They were perfectly open about it and customers just grinned and said, 'Why not? It's a good cause.'"

The fair was so successful that it was decided to make it an annual event. The second—with added sponsors including the newly formed Friends of Art of the Milwaukee Art Institute—brought out more than 250 Wisconsin artists who displayed 1000 of their works on clotheslines, rustic fences, in barns, tents, pastures and paddocks. Four thousand

CONTINUED ON PAGE 42

WORLD'S FASTEST FUDGE

1. World's fastest fudge! No cooking! No beating! No testing! It's new "Junket" Quick Fudge Mix . . . the only pre-cooked, pre-creamed fudge mix.

2. Real old-fashioned flavor! You've never tasted fudge so smooth . . . so creamy . . . so heavenly. A luscious treat for the whole family.

FREE! To introduce you to New "Junket" Fudge Mix. Handy fudge setter, shown below. Form perfect fudge squares on wax paper—no pan needed! Send top from package of New "Junket" Fudge Mix to: JUNKET, Little Falls, N. Y.

New!

"JUNKET"® Quick FUDGE MIX

Chocolate • Penuche • Coconut

GRAVY MASTER
MAKES IT EASY
There's No Gravy Or Stew Like Homemade

FIRST

2 oz. to 1 gal.

World's choicest imported olives —first press— make Pompeian your first name in olive oil.

A naturally unsaturated oil—it's better for you

Free recipe book. Dept. L3 Pompeian, Balto. 24. Md.

"We must plan meals with plenty of protein," said Elsie, the Borden Cow

These days it's very important to give your family plenty of high-quality protein.

The body can't store this vital food element that builds and repairs tissue—you must have new amounts every day. And protein is most abundant in Borden's Cottage Cheese.

Serve Borden's Cottage Cheese with your favorite pancakes or on a hot vegetable plate.

With other foods or right from the carton, Borden's Cottage Cheese is delicious—creamy, fresh-tasting, not too sweet, not too tart. And only 15 calories in a tablespoonful!

Get Borden's Cottage Cheese at your neighborhood food store or from your Borden man.

Borden's Cottage Cheese is power-packed with pure protein!

If it's Borden's, it's got to be good!

Borden's Milk • Fine Cheeses Ice Cream • Starlac

See Borden's TV shows, "The People's Choice" and "Fury" over NBC.

© 1958, The Borden Company

even a baby's finger can seal this envelope...

Self-Seal®

ENVELOPES

REPLACEMENT OR A REFUND OF MONEY
Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping
IF NOT AS ADVERTISED THEREIN

the envelopes that seal without licking

You can buy them wherever stationery is sold.

Self-Seal Envelopes were originated by UNITED STATES ENVELOPE COMPANY • Springfield 2, Mass.

World's Largest Manufacturer of Envelopes

The whole family will Enjoy a Vacation in WASHINGTON STATE

Few areas offer the vacationist such a lavish assortment of natural and man-made wonders, and best of all they are easy and inexpensive to enjoy. All are but hours apart via modern highways. You can drive from sea level to ski level in two hours, from a modern metropolis to a primeval forest in three. Our colorful folder "Only Hours Apart" is most interesting. Send for a copy today.

Ages-old Dry Falls

Take a dip in the Pacific

Free folder - Send today!

Washington State Department of Commerce & Economic Development
Gen'l Administration Bldg.,
Olympia, Washington.

Please send your free vacation folders to:

Name_____

Address_____

City _____ State_____

(PLEASE PRINT CLEARLY) 13

friendly WASHINGTON A State of HAPPINESS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 40

people attended. They bought $2500 worth of art at prices ranging from $1.50 for a pen-and-ink sketch to $175 for a Karl Priebe painting. Two Milwaukee artists did 45 on-the-spot child portraits. And one creator of a silk-screen print with a $10 price tag recorded the fair's first $1-down-and-$1-a-month sale—to a guest whose small pension does not allow for much luxury, but who still responds to the need for beauty.

A four-day Artists at Work Fair in a suburban shopping center, with 600 works of art displayed among the hardware, groceries, furniture and fashions, drew fascinated crowds. (From a local merchant it also drew the half-joking comment, "This culture business brings business!")

C.A.P. volunteers worked three shifts a day as guides, collected favorite stories about art's venture into the neighborhood shopping center.

Jane Doud met a boy and girl wandering hand in hand from display window to display window consulting in murmurs, finally choosing a painting. "We're just married," they told her happily. "And this is the very first thing we've bought for our house."

BACKLOG

Householders on the American frontier faced a serious problem in regard to a source of fire. There were no matches, and in damp weather flint and steel were likely to fail. So many pioneers tried to keep a fire burning without interruption for months or years at a time. They actually discovered a way of doing just that. A big green log, placed next to the stones in the back of the fireplace, would smolder for days. Dry wood burned in front of it gave heat, but the fire died out after the last pieces were laid on it at night. Next morning, the backlog would yield embers from which a new blaze could be started. As a rule, the backlog was not used for fuel. But in emergencies it could be pulled out and burned. Consequently, any sort of reserve came to be called a backlog.

WEBB B. GARRISON

"I came to buy some new bath towels," a young housewife said smilingly as her five-year-old son tugged her across the sidewalk to watch artist Robert von Neumann at work on a painting. "And what did I buy? A picture I fell in love with!"

The fair committee worked hard for the success of music in C.A.P. "But we weren't the only ones!" they stress. "Everybody worked. The program belongs to the whole community."

The C.A.P. Symphony Orchestra is a reality now. Formed of 70 of Milwaukee's most gifted music students, its great moment ("so far!") came when it appeared with Wisconsin's renowned Waukesha Symphony, Milton Weber conducting. This was a prideful evening for Austrian-born Mr. Weber too. As C.A.P.'s music director he takes warm pride and pleasure in these youngsters who are learning to love music with his own lifelong devotion. "They always give you more than you ask of them," he says. "They never miss rehearsals. Bad weather can't keep them away." He pauses. "Why, on the hottest day of summer a group of them walked more than a mile to the public library to get books on a music question that had arisen. When you get a response like that, you know you are filling a need."

As well as classroom work—"There's more to music than just playing an instrument"—C.A.P. now has a Prep Orchestra, several ensembles, a choral group called The Capisters. All delight audiences on their public appearances. And, under the auspices of the Milwaukee Art Institute which now assures its $10,000-a-year budget, the program is still expanding. END skin comes alive with the MIRACLE 5* ingredients of

L.O.L.

wonder lotion

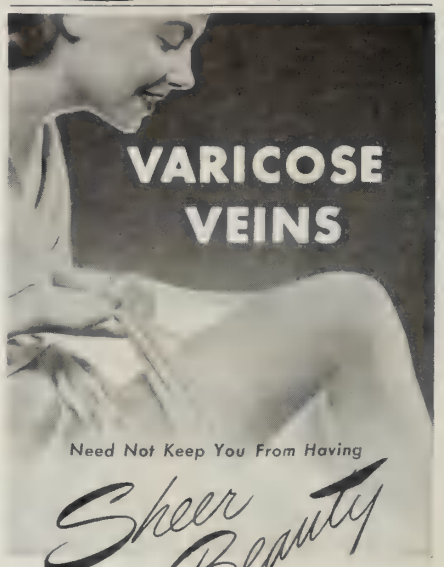
One-step antiseptic lotion goes to work instantly with a penetrating action that clears away oiliness, loosens blackheads, refines pores, soothes skin irritation. Kills bacteria, leaving your skin radiantly fresh and deep down clean.

Quick . . . invisible . . . greaseless.

4 oz., $2.00 8 oz., $3.25

*Organic Sulphur Oil Compound, Resorcinol, Hexachlorophene, Eugenol, Oil of Eucalyptus

Lydia O'Leary



Creator of famous, medically recommended COVERMARK; SPOTSTIK, the miracle cover-up; COLORLES Finishing Powder keeps all foundations from changing color.

Write Department J, LYDIA O'LEARY, INC.
41 East 57th Street, New York 22, N. Y.

FREE WEDDING CATALOG

Everything for the Wedding & Reception!
Invitations • Gifts for the bridal party
Table decorations • Trousseau items
Unusual, exciting personalized items.

Write ELAINE CREATIONS
Box 824 Dept. E-115
Chicago 42, Ill.

Need Not Keep You From Having

Sheer Leg Beauty

See the new Super Extra-Sheer Bell-Horn Tropical Weight Elastic Stockings at all Department, Surgical and Drug Stores. Tropical Weight Stockings are the sheerest made which give the correct support for varicose veins.

BELL-HORN
TROPICAL WEIGHT
ELASTIC HOSIERY

BELL-HORN, 451 N. 3rd St., Phila. 23, Pa.
Send FREE BOOKLET: VARICOSE VEINS

NAME_____

ADDRESS_____ Y

Leading Makers of Elastic Hosiery for Over 100 Years

Save time, save food with this amazingly useful

Carve-n-Saw

Slices bread

Carves roasts and fowl

Saws bones

Cuts frozen food

$1.00

Certified Retail Value $2.95

and the front from any envelope of

LIPTON SOUP MIX

It's a big 12½ inches end-to-end—with a husky, rust-proof chrome steel blade, stainless steel saw. Beautiful rosewood handle is firmly riveted—won't come loose.

Handy! Easy to Use! Carve-n-Saw has dozens of uses . . . it's so versatile you'll wonder how you ever got along without it. Get this useful combination knife and saw for your kitchen. Buy another one for your outdoor barbecue as well.

Carve-n-Saw is a wonderful value! . . . the kind you'd expect to get from Lipton, who gives you such a great value in soup.

There's no soup quite as good as Lipton's. It has such a fresh, home-cooked flavor, and it's so nourishing. Tastes just like the old-time soup-kettle kind, but so delightfully quick and easy to make.

In minutes you can serve any one of Lipton's five taste-tempting soups: Green Pea, Chicken Noodle, Onion, Tomato Vegetable, Beef Vegetable. Enjoy some soon.

Get your Carve-n-Saw now! Take advantage of this exciting offer today! Remember it's a certified $2.95 value for only $1.00. Just send in your money with the front from an envelope of Lipton Soup Mix.

Double-your-money-back guarantee. If you are not fully satisfied with the Carve-n-Saw as represented here, just return it with a note requesting double your money back to Lipton Soups, Box 177, New York 46, N. Y. and you will receive $2.00 for the $1.00 you spent.

HURRY! Offer subject to withdrawal without notice. Good only in U.S.A. and its possessions.

SEND FOR YOUR CARVE-N-SAW NOW!

LIPTON SOUP, Box 1558, New York 46, N. Y.

Please send me ____ Carve-n-Saws. I enclose one dollar (check or money order preferred—no stamps please) and the front from any Lipton Soup Mix envelope for each Carve-n-Saw ordered.

Name _____

Street _____

City _____ Zone _____ State _____

Please allow about 4 weeks for delivery. This offer void in any state, territory or municipality where prohibited, taxed or otherwise restricted.

WALL-TEX "Ming Blossom"

Walls of canvas say nice things about you . . .

That's why so many women are decorating with WALL-TEX. Like any fine fabric, WALL-TEX has texture. It gives life and warmth and color to plain, bare walls . . . just as deep carpeting does to a cold, bare floor.

WALL-TEX won't scratch or tear. The beautiful colors never fade. They're even scrubbable. And the sturdy canvas backing protects the delicate plaster wall beneath.

Send for it. See 200 WALL-TEX patterns at your decorating store. Or send 10c for swatches and Decorating Guide. Columbus Coated Fabrics Corporation, Dept. LHJ-38, Columbus 16, Ohio.

Wall-Tex®
Scrubbable Wall Canvas

IN CANADA: EMPIRE WALLPAPER & PAINT CO.

THERE'S A MAN IN THE HOUSE

By HARLAN MILLER

M. BLANCHARD

"If I ever do stop loving you, I'll let you know."

I almost lost my temper at a burst of rock-'n'-roll music at 7:30 A.M. But it turned out to be Red Krauthoff, the plumber, banging on an iron pipe in the pantry we're remodeling into a bathroom.

My red-haired sister clings to the same hairdo at 37 that she wore when she was 17. I've offered to do something handsome if she'll adopt a simpler coiffure, but she can defend her semipompadour by the hour.

Our youngest has won his grandfather's three-door gold watch, plus $100 in cash, for reaching 18 without smoking or drinking. I claim he was supposed to get the watch at age 21. But I'm outnumbered, and he wants to know what he gets if he doesn't smoke or drink till he can vote.

Our town's high school is discussing the award of a sweater with a letter, like an athlete's monogram, to students with high grades in math and science. Why not give the idea a whirl at Yale, Princeton or Harvard?

My Dream Girl eyed a strip of carrot she picked off the revolving hors-d'oeuvre platter last time I dined her out. "I'm positive," she said thoughtfully, "that carrots have straightened out a lot since I peeled 'em as a girl."

My son-in-law Steve has devised an electronic toy to keep their tots beguiled on trips or when company drops in. It works on batteries, and all sorts of switches flash lights on and off, ring bells, open doors, unveil goblins and toot horns. I hope it prepares 'em for the strains of the brave new world.

A few gems from my collection of tiles are being imbedded in the walls of our new downstairs bathroom, tiles from 10 or 12 different countries. "What if we move?" asks my Princess of Sheer Delight. "With such a bathroom," I ask, "why should we move?"

After a heavy wet snow I gently brushed the snow off some of my wife's favorite evergreen shrubs. Her gratitude astounded me; she instantly promised to make me some potato pancakes within the week.

I suspect our town's women's club could raise just as much money with a tour of a dozen or so choice kitchens as it does with its annual Garden Tour. Especially if ticket buyers were allowed a quick peek into the refrigerator.

As a man who used to be a boy myself once, I'm incredulous at how long a half gallon of ice cream lasts in the freezer of our refrigerator. Privately I'd concede I'm the most predatory ice-cream eater in the family.

Ah, family life! Every action is magnified, mirrored, imitated, exaggerated; rejected, burlesqued, reflected, adopted; mimicked, misunderstood, ignored, and often understood only too well. Ah, family life is where you win your Ph. D.

My savvier friends claim it costs almost $1100 to drive a new car the first year, if you drive 10,000 miles. But I comfort myself thinking what a spanking team of horses would cost, with a shiny buggy, and all the adverse comment. What's the alternative?

I marvel at how much personality an infant cultivates by the time it's 18 months old. Some of the most cantankerous codgers at our town's club don't have as much personality as a little tiny baby.

We've laid down the law, at a conference of dads and moms: Our youngest and his 18-year-old chums must earn 80 per cent of their bicycle-motor scooter-motorcycle-sport car tour expenses or the trip will be canceled, even at the last minute. We'll try to convince 'em travel is more than poring over colored folders.

In our staid little circle there are ladies affectionately known as Tom, Bill, Jack and Joe. Which occasionally makes me fonder of names like Gwendolyn or Esmeralda.

I wished we had a Ben Franklin to send to Moscow to palaver with Khrushchev, and for once the boys at the round table listened. Or even a Justice Hughes or a Henry Stimson. Ben would have remembered that Russians have sensitive skins, too, and sensitive feelings.

Actually, it's up to the women again: The eggheads will save us if the women give 'em the kind of encouragement normally reserved for All-American tackles. We'll even carry the eggheads out of their laboratories on our shoulders.

Among the girls at my Dream Girl's fortnightly Kappa alumnae luncheon, it's unanimous that it's up to Mamie to keep Ike from rushing out hatless to the airport to greet every Tom, Dick and Harry who flies in. He's the boyish, hatless, military type, and Mamie better take command.

If a girl flirts with you at a party, clean and bright, with warm smiles and animated gestures, and touches your arm and your lapel, you think wonderful, that's O.K. But if your wife coquettes like that you simmer and wither with jealousy. (So does the other girl's husband, if he's foolish.)

A faltering scholar next door has promised his dad that his 4-minus in chemistry will become a valiant, shiny 2 on his next report card. I've advised my neighbor to get that promise in writing and lock it in the vault downtown.

At breakfast I was spoofing my loving Dream Girl about the whistles and wolf calls when she modeled a fur clutch cape at the Charity Ball: I claimed I'd hired a claque, which wasn't true. "Should I have slugged the rascals?" I asked. She merely beamed.

After a long argument at dinner with some of our best minds, we reached an odd conclusion: that the logical candidates for 1960 are Dewey and Stevenson, each beaten twice, though it seems more than that. (An advantage for the Republicans: Dewey's past has almost been forgotten.)

A few of our town's individualists think tails and white tie are obsolete; they'd like to wear a white tie with a dinner jacket, because it looks more festive. But the Autocrat of our Lunch Table says yes, the waiters found that out a long time ago.

. . . When my Lady Love shops for hours trying to find me a hairbrush shaped like a pocket comb,

. . . Or my son gives me 31 reasons in writing why I should buy him a hi-fi set with a woofer and two tweeters,

. . . And I study a snapshot of my daughter-in-law, slim and blond, holding Harlan III (one year old) at an airfield in Japan,

. . . Or my daughter's green thumb makes a sensational success of the second lawn she's planted from scratch,

Then I'm content, amiable, a mollified ex-bachelor.

Make a festive dessert the "busy-day" way—

Pudding Cheesecake

No cooking!

the tang of cheese—
the crunchiness of graham cracker crust—
the tart-sweet smoothness of Jell-O Lemon
Instant Pudding!

LEMON PUDDING CHEESECAKE

1 package (8 oz.) cream cheese • 2 cups milk
1 package Jell-O Lemon Instant Pudding
1 8-inch graham cracker crust

Soften cream cheese, blend with ½ cup milk. Add 1½ cups milk and the pudding mix. Beat slowly with egg beater just until well mixed, about 1 minute. (Do not overbeat.) Pour at once into graham cracker crust. Sprinkle graham cracker crumbs lightly over top. Chill about an hour. Serve to 8 delighted people—a real party dessert that you can whip up so easily, thanks to Jell-O Instant Pudding!

Be ready to serve delicious desserts at a moment's notice. Keep all seven flavors of Jell-O Instant Pudding on hand.

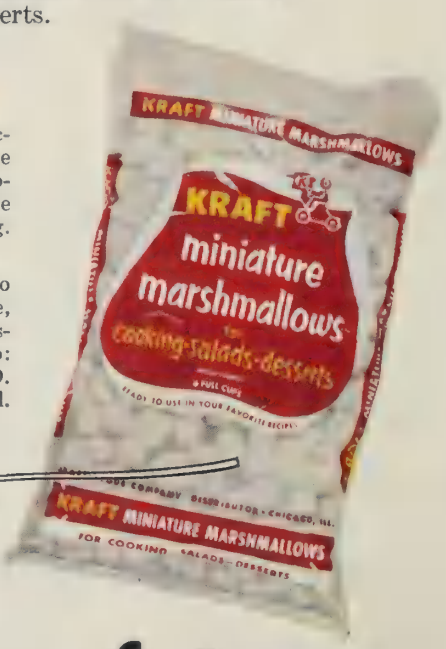
Jell-O is a registered trade-mark of General Foods Corporation

New Marshmallow Time Savers:

Kraft Recipe-size Marshmallows

You don't have to cut 'em up! That's why you get such pretty effects with these tiny marshmallows. Just be sure you get Kraft Miniatures—they don't get hard the way others do—they stay soft and fluffy. And they're so easy to use in salads and desserts!

Sprinkle them over Sundaes. Feature them on Strawberry Pompons (fill sponge cake dessert cups with Kraft Pure Strawberry Preserves, arrange Kraft Miniature Marshmallows around preserves and broil until lightly browned). Mix into juicy desserts.



Ambrosia recipe:

Lightly combine 2 cups orange sections, cut in half, 1½ cups pineapple tidbits, one 3½-ounce can flake coconut and 1½ cups Kraft Miniature Marshmallows. Chill before serving. This recipe serves six.

Free Recipe Booklet! Tells how to make Chocolate Marshmallow Pie, Broiled Marshmallow Frosting, unusual desserts, salads, treats! Write to: Kraft Miniature Marshmallows, P.O. Box 1513, Dept. L3, Chicago 77, Ill.

10 miniatures equal 1 regular size marshmallow

The only kind that stay soft!

In a big crisis, a woman is less apt to "go to pieces" than a man is.

HOW NEUROTIC ARE YOU?

Have you heard that neuroses are a sign of genius? Maybe even considered growing a few of your own? Better read first about the surprisingly common "garden variety" neurotic.

By JOHN E. GIBSON

Just what does it mean to be neurotic? Is it a mixed blessing, or a distinct liability and handicap? How can you tell if you have a neurosis, and what can you do about it?

As a result of exhaustive studies and intensive research, science can now provide answers to such questions. For example:

Q.: What is the difference between a normal and a neurotic person?

A.: One of the best definitions of a normal person is offered by Dr. Earl D. Bond, University of Pennsylvania professor emeritus of psychiatry: "Normal people are those who grow up to focus their energies on main problems." The neurotic person, on the other hand, dissipates much of his energy in emotional conflicts. And the more neurotic he is, the more energy he wastes in this manner. That is why one of the most typical symptoms of neurosis is the tendency to tire easily. The neurotic can—and frequently does—completely exhaust his energy supply without accomplishing anything.

Q.: What effect do neurotic tendencies have on the ability to do creative work?

A.: The fact that many creative artists have neurotic tendencies has caused many to assume that this may be an asset rather than a liability. Evidence indicates, however, that the opposite is true—and that creative persons are successful in spite of these tendencies rather than because of them.

Studies conducted by Dr. Karen Horney, late dean of the American Institute of Psychoanalysis, show that neurosis lowers the level of performance in any type of creative work.

Q.: If a person is neurotic, does that mean he is different—odd?

A.: No. It means simply that (1) he is disturbed by conflicts within himself, and (2) that he has difficulty in adjusting harmoniously to some of the complex aspects of living. Because his energies are diverted by these conflicts, he is less happy, and functions less efficiently than would otherwise be the case.

Dr. Lawrence S. Kubie, professor of psychiatry at Yale, finds that the neurotic process is as inevitably a part of human development as speech and breathing.

Q.: Are bachelors and spinsters more likely to be neurotic than married people are?

A.: Yes. Studies show that they are. A woman usually remains single for one of two reasons: (1) because she can't find a mate; (2) because she finds the idea of marriage distasteful. If a woman doesn't marry because she can't find a husband, she is prevented from fulfilling her natural role in life—and deep-seated frustrations and inner conflicts are bound to result. If, as in many cases, she remains single because of an aversion to marriage, that aversion is more than likely to be the result of emotional maladjustment.

As for bachelors, studies of the noted psychiatrist Dr. Edmund Bergler show that most confirmed bachelors are neurotic, and that their aversion to marriage is actually a symptom of their neurosis.

Q.: Do women tend to be more neurotic than men?

A.: Yes. Leading university studies show that women are much more likely to be emotionally maladjusted than men are, and tend to be more high-strung, more easily upset and frustrated, more given to worry and anxiety. These tendencies, coupled with the fact that women are more introverted and given to brooding, make it more difficult for them to maintain emotional stability.

Though women lack a man's capacity to adjust to the minor irritations and crises of everyday life, studies have shown—paradoxically enough—that when a really big crisis comes along, a woman is less apt to "go to pieces" than a man is.

Q.: Is neurosis related to intelligence?

A.: Yes. Your I.Q. rating has a definite bearing on your chances of being emotionally well adjusted. In a University of Toronto study of 30,000 persons, by far the biggest percentage of neurotics was found among persons in the lower I.Q. brackets. As intelligence increased, maladjustment steadily diminished.

In the upper ranges of intelligence, however, neurosis decreased at a much slower rate. Concludes Dr. John G. Lewan, "While a certain amount of intelligence may be a necessary aid to adjusting in life, very superior Happy - Happy - Happy Meals!

Happy meals, naturally—because only natural white River Brand and Carolina Brand Rice have that natural flavor the whole family loves. And Mom loves them best of all because they're so fast and easy to prepare.

TASTES BETTER NATURALLY!

RIVER BRAND
Popular low-cost medium grain rice.

CAROLINA BRAND
King size extra long grain rice.

COOKS QUICK NATURALLY!

READY TO EAT FAST!
14 Minutes from Box to Plate.
Fast Cooking Recipes on Every Box.

RIVER BRAND RICE MILLS, INC. New York, N.Y. · Houston, Tex. · Memphis, Tenn. · El Campo, Tex. · Eunice, La.

Rich Brown Gravy

with the T-Bone Taste!

Wonderful gravy—every time! It's so easy with B-V. You get the rich meaty flavor only this real meat extract can provide. Directions—short and simple—in every package.

Also try B-V for:

SOUP · STEW · HOT CUP · BURGERS

Wilson & Co., Inc.
Meat Packers, Chicago

END LEG FATIGUE WITH THE ONLY ULTRA-FASHION ELASTIC SHEER NYLON STOCKING* DESIGNED TO SUPPORT!

You've never worn a stocking like Supp-Hose! It's the first fashion sheer nylon support stocking designed to relieve leg fatigue—and it contains no rubber. Every stitch is nylon—nylon with a special twist that gives it a truly elastic quality to lift and support tired leg muscles all day long.

LOOKS LIKE ANY FASHION SHEER NYLON!

Supp-Hose is a new source of fashionable support for housewives, expectant mothers, working women, and women who suffer from varicose veins. Try a pair—see how good your legs will look and feel. And remember, no one will know you're wearing them!

A VERY ECONOMICAL STOCKING!

Supp-Hose costs just one-third what you'd expect to pay. One pair of Supp-Hose should give you 5 times the wear of ordinary nylons. Ask for Supp-Hose in your favorite brand at stores everywhere. Available in proportioned sizes: beige, natural, white.

4.95 pair

Supp-hose†

Chester H. Roth Co., Inc. ® 200 Madison Ave., N. Y. 16 • Sold in Canada, too.

intelligence is not infrequently a handicap, setting off the individual from his fellow men." He points out that the person of superior intelligence is more likely to anticipate difficulties, and worry about them.

Q.: How can you tell if you are neurotic?

A.: If you suffer frequently from "that tired feeling" when you haven't been overworking; if you often wake up feeling as fatigued as when you went to bed—and a physical checkup shows nothing wrong with you—then you may be suffering from a neurosis. A neurosis can—particularly if it is a severe one—dissipate energy almost as fast as the human body can produce it.

Q.: Does our manner of speech give away neurotic tendencies?

A.: Yes. Studies conducted at Harvard University Medical School show that the neurotic's speech is likely to differ from the normal person's in a number of ways. The speech of some neurotic persons tended to be studded with "I this," and "I that," "I want," "I think," "I suppose," and so on. The speech of these persons was also characterized by vagueness.

Q.: Is "doodling" considered a sign that you are neurotic?

A.: No. Studies conducted by the noted psychiatrist Dr. J. G. Auerbach have shown that nondoodlers are mostly those who repress the emotions that they fear—and this causes them to be even more disturbed emotionally. His researches indicate that doodling can provide a normal and healthy means of discharging emotional tensions.

Q.: What makes a person neurotic?

A.: Neurosis stems basically from personality conflicts, and failure to adjust harmoniously to life. Lack of sleep or an inadequate diet may also contribute. In experiments conducted at the University of Minnesota, subjects were fed a diet low in nutritional values. Almost 90 per cent developed marked neurotic tendencies—and in some cases mental and emotional instability became extreme.

A woman's advice is not worth much, but he who doesn't heed it is a fool.
PEDRO CALDERON

Q.: If you're neurotic, what can you do about it?

A.: Here are six basic rules which authorities say aid in adjustment:

1. Avoid constantly complaining about life. Remember no one is exempt from daily irks or irritations, at home and at work.

2. Avoid self-pity. A good antidote for this is honesty combined with a sense of humor. Try to take yourself less seriously.

3. Avoid looking for motives in people. Stop speculating about hidden meaning behind what people say and do.

4. Avoid exalted standards. When our personal standards for success are too exalted for our abilities, we block our way to self-esteem. Conflict and frustration are bound to result.

5. Avoid continually analyzing yourself and your thoughts. Don't always try to figure out why you do everything.

6. Avoid poor and improper diet and get adequate sleep. These factors have an important bearing on emotional stability.

If you have great difficulty in following these rules, you may need professional help.

Remember that, as the National Association for Mental Health has pointed out, people who are happy and well adjusted have the following characteristics: They feel comfortable about themselves; and have a tolerant, easygoing attitude toward others. They neither under- nor over-estimate their abilities. They don't expect to be perfect; and can accept their own shortcomings.

They expect to like and trust others, and take it for granted that others will like and trust them. They respect the many differences they find in people. They shape their environment whenever possible, adjust to it whenever necessary. They set realistic goals for themselves, put their best effort into what they do, and get satisfaction out of doing it. END

GOLDWATER'S
Phoenix, Ariz.

KERR'S
Oklahoma City, Okla.

MORTON WILLIAMS
Tampa, Jacksonville, Fla.

Rhythm Step

JOHNSON, STEPHENS & SHINKLE SHOE CO., ST. LOUIS, MO.

Free planning help

Western Vacations

Greatest Fleet West

Top scenery and service on Super Dome HIAWATHAS and Western "CITIES" Streamliners.

- ☐ Pacific Northwest—Coulee Dam; Seattle-Tacoma with Puget Sound, Mt. Rainier, Olympic Peninsula.
- ☐ Yellowstone National Park
- ☑ California-Nevada—Las Vegas—Los Angeles—Santa Barbara—Carmel—Yosemite—Sequoia—Reno—Lake Tahoe—San Francisco.
- ☐ Salt Lake City—Mormon Capital. Arizona-Utah Parks: Zion—Bryce—Grand Canyon north rim.
- ☐ Colorado Rockies—Denver—Rocky Mt. Parks—Colorado Springs—Pikes Peak—Garden of the Gods.
- ☐ Western Dude Ranches
- ☐ Escorted Tours—wide variety.

H. Sengstacken, The Milwaukee Road
719 Union Station, Chicago 2, Ill.
Please send free literature checked.

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ Zone____ State____

THE MILWAUKEE ROAD

Unretouched photo of the hands of Mrs. Michyl Veach, St. Louis, Mo. Only right hand was given Jergens care.

PROOF: A few drops stop "detergent hands"

In a scientific test*, over 450 women soaked both hands in detergents three times a day. In several days, left hands not treated with Jergens Lotion became coarse and red. But right hands, treated with Jergens, stayed soft and lovely. No other lotion similarly tested kept hands so soft and smooth. Jergens Lotion stops all chapping and dryness. It doesn't merely "glove" your hands with sticky film... it penetrates to help replace the natural moisture lost to wind and weather, indoor and outdoor chores. No wonder it's the world's most popular hand care! Only 15¢ to $1.

Notice to doctors and dermatologists – for summary of test write The Andrew Jergens Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.*

How can you foresee that your marriage is going on the rocks?

By CLIFFORD R. ADAMS, Ph.D.
Pennsylvania State University, Department of Psychology

TROUBLE AHEAD

"Two weeks ago my husband told me he was no longer happy in our marriage of five years, and that when he started a new job the first of the month, he was leaving me for good. It was a terrible shock. I was too numb to think, but there was nothing I could do anyway. He signed over the house to me and gave me most of our savings and he's gone. He's not pressing for a divorce, just told me I could use any grounds I wish.

"Looking back, I can see why I didn't make him happy, but it's too late. Why didn't I see what was happening while there was still time to do something about it? Aren't there ways a wife can tell when her marriage is headed for trouble?"

A recital like this is always distressing to a counselor, because he knows that there is a good chance the marriage could have been restored, if only the wife had become aware of the danger earlier. As she supposes, a marriage almost never comes to a sudden or dramatic end without previous symptoms of trouble.

But too often the danger signals are ignored or overlooked altogether. Immersed in the details of household routine, preoccupied with job or other outside interests, concerned with the care of her children, many a wife neglects the most vital element of all in marriage, the quality of her relationship with her husband. Here are some warnings that no wife can afford to overlook:

Lack of confiding. The opportunity to confide fully and freely in someone you love and trust is one of the deep satisfactions of marriage. Almost all newly married couples delight in sharing confidences. As time passes, fewer details are necessary, but the happily married pair continue to share hopes and disappointments, thoughts and feelings. If either mate is increasingly indifferent or reluctant to talk things over, the other should ask why. When the habit of confiding is broken, one of the strongest bonds between husband and wife is destroyed.

Deteriorating sex relationship. Few couples achieve a perfect sexual adjustment from the start, but gradually, as mutual understanding develops, the physical expression of love becomes more rewarding for both. The consistent failure of either to achieve satisfaction in the sex relationship is always a matter of concern. But a decline in sexual responsiveness (except as it accompanies age) is even more significant, and suggests trouble in other aspects of the marriage.

Inadequate companionship. In the first months of marriage, the typical young husband and wife want to spend all their time together. As they settle down to workaday routine, this becomes impractical and, beyond a point, undesirable. But the quality of their companionship is far more important than the amount of time they spend together. If either frequently spends time away from home unnecessarily, if they find it hard to carry on a conversation, share few friends, show little interest in each other's activities, they are losing their capacity for companionship. It is up to the wife to take the first step by enhancing her desirability as a companion.

Absorption in other interests. The conscientious mother must necessarily devote much of her time and energy to her children, the working wife to her job. Civic duties may cut into her leisure. But the wise wife and mother always remembers that her husband comes first. Signs that she is failing to do so may be his increasing irritability, growing preoccupation with sports or other activities, indifference and lack of co-operation in the home.

Increasing independence. This is likely to result when there is little confiding and companionship, and too much preoccupation with outside interests. Though every mature adult wants to be self-reliant, the loving husband and wife do not want to be independent of each other. For when they are, they are following separate paths.

Inferior housekeeping. An indifferent housekeeper may be an excellent and beloved wife; but again, it is the trend that is important rather than the condition at any given moment. The wife who becomes increasingly slipshod in her housekeeping is not only neglecting her husband's physical comfort, she is also subtly showing disrespect for him.

Almost certainly the wife whose letter we quoted failed in one of these areas, and probably in several. Yet none of them is difficult to identify, or impossible to improve.

If you have any doubts about the progress of your marriage, the accompanying quiz may help you evaluate the gravity of the problem. Rereading this discussion may then suggest the area of difficulty and offer some hints for improvement.

DON'T USE JEALOUSY AS A WEAPON

Donna took full blame for the crisis that threatened her marriage of less than a year. She had deliberately tricked Ted into thinking she was interested in another man, and now he was ready to call it quits.

"When we'd been married three months, Ted was transferred to a strange city. With his new duties and his own ambition, his job took up almost all his time. He was away two or three days a week, and even when he was at home he was usually so busy writing reports or working out plans that I began to feel his job was more important to him than I was.

"Before Ted and I were engaged, I occasionally dated Frank, and Ted always seemed a little jealous of him. I thought if I could make him jealous again, he would pay more attention to me.

"So I wrote Frank a fat letter, pretty mushy, and saying a lot of things I didn't mean. I never intended to mail it, but I addressed and stamped it, and then left it, face up, where Ted would see it. When he found it, I pretended to try to get it away from him.

"Ted tore it open. When he read it, he turned white, and said if that was the way I felt, I could have Frank—he was through. I've told him over and over that I never intended to mail the letter, and that I didn't mean the things it said, but he won't believe me. He is being transferred again next month, and he says he won't take me with him. Yet I love him dearly, and I know he loves me. What can I do?"

Obviously, the first step was to persuade Ted to talk over the situation with someone not emotionally involved. Finally, but reluctantly, he came to see me. He said, "She insists she never meant to mail the letter. I don't believe her. But even if she's telling the truth, she couldn't have written that letter if she loved me. I can't ever trust her again."

After several conferences, Ted calmed down enough to admit that Donna might be telling the truth, that the letter had been merely a foolish, childish trick which backfired, and which she sincerely regretted. But he still didn't see how she could be so stupid as to risk their marriage for a prank if she really loved him.

I explained that intelligent people often behave foolishly when they are emotionally upset, that Donna's loneliness and fear of not being loved had driven her to take a step she would have condemned in anyone else. Gradually, Ted saw that his reactions, too, had been governed by emotion rather than reason, and that the facts as he now interpreted them gave him no reason to doubt Donna's love or loyalty.

When he took the new job, Donna went with him. Her Christmas greeting was optimistic and brought the news that she was pregnant and both she and Ted were very happy about it.

Men, more often than women, inspire jealousy in their wives without consciously intending to. Particularly if his wife is hypersensitive or somewhat unsure of herself, a man may upset her painfully by singling out one woman for his attentions at a party, or by overenthusiastic comments about her appearance, talents, conversational skill. The thoughtful and perceptive husband avoids giving his wife any ground for jealousy.

But women, more often than men, deliberately try to arouse their husbands' jealousy, primarily as a means of getting attention. Their inward purpose (usually unrecognized) is to reassure themselves of their husbands' love. But jealousy is a dangerous and destructive emotion. Instead of fortifying and renewing the husband's love, too often it leads to doubt, suspicion and resentment.

Donna's story promises a happy ending. She saved her marriage by her willingness to accept responsibility, her candor in explaining her behavior, and her promptness in seeking professional help. But it was a near thing and a painful experience, and it might have turned out differently—many stories of jealousy do.

If you are lonely and need more of your husband's time and attention, tell him so honestly but without complaining. But don't try to get what you want by making him jealous, or by any other trick. Scheming has no place in a relationship of trust.

DO YOU AGREE?

Is sex love?

No, but the deepest expression of love is sexual.

ASK YOURSELF:

Are We Headed for Trouble?

People who are repeatedly involved in accidents are often considered "accident-prone." By this, we mean that the real reason for their mishaps may be that they are worried or emotionally upset. In the same way, we might describe as "trouble-prone" marriages characterized by certain symptoms of conflict and inner stress. Unless the difficulty is identified and corrected, a crisis will probably arise. Honest answers to these questions will help you find out how secure your marriage really is.

Does Your Husband Occasionally:

1. Get on your nerves?
2. Fight about trifles?
3. Evade the truth, or lie to you?
4. Say you are cold and unresponsive?
5. Keep things from you?

Do You Occasionally:

6. Feel lonely and neglected?
7. Wish you hadn't married him?
8. Deliberately try to outwit him?
9. Taunt him about other men?
10. Let the housework get out of hand?

Do You and He:

11. Often argue in front of friends?
12. Dislike staying at home?
13. Like to hurt each other?
14. Have different ideas about most things?

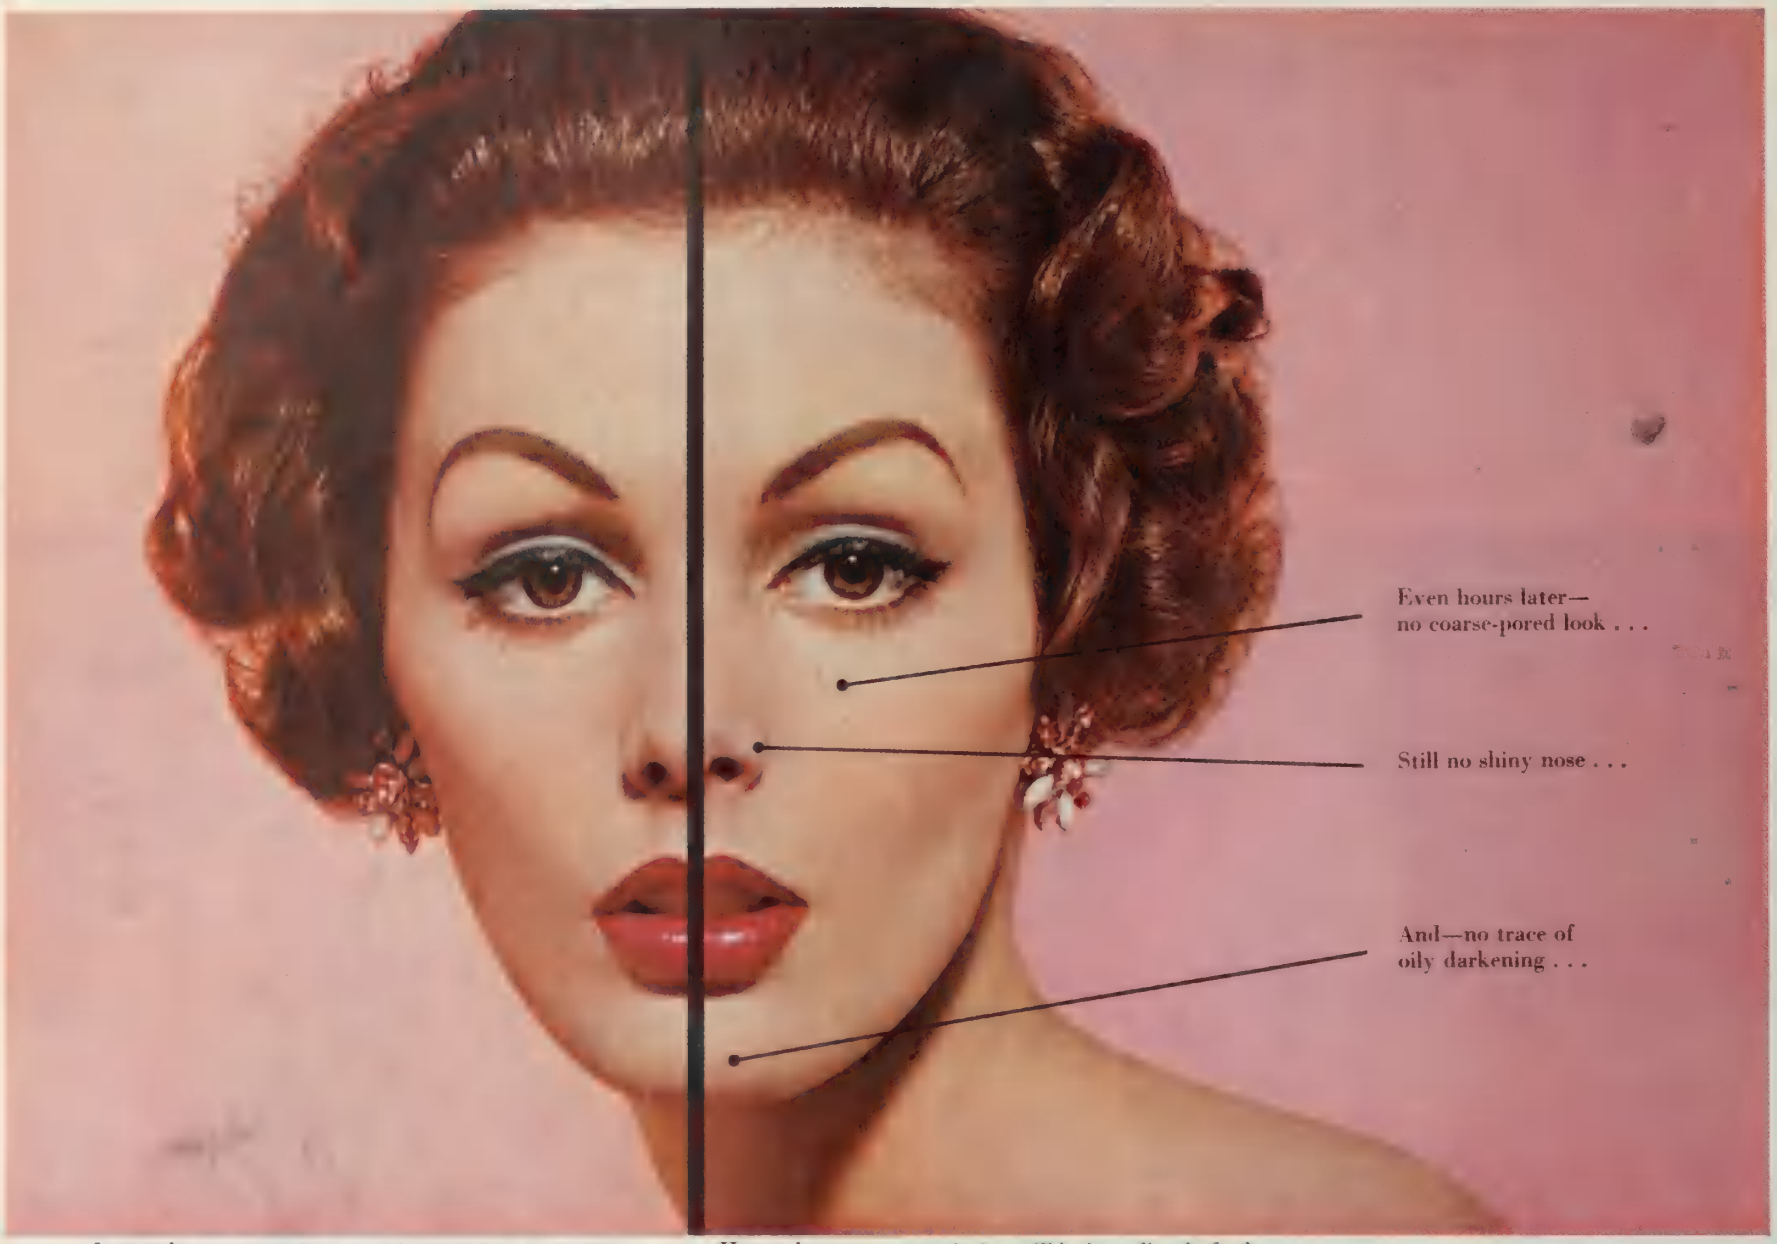
Credit 2 points for each definite "No" answer and 1 point for each "No" answer about which you feel doubtful. A "Yes" counts zero. If your total score is 23 or more, your marriage appears to be solidly established. The average wife scores 20 or 21. If your score is 16 to 18, trouble may be ahead, but if your score is 15 or less, your marriage is already in trouble. It will take determined effort and real help from your husband to improve matters. Any delay may well prove disastrous.

Beautiful Hair is Healthy Hair

BRECK BANISH

DANDRUFF TREATMENT SHAMPOO*



NEW...A BEAUTY SHAMPOO THAT BANISHES DANDRUFF

This clear golden liquid shampoo has a unique two-way action, it gives your hair a lovely, soft new luster—and with regular use assures you of freedom from dandruff. Clinically tested Breck Banish, containing 22T4, leaves its influence on the scalp even after you rinse. It protects the scalp between shampoos—prevents the formation of new dandruff. Ideal for all the family, Breck Banish is non-drying, pleasantly scented, leaves no harsh or irritating effects. Use it regularly at home or at your beauty shop. Your hair will shine with new beauty. Beautiful hair is healthy hair.

COSTS NO MORE—DOES TWICE AS MUCH . . . Breck Banish gives you both new hair beauty and freedom from dandruff. Available at beauty shops or wherever cosmetics are sold. 8 oz. $1.50

Copyright 1958 by John H. Breck Inc. *Patent Applied For

JOHN H BRECK INC • MANUFACTURING CHEMISTS • SPRINGFIELD 3 MASSACHUSETTS • NEW YORK • CHICAGO • SAN FRANCISCO • LOS ANGELES • OTTAWA CANADA

Instantly your skin takes on a luscious new perfection . . . so velvety you don't even need powder!

Hours later your complexion still looks radiantly fresh. This amazing new liquid make-up never turns greasy!

DISCOVERED . . .

a really long-lasting liquid make-up!

Its radiant glow never turns shiny . . . so velvety you don't even need powder!

Glow that lasts. Now—you'll never look faded again. Think of it—a beautifully flattering "cover-up" that stays fresh-tinted all day. New Angel Touch won't fade off . . . won't streak or muddy on your skin.

Luscious finish that clings! Now you'll never look shiny again. New Angel Touch is creamy-smoothing—but never greasy. No need to blot up extra oiliness with powder. Angel Touch stays velvety-fresh without powder.

Squeeze out one drop at a time! Now—no waste, no spilly mess. In heavenly new squeeze bottle that gives just the amount you want. Won't leak in your purse!

Stunning new squeeze bottle

6 "Love-Light" shades
59¢ or $1.00 plus tax

POND'S Angel Touch

You Actually Walk On Air! This modern miracle of walking ease—Dr. Scholl's Ball-O-Foot Cushion for men and women—relieves pain, callouses, burning, tenderness at ball of foot. The cushion, not you, absorbs shock of each step. Loops over toe—no adhesive. Flesh color. Washable. Only $1 pair. At Drug, Shoe, Dept., 5-10¢ Stores and Dr. Scholl's Foot Comfort® Shops. If not obtainable locally, send $1.00 direct to DR. SCHOLL's, Dept. 78B, Chicago 10, Ill.

in the BLACK HILLS of South Dakota

WRITE FOR FREE COLOR FOLDER!

Simply, eloquently the Black Hills Passion Play portrays the last seven days of the Christus. Played by the incomparable Josef Meier, cast of hundreds—the Black Hills Passion Play inspires thousands. This year, vacation in the Black Hills wonderland. See the Black Hills Passion Play.

SOUTH DAKOTA DEPARTMENT OF HIGHWAYS
H. U. Dixon, Pub. Dir., PIERRE, SOUTH DAKOTA

"WHERE'LL I GET THE CASH?"

HOW many times have you asked yourself that question when you are faced with household expenses that have to be met? We would like to suggest an answer that can mean increased income for you.

By selling magazine subscriptions, you can earn generous commissions. Many of our representatives earn more than $5.00 a week in their spare time—and you can do the same! Just send us your name and address on a postal, and you will receive our offer and easy-to-follow instructions.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
303 Independence Square
Philadelphia 5 Pennsylvania

OUR READERS WRITE US

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 4

to sacrifice your own feelings—even though you will never see your child again.
Name Withheld

Columbus, Ohio
Although my parents were heartsick when I became pregnant, they did bear up and have loved my baby as much as they would any grandchild. People can be kind. I plan to marry very soon, and my fiancé also knows and understands. I hope I will be a better wife and mother because of my mistake. Name Withheld

Detroit, Michigan
It seems to me we are attempting to solve this problem in the wrong way. To the male we tend to give privilege; to the female, responsibility; we hold responsible the one who is hurt rather than the one who hurts. When a man has planted the seed, it should be expected that he nurture the crop. The girl who needs the role of wife and mother and the child who needs parents should not be sacrificed to the weakness of our males! MRS. B. W.

Indianapolis, Indiana
I wish that some of us well-meaning, shocked, suspicious-minded and tearful people would use the good old Ozark brand of honor due a newborn baby and prevent anyone from robbing it of its God-given parents. Our American way of life was not built on the concept that young people are free to love, live with and leave anyone of their choice; and I can think of no greater news than for this educated couple to be together with their baby girl, whether it be a shotgun wedding or a social worker accomplishing the impossible. MRS. WALT DAVIS

Jamestown, New York
Surely there isn't one person on this earth who can judge this girl or others who have made the same mistake. Those who can, stop and ask yourselves where your children are and what they are doing at this very moment or what they will be doing in the future. Do you really know?
Name Withheld

Riding High

Alliance, Nebraska
Dear Editors: The JOURNAL has many adventures, I know, but I thought you might enjoy this print of it "riding high."

Journal and friend.

I had just found the new copy on the newsstand, and couldn't wait to see inside. It went with us through Yellowstone National Park and the Grand Tetons too! Sincerely,
ISABELLE M. ANDERSON

Here's That Question Again!

Dover, Delaware
Dear Sirs: Since you asked Ogden Nash "Why Aren't Women More Like Men?" I feel that women should be given equal space in which to reply to Mr. Nash, Mr. Harrison, Mr. Shaw, and to Mr. Allan Jay Lerner, who has given us (and we thank him from the bottom of our hearts!) one of the finest musicals of all time.

1. "Why can't a woman be more like a man?"
   Do men really want that?

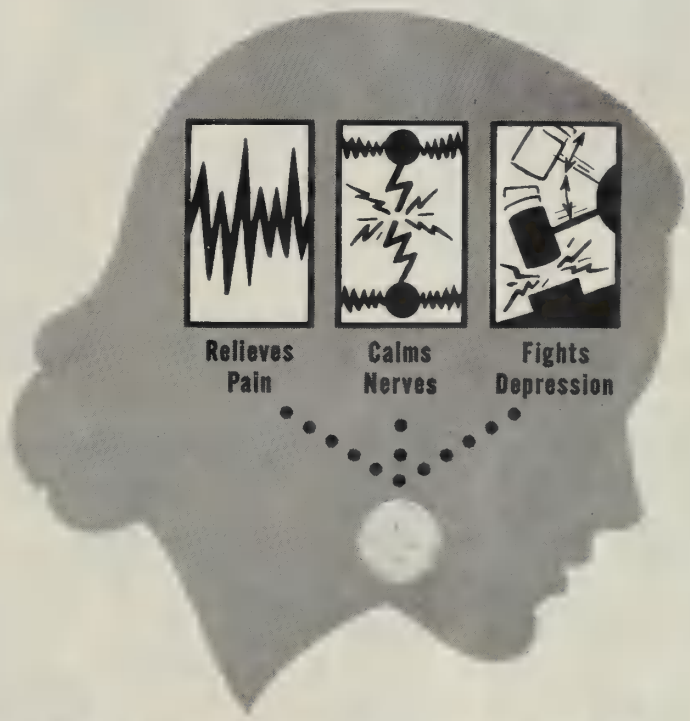
Here's why

ANACIN®



gives better TOTAL results in

PAIN RELIEF

better than aspirin...
even with buffering action

BECAUSE ASPIRIN contains only one pain reliever..... ADD BUFFERING ACTION and you still have only one.

BUT ANACIN relieves pain, calms nerves, fights depression.

Anacin is like a doctor's prescription. That is, Anacin contains not just one but a combination of medically proven active ingredients. Anacin (1) gives fast relief from pain of headache, neuritis and neuralgia. (2) Calms jittery nerves—leaves you comfortably relaxed. (3) Fights depression. Thus, Anacin gives you better TOTAL results in pain relief than you get from aspirin, even plus buffering action. And Anacin does not upset the stomach. Buy Anacin Tablets today.

3 out of 4 doctors recommend the ingredients of ANACIN

Special spice offer available with Unicap* multivitamins

Start a spice collection while building your family's health.

Unicap—for 18 years America's leading vitamin preparation—now makes a special offer with every economy-size 250 bottle.

These handsome Unicap bottles make ideal spice jars. Now, a coupon offering you a set of 16 attractive spice labels—and a book with 150 enticing recipes for spice cookery—goes along with every Unicap 250 bottle. The labels and cookbook are yours just for the cost of handling and mailing. See your local pharmacist for your Unicap Multivitamins today!

*TRADEMARK, REG. U.S. PAT. OFF.

For free booklet "Vitamins Do Make a Difference," write The Upjohn Co., Dept. 810A, Kalamazoo, Michigan

STOP PAIN INSTANTLY COMBAT INFECTION-PROMOTE HEALING WITH ANTISEPTIC

Campho-Phenique

(PRONOUNCED CAM-FO-FIN-EEK)

WHEN USED ON MINOR BURNS, CUTS SCRATCHES, ABRASIONS

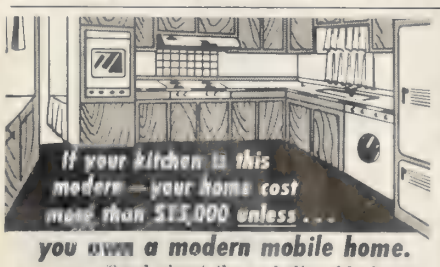
Quick! Apply Campho-Phenique at once to minor burns from hot cooking utensils, hot water or steam . . . stops pain instantly, promotes rapid healing. The same thing happens when you use it on minor cuts, scratches and abrasions. Campho-Phenique is highly antiseptic. Wonderful for fever blisters, cold sores, gum boils; to relieve itching and to guard against infecting insect bites. Used on pimples, Campho-Phenique helps prevent their spread and re-infection.

New DANDRICIDE Rinse Stops Dandruff Longer Than Any Shampoo or Tonic

. . . or your money back!

Shampoos or tonics merely dissolve dandruff scales, only to have them return in a few days. New Dandricide rinses loose dandruff OUT, really cleans the scalp, fights the fast return of unsightly, itchy dandruff as no shampoo or tonic can!

Concentrated to last longer! Easy to use!



Because it's concentrated, you get 12 Dandricide rinses in a $1.00 bottle. Just mix with water as directed, rinse and that's all! Good for men, women and teen-agers.

Get Dandricide at beauty and barber shops, drug and department stores. $1.00 bottle lasts for months! Dandricide is money-back guaranteed to keep dandruff away longer than any shampoo or tonic you have ever used. Buy a bottle today!

For trial bottle of Dandricide, mail your name and address plus 25¢ to Dandricide Co., Dept. LH3, 114-12th Street, Brooklyn 15, N. Y. and you will receive a generous three-rinse size bottle. Do it now!

$1.00 For a 3 months supply

you own a modern mobile home.

6-month trial subscription $1.00

Read about the unbelievable luxury and economy of mobile living. Get the facts on mobilehomes first hand — from people who live in them.

Only $3.00 for two years.

TRAILER TOPICS MAGAZINE

Suite 1591, 28 East Jackson Blvd., Chicago 4, Illinois

ROOT YOUR OWN CUTTINGS IN SAND

in a box, greenhouse, or hotbed. Scientific Instructions copyrighted, $1.00. It is easy in an amazingly short time to root cuttings of Camellias, Azaleas, Gardenias, Roses, Evergreens, and other plants in sand, any time of the year with our instructions. This information cost us thousands of dollars, and years of experience and costs you only $1.00. Postpaid.

SPURGEON PICKERING, Dept. LHJ-B3, Biloxi, Miss.

2. "Men are so honest."
So—where were you last night when I called the office?

3. "So thoroughly square."
We hate to admit it, but they are square a lot of the time.

4. "Eternally noble."
We'd like a little less nobility and a little more reality.

5. "Historically fair."
Napoleon was fair? Hitler? Genghis Khan? Henry VIII?

6. "Always give your back a pat."
And not only your back!

7. "So pleasant."
Not before that first cup of coffee, they aren't!

8. "So easy to please."
I don't know why I gave you that tie. I just thought you'd like it.

9. "Friendly, good-natured and kind."
To stray dogs and lonesome blondes.

10. "A better companion you never will find."
But, dear, I'd like to go camping in the woods with you.

11. "Decent."
What were you men laughing at over there in the corner?

12. "Regular chaps."
We admit they want their dinner on time, but what husband bounces out of bed at the first sound of the alarm so that he won't be late to work?

13. "Ready to help you through any mishaps."
They may be ready, but they're just never around when catastrophe strikes.

14. "Buck you up whenever you are glum."
I don't want to be bucked up. I just want to cry!

15. "Be a chum."
Uh-huh. We've all heard that one.

Very sincerely yours,
MRS. GEORGE P. BRETT III

Social Security Benefits

Baltimore, Maryland

Gentlemen: In "Suddenly a Young Widow" (October JOURNAL), the author states that by earning $1,820 a year, Mrs. Morlang would have to give up her share of the family's Social Security check for eight months. This statement is misleading: the total benefits payable to the Morlang family would be $75 a month, whether or not Mrs. Morlang was working, and regardless of the amount of her earnings. (Although she would give up her share, the children's shares would be increased to compensate.) Some of your readers may not know that when more than four members of a family are receiving survivors insurance benefits, the fact that one of them goes to work does not reduce the total family payment.

Your article certainly shows that old-age and survivors insurance is extremely important to young families. The average payment to a widow with five children, however, is $139 (maximum $200), and more than nine out of ten mothers and children have this protection under the law. (A family may receive less because of brief employment and low wages.)

Sincerely yours,
VICTOR CHRISTGAU
Director, Bureau of Old-Age and Survivors Insurance

▶ The Morlang family has been "adopted" by the officers, noncommissioned officers and airmen of the 5th Communications Squadron Division of the United States Air Force. In a Christmas letter to Mrs. Morlang, the squadron commander wrote: "Your departed husband, Herb Morlang, was a combat veteran who had fought in Europe with the 13th Armored Division. In this squadron we have some men who came from homes that had known tragedy and privation. The qualities of mother love, of self-sacrifice, of stubborn refusal to give up your family that you displayed in your particular crisis would excite admiration and respect in the heart of any considerate person. . . . God bless you and your family. Merry Christmas." ED.

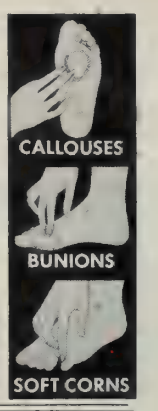
Corn, Callous and Bunion Pain Stops

Out come corns and callouses in a hurry!

Dr. Scholl's Super-Fast Nerve-Deep Relief . . .



Never before anything like it!

No waiting when you use Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads! Just the pads alone on corns, callouses, bunions, sore toes, tender spots give fast nerve-deep relief . . . ease new or tight shoes and stop corns, callouses before they can develop!

Remove Corns, Callouses

Used with the separate Medications included in every box, Dr. Scholl's Zino-pads remove corns, callouses one of the fastest ways known to medical science! Get a box today. At Drug, Shoe, Dept. and 5-10¢ Stores everywhere.

Dr Scholl's Zino-pads

HOT, TENDER FEET?

Dr. Scholl's Foot Powder quickly relieves hot, tired, tender, perspiring, odorous feet. Eases new or tight shoes. Get a can today!

Dr Scholl's FOOT POWDER

Lovely NAILS in A FLASH . . . with

NU-NAILS
ARTIFICIAL FINGERNAILS

Cover short, broken, thin nails with NU-NAILS. Applied in a jiffy with our amazing new quick-drying glue. Can be worn any length . . . polished any shade. Help overcome nail-biting habit. Set of ten 29c. At dime, drug & dept. stores.

ONLY 29¢ SET OF TEN

NU-NAILS CO., Dept. 12-C
5251 W. Harrison, Chicago 44

Also Hollywood Fingernails... Permanent Dubonett Rose Color. No polish required . . . 39c set.

MONEY
In Your Free Time

Spare-time income can be yours easily. Write today for details about our subscription-selling plan. No obligation.

CURTIS CIRCULATION COMPANY
302 Independence Square, Phila. 5, Penna.

Do FALSE TEETH Rock, Slide or Slip?

FASTEETH, an improved powder to be sprinkled on upper or lower plates, holds false teeth more firmly in place. Do not slide, slip or rock. No gummy, gooey, pasty taste or feeling. FASTEETH is alkaline (non-acid). Does not sour. Checks "plate odor" (denture breath). Get FASTEETH at any drug counter.

BRIDAL FABRICS at WHOLESALE PRICES SAVE!

SCHENFELD & SONS, 103 Hester St., Dept. L-3, N.Y. 2
Rush me your FREE Catalog with dozens of beautiful Swatches, Color Chart, etc.
NAME .....
ADDRESS .....

He said: "La Señora perdonará mi temprana partida." ("The lady will please forgive my early departure.")

He meant: "El aire aqui esta cargado, tengo que salir!" ("Caramba! The air in here is foul! I must leave.")

He said: "Pardonnez-moi de vous quitter si vite." ("Alas Cherie, forgive me for leaving so quickly.")

He meant: "L'atmosphere est insupportable ici" ("Sacre Bleu! The atmosphere here is unbearable.")

He said: "Terribly sorry, old dear. It's early but I must toddle."

He meant: "Gad! The air in here is like a ruddy fog. I've had it!"

He said: 残念ながら失礼しなければなりません (Translated) "So sorry must leave."

He meant: 空気が悪いから急なければなりません (Translated) "Must go quick. Air here terrible!"

There's a world of difference in deodorizers!

This couldn't have happened with air-wick

Air-Wick—the one and only chlorophyll deodorizer—kills unpleasant odors in seconds... makes the air seem sunshine-fresh. That's why discriminating housewives everywhere, in the United States, France, England, Spain, Japan—62 countries in all—depend on Air-Wick. Repeated scientific tests have proven Air-Wick 3 times as effective—faster—more pleasant to use. So don't be fooled by imitations! Insist on genuine Air-Wick — the world's leading home deodorizer!

Use handy wick or speedy spray... deodorize the Air-Wick way!

NOW! A new kind of Softasilk Cake Cook Book!

FREE!

from Betty Crocker

At last I've been able to bring you the recipes your letters have asked me for . . . recipes for special-occasion cakes and family-favorite cakes . . . and some wonderful new cooking recipes that use Softasilk.

Haven't you always wanted to bake a luxury cake from scratch? Our new book has easy step-picture directions to show you how to make the cakes a mix won't make—like chiffon cakes, lovelight chiffons, and butter cakes. You'll even find the wedding cake so many of you have asked for, with complete directions for assembling and cutting.

And we've also included quick and easy cake recipes—the kind you like to mix up "just for the family" or perhaps to start your daughter on her own happy baking career. Cakes like Real Red Devils Food and Dinette Cake.

You'll be thrilled with the new Softasilk cooking section, too. We're giving you easy methods for cream sauces and gravies . . . recipes for quick breads and desserts . . . elegant butter cookies you can mix up and bake in just 15 minutes . . . soft, light soufflés that come out with a "high-hat" crown every time you make them.

Our kitchens have tested and retested these Softasilk recipes so that even beginner cooks can be sure of first-time success. Do write and tell me how you enjoy making them.

► 32 pages ► illustrated pages of sure-success baking tips!
► 58 famous tested Softasilk recipes!

New Cakes	Sauces and Gravies
Traditional Cakes	Easy Soufflés
Double-Quick Cakes	Cookies, Quick Breads
	Desserts

Beginner homemakers—experienced homemakers—will want this cookbook for special-occasion baking, for everyday cooking!

HERE'S HOW YOU CAN GET YOUR SOFTASILK COOK BOOK FREE!

Look for this specially marked Softasilk package at your grocer's! Your cookbook will be right on the back!

Or if your grocer is out of the specially marked packages, send one box top from any Softasilk package to Betty Crocker, Dept. 930, Marquette Ave., Minneapolis 2, Minn.

Hurry! Offer Limited!

General Mills

Journal ABOUT TOWN

Gossip about people you know,
editors you like,
and what goes on in New York

FIFTY YEARS AGO IN THE JOURNAL

A pet expression of March, 1908, was "Ain't it awful, Mabel?" which came from a jingle about two chorus girls:

"My Gawd! is that the overture?
I never will be on, I'm sure—
The things us actresses endure,
Ain't it awful, Mabel?"

The mayor of Cincinnati said no woman was physically fit to drive an automobile. Mary Roberts Rinehart wrote The Circular Staircase, and I Had a Dream, Dear enlivened barbershop quartets.

In the March, 1908,* JOURNAL, *Spring Styles for Little People includes "something new in a pleated dress of white linen with blue piping for a little man, which may be worn by a girl quite as well. Sizes two to eight in a Journal pattern."

"A woman can be well dressed on six gowns a year," believes Mrs. Ralston, fresh from Paris. "Two washable cotton gowns for summer, two tailored suits and two dressy gowns. The suit will be worn at least three years, so choose a dark, inconspicuous color and put all your money (between $10 and $15) into the material and cut."

"It is not wise to put a child to bed without having her bowels move at least once during the day," advises Doctor Coolidge, former house physician of New York's Babies Hospital.

"It is extravagant to cook a good-sized fowl all at once," believes Mrs. Rorer. "Take the feet, neck and giblets for soup, the breast for chicken au suprême; boil the joints for chicken pie, and the third night use the legs and wings for deviled chicken and rice."

"A three-day royal visit of King Edward and Queen Alexandra will cost the hostess between $50,000 and $100,000. The first thing she must do to her house is to overhaul the drainage, from top to bottom, a costly and bothersome business," says the author of When the King Visits a Private House.

"For the family dinner table, it is not in good taste to stuff the dinner napkins into the water tumblers."

"The jacket of my last year's suit is too tight across the front, but I must wear it." Advises Mrs. Ralston, "Make a pretty little flowered vest and wear the coat open."

HERB CONNOR

Editorial workers Jean Freeman, Joyce Posson and Ruth Imler model early uniforms of the Girl Scouts. Ruth is still active as a Scout Leader.

In March, 1912, there were only twelve Girl Scouts in this country, all living in Savannah, Georgia. Today the membership is about twelve million in twenty-eight countries. Recently Jean Freeman, Joyce Posson and Ruth Imler, three of our young editors and ex-Scouts of considerable attainment, were invited to the Philadelphia Museum School of Art to preview a period exhibition of Girl Scout uniforms. Of course they tried a few on. Ruth chose the one worn by the first Girl Scouts—navy blue with a light blue tie. Jean tried on a Leader's uniform of the 1920's. The World War I costume appealed to Joyce. "It reminds me of the heroine in a story I wrote for American Girl called 'Pipsqueak and I,'" she sighed. "I was thirteen then—don't mention the year."

"What is our readers' favorite recipe?" we asked Louella Shouer on a recent visit to her mouth-watering department. "The favorites keep changing from month to month," Louella told us, "but our steadiest favorite is Forgotten Dessert. (It's four years old.) Why the name? You just put it in the oven and forget it. The trouble is, the name must have some effect on our readers, because so many forget where they put the recipe, and write for replacements, that we keep a whole pile on hand all the time." So don't be embarrassed to ask for another. Louella is ready for your requests.

A short while back we told you that New Yorkers get the time of day over the telephone by dialing N-E-R-V-O-U-S. That's not all, Eileen Sharpe tells us. In this state you can also dial a number and hear a prayer. You can dial another and find out where fish are biting; you can find out how the highways are, and what the weatherman thinks. In one season, 1,200,000 fans dialed for the baseball scores. And do you think these dialings disturb the telephone company? Not in the least. Each one is a dime.

We've spoken before of the occupational hazards our editors face in the line of duty, but here's one we don't think we've mentioned, though it's quite common, we hear, among the editors whose trudging task it is to scout for all the purchasable things that are newest, loveliest, most unusual, useful and desirable for our pages. We'd gone up to see a dazzling collection of new dishware that Nancy Wood had discovered, only to discover Nancy measuring her feet with one of those rules that are truly foot rules. "It's fun to find things that people write in to rave about," Nancy acknowledged, "but with all the walking it takes, my feet have grown from 5½ to 6½. Where will it all end?"

Nancy Wood and her still-growing foot.

EILEEN SHARPE

We've just been talking to our theatrical seer, and he tells us that during March the biggest box-office musical on Broadway for out-of-towners will still be My Fair Lady, but for New Yorkers it will be The Music Man. We're glad about The Music Man (though we happen to have an "out-of-towner's" attitude toward My Fair Lady), because Meredith Willson's bright entertainment is wittily and colorfully laid in Iowa, the birth state of our two topmost editors and many others on the masthead. Our forecaster firmly declares that the next hardest tickets to get all spring will be for Look Homeward, Angel; Jamaica; and West Side Story. Any questions for summer? We'll ask our man. But no tickets!

Abbot Mills takes most of the pictures for this page, but not the one of him and the ravishing Carol Lawrence taken in the dressing room of the star of West Side Story, which as you know is the dramatic dancing musical hit about juvenile delinquents. Carol in the picture here is telling Abbot of the day during rehearsals when the director, with the idea of giving the cast a firsthand illustration, brought in a gang of real delinquents who swaggered onto the dim-lit stage full of bluster and brashness, until someone turned on all the lights and the gang froze with stage fright; then, shaky and silent, sloped out the backstage door. "Maybe that's a good lesson," said Carol, "just to turn on more light."

EILEEN SHARPE

Abbot Mills and West Side Story star Carol Lawrence.

Three talents came together to bring you the exclusive Chanel collection on page 72 and the poppy-print-lined suit on the cover. With this thought that the finest fashion is always a wearable fashion, the collaboration began with fittings on top French model Marie Hélène*, who posed patiently for hours until* Mlle. Chanel said, "Move." Then the clothes were watched in walking and turning. Finally, when each fashion became one with the wearer, it was photographed by Wilhela Cushman*, whose most active accessories are her passport and her camera.*

How could they make promises? Tomorrow might shatter all dreams, Cancel all vows.

By D. K. FINDLAY

The château of the Bertholets turned its back on the Channel and looked toward the valley of the Seine. It was built of grayish stone which was crumbling, and to Alix, who had been brought up in Scotland, it seemed angular and prim. There were no formal gardens, but the fields lapped it on two sides—and were not the fields of France, asked the Bertholets, sufficient garden for anyone? On this fine morning, the celebrated fields were turning to the harvest tint, the air above them was blue and limpid.

Below her the house was filled with the sounds of preparation. She heard her mother's voice calling sweetly and impatiently. They were making an expedition to Les Forges in the car of M. Henri Dubissac—M. Dubissac, who was rich and swarthy, and wished to become her mother's lover.

Alix got together her painting things. Then she lifted down from the wall a water color of a river scene—some willows leaning to the water and a punt moored in their shade. This had been painted by her Great-great-grandmother Amelia and the river was the Mississippi; not the great Mississippi, but a small Mississippi in Canada. As a child Alix used to look at it and wonder if Amelia had gone on voyages on the river and what had happened to her among the savages.

Amelia had gone to Canada when she was young and had died there of a fever. One day Alix had found in the attic a bundle of old letters addressed to Dearest Sabra, who had been Amelia's sister. She had made a book of them, protecting the brittle scraps with the faded brown ink between white sheets and a stiff cover. It was done when she herself was lonely, a labor of love undertaken in sympathy for her far-off little great-great-grandmother.

She lifted her head to listen. The sounds of preparation were no longer to be heard; the house had the quietness of one which has seen its travelers off and may now sink back to repose. She went to the window. The terrace was deserted, the shiny car of M. Dubissac was disappearing down the drive.

"Alix, where are you?"

Colonel Duvernay, her oldest friend, was coming up the stairs. He had been a soldier and diplomat, his hair and mustache were gray, he carried himself with distinction.

"There you are. So she has gone off and left us. Alix, she will always play such tricks. Do not disturb yourself—you are well out of such an expedition. Allison will return to us profoundly bored."

He looked at her with his hawk's eyes, yellow with an impact of vitality.

"But I did not come to condole with you. I have come to suggest an expedition to the caves of St. Leu d'Esserent."

"I thank you, my good friend, who have this moment invented the caves of St. Leu d'Esserent."

"No, no, they exist, I affirm it. So now let us take a holiday, let us stay for days and set all tongues wagging."

"I would like to," she said.

"Ah, the book of Amelia." He picked it up from her table. He read aloud part of the first letter:

"'Dearest Sabra: If you could see me, you would not know whether to laugh or cry, for I am crouched in a rude shelter of branches with a chip upon my knee to write upon, and Anne asleep on a couch of leaves. It is strange and disquieting to reflect that here we shall live out our lives. There is nothing here but the great forest. The firelight glances upon the stems of the great trees and advances but a little way into the gloom. Beyond us lies the river and faintly we hear the sound of the cataract ——'

"That poor Amelia," said Colonel Duvernay. "Let us take her little book along with us."

The caves bored Alix.

"Very well," said Colonel Duvernay. "Where would you like to go?"

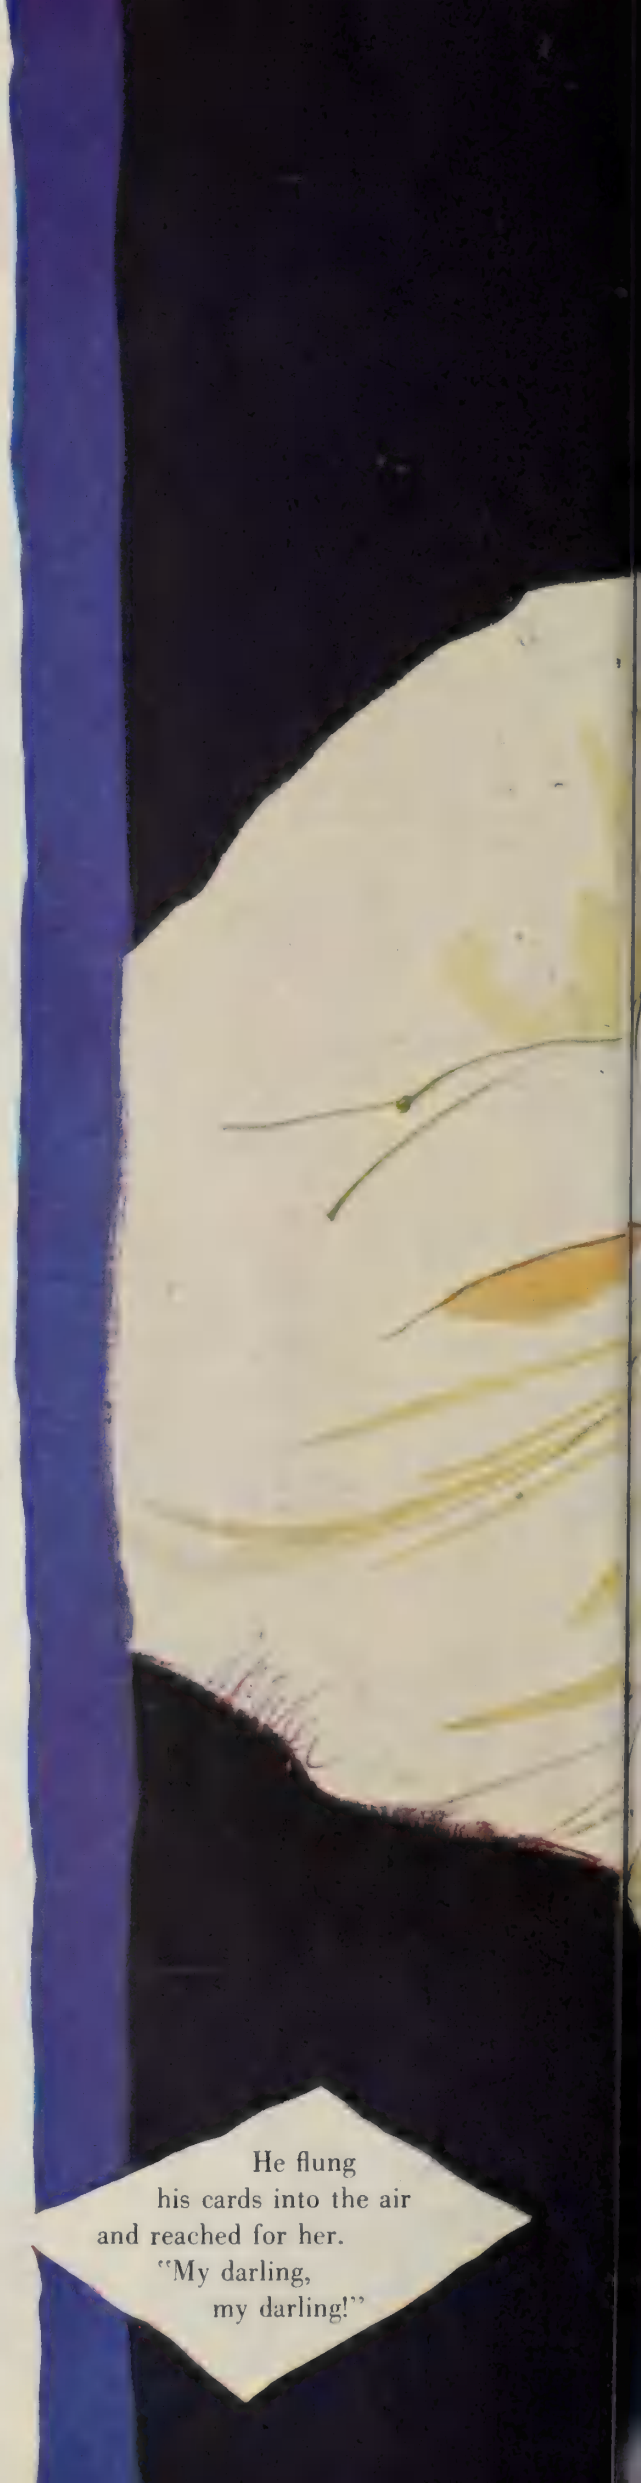
"The sea, I think."

They traveled in a little green train and came to the villages on the Channel. Alix set up her easel on the sand and Duvernay observed the boats with their sails like shells and let his mind run in the past.

"You do not remember the summer your mother had the house on the Seine; you would be too young."

But she remembered part of it—the lawns running to the river, the barge hung with colored lanterns at night. She had another memory of that summer—her mother in a frilly white dress laughing at her and snatching her up and dancing with her, while she clung to her and breathed the scent of her talc. That was the good time, when her mother loved her.

"It was a time of good friends," said Colonel Duvernay. "I do not remember that we did much; nevertheless, that summer remains in my head. A light trembles over it as the light trembles on water. Poor Allison," he said, still reminiscing. "Scotland nearly killed her."



Her mother had gone to visit Scotch cousins and fallen in love and married there. But the marriage, which was probably the best thing that had ever happened to the butterfly Allison, had not lasted long; he was an officer in the regular army, he was killed in a flying accident. Alix had loved Scotland and her Scottish grandparents; she wished she could have known more of her father. She was just old enough to remember his death

CONTINUED ON PAGE 129

THE JOURNAL'S COMPLETE-IN-ONE-ISSUE CONDENSED NOVEL

Copyright © 1958 by D. K. Findlay

SEARCH FOR AMELIA
is soon to be published in book form by
J. B. Lippincott Co.

SEARCH FOR AMELIA

Sherrard meant the splendid gift to be a sign of his intentions. Luckily, Maria didn't understand.

By MARGERY SHARP

Everyone knows that in 1860 far too much looting went on at the Summer Palace in Peking. Bric-a-brac carved from jade and crystal in particular proved irresistibly attractive to an acquisitive if not licentious soldiery. (Today, of course, such objects would probably be described as having been liberated.) The result was the dispersal through Western Europe of a great number of miniature Chinese masterpieces; and Sherrard, some hundred years later, thought he had his eye on one of them.

Sherrard looked through the plate-glass window at the cat, and the cat, or so it seemed, looked back through the window at Sherrard. It was a portly and sagacious creature, posed in an attitude of great comfort and dignity; about nine inches long by five high, carved from a block of amethyst quartz which must thus have been considerably larger. The body was striated with light gray crystal, the mask and ears violet—almost Siamese coloring; but the broad complacent face, sunk so reposefully upon the broad chest, had nothing of a Siamese's nervous tension. It was a Chinese cat—and in Sherrard's opinion, a masterpiece.

Sherrard at this juncture, it so happened, greatly desired to make a gift of surpassing beauty to a young Chinese lady resident in New York. He therefore entered the shop and a moment or two later balanced the creature on his palm.

He could just manage it. For its size, it was astonishingly heavy. It must have weighed about seven pounds. It was also astonishingly cold—like wet ice.

"Amethyst quartz?" suggested Sherrard.

"Amethyst quartz," agreed the proprietress, with a polite smile for her customer's knowledgeableness. She was a small, elegant woman, thus matching her establishment, which was situated in Piccadilly; for his pocket's sake Sherrard would have preferred less chic, but at the same time recognized that one couldn't expect such a cat to turn up in—to put up with—any flea market. "Of the finest quality," added the proprietress. "So is the workmanship. Turn him over."

Sherrard obeyed. The cat's underside was as exquisitely carved as the rest of him; four delicate paws, the claws withdrawn, were tucked neatly into a comfortable belly. Near the root of the tail Sherrard made out a small, faintly incised Chinese ideogram.

"Have you its pedigree?" inquired Sherrard, without irony.

The proprietress shrugged. "Chinese and, say, eighteenth century. Not that I'm an expert. I bought it at a sale in a country house, because I was lucky; there were no Chinese experts there. And of course I know what my eyes tell me; it's the work of a considerable artist."

Sherrard's eyes told him the same thing. He appreciated it, it gave him confidence, that she didn't produce any tale of loot from the Summer Palace to put the price up. In any case, the price was quite high enough for Sherrard.

"Two hundred pounds," murmured the proprietress indifferently.

"I'll have to think," said Sherrard. "May I let you know tomorrow?"

Indeed he had to think. He was a foreign correspondent, and a successful, even a celebrated, one; on his pay and expenses he lived a thoroughly ample life; but to put down two hundred pounds cash—six hundred dollars, two hundred thousand francs, three hundred and fifty thousand lire—wasn't a trifle to him. All the rest of that day, and well into the night, he mulled it over.

There were several reasons why he wished to make Maria in New York some exquisitely beautiful gift. In the first place, she was herself exquisitely beautiful, and like to like. (Her Chinese name meant Small Pink Lotus Bud at Dawn, and it suited her. Maria discarded it to become Maria when she so thankfully and enthusiastically became an American citizen.) Had he been a millionaire, and had he known nothing of Maria but her appearance, Sherrard would have bought her the amethyst cat as a mere matter of artistic propriety. But he did, besides, know her—he'd known her off and on for some years—and had the greatest admiration for her character also. Educated in China at a Quaker school, sent on a scholarship to an American university, it perhaps hadn't been difficult for Maria herself to acquire citizenship in the New World; but with incredible pains and persistence, as soon as she could support a dependent, she'd succeeded in bringing over her only living relative—an uncle so old and so useless that only a heart of gold could see him as anything but a burden. "He was kind to me when I was little," said Maria, "and I've got him off opium onto Coca-Cola!"

For as well as being goldenhearted and beautiful, she was sensible and strong-minded. She had every feminine quality. Every time he left New York without asking her to marry him, Sherrard regretted it in the plane.

Why he didn't ask her to marry him was partly because he was so used to being a bachelor, and partly because Maria kept him always, very slightly, at a distance. She kept everyone, Sherrard fancied, slightly at a distance. In the hospital where she worked as a masseuse she had dozens of friends but no intimates; as she had dozens of escorts but no one particular escort. Her reserve was like a delicate Chinese fan fluttering perpetually before her face, which she couldn't cast aside even though she wanted to. Sherrard thought that at the sight of the amethyst cat—so surpassingly beautiful, expensive and Chinese—perhaps that fan

CONTINUED ON PAGE 182

The Amethyst Cat

"How perfectly lovely,"
said Maria with extreme politeness.
Maybe, Sherrard thought, it would even be good for me to marry a wife with absolutely no imagination.

Reece had his dream,
but Addie Jean was cherishing
a dream of her own.

Don't get in

By M. H. DAVIS

It was seven miles to town. Reece started his walk from his mother's cabin in the morning dark. He went up the mule path to the ridge where the dirt state road began, the rutted old road partly washed away by mountain rains. For two miles it circled along the Ridge and then dropped down to join the paved highway where the school bus ran. Sometimes as he left the dirt road with his shoes and schoolbooks slung on his back and the precious cargo of egg cartons cradled in his arms, the headlights of one of the big trailer rigs would pick him up in the dark and slow down to give him a lift into town. The drivers were usually from up North, Ohio and Illinois, and they would look him over carefully before they let him mount into the cab. They would see him, a boy tall as a mountain man, dark-faced, glum, and they would look back at the dirt road which led into the hills and at his muddy feet and ask him where he was headed, what he was carrying and why wasn't he riding the school bus. Because it was only civil to do so, he would explain about the eggs and how he walked down three times a week to Hobart to deliver them to town people, getting up in the dark so that he would be finished and ready for school at eight-thirty.

He had long ago got used to their questions and the way the Yankee drivers talked, flat, like quacking ducks, and the way they always called him "kid," but always kind, always friendly. They usually gave him sandwiches whether he wanted them or not and talked a blue streak, telling him to keep up the good work, he was a great kid, and so he lived way back up in the hills, a hillbilly, hey, and to keep a lookout, they'd be bringing the rig back from Florida in a couple of weeks, they'd give him a lift then. He never listened to their half-promises. This was the way of town people, North or South, always talking to bolster their lonesomeness. Seemed like they didn't know how to sit silent like mountain folk, looking out the window at the darkened hills, thinking their own thoughts.

There were few trucks this spring morning. The fog was thick along the highway and the cars crept along with yellow fog lights on, not wanting to stop for riders. Even as he came into town he saw the street lamps still lit, the air thick and dark with smoke from the cotton mill, and saw through the windows of the houses people eating breakfast by electric light, getting ready to go to work. He passed the big consolidated high school sitting in the middle of its red clay field with only the single light bulb burning over the steps. He had two hours in which to deliver the eggs.

At the first house he left the carton of eggs between the screen door and the sill. It was too early to waken the Blankenship sisters. The old ladies usually made him walk a special trip into town on Saturday to collect. Like most old women, they were fussy, mean about little things.

He made two other stops. The fog was dirty, blacker in the streets near the mill. But he knew that up on the Ridge in the hills the sun was shining now, burning away the mist, leaving it still hanging dirty and thick here in the valley and the town. He was as wet as if he had stood in the pouring-down rain. He was conscious of the hole in his sweater, the patch of shirt was wet under it. He would have to wear the sweater, wet or not, through class, he couldn't rightly take it off. The shirt was pretty worn too. His hair was long and shaggy. It gave him the rough, darksome look that marked the mountain boys.

The Widloughs' back door opened into an old-fashioned alley lined with crepe myrtle and chinaberry trees. He always came around to the back. He had to be careful of Mrs. Widlough's climbing rosebushes she had put out along the garage. Somewhere in the house Jane Widlough was getting up, maybe doing her history assignment left over from last night. He felt his throat close. Now he would be wordless, silent as a stone before the Widloughs, who talked and smiled all the time.

Mrs. Widlough turned on the outside porch light.

"Goodness, Reece, it's so thick outside here I can hardly see you," she called to him. "Come in and I'll settle my bill with you now as I guess this is close enough to the first of the month."

He stepped inside the door. They were all at the table in the yellow-painted kitchen, eating breakfast. The table was full of glassware and baskets for the bread and glittering things. He was embarrassed to see them eating. Mr. Widlough had on his bathrobe. He could hardly look at Jane. She wore a sweater and skirt, her hair was clean and brown and well cared for. There was a red ribbon in it.

"How's your mother, Reece?" Mrs. Widlough asked. She was searching around for her purse.

He could not answer her. He knew that they were looking at him, Jane and her little brother and Mr. Widlough in his bathrobe with the morning paper.

"I've heard some nice things about you from Mr. Tucker, the county agent," Mrs. Widlough went on. "The bill was two-forty, wasn't it, Reece?" She pressed the money into his hand. "He says you work hard, that you're going to put some cows on your father's place this year. I know he expects big things from you. Tell your mother I hope she feels better."

Mr. Widlough looked up suddenly.

"No need to break your back with hill farming, Reece," he said. Law practice had put habitual authority into his voice. "Don't waste your life scratching around up on the ridges. Hard work doesn't pay up there. It's only fit for trash like the Sikeses and old man Yarbro. Get yourself a good education, college if you can. Make your time pay."

"Well, thank you, Reece," Mrs. Widlough was saying. He found he was moving toward the door. "We'll see you next week."

He was outside, the door closed.

He could not tell whether they had made fun of him or even if they took count of what they had said to him. They talked so fast, said things so lightly and confidently. Especially Mrs. Widlough. They moved mountains with their mouths. "Mr. Tucker expects big things CONTINUED ON PAGE 178

Reece had a feeling of dismay when he thought of bringing this girl into the house to warm her before the fire—and the look on his mother's face when she saw her.

my way

America's Best-Dressed

PHOTOGRAPHS BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

Mrs. Guest is perennially named as one of the 10 Best Dressed. She stresses simplicity, dresses to accentuate slenderness and says, "Good clothes do not wear out if you hang them up." She recently wore to Europe a suit eight years old. In this photograph Mrs. Guest is dressed in a pale aquamarine chiffon, beautifully simple and understated, designed by Mainbocher.

These few spend
$10,000 to $100,000 or more a year for clothes, not counting furs and jewels—and may have as many as 250 pairs of shoes at one time.

You can't buy your way onto a list of America's best-dressed women, but the chances are heavily against your making it or even being considered unless you can afford to spend more on clothes than most people earn in a lifetime.

It's a little, says one fashion expert, like saying you can't buy first place in the Kentucky Derby. "That's right, you can't; but you'll pay plenty for stables and entry fees or you'll never even be in the running."

To say that a clever career girl who buys carefully could ever hope to be listed alongside the Duchess of Windsor, who may spend twenty-five or fifty times as much (just as carefully), is simply not realistic.

What is immediately clear is that:

1. To be well enough dressed to be a candidate for the list requires the expenditure of at least $10,000 to $40,000 a year, every year. This is a minimum more often exceeded than not, and does not include jewels and furs.

2. To get on the list itself depends not only on clothes but also on other factors, which range from state of health through an eye for publicity to willingness and ability to lead a particularly demanding, expensive kind of life.

The women whose qualifications have consistently exceeded all others in these ways are the Duchess of Windsor, Mrs. Winston Guest, Mrs. William S. Paley, Mrs. William Randolph Hearst, Jr., the Countess Mona von Bismarck (the former Mrs. Harrison Williams), Mrs. Henry Ford II and the late Mrs. Byron Foy. Others have been mentioned from time to time, but none with such unwavering regularity. They are various types as women and in the ways that they dress. But in certain conditions their talents merge.

Aside from the money—and women have offered to those who might be influential as high as $50,000 for the "best-dressed" honor—these women have energy, planning ability, determination, intelligence and judgment, artistic sense, dramatic flair and a high degree of organizational ability. They have stamina and they need it. All of them are active in at least several charities, and with their help millions of dollars are collected every year for worthy causes, such as aid to retarded children, cancer research, scholarship funds. No group in society works harder at these projects. This is an important reason for their success, both as social benefactors and as leaders in the almost totally different world of fashion. Their days and nights are filled with places for them to go—the Colony or Pavillon, a charity ball at the Waldorf; and things to do—go to welfare-committee meetings, subscribe to important dinners, show an interest in a rising young artist or themselves collect paintings, antique furniture of an unusual era or rare porcelain. These valuable collections may be given away eventually to a museum. In themselves, these activities involve great sums of money. They are factors in being a "best-dressed" woman because they bring the woman to the attention of people whose opinions are important. But this attention would be valueless were not these women also attractive, and also qualified by reason of their clothes, taste and impeccable style sense.

Clothes, obviously, and clothes that are very expensive, are the nucleus of the effort (whether consciously or unconsciously directed) that winds up with a woman's being named in January to the annual list of best-dressed women.

How many clothes such a woman has can vary widely. Here is the wardrobe that one woman who has been named to "best-dressed" listings keeps in her New York apartment: 5 fur coats and 6 less important fur items; 28 long evening and ball gowns; 14 cocktail, dinner or short evening dresses; 19 suits; 10 light wool afternoon dresses; 8 cotton or linen day dresses;

A LOOK INTO THE CLOSET OF

5 fur coats and
6 less important fur items
28 long evening and ball gowns
14 cocktail, dinner or short evening dresses
19 suits
10 light wool afternoon dresses
8 cotton or linen day dresses
6 cloth coats
1 fur-lined cloth coat
4 separate jackets
3 dress-and-coat ensembles
8 short printed silks and chiffons for afternoon and on into cocktails
35 housecoats and negligees
37 nightgowns
4 bed jackets
42 blouses

Women... the fashionable few

By LAURA DATE RILEY

6 cloth coats; 1 fur-lined cloth coat; 4 separate jackets; 3 dress-and-coat ensembles; 8 short printed silks and chiffons for afternoon and on into cocktails; 35 housecoats and negligees; 37 nightgowns; 8 bed jackets; 42 blouses; 29 sweaters; 225 pairs of gloves; 89 pairs of shoes; 37 hats; 93 scarves (and light stoles), 23 slips and 8 half slips; 16 panties; 18 brassières, and 4 strapless brassières; 17 girdles; 5 dozen pairs of stockings; 28 handbags; 3 umbrellas; 1 pair of plastic rain boots (no raincoat); 117 handkerchiefs; 45 pairs of earrings; 38 necklaces; 28 clips and pins; 16 bracelets.

Practically everything she owns is custom-made. Exceptions are her stockings, scarves and most of her gloves and shoes, and her panties of fine English silk knit, which cost $20 a pair. She has five Alençon-lace stoles which were made for her and which cost $185 each—one is hand-embroidered with gold thread. But most of her other scarves she bought herself, while browsing in the Paris boutiques. These are one of her few "impulse" purchases—the rest of her wardrobe she carefully plans, even to the underthings.

Her slips cost $150 each .They are handmade in Paris of satin and heavy Belgian lace set in deeply at the bosom and in eight-to-ten-inch borders at the hem; two are black, the rest are white, gold and cream-colored. Her brassières are all cream-colored, as are her girdles, and both are made for her in New York. The brassières are heavy silk lace backed with marquisette. They cost $45 each. Her girdles are lace-and-satin-paneled and cost $60.

Her suits cost $800 to $1000; her day dresses, $500 to $700; cocktail, dinner and short evening dresses, $500 to $850; and long evening and ball gowns an average of $950—although one deep ruby-colored brocade evening suit from Balenciaga, hand-embroidered with thousands of tiny sequins and jet beads, cost $2500. ("It will last a long time," she explained.)

She has a floor-length mink opera coat; a mink stole; a sable stole; a chinchilla jacket; a white mink jacket; an autumn-haze mink coat for everyday with huge patch pockets and a straight, slim line; and a dressier one in dark, almost black mink, with the skins stitched together in a rippling circular pattern. She has a full-length brown broadtail; a black broadtail suit—short boxy jacket and slim skirt, with which a seven-eighths black broadtail coat makes a three-piece ensemble; and a brown mouton coat which she wears to the country. The floor-length opera coat cost $28,000; the chinchilla, $16,000; and the very dark mink, $14,000. The mouton was $2000.

She has three diamond necklaces, the newest an ingeniously simple two strands of baguettes set in platinum with a marquise-and-sapphire pendant. (The pendant and one strand of diamonds are detachable and can be worn together as a bracelet or separately.)

She also has carved emeralds, rubies, a brilliant parure of diamonds and rubies in necklace, bracelet and earrings, and seventeen sets of pearls or some combination of pearls with other gems.

She keeps her clothes in a pink wardrobe room the size of an ordinary New York apartment living room. (Her jewels are kept in labeled file drawers in a safe nearby, and the safe is wired to the headquarters of a New York detective agency.) The wardrobe room is lined with closets, cabinets and drawers with glass fronts so that almost the entire contents are visible at a glance. The hats are set in rows on transparent mannequins' heads in deep cabinets. Out-of-season evening dresses are laid out full-length in drawers along the floor. Shoes are together in racks that extend to the ceiling. The personal maid whose duty it is to care for these clothes has a rolling ladder chair to reach the topmost rung. She knows her employer's taste so well she can select with perfect assurance the clothes for any occasion, or pack for a weekend with no specific directions.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 118

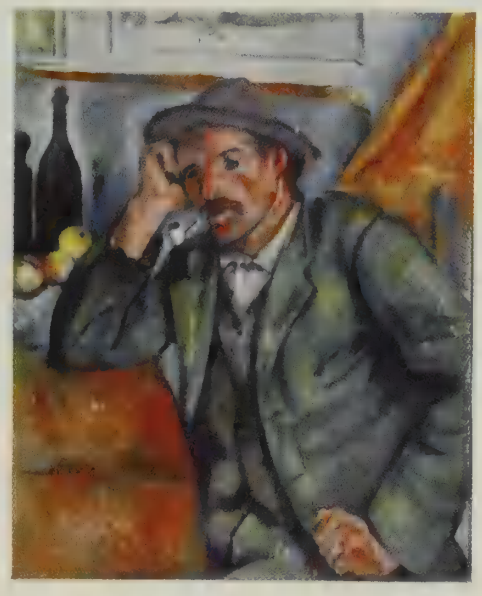
ONE "BEST-DRESSED" WOMAN

29 sweaters
225 pairs of gloves
89 pairs of shoes
37 hats
93 scarves (and light stoles)
23 slips and 8 half slips
16 panties
18 brassières and
4 strapless brassières
17 girdles
5 dozen pairs of stockings
28 handbags
3 umbrellas
1 pair of plastic rain boots (no raincoat)
117 handkerchiefs
45 pairs of earrings
38 necklaces
28 clips and pins
16 bracelets

Can a secretary be as well dressed as a "best dressed"? Mrs. Wilhela Cushman, LADIES' HOME JOURNAL fashion editor, chose Mrs. Nicholas Bernard, in the JOURNAL Workshop, to exemplify the well-dressed secretary. Mrs. Bernard is shown here wearing a gray flannel suit bought last spring for $60.00, with a yellow silk scarf at the neckline. "It's not the number of clothes in the wardrobe that counts," says Mrs. Cushman; "it's the way a woman looks at any given moment."

ART MASTERPIECES FROM RUSSIAN MUSEUMS

Russia is a treasure house of art, much of it little known in the outside world. In addition to fantastically opulent jewels, furniture and bibelots of the czars, Russian museums house marvelous examples of almost all great schools of painting. From The Hermitage (in the early days of the Soviets), Andrew Mellon purchased paintings—Raphaels, Titians, Van Dycks and others—which are now the nucleus of the great National Gallery collection in Washington, D.C.



Few persons outside Russia have seen the magnificent paintings on these six pages, chosen by your editors from the astounding wealth of masterpieces of Schools of Paris, now in Moscow and Leningrad museums. In a quarter century before 1914, these masterpieces were purchased, often directly from the artist's studio, by two rich, artistically perceptive and courageous Russian tea merchants and good friends, Sergei Ivanovich Shchukin and Ivan Abramovich Morosov. The French Impressionists, Fauves and Cubists were then harshly viewed by important Parisian critics. Matisse, Picasso, van Gogh, Gauguin, Cézanne, Manet, Monet were better known and more highly regarded in their earlier years among Russians, Germans and Americans than in Paris. Now the collections of Shchukin and Morosov fill room after room, with indescribable beauty, in The Hermitage, in Leningrad, and the handsome Pushkin museum in Moscow, having been expropriated by the government after the revolution.

In the opinion of Alfred H. Barr, Jr.,* of New York's Museum of Modern Art, "The Russian museums have the greatest collection of Picassos before 1914, and the greatest collection of Matisses anywhere. Their Gauguin collection is by far the finest in the world. So far as institutional collections are concerned, the Russian Cézannes rank second only to those in the Barnes Foundation in Merion, Pennsylvania. The van Goghs are excellent."

The JOURNAL is permitted to reproduce its choice of these paintings, by special permission of the Russian Ministry of Culture, and hereby gratefully acknowledges its indebtedness. We hope our readers will be as pleased to view these seldom-seen paintings here as we were delighted to come upon them, momentarily gathered together, in the dim galleries of The Hermitage one early fall afternoon not too long ago. The JOURNAL commissioned an American photographer, Frank Lerner, to fly his own special equipment into Russia to make sure, by direct comparison, that his photographs faithfully caught the color and beauty of the originals.

BRUCE AND BEATRICE GOULD.

*Author of Matisse: His Art and His Public.

The Smoker

PAUL CÉZANNE—HERMITAGE

Red Room

HENRI MATISSE—HERMITAGE

Scene From North Bridge

HENRI ROUSSEAU—HERMITAGE

Café at Arles

PAUL GAUGUIN—PUSHKIN

Moulin de la Galette

PIERRE-AUGUSTE RENOIR—PUSHKIN

The Meeting
PABLO PICASSO—PUSHKIN

Portrait of Dr. Rey
VINCENT VAN GOGH—PUSHKIN

Vase of Flowers
HENRI MATISSE—PUSHKIN

Are You Jealous?
PAUL GAUGUIN—PUSHKIN

Country Scene at Auvers After the Rain
VINCENT VAN GOGH—PUSHKIN

Woman in Black Hat
KEES VAN DONGEN—HERMITAGE

In Naples

ALBERT MARQUET—HERMITAGE

Nude on Sofa

PIERRE-AUGUSTE RENOIR—PUSHKIN

Pine Tree

PAUL CÉZANNE—HERMITAGE

Woman in Garden

CLAUDE MONET—HERMITAGE

Dancer Taking Photograph

EDGAR DEGAS—PUSHKIN

Street in Montmartre

MAURICE UTRILLO—PUSHKIN

Portrait of Solair

PABLO PICASSO — HERMITAGE

The Bank of the Marne

PAUL CÉZANNE— PUSHKIN

Dishes and Fruit

HENRI MATISSE— HERMITAGE

Two Girls in Black

PIERRE-AUGUSTE RENOIR— PUSHKIN

Wife of the King

PAUL GAUGUIN— PUSHKIN

Suzy Parker, soon to be seen in the film Ten North Frederick, wears this Chanel tweed flecked with many colors, given the surprising touch of violet taffeta in its jacket lining and blouse. The matching tweed bag and the jeweled pin are Chanel designs too.

PHOTOGRAPHS, THESE PAGES BY WILHELA CUSHMAN

CHANEL

creates

for the Journal

CHANEL

Six great suits . . . brilliant in their becomingness, their adaptability, their ease for current living. Even as you turn the pages to see these clothes with the world-famous name they are being shown in Paris in her spring collection. Like all "Chanels," they are seasonless, yet have an identity and a quality that go beyond the flashes of fashion.

Chanel has always believed that the woman is more important than the clothes she wears . . . that fashion should never be a problem, but always be young and wearable. She brings a woman's understanding to fashion design.

These Chanels are "in" fashion and will be in for seasons to come; and although they are casual, they are utterly feminine. Lavish, brilliant jewels (which she loves) are a part of every costume and can be worn with everything from tweeds to lamés.

By WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor

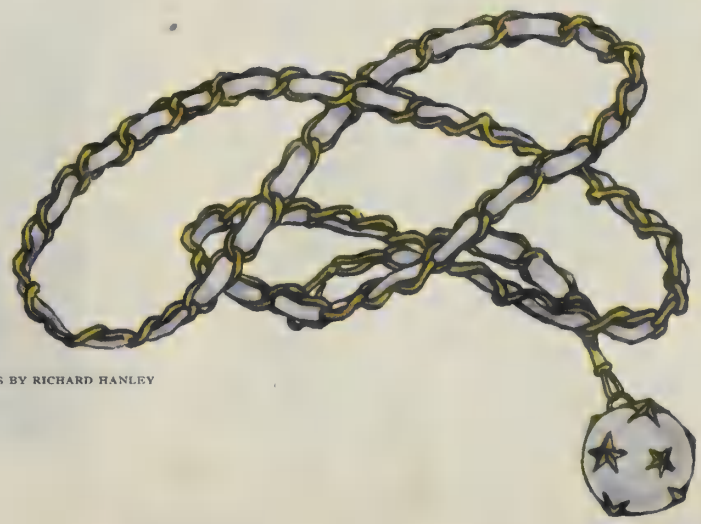
Chanel brings tweed to dinner and the theater by combining it with a lamé blouse—pale tweed and gold lamé. The pendant necklace designed for the costume is of baroque pearls twined with gold.

CHANEL

creates

for the Journal

The white basket-weave tweed with printed silk blouse is an enchanting, feminine, spring-into-summer fashion photographed on Suzy Parker. The silhouette is slim and easy. The blouse ties softly at the waistline. The jacket lining matches the blouse.



Year-round beige jersey with a fitted overblouse of navy-blue jersey is any woman's any-day suit. Again, a matching handbag hung on a gold chain, and a rope necklace of gold and white.

Red-and-navy jersey is eternally right in Chanel's opinion. Jersey blouse with jersey suit is also a favorite formula and wonderful for an early-spring or a travel suit. This four-pocket, straight-jacket fashion is worn by Suzy Parker.

Silver-lamé dinner dress and jacket—a fashion with great glamour and at the same time wonderfully easy to wear.

SKETCHES BY RICHARD HANLEY

EVERY INCH

The timeless suit that is eternally young—navy serge with brass buttons, a pleated skirt, a white blouse, by Dan Millstein, $119.95. Wear it with a straw breton from John Frederics' junior collection, $14.95.

The plaid coat is a major fashion—a new wear-it-everywhere casual, $59.95, by Sandy Smith; felt hat by Elizabeth Marks, around $7.95, a red bag, $5.00.

The fashions on all these pages are presented to you because they show you the trends of the season and serve as a guide as you shop. You will find many of them in stores throughout the nation. However, if you do not find identical styles in your local shops, we believe similar ones will be available.

WILHELA CUSHMAN

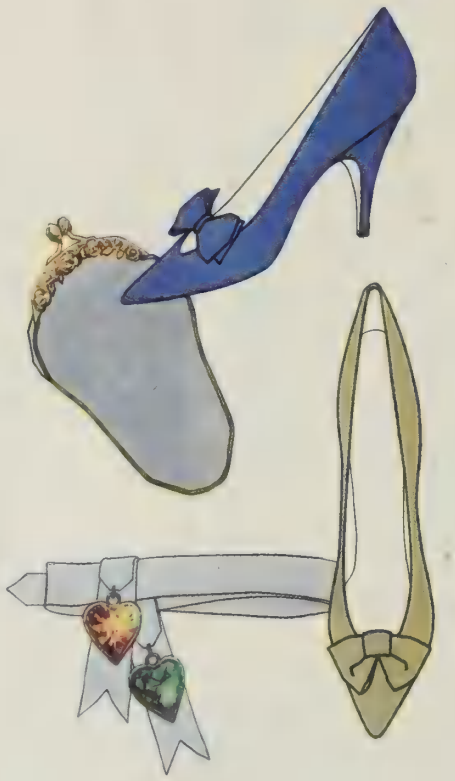
A FASHION

. . . your money's worth, and more

If you are deciding on one new costume to make your wardrobe complete and if you want to capsule the news of the season, you must be sure of the fashion and the value from head to toe. The way you look includes your bag, your gloves, your pin as well as your hat and shoes. And this high-voltage costume needs to be one that goes a lot of places, does a lot for you, lasts more than a single spring.

By RUTH MARY PACKARD

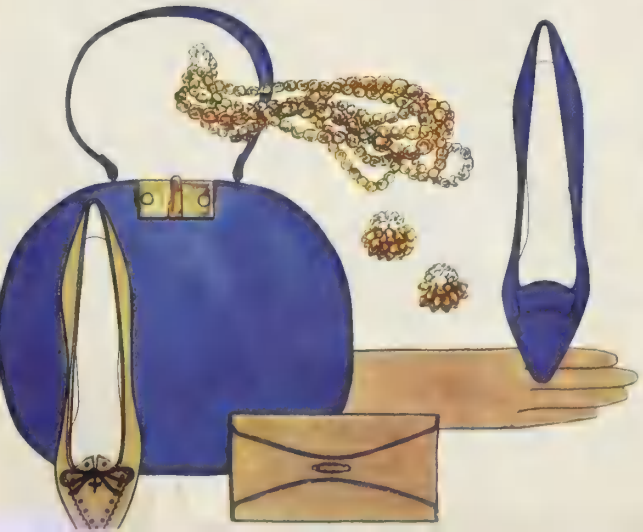
Black silk-shantung sheath, slim and well cut, right any time of day, $39.95, by Jerry Greenwald. Worn with soft cloche of straw braid, $8.95, by Frances Nelkin.



Spring chemise in a gray silk-and-cotton mixture, $19.95, by Jerry Gilden. Hat of white straw, $8.95.

Printed silk dress and jacket $49.95, by Bob Crystal. Bandeau of straw leaves, $8.95; small faille handbag, $7.95, by Morris Moskowitz.

Bows everywhere—on Aliata's royal-blue calfskin slipper, the champagne-colored pump. Balenciaga's beautiful azure-blue suède belt is hung with crystal hearts. The tiny jewel of ■ bag is of iridescent silk.



Your

WILHELA CUSHMAN

The hat of stitched silk is one of the simplest, most elegant hats in the world, and virtually timeless. This pale lilac taffeta is by Mr. John. Best worn with a matching costume—the fine wool-flannel dress by Ben Barrack.

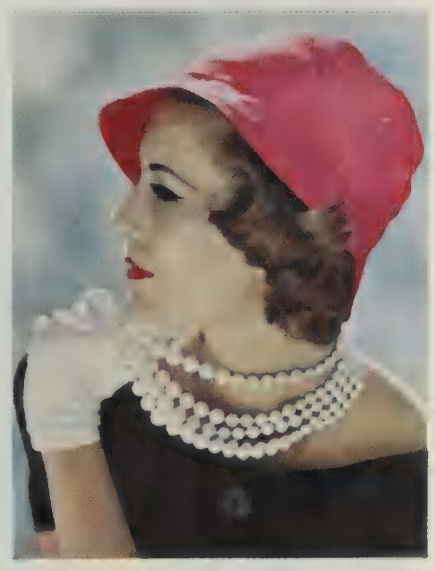
RICHARD HANLEY

Royal-blue calfskin bag by Richard Koret. Choose a blue shoe with a cuff—a wheat-colored walking shoe. Amber fold-over satin purse and crystals from Eleanora Garnett.

The fashions on all these pages are presented to you because they show you the trends of the season and serve as a guide as you shop. You will find many of them in stores throughout the nation. However, if you do not find identical styles in your local shops, we believe similar ones will be available.

Sun-gold cut-velvet bag by Joan Morse—wonderful with a silk-print pump or pale slipper by Christian Dior. Coral beads—Nettie Rosenstein.

Fringe of feathers on straw, an enchanting hat by Adolfo of Emme. Wear with black.



Double-faced sapphire-blue milan breton to wear with matching silk or wool, by John Frederics. Blue silk-shantung costume by Sydney Wragge.

Pretty Head

turns to accessories

More often than not, the woman who always looks well does it with accessories. The look of quality, the touch of color, the personal spark is in the becoming hat, the fastidious shoe, the really good handbag, the scarf, the pin, each thoughtfully chosen.

By WILHELA CUSHMAN
Fashion Editor

Left—Lilac blossoms covering the head—the sweetest hat of spring by Christian Dior, New York. Wear with blues, greens or black. The silk costume by Harvey Berin.

The slouch hat comes back to fashion for any hour—devastatingly feminine in this stitched fuchsia chiffon, by Pierre Cardin.

Grosgrain pillbox in brilliant color by Mr. John, with wools or silks. Tweed dress by Abe Schrader.

PRINTS
from HEAD to TOE

This spring you will be wearing prints from the top of your head to the tip of your toes.

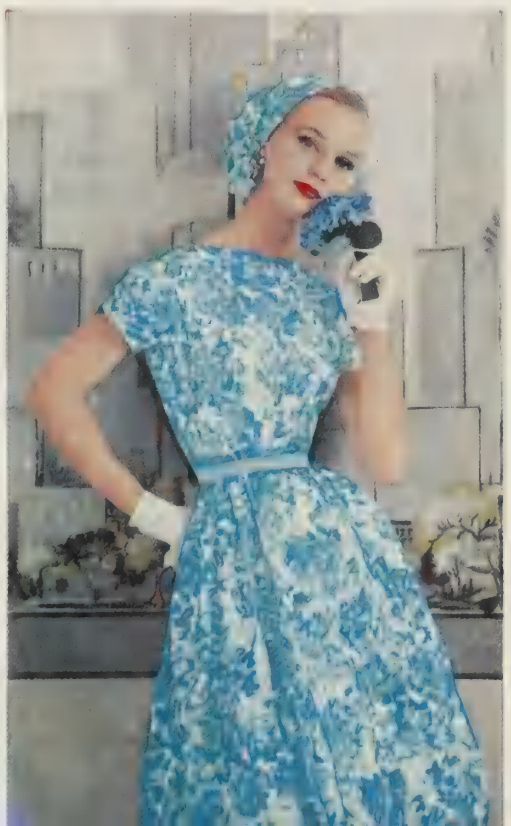
The prettiest printed hats, the gayest printed shoes are an important part of the spring fashion picture.

They might match a dress or accent a neutral . . . but they are bound to brighten any wardrobe.

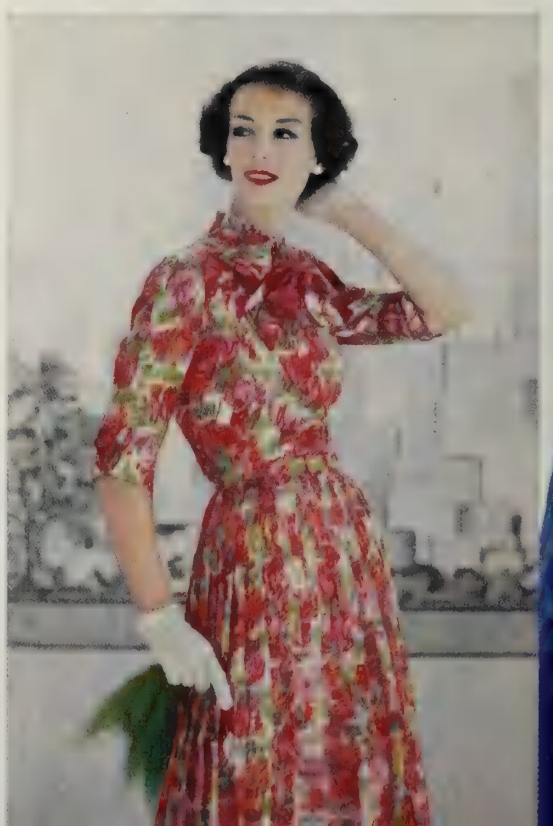
By NORA O'LEARY
Pattern Editor

HAT BY MR. ARNOLD

A black-and-white spatter print is one of the most versatile. Our ensemble, in silk surah, has a one-piece dress with a circular fan-pleated skirt and an easy-fitting double-breasted jacket with velvet overcollar, velvet buttons, three-quarter sleeves. Vogue Design No. S-4868.



SHOES BY JEAN BANDLER



Beige, black and a bright print are a happy combination. The jacket and skirt are both made of silk linen. The printed overblouse and jacket lining are of silk surah. Note the matching shoes. The costume, Vogue Design No. S-4872.

Other Views, Sizes and Prices of Vogue Patterns on Page 106.
Buy Vogue Patterns at the store which sells them in your city. Or order by mail, enclosing check or money order,* from Vogue Pattern Service, Putnam Ave., Greenwich, Conn.; or in Canada from 198 Spadina Ave., Toronto, Ont. Some prices slightly higher in Canada. (*Conn. residents please add sales tax.) These patterns will be sent third-class mail. If you desire shipment first-class mail, please include 5c additional for each pattern ordered.
© VOGUE

This gay young print in turquoise and white taffeta has an amusing draped skirt with a self bow at the hem. The simple bodice zips up the back. Vogue Design No. S-4873. Make a matching draped turban.

A beloved shirtwaist dress in a rose-printed silk to wear now under your coat and all through the summer. The neckline ties in a soft bow, the skirt has unpressed pleats, or you may press them as shown. Vogue Design No. 9178.

We feel that the more beautiful the print, the simpler the design of the dress should be. This charming iridescent woven flower on silk shantung is one of the loveliest prints we've seen in years. The simple bodice has an open neckline and tiny buttons to the waistline. The sleeves are long and slim, the skirt softly gathered. Vogue Design No. 9452.

HAT BY MR. ARNOLD

LEOMBRUNO-BODI

HAT BY EMME

Polka dots are always a sure sign of spring. Our slim dress is topped by a cherry-red silk-linen coat lined in the same dotted surah. Even the youthful roller hat is in the same fabric. The dress and coat are Vogue Design No. 112. Make coat later in a printed linen.

The detail of the dress shown above under the red coat is an important fashion. The bloused-back effect held in by a ribbon drawstring is a casual, wearable version of the chemise. Without the coat, it's a summer favorite.

HAT BY DON MARSHALL; PHOTOGRAPHS BY MARIA MARTEL

"Uncle William!" I think I heard Inspector Cailleux ordering us to sit down, but I was not listening, nor were the others.

GREENGAGE SUMMER

BY RUMER GODDEN

CONCLUSION As soon as we came into the house we knew that Mme. Corbet had sent Mlle. Zizi to meet Eliot because she wanted her out of the way.

Mme. Corbet was efficient; when anything had to be arranged at Les Oeillets, it was made ready quietly and swiftly. "But not if Mlle. Zizi is there," said Hester. Mlle. Zizi gave contradictory orders, upset M. Armand by suggesting last-minute changes in the food, and quarreled with Mme. Corbet. It was wiser to send Mlle. Zizi away. Now the house was being quickly transformed; we could see it was for a much bigger occasion than any since we had come.

"Is it a banquet?" asked Willmouse.

The tables in the dining room had been moved to make one large T, the whole covered with white cloths and laid with silver and glass. "Ninety-four places," whispered Hester when she had finished counting. The flowers were not being done as usual by Mauricette; Madame from l'Églantine and her two mademoiselles in green overalls were arranging them, carnations, asparagus ferns and white flowers like small lilies on one stem; they had a strong, sweet smell. "Mauricette says they are tuber roses," I said.

In the bar a platform had been made; we knew it was only of boxes but, laid with a carpet and palms, it looked impressive. There were more flowers in the hall and bar and a carpet had been put down from the front door to the foot of the stairs. "Because the sous préfet and Monsieur le Maire are coming," said Vicky, who had joined us from the kitchen.

"It is a banquet," said Willmouse certainly.

"It's the Brass Instruments Ball," said Vicky, who had been in the kitchen most of the day and knew everything.

Not quite everything. It was the Brass Instrument Factory's centenary dinner, but it remained forever in our minds as the Brass Instruments Ball.

We had often passed the factory when we were exploring across the river. Now all the thirty workers, with their wives—and husbands, for some of the workers were women—their grown-up sons and daughters were coming and, as well as the sous préfet and the mayor, the town clerk, the commissar of police, the lieutenant of gendarmerie, the chief of the municipal band, "Et le Capitaine des Pompiers," said Mauricette, which meant the head of the fire brigade. Mauricette said that the doctor, M. le Directeur, was coming because he was the brother-in-law of M. Perrichaut, and that Eliot and Mlle. Zizi were invited. There would be no room at Les Oeillets for any visitors that night; the whole hotel was taken up with the Brass Instruments.

"What will they do?" asked Vicky, and Eliot, who had come up behind us, told her:

"They will eat a lot, drink quite a lot and make long speeches. And then perhaps they will dance."

"To the Brass Instruments Band?" asked Hester.

The Brass Instruments had their own band. We had heard it on Sundays and guessed that the platform was for them.

"Look what they are to eat," said Vicky.

She had brought us the menu:

Hors d'oeuvres variés
Homard à la mayonnaise

"That's lobster," I told Vicky.

"I know, I ate some," she said.

Poulet Chasseur
Filet de boeuf rôti jardinière
Salade de saison
Fromages variés
Pièce Montée
Fruits

"And the pièce has a whole band on top of it," said Vicky. "Monsieur Armand has been four days making it." She took us to look at it. It was on a silver slab, a great cake with trellises and scrolls of icing and, on top, a sugar band, the bandsmen made of meringue and colored, the tiny brass instruments of yellow sugar. We could not believe it had been made here in the kitchen. M. Armand seemed radiantly pleased as he chivvied us out of the kitchen, but I had caught sight of Paul, his back turned to us, at the sink with a huge pile of saucepans. When he reached for a cloth the lock of hair fell back and we saw his face looking thinner than ever and as dirtily white as his apron. How I wish now I had gone and spoken to him, but I was afraid he would only have sworn at me.

No one told us what was to happen to us and we stayed watching in the dining room while Mme. Églantine and her mademoiselles put the last flower in the last vase, then we went upstairs and dressed. We put on our best frocks, that we had not worn yet; they were not very grand—crinkled white seersuckers with small rose spots. Mother had made them out of a length she had bought at the sales; Joss had grown out of hers, and they had been handed down so that I wore Joss', Hester wore mine and Vicky, Hester's; with two more to come down, it seemed Vicky would have to wear rose-spotted seersucker for years. Willmouse put on a clean shirt, his silk tie, clean shorts. "What will Joss wear?" asked Hester.

"She will see when she comes in," Willmouse said.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 100

Copyright © 1958 by Rumer Godden

The complete novel is soon to be published by The Viking Press, Inc.

GRACEFUL THROATLINE, FIRMER CHIN (1) Sit, cross-legged, with head dropped as far forward as possible. Now (2) describe a complete circle with your head by rolling it over to right side, (3) all the way back—then to left side, and forward to first position. If you are doing this correctly, you will feel the s-t-r-e-t-c-h all the way around. Try 3 times. Reverse circle, try 3 more.

Stretch for beauty

ROGER PRIGENT

Today's exercise experts believe s-t-r-e-t-c-h-i-n-g exercises triple their value by doing three jobs at once: each s-t-r-e-t-c-h-i-n-g movement strengthens and lengthens muscle-tissue attachments; redistributes and streamlines measurements by firming and toning loose flesh; and increases your metabolism, which speeds up your loss of weight. Through planned s-t-r-e-t-c-h-i-n-g your posture and walk become graceful and youthful, your circulation steps up, making you feel as fit as you look. S-t-r-e-t-c-h-i-n-g works to undo the restrictions brought on by tense necks, rounded shoulders, sway backs, tight lower backs. The exercises on these pages are designed to limber and reshape you from top to toe. Concentrate on the ones you feel you need most, and do them every day. Begin with 10 minutes (at least ½ hour after mealtime is a good time to start), and gradually work up to 20, 30 or more minutes, depending upon your endurance as well as how much time you can afford each day. Do each exercise rhythmically. You should feel fresh and exhilarated after your program. (If you are fatigued, you've done too much. Build up s-l-o-w-l-y.) Supplement these exercises by s-t-r-e-t-c-h-i-n-g in your household chores. (Stretch for that platter on the upper shelf, stretch for the toy that rolled under the sofa.) Be sure to have your doctor's approval of your program before you begin and then, with his blessings, commence s-t-r-e-t-c-h-i-n-g your way to beauty!

By DAWN CROWELL NORMAN
Beauty Editor

TINIER WAIST, FLATTER MIDRIFF (1) Stand straight with feet apart in a comfortable stance, arms straight above head, hands clasped. (2) Twist upper body to right, (3) bend forward and try to touch floor in front of right foot. Then swing up and twist to starting position. Repeat on other side. Try 5 times daily, each side. Gradually work up to 10.

FLATTER ABDOMEN, FIRMER THIGHS (1) Sit on floor and lean back, resting trunk on elbows, palms on floor, knees bent, feet flat on floor. (2) Lift knees and bring them back toward chest. (3) Without allowing legs to touch floor, slowly stretch them out in front—then slowly bend knees and return to chest. Try to repeat leg stretch 3 times before lowering feet to starting position. Gradually work up to 10.

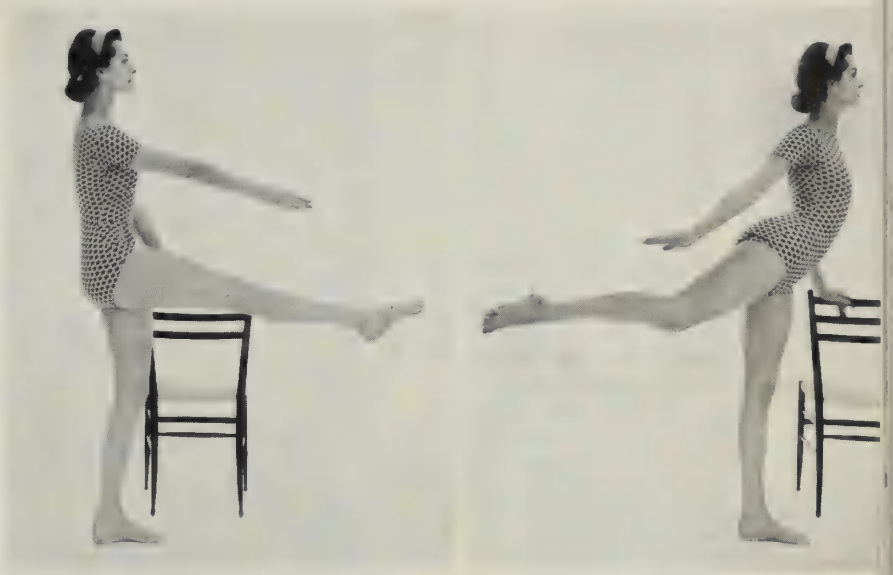
Printed Exercise Suits by Capezio.



Exercises by Evelyn Loewendahl, formerly faculty member University of California, Los Angeles, and associate professor, Physical Rehabilitation, Pepperdine College.

UPPER SILHOUETTE STRETCH (for shoulders, bust and arms) (1) Stand straight, feet together, toes straight ahead. Hold 2- or 3-pound weights (boxes of sugar or salt) in hands at sides. (2) Describe a wide circle with weights by raising arms forward, above head, (3) back, out to sides, and down. You should feel the s-t-r-e-t-c-h in your arms all the way through this exercise. Try 10 times; gradually work up to 20.

RMER UPPER ARMS (1) Get on hands and knees, arms straight, ard, hands directly under shoulders. (2) Slide legs straight back, then (3) bend elbows and lower body to floor. Push up until elbows are straight. Return knees to starting position. Do 3 times; gradually build up to 8 or 10.

FIRMER HIPS AND THIGHS Stand beside table or chair and balance body by holding on with left hand. (1) Keep your back straight and swing right leg forward and up as high as possible and (2) back and up as high as possible. For balance and co-ordination, let your right arm swing back and forth with your leg movements. Try 10 swings. Repeat exercise using left leg and arm.

SLIMMER HIPS AND WAIST (1) Stand sideways 6″ from wall, hands clasped overhead, elbows straight. (2) Without moving feet, push hip against wall and keep it there while you slowly bend upper body away from wall. Use left hand to pull right arm over as you bend. Return to starting position. Try 3 times, work up to 5 on each side.

TONING INNER THIGHS AND ABDOMEN Lie on floor, legs together, arms at sides. (1) Holding legs together with knees straight, lift feet about 10″ above floor and (2) swing legs apart as far as possible. Bring them back together and down. Try 5 times; gradually work up to 15.

PRETTIER POSTURE, FIRMER THIGHS Stand straight, arms at sides, feet together. Keep body straight and in quick rhythm alternately lift right knee as close to chest as possible, and then left knee. Try 16 counts each day. Increase if you wish.

FOR SLIMMER ANKLES, FLEXIBLE FEET Describe as wide a circle as possible with your foot to stretch and limber the ankle joint and all muscles which control the foot. Begin with 5 circles in each direction, for each foot. Gradually work up to 10.

Journal's Extra Dividend House

It starts with a sound main-house investment. Its added interest is a two-room wing

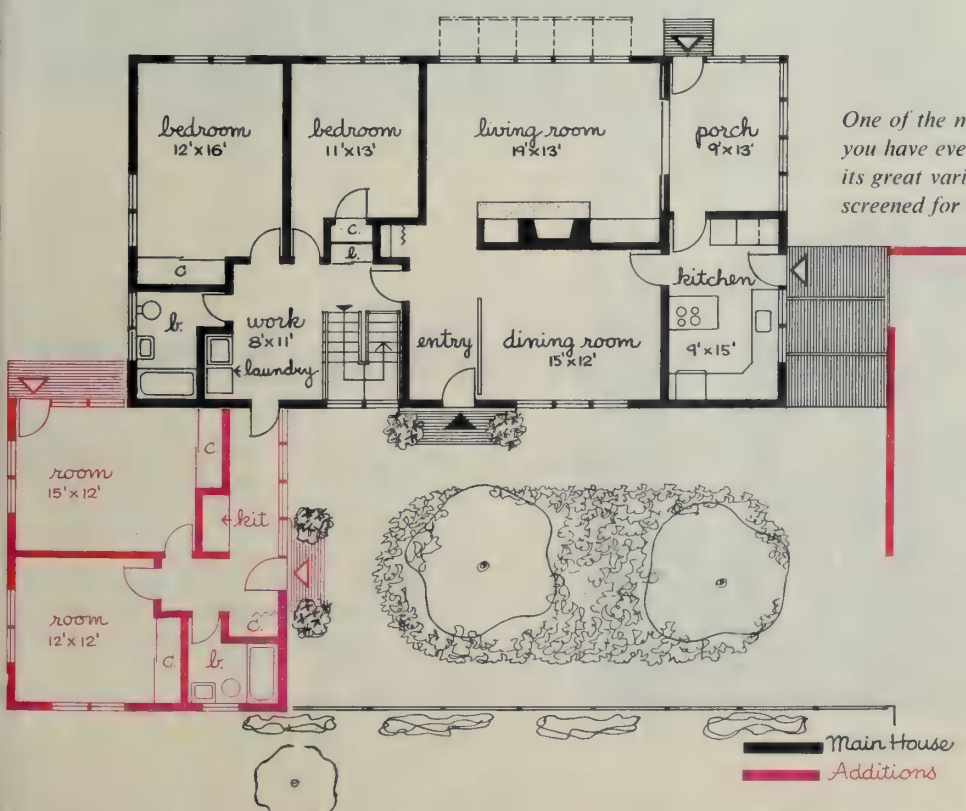
. . . for in-laws, or young marrieds
. . . as family grows
. . . as extra bedroom for guests
. . . as a professional office
. . . or rent it for income later

Here is a house that is planned in advance to double its value and livability both. It is a house for the farsighted family who would like to start off in the $18,500 range, yet be able at any time to have their home become a full house and a half at an additional cost. At the same time it is a house for a family so farsighted that their enlarged home grows logically. A slightly larger original cost pays off handsomely later.

Anyone who has ever watched an afterthought addition being grafted onto a house by ripping off great sections of the roof and exposing whole rooms to passers-by will appreciate the neatness of the operation here. It is merely a matter of attaching the paneled walls of the wing to the paneled walls of the main house, letting the flat roof of the wing snug tightly under the main-house eaves, and then connecting the plumbing and wiring which were right there ready and waiting to be connected. And in the same way the front path suddenly becomes a patio that very prettily and pleasantly accommodates the entrance doorways of house and wing, while preserving their independence. The story of the house is a kind of Foresight Saga. Almost any family size or situation you can think of has been foreseen, and put into the plan. Follow it through, and see for yourself.

EZRA STOLLER

Even in its starting-off stage it is styled for its future.



In its final form, livability, beauty and value have been added.

RICHARD PRATT
Architectural and Garden Editor
WILLIAMS AND WELLS
Designers
MARGARET DAVIDSON
Homemaking Editor

The Journal's
EXTRA DIVIDEND
HOUSE
Portfolio #7

The main house and the wing share the patio which provides each one with a separate approach and with equal adornment.

One of the most engaging floor plans you have ever followed through runs the gamut from its great variety of living possibilities to a porch screened for summer, glassed in for winter.

Blueprints are available from designers Williams and Wells, 32 E. 57th St., New York 22, N.Y., at $10 a set

BUILDING NEWS

Dividends run through the house. Its whole panel construction is a subtle, significant part of the plan. As you follow the blueprint, you discover that all the wall panels of the house can be fabricated in any woodworking shop, and put together on the building site. Some panels are wood; others are wood and glass; others combine fixed glass and louvered glass. The sizes of these panels are repetitive, which means they can be cut and carpentered and shipped to the site at a saving all the way. In sum, almost all the house except the outer frame can be built indoors or under cover, then assembled and put into place on your lot.

You save initially by this system, and you save later. Our additions (wing and carport) call for flat roof construction. That means you can add, even years later, with no need to tear out any existing parts of the house. The wing, for example, butts straight against the house under the gutter line. The roof of the main house stays intact all the time you're growing outward.

Because the panels in the new wing are sized to panels in the main house, you add a wing almost as though you were working with children's building blocks. Your additions fit where you place them because all measurements jibe. Take a few panels out of your old house—add a wing—the new section lines up in perfect joining.

For the pitched roof of the main house, we used a modern and highly durable seamed metal alloy. Paint it the color of your choice. Its life is extraordinarily long, and its resistance to leakage is great.

Duckboard door platforms rather than steps give you manifold benefits. Of good-looking wood, slotted in this way as platforms at the door, they let rain drain off, can be cleaned with a hose, are natural mudguards, dry immediately after a shower, and are superb decorative platforms for potted plants.

Attic space beneath the main roof is ventilated, with louvers at both ends, and this air space makes the penetration of summer heat into the house less possible. A nonstorage attic of this kind insulates against extreme cold, too, and so saves on both heating and (if you have it) air-conditioning costs.

Gravel up to the walls in place of foundation planting is a measure for clean appearance that is good for the walls and convenient for window washing, painting.

English ivy substituting in the patio for grass provides a handsome, permanent and almost carefree ground cover.

The white birch is one of the best and most becoming patio trees; its feathery foliage never too dense, its size never too great for nearness to house.

Tub gardening is the easiest of all, and admirably decorative. Colorful summer annuals give way in early September to simply handled chrysanthemum plants that bloom until frost.

In the living room, 19′x13′, space seems to extend on all sides. Part of the room's appeal is its warmth of color and gracefully scaled furnishings. Part is the extra dimension added by a porch, screened or winterized, in many seasons an entertaining annex to the room itself. And the living room's windowed wall, facing away from the road, looks out onto quiet lawn or grove of trees or terraced area, as you choose. All the elements in its design give a sense of spaciousness.

The Oriental trend fits beautifully into the clear colors of a contemporary home. You can choose from popular-priced furnishings nationally available. Around the fireplace of white-painted concrete block, furniture groups naturally and sociably. We like white walls here, and the contrast of dark floor and green wool-tweed rug, in a scheme lit with fabrics. The sofa, for instance, contemporary and walnut, captures the eye immediately in cotton of Oriental brilliance. Rush chairs are as vivid as pools in a blue spun cotton. A simple wood chair has been lacquered and flecked to a jewellike blue and pillowed in gold-and-white cotton. The coffee table is natural teak with patterned wood top. Even with few furnishings, for the young family, a room like this can vibrate with color.

Add a game table, low and long, beside the window. In this case, only 22″ high, it neither cuts off the view nor calls for too many accessories. Two brass-legged ottomans fit under, pull out for extra seating. A Korean bronze lamp lights the game area. As a commodious storage chest, we carry out the Eastern influence in a cabinet of Hong Kong origin, but you could choose antique or contemporary as well. A single extra armchair is all the room needs for solid comfort.

Accessories are added at will. Over the chest: an inexpensive rubbing of ancient horses in spirited blacks and grays. Above the fireplace: an antique wood mold mellowed to the color of old ginger. The radio-and-music center fits to left of the fireplace in a tailored-to-space arrangement of tambour-doored chests. Matching shelves paneled in pandanus cloth can conceal a speaker.

A room like this is a wise investment. Start it simply and knowledgeably, and its wealths of livability and beauty grow with the years.

HAROLD FOWLER

Our Living

Porch is inviting with a white circular table under an iron lantern, two brass garden stools, a few colorful armchairs, tubs of dramatic greenery. Its unobstructed view adds to the living room's pleasure.

The Journal's
EXTRA DIVIDEND
HOUSE
Portfolio #7

At the eight-foot-high window, sunny yellow draperies are of washable dress fabric. Outdoor overhang filters sun. Rush chairs have cushions so you can change colors seasonally; slip covers you alternate can all be washable. Ottomans were covered in red herringbone cotton mix.

Room's Profit: Porch and Garden Extensions

LIVING-ROOM NEWS

To screen sun, house uses overhangs of wood in slatted patterns (as seen through living-room window at left). They not only protect large expanses of glass from high and hot summer sun, but are angled so that low winter sun can come in unobstructed with all its cheer and warmth.

Porch is easily winterized or screened for summer, adapts to your locale. Wood-framed screens for summer alternate with glass panels in winter which fit in place as you switch to meet the seasons.

Disappearing doors separate living room and porch. We use sliding aluminum-sashed doors which, when open, go into pockets in the walls, so the two rooms seem one. But privacy can be secured at any time.

Windows in two parts, as seen in the living room, use fixed glass panels above, with a lower section of sliding sash for ventilation.

Weatherproof steel porch table can go out in the garden, is certified rustproof for ten years.

Rug here is mothproofed in manufacturing process. Quite a few new rugs now bear this guaranty . . . worth asking about when you buy.

Wall-to-wall fluorescent valances, an alternate idea for your living room, can add drama where draperies are the featured pattern. New hardware and fixtures allow you to light your silky draw draperies from above. Lighting itself is concealed. Its effect is lovely.

Long-life light bulbs are guaranteed for 10,000 hours. In the attic, over stairways, in the basement, or wherever replacing bulbs is awkward, they are well worth the extra cost.

Fluorescent lighting has been modernized, in flattering warm-white colors. And incandescent lights come in tints these days, so you can choose even yellow, blue, pink and blue-greens, depending on the color background you want to dramatize.

For walls, new paints abound, including those which must be applied by professionals but give a speckled effect in one spray operation. Even the homeowner can paint chairs and tables with small spray cans of paint available in almost every color—even flecked and dotted.

DINING-ROOM NEWS

Window blind with new tilt control is used here, allows you to direct light and ventilation any way you like. The lower part, for example, can be opened for air, the upper part closed for privacy. Or single sections of the blind can be closed or opened as path of the sun changes. A revolutionary new cord design is responsible.

Hidden hinges are handy to know about if you use shutters or louvers. Designed on a new principle, they have no protruding parts that show.

Touch latches enable you to close or open doors with gentle finger-tip pressure, are useful for cupboards, closets, storage walls. No hardware juts out to break the surface or distract the eye.

Handsome doorknobs will tempt you too. Some now come in rosewood, myrtle, ebony. Others are ceramic in white or colors or variegated floral patterns. Even front-door knobs have become more personal, with monograms.

Light dimmers enable you to turn lights low during party conversation, turn them up when card players gather around the table. These dimming devices are installed in the wiring system, and are operated by dials.

For window gardeners, new hardware fastens to window casings to hold glass shelves.

Soil-resistant fabrics in this room have all been guaranteed longer life through chemical magic. The process of siliconizing materials, so they resist spills and smudges, has developed steadily. Even fabrics that were once temperamental (glazed chintz, for instance) can now be given this protection.

Sliding or folding doors, to order, are often the answer to a divider problem. You can choose woven wood strips in wood frames, plantation shutters, West Indies screens, decorative glass, or fabrics laminated in plastic. Lightweight aluminum ceiling tracks support them.

Pole lamps adjust by spring to your ceiling and floor, provide two or three shaded bulbs at various heights, are a good choice between two chairs in your library area.

Directly off the hallway is the dining room. We shield it from incoming guests with a divider that can be a full-scale library or the start of one, because the room can also double as an after-dinner study and retreat. With a divider unit tailored to order, you can also plan room, as we do here, for desk, work and writing space needed in the evening hours.

The dining room is 15′x12′, and with its privacy and serviceability it glows with animated color. Three walls are yellow, a single one strikingly blocked in black-and-white Oriental wallpaper. At the large and sunny window, draperies are a striped black, white and yellow linen. The table we choose is teak and oak, seats six as shown, or up to ten at its full holiday or dinner-party expansion. Beech dining chairs, satiny to the touch, are surprisingly moderate in cost and covered here in cherry cotton. Probably at no other time has the young family just setting up a household, or the older family starting fresh and replacing, had such a choice of domestic and imported furniture in such a gamut of good looks and price ranges.

For shelving or extra serving surface, for instance, choice can range from a contemporary chest to items as individual as the French baker's rack in black iron and milk glass, airy and individual and utilitarian all at once. And lighting has never been more beautiful. One choice: the quintet of white globes you see here in a wood yoke, ceiling strung to save space, and multiple to give any degree of light you like.

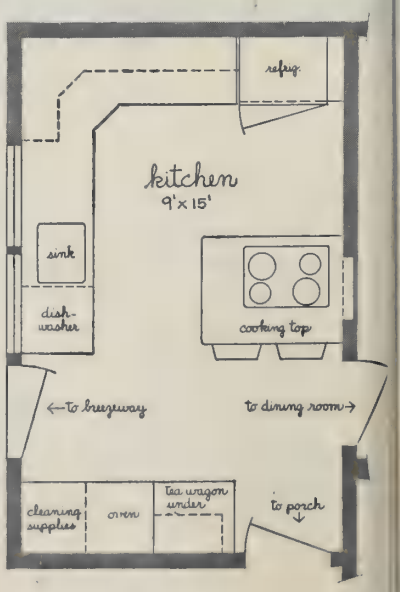
HAROLD FOWLER

In the bookshelf divider, a small-scaled desk matches the buffet chest in its drawer design. Writing shelf slides in or out. Over stationery shelves, gleaming brass wall lamp is a space saver. Next to it, a fanciful seed mosaic is an art-on-a-budget discovery, among many such to be found.

Handsome buffet chest has recessed finger grips rather than applied hardware, holds mats, coasters, linens and china.

Our Dining Room's Dividend:
Library and Study Room

Dishwasher can easily handle china and utensils for nine people. Refrigerator has a squared-off and built-in look, but actually is free-standing, with a grill above for ventilation.



Our Kitchen's Asset: 11 Feet of Continuous Counter

The kitchen is straightforward in plan, and strategic in the way it operates. Because of the separate dining room next to it, and the porch for informal dining, the kitchen itself need allow no room for family meals. It does have sit-down and snack space in peninsula form, with room for two stools. Primarily, it has sweeping expanses of work space for creative cooking and easy cleanup. Counter space extends along two sides of the room, from dishwasher on down to refrigerator. More counter and ■ wheeled cart are next to the separate built-in oven.

The materials are gala, versatile and practical: cabinets white above, pink below; stainless steel in silvery shimmer; cherry-red plastic counters fronted by a hardwood cutting-board strip to give a whole length of mother-daughter work space.

In over-all location the room is near the carport, handy for errands and deliveries. Its windows face entry road and garden to save any shut-away feeling. Just as welcome each day are its inner conveniences. The dishwasher stops automatically when you open the door to add a forgotten glass. The refrigerator has ■ 95-pound freezer section, plus fresh-food storage, and is self-defrosting. The stainless-steel cooking hood houses a fan and a light. The oven controls its own temperature.

It's a kitchen as sound as a blue chip. Bank on it for a satisfying lifetime of use.

STUART

With oven on its own, mother and daughter can cook separately when they like. Counter is handy for setting out a bubbly pie or crusty roast. Serving cart fits under.

Cooking top is set into a counter. Hottest utensils can't harm the stainless steel. Fanned hood above whisks steam up out of the kitchen to keep temperatures pleasant.

The Journal's
EXTRA DIVIDEND
HOUSE
Portfolio #7

KITCHEN NEWS

The red plastic ■■ use for counters is brand-new, highly flexible and tough, and curves up to make its own backsplash. The big advantages: less work to install, and no crevices to clean. At front is wood section for knife work. At rear, backsplash forms a shelf.

Kitchen's wallpaper, in thistledown design, is plastic coated. Splashes won't harm it, and small fingermarks sponge away.

Floor is plastic tile in rosy pink and charcoal, a flecked design that doesn't show soil.

New surprise in kitchen cabinets: The ones we show have wood doors framed in such a way you can remove them without tools. Here we show white in top section, pink below counter. But when you want to vary a color scheme, or when the fronts show wear, you can shift both doors and drawer fronts. The cabinets themselves are metal with baked-on finish for durability.

Small-size 150-watt bulbs allow you to get more light from an enclosed kitchen fixture. Brand-new, bulbs are ⅔" smaller than they used to be, and will fit into a spot originally planned for a 100-watt bulb.

Whole luminous ceilings can be planned inside bathrooms or kitchens, so that you have light from a large area, shadowfree, coming down from behind diffusing plastic panels. It's fairly expensive installation, but gives a luxurious feeling, and is sensible if a room is not oriented toward sunlight.

Large-capacity dishwasher has convenient slide-out racks. Because of its generous size, an average family can store used dishes after breakfast or lunch, wash them only twice or even once a day.

Magnetic door latches are the quietest of all in your home. They have no moving parts. Inset in the frame is a permanently magnetized piece of metal, and a companion piece of metal is set into the door itself. Doors between two rooms stay securely closed, are rattle-free.

Automatic garage-door opener can now be operated by push button from inside your car. It operates electronically, is a good item to remember if you later convert the carport.

MORE NEWS

Wall is plastic on canvas, in soft yellow with silvery overlay that has the look of silk. Same lustrous material was used as panels on the cupboard doors.

Ironing table is adjustable for sit-down or stand-up ironing, and has a new rounded shape wide in the center where it's easier to reach. Wheels in the base come into action when you stand the ironing board on end, and you can glide it into storage.

Convenient hanger, as you iron blouses and shirts, is a separate portable stand with swinging arm. You see it in action at right below. Later it stores out of sight in slotted area at left of washer and dryer.

Playhouse that fits over a card table is made of unbleached muslin, illustrated in felt. It folds after use, can be kept in a drawer.*

Sun-lamp bulbs can light your way to relaxation as you sit and sew. They provide ultraviolet rays to give you a tan and other health benefits. Infrared heat-lamp bulbs can also be used to ease muscle pain. Both types now fit regular light sockets.

Stairway lighting idea: recess small fixtures flush with the wall, or under handrails.

For locking an open window, a thumbscrew arrangement is fastened to the side of the frame. It is adjustable so window can be open at three heights and yet be locked.

Shelves adjust in your cupboards or bookcases when you use metal side tracks with removable brackets. Newest aid are the side tracks that come with small vertical numbers. You can insert a shelf on the level, with no guesswork.

Our pattern No. 2920, 25¢, from Reference Library, Ladies' Home Journal, Philadelphia 5, Pa. Pennsylvania residents please add sales tax.*

Dryer has five settings, suitable for sheer to strong fabrics. Washer, too, has a range of water temperatures to cater to all family laundering.

Our Hall's Gain: Laundry, Work and Play Space

Actually an enlarged section of the hall, the laundry center tucks away in a space approximately 11'x8', takes a tremendous strain off the rest of the house. There is room for ironing as well as a play center.

A cheerful yellow washer and dryer fit side by side. Plumbing lines link up economically with the bathroom beyond. You can hide the laundry nook if you like with a pull-down split-wood shade, though the appliances are so good-looking they don't need screening. An ironing board and collapsible chair fit in a slot beside them. Above is room for blanket storage.

The wall chest can hold your portable sewing machine. Behind it we allowed a slot for a card table which can come out to be an extra work surface or, with cover, be a playhouse for the children. A comfortable chair and stools that double as tables complete the room.

With low railing at one side and a windowed view beyond, the space has openness and freedom along with its triple-value downright usefulness. Here, as in the entire house: inches work, costs stay down, but there's room for fun too.

STUART

Door leads to the wing described on our opening page. It can close off entirely, or yield a large extra area of living space.

Rarely is there a single cause for an unsatisfactory marriage. Frequently there are so many obvious causes of trouble that the counselor scarcely knows where to begin. In the Los Angeles headquarters of the American Institute of Family Relations, where we give nearly 15,000 consultations each year, we try to go to work on the marriage from as many sides as possible. This "total push" frequently brings quick improvement. One of the problems may be as simple and as easily helped as disorganized housekeeping—a salient factor in the case here described. When Lila was aided to make out a schedule for her routine housework, and handle it more systematically, she accomplished more with less effort, and some of her other difficulties began to seem less important. Surveys have concluded that poor housekeeping is a major factor in marriage troubles and that many homemakers could do their routine work in 40 per cent less time than they now give to it—and do it better. . . . The counselor in this case was Mrs. Carolyn Sichel.

PAUL POPENOE, SC.D., Director

Can this Marriage be Saved?

SHE: "Good housekeeping means a lot to Whit. He is the type who expects efficiency; he thinks a home can be operated like a factory. Even trifling failures upset him terribly."

HE: "When I see things thrown around, it has a physical effect on me; my stomach tightens, my eyeballs throb, and invariably my temper snaps."

LILA TELLS HER SIDE: "I can take doing without things," Lila said wanly. A slender woman who appeared to be in her late thirties or early forties, Lila wore an expensive, custom-tailored but no longer fashionable suit. "I can even take explaining to the youngsters that they must do without until daddy's commissions improve. But Whit's insurance business, despite the fact that he works desperately hard, has never grown to a point where it will support our size family. We have a five-year- and a nine-year-old girl, and I have a teen-age son, Larry, by my first marriage.

"I feel so guilty about our grocery bill—I can't manage any payments on it—that I have been cutting down on the food I buy. I then fret that the children may be undernourished. I don't nag Whit for money; I accept and thank him for the few dollars he does hand me. But I wish he would talk to me so I could share his burdens. I worry all the time that his health may crack under the strain and become as poor as mine. Several weeks ago, I just happened to overhear him on the phone. The finance company was threatening to repossess his car—and he must have it to stay in business. Whit looked so drawn and old when he hung up—my husband is only forty-four—that I felt like bursting into tears. I put my arms around him and insisted he take a nest egg I'd been holding back since my last birthday. My father gave me a hundred dollars, as he always does, but this year I didn't mention the gift. My husband is sensitive on the subject of my father, who managed to build up a prosperous business in spite of lacking Whit's education. Whit did accept my 'loan' and got the finance people off his neck.

"Our move to the beach was a mistake. Whit's hours, since we're there, are fantastically bad. He leaves home at six A.M. and often does not return until eight or nine P.M. I supposed living in an isolated beach cottage would be cheaper than living in town. Unfortunately, the schools are too far for the children to walk, so I must take Sally to kindergarten, then rush home to drive Ellen to elementary school, dash back to get Larry to junior high—and repeat the whole process again in the afternoon!

"Because of all the driving, sometimes it's almost evening before I get at the bedmaking and breakfast dishes. In the old days, I was a fairly good housekeeper. Good housekeeping means a lot to Whit. He is the type of man who expects efficiency, organization, a foolproof system; he thinks a home can be operated like a factory. Even trifling failures upset him terribly.

"Last week he spotted one unwashed teacup in the sink. I bore his criticism in silence. But then he turned on Larry for leaving his schoolbooks in the den. Larry had been using the books to do his homework; the poor kid has been having a tough time at school and I believe he should be encouraged to study in the den or anywhere else. Whit's attack was so manifestly unfair—most of the time he is wonderfully patient with our daughters—that I undertook to defend Larry. My nerves went to pieces and I said a lot of things I didn't really mean.

"I accused Whit of not working during his interminable absences but of dilly-dallying with some woman; my first husband did step out on me, and constantly. Whit hit the roof, denied being interested in any other woman, but shouted there was nothing pleasant in our house for him to come home to. He went into his den and slammed the door. Immediately he opened the door, stuck out his head and yelled that the room was stifling hot and that maybe we could save money by using less heat. Next he shouted that I must have forgotten to take my pink pills again and should do so at once and try to control myself before the children.

"My pink pills are various hormones that are CONTINUED ON PAGE 197

DON ORNITZ

"Whit turned on Larry for leaving his schoolbooks in the den.
The attack was so manifestly unfair that I undertook to defend Larry.
My nerves went to pieces and I said a lot of things I didn't really mean."

Swiss Steak, Savory and Tender

Dressed in sour-cream sauce, this family favorite appears gaily at a party buffet,
a delight to guests . . .
a tribute to you

Our Swiss steak is perfect for a buffet party. It's accommodating—gives you time to enjoy your guests. And it's economical, so you can have another party soon. When slowly, gently cooked, it becomes so tender a fork will cut it. It's different too—an old favorite with a new face. The secret's hidden in the sauce, not made this time with tomatoes, but of a subtle blending: rich roasting juices and a sprinkling of herbs made satiny at the last minute with sour cream, enriched with tender young mushroom caps and pearly onions. Hollow out kitchen-ripened tomatoes, fill them with curried eggplant, pop them into the oven—and out—so that the stuffing's mellow and moist and beautifully browned. Toss a salad of delicate romaine hearts, water-cress sprigs and almond slivers; bake an herb bouquet into yeast bread. Round out your meal with mixed fruits and a bit of sweet—macaroon cookies. Then sit back and watch your friends enjoy themselves—and your family fare with a party personality.

Our Swiss steak is a main dish that does double duty: bubbles along unattended for three hours, then comes gracefully to the party in its own casserole.

Menu

SWISS STEAK WITH SOUR-CREAM GRAVY

TOMATOES STUFFED WITH CURRIED EGGPLANT

ROMAINE SALAD HERB BREAD

SPICED FRUIT

FILBERT MACAROONS

COFFEE

(Planned for 8)

Colorful ovenware that comes right to the table mixes well with crystal, pottery, wood and silver, making this March meal as appealing to the eye as it is to the palate.

STUART-FOWLER

SWISS STEAK WITH SOUR-CREAM GRAVY

Buy a 5-pound piece of top sirloin. Be sure it's top quality too. Sprinkle ½ teaspoon salt and about ⅛ teaspoon pepper on one side and pound it in well with the blunt side of a kitchen knife. Then sprinkle about 2 tablespoons flour on the same side and pound it in also. It is best to do this in stages. Turn the meat over and repeat the salt, pepper and flour procedure. Be sure you pound the meat well—pounding helps to tenderize a not-so-tender cut. Now melt 2 tablespoons shortening in a deep heavy kettle and brown the meat on both sides. Remove the meat from the pot and sauté 2 large sliced onions. From 1 pound mushrooms remove the caps from 12 and slice the stems and remaining mushrooms. Add to the onions and brown also. Replace the meat in the big kettle. Season with ½ teaspoon seasoned salt, ⅛ teaspoon ground cloves, a large bay leaf, ¼ teaspoon each marjoram and thyme and 1 teaspoon paprika. Add a 10½-ounce can consommé. Cover the kettle and simmer the meat slowly (never let it boil or the meat will become tough and stringy) for about 3 hours, or until the meat is tender. Don't try to hurry the cooking. To be fork-tender, moist and luscious, Swiss steak CONTINUED ON PAGE 170

Fish COLLECTOR'S ITEMS from the Journal Kitchen

STUART

Sole rolls flavorsomely stuffed with seasoned crab; a luscious shrimp-and-crab Newburg sauce over all.

Fish can be fabulous food. In thirty minutes you can prepare a platter of delicious, creamy fillets fit for visiting royalty. Such feasting need not harm the budget, either, for fish usually costs less than meat. Mild and sweet, fish takes happily to herb seasonings, crusty coatings and piquant sauces. (Note to dieters: Fish is your friend. Although most varieties contain no more calories than lean roast beef, they are high in vital nutrients.)

If you would eat fish at the peak of its sea-fresh mildness, serve it the day it is bought. To keep sweet until cooking time, wipe the fish inside and outside with a damp cloth. Wrap first in waxed paper and then in foil and store in the refrigerator.

Whole Fish with Mushroom Stuffing. In a large skillet, sauté 2 tablespoons chopped onion and ¼ cup sliced mushrooms in 3 tablespoons butter. Add 2½ cups fresh bread crumbs and ¼ cup chopped, seeded cucumber. Season with ½ teaspoon salt. Toss gently until ingredients are well mixed. This makes about 2½ cups stuffing—enough for a 3-pound whole fish or 2 pairs large fish fillets. Spoon the stuffing into the body cavity of the fish or between the fillets. Close sides of fish or fillets with toothpicks or skewers. Sprinkle with salt and dot with butter. Place on greased baking sheet and bake in a hot oven, 400° F., for about 25 minutes or until the fish separates easily into moist opaque flakes when tested with a fork. While fish is baking, melt ¼ cup butter in a saucepan and blend in ¼ cup flour. Gradually add 2 cups chicken broth. Cook, stirring constantly, until sauce thickens. Add ¼ cup lemon juice and ½ teaspoon salt. Just before serving, stir in ¼ cup chopped parsley. Transfer the baked fish to a hot platter and pour sauce over it. Makes 4–6 servings. Garnish with crisp, batter-fried onion rings and broiled tomato halves.

Serve a ruddy chunk of salmon, steeped in seasoned juices—sealed in during cooking.

Salmon "en Papillotte." Buy a 2-pound chunk salmon steak. Prepare a strip of aluminum foil large enough to envelop the fish completely with airtight folds. Lay the steak on the foil. Dust generously with freshly ground black pepper, 1 teaspoon salt and 1 teaspoon monosodium glutamate. Pour over ¼ cup lemon juice and 1 tablespoon capers and juice. Wrap tightly in the foil. Lay in a baking pan. Bake in a hot oven, 425° F., for about 40 minutes. Do not open the package during baking. Remove the foil, skin and bones. Lay the salmon on a hot platter and pour the juice over it. Garnish with lemon wedges and green pepper rings. Makes 4–6 servings.

Fresh lime juice and spices, as a marinade before baking, do wonders for fish. The tang of ginger and bay leaf pervades its creamy flesh. Here's a blend of flavors to bring delight to your palate.

Baked Fish in Lime Juice. Arrange 2 pounds haddock fillets in a shallow baking dish or pan. Salt and pepper fish. Mix together ½ cup lime juice, 2 tablespoons minced onion, 1 teaspoon powdered ginger, 1 teaspoon grated lemon rind, ½ teaspoon salt, ½ bay leaf, crushed, and ⅛ teaspoon pepper. Pour mixture over fillets. Allow to stand at room temperature for about 1 hour. Dot with butter and lay slice of lime on each fillet. Bake in a moderate oven, 350° F., for 20–25 minutes, until it flakes. Remove to serving platter and pour juices over fish. Makes 4 servings.

Creamed crab with green onion and celery between delicate white sole fillets—a delectable creation. Bake, brushing with melted butter until the fish is flaky and dappled with gold. Serve from the baking dish with a light and lovely sauce. It's as good as it sounds—and quickly prepared too.

Sole with Shrimp-and-Crab Filling. Buy 3 fillets of sole, each weighing about ½ pound. Salt and pepper them well. For the filling, melt 1½ tablespoons butter in a saucepan. Stir in 1½ tablespoons flour. Gradually add ½ cup milk. Cook, stirring constantly, until the sauce is thickened. Remove from the heat and stir in ½ cup each flaked, boned crab and chopped, cooked deveined shrimp. Season with ¼ cup each chopped celery and green onion, 1 tablespoon chopped parsley and 1 teaspoon salt. Divide the filling equally among the 3 fillets, spreading it generously. Roll fillets carefully and secure with toothpicks. Cut each roll in two. Place in a shallow baking dish; bake in a hot oven, 400° F., about 30 minutes or until flaky. Baste often with melted butter. Serve with the following sauce: Melt 1 tablespoon butter in the top of a double boiler. Stir in 1 teaspoon flour and gradually add 1 cup light cream. Season with ½ teaspoon salt and a dash of pepper. Quickly add some hot sauce to 2 slightly beaten egg yolks. Readd to the sauce. Place over simmering water and cook, stirring constantly, until thickened. Add about 1 tablespoon lemon juice and pour over the fish just before serving. Garnish with whole cooked shrimp and crab meat. Makes 6 servings.

The first spring flowers in miniature make enchanting bouquets all over the house.

Baked in little shells, shrimp or crab coquille serves as a tempting appetizer. Or heap it into a shallow casserole for a main dish.

Shrimp or Crab Coquille. Drain, flake and bone 2 (8-ounce) cans crab meat, or substitute an equal amount of chopped cooked deveined shrimp. Dice 2 hard-cooked eggs and add with ½ cup soft bread crumbs to the fish. Season with 1 tablespoon each minced green pepper, minced parsley and grated onion. Add 1 teaspoon lemon juice and ½ teaspoon prepared mustard, ¼ teaspoon salt. Then add 1 can condensed cream-of-mushroom soup with enough milk (up to ¼ cup) to make a moist mixture. Toss lightly and pile in 4–6 scallop shells. Top with ¼ cup soft bread crumbs and ¼ cup grated Parmesan cheese. Bake in a hot oven, 400° F., about 15–20 minutes, until golden brown.

Try something new with those wonderful small, dark, smoky oysters which have recently become so popular for canapés. The flavor is marvelous with eggs—nearly any kind of eggs. Make a small amount of white sauce, add some diced smoked oysters to it, and pour over poached eggs for an unusual treat. Or for Sunday breakfast, add cut-up smoked oysters to scrambled eggs or an omelet. Here's your omelet for two.

Smoked-Oyster Omelet. In a heavy frying pan, melt 2 tablespoons butter and add 2 tablespoons minced smoked oysters. Slightly beat together 5 eggs, and 5 tablespoons milk or water. Season with a dash of pepper. Pour eggs over oysters and add 2 tablespoons minced parsley. Cook over gentle heat until omelet begins to set. Tip pan so the uncooked egg can run to side of the pan and become set. If you like a "French omelet" (soft and almost runny inside), flip omelet over double now and serve. For a more solid omelet, place pan in a moderately hot, 375° F., oven until top sets.

P.S. To make this omelet a hearty supper dish, heat in pan with oysters 1 cup diced boiled potatoes, before adding the eggs. To complete the meal, add a crisp, well-seasoned green salad and blueberry pie.

One last word: We've suggested using commonly available fish in these recipes, but should the waters near your home yield other varieties, by all means substitute them; and of course it's open season on the frozen varieties the year round.

soup kettle suppers easy cooking—hearty eating!

Pick a pair of Campbell's Soups. Add something extra like diced ham, canned corn, sausages or croutons. That's the makings of "the soup-kettle supper." Serve it with salad and know what you've got? A nutritious supper . . . an inexpensive way to make the crowd feel right at home! So good, they'll expect it next time!

Mushroom-Asparagus Soup with Ham Strips. Terrific for spur-of-the-moment entertaining! Lightly brown 1 cup cooked ham in strips in 1 tbsp. butter. Add 1 can each Campbell's Cream of Mushroom Soup and Campbell's Cream of Asparagus Soup. What a pair these are! Blend in 1 soup can milk with 1 soup can water until smooth; heat. 4-6 servings.

Beef Noodle-Vegetable Soup with Crispy Croutons. Mix 1 can each Campbell's Beef Noodle and Campbell's Vegetable Beef Soup, with 1½ soup cans water. Heat. For croutons, cook till crisp and brown, 2 cups soft bread cubes in 2 tbsp. melted butter seasoned with ½ clove minced garlic or ¼ tsp. thyme or dash seasoned salt. Serve with soup. 4-5 servings.

Tomato-Bean Soup with Sausage Bites. It's souper! Cut ½ lb. link sausage into 1-inch pieces; cook slowly over low heat in saucepan till brown; pour off drippings. Then add 1 can each Campbell's Tomato Soup, and Campbell's Bean with Bacon Soup, 2 soup cans water, and ½ cup chopped celery. Cover; cook till celery is soft, about 15 min. 4-6 servings.

Turkey Noodle-Celery Soup with Creamy Corn. Bet you make this soup-kettle supper soon! Cook till done ¼ cup chopped onion in 1 tbsp. butter or margarine. Blend in 1 can each Campbell's wonderful new Turkey Noodle Soup, Campbell's Cream of Celery Soup. Add 1 cup each milk, water, and a spare can of cream-style corn; heat. 4-6 servings.

Good cooks cook  with Campbell's Soup

For club or church suppers . . FREE QUANTITY RECIPES • Just write to Home Economics Dept., Campbell Soup Company, Camden, N. J. Recipes to feed large groups will be sent to you free.

"Heart attack? Sure I had one . . ."

"But here I am—working almost the same as before my heart attack. Close up shop a little earlier and take things a little easier. And I watch my diet and weight pretty carefully. Like my doctor says, I've learned to live within the capacities of my heart."

TODAY, in your community—where you buy gasoline, your groceries, your clothing—you're likely to find people at work who have recovered from heart attacks commonly caused by coronary thrombosis.

Although coronary heart disease takes many lives, there is much about it that justifies an optimistic outlook today.

For example, studies show that 80 percent of those who have a "coronary" survive their first attack . . . and that most are able to go back to work and enjoy many useful years. Moreover, those who make a good recovery face few or only moderate restrictions.

They must, however, observe sensible safeguards about work, activity, diet, weight control and rest. Those who do so generally live as comfortably as if their hearts had never been in trouble.

The recovered coronary patient can often worry unnecessarily. This is because a heart attack may be a frightening experience which creates doubts and fears about the future. The recovering coronary patient, for example, may worry about having another attack or about how much he will have to change his accustomed ways of living.

Naturally, the doctor is the best person to ease the patient's mind. But questions that puzzle and worry the patient often arise when the doctor isn't around. Or, questions may come up which the patient hesitates to ask.

To help fill this need, Metropolitan has prepared a new booklet . . . in cooperation with heart specialists . . . called "After a Coronary." Perhaps there is someone in your family or circle of friends to whom this booklet would bring reassurance.

You, too, might read it to advantage, for everyone should know about this disease which occurs so frequently nowadays. You will find it a helpful booklet . . . as well as a hopeful booklet—reflecting optimism for today's coronary patients.

For your free copy, simply fill out and return the coupon below.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Company
(A MUTUAL COMPANY)
1 Madison Ave., New York 10, N. Y.

Metropolitan Life Insurance Co.
1 Madison Ave., N. Y. 10, N. Y.
Please send me the free booklet, "After a Coronary," 3-58-J.

Name_____

Street_____

City_____ State_____

THE GREENGAGE SUMMER

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 83

"Isn't she in?" asked Hester, but there was no sound from her room.

We cleaned our nails and brushed our hair; Vicky and Hester put on clean white socks—Joss had arranged for our washing to be done and at last we had clean clothes. When we were finished there still had not been a rustle from Joss' room. "If she had been to see mother she would have been back long ago. Perhaps she went out with Monsieur Joubert," said Hester.

"Someone would have told us."

I knocked. No answer. I went in and Joss was there, lying face downward on her bed.

"Joss! Are you having an attack?"

No answer.

I went timidly closer. Hester and the Littles stayed at the door.

"Joss. It's Cecil. Speak to me, Joss."

She raised her head, but she did not speak to me. "I hate her. I hate her," she said. It sounded as if she were speaking to the whole world.

"Hate whom?" But I knew and, "What happened?" I asked apprehensively.

"She has ended the painting," said Joss.

"Ended the ——"

"Yes." Joss sat up and beat the pillow with her fist. "Yes! Yes! Yes!"

"But . . . how?"

"He asked me to have lunch with him."

I hesitated. We knew who "she" was, but "he" might have been . . . "Eliot?" I hazarded.

"Idiot! Monsieur Joubert. It was so hot outside—I think he did it because of that—and I said yes. There was no one in the dining room but us and . . . them."

"Mlle. Zizi and Eliot?" I asked.

"Yes. Perhaps we—Monsieur Joubert and I—laughed too much." She lifted her chin. "I wanted to laugh. Eliot ——" She broke off.

I had to prompt her. "Eliot?" I repeated.

"Kept looking," said Joss. "Then, when he had gone—he went quite soon, as if he didn't like it—Mlle. Zizi came to our table and said ——" She stopped again.

"Said?"

"It was in French, but I understood. I wish I hadn't," said Joss. She looked round and saw the others. "Shut the door, Cecil."

I slowly crossed the little room and shut the door. Whether because of the long bathing that afternoon or the shock in the cove, I seemed to be filled with pains, in my legs and back and head, pains that hurt, and I did not want to hear any more . . . ugliness, I thought—I could sense this was something ugly—and I wished I were with Hester and the Littles on the other side of the door.

I came back to the bed and Joss whispered, "She told him she could not have it in her hotel, an old man and a young girl. That I had ——"

"Had?"

"Bothered Eliot," said Joss in a whisper. Two tears fell on the pillow, only two; it was as if she were bleeding, not crying.

"What happened then?"

"Monsieur Joubert got up and bowed, not to her but to me."

"Bowed to you?"

"Yes," said Joss impatiently. "He said, 'When you are a little older and in another place, and your mother is with you, we shall meet again. I shall write to her,' and he left."

"For good?"

"Yes. I saw Paul carry out his luggage and painting things and a taxi came. I don't think Mlle. Zizi meant Monsieur Joubert to do that—I heard Mme. Corbet being cross—but when she sees me Mlle. Zizi can't help what she does. She won't let me have anything. Not anything."

"Why does she hate Joss so terribly?" I asked Hester afterward. "It seems more than because Eliot likes her."

"It isn't Eliot," said Hester. "Not only Eliot," and she added, "You know how, when you have been awful to anyone, you can't bear them."

Now I felt miserably tired, too tired to cope with this hotbed of feelings. Something bad will happen, I thought, and again those prickles of fear ran over me.

"Joss ——"

I meant to tell her about the man in the cove, but she was not listening, at least she was listening to something else. She asked, "What is happening downstairs?"

I told her about the Brass Instruments Ball; the glory had gone out of it for me, but she got up from the bed. She looked so determined that I asked, "What are you going to do?"

"Go to the party," said Joss.

"But we haven't been asked."

She did not answer that. She looked over my head and said, "I tried to be nice. I found my own thing and kept out of the way. Now I won't."

"Suppose they don't ask you?"

"I shall make them. I can make people do what I like." By "people" I knew she meant men.

"But Joss"—I produced this hesitantly—"if you make them won't it seem that you might—might be what Mlle. Zizi says you are?"

Joss' chin went even higher. "She thinks I am what she is," she said with disdain. "All right. I shall be, only worse." Perhaps she saw the doubt that came into my face, for she asked, "What else am I to do, Cecil?"

Give to every other human being every right that you claim for yourself.
ROBERT GREEN INGERSOLL

That sounded like Joss, not Joss cased in this proud hardness, and I said, "Go on painting."

"Without Monsieur Joubert?"

"That's what he would have done."

I thought I had won, but when I looked at her I saw it was no use saying anything more. "I shall go to this party," said Joss, "and I shall wear Sin."

It was called Sin because she had had no right to buy it. A year before, Uncle William had given Joss money to buy a new raincoat—her old one was up to her knees and showed inches of wrist—but she had gone into a dress shop and bought a dress. That was in the sales, too, "and it had been marked down from ten guineas," said Joss.

"Ten guineas for a dress!" That seemed fabulous to us—except Willmouse.

"A dress can cost a hundred pounds," said Willmouse.

"But—when will you wear it?" mother had asked, bewildered.

"Perhaps never," said Joss. "But I had to have it." It was ivory silk, stamped with roses. It left Joss' neck and arms bare and the skirt was narrow. "It's the cut," Willmouse had explained and examined it carefully. "It is influenced by the Chinese," he pronounced, "which is why it suits her."

For a year it had hung in Joss' cupboard. Now, after she had washed her face and brushed her hair, she took it out of the wardrobe. I had opened the door into my room to let the others come and we watched while she put it on.

Beside Sin our seersuckers looked very ordinary and homemade and the old envy came back. "It's too tight," I said spitefully. "You show."

Joss looked at herself in the looking glass and smiled. "All the better," she said and laughed at my scandalized face. She had a lipstick and powder too. When she had bought these things I did not know, but watched, divided between marveling and fright, while she made up her face. "Don't put on too much," said Willmouse.

"I'm not Mlle. Zizi," said Joss witheringly.

When she was ready her glance fell again on me. "What's the matter with you, Cecil?" she asked.

"I have pains."

"Where?"

CONTINUED ON PAGE 102

No matter how active you are all day... New Mum stops odor without irritation

If you've ever worried about your deodorant failing . . . or about underarm stinging or burning from using a deodorant daily—now you can set your mind at ease.

New Mum Cream will stop odor right through the day and evening. And new Mum is so gentle for normal skin you can use it whenever you please. Even right after shaving, or a hot bath. Mum Cream gives you the kind of protection you can't possibly get from any other leading deodorant—because it works a completely different way.

Contains no aluminum salts

Mum Cream is the only leading deodorant that works entirely by stopping odor . . . contains no astringent aluminum salts. And it keeps on working actively to stop odor 24 hours a day with M-3—Mum's wonderful hexachlorophene that destroys both odor and odor-causing bacteria!

When Mum is so effective—yet so gentle—isn't it the deodorant for you?

MUM® contains M-3...stops odor 24 hours a day
(BACTERIA-DESTROYING HEXACHLOROPHENE)

SO GENTLE FOR ANY NORMAL SKIN YOU CAN USE IT FREELY EVERY DAY

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

AMERICAN INSTITUTE OF LAUNDERING CERTIFIED

WON'T DAMAGE CLOTHES

ANOTHER FINE PRODUCT OF BRISTOL-MYERS

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 100

"In my arms and legs—everywhere."

"Growing pains," said Joss.

I suppose now it was only an ordinary bourgeois party such as would be held anywhere in the provinces of France, but to us it seemed resplendent and exciting, though we had to admit the guests were not so elegant as the flowers and food. "I think I shall go for my evening walk," said Willmouse after we had seen the first few people arrive. I could tell he was disappointed. We had not taken it into account that they were working people not quite at home in their Sunday best. The men were in dark suits, too heavy for the hot evening. Their wives had meticulously clean blouses, coats and skirts, and wore high-heeled shoes instead of their usual slippers.

We watched from the stairs, not daring to risk going down until there were so many people that Mlle. Zizi or Mme. Corbet would not notice us.

"Is that Monsieur le Maire?" asked Hester. Everyone bowed politely as they greeted him, but though his beard was imposing he was wearing a plain black suit and had only a little ribbon in his buttonhole to show he was important. But M. Perrichaut was impressive; we knew it must be M. Perrichaut because he was receiving with his wife. He was taller than anyone else—"Except Eliot," said Hester—white-haired, with an important-looking paunch. "Let me look at him," said Joss and gazed as if she were spying out the land. M. Perrichaut seemed fitted to be the owner of the Brass Instruments Factory. He had a young man at his elbow who made introductions in a reedy voice. "Like a piccolo," I whispered, but Joss did not laugh. She was very grave. "Tell me when the doctor comes."

"Monsieur le Directeur?"

"Yes."

"He is here," said Vicky presently.

"Go down," Joss told us, "go one by one, slip in among them and start shaking hands with everyone. Then they can't send you away. And don't tag onto me," she said severely.

Hester and Vicky disappeared, but I hung back. Joss hummed a little tune—which told me she was nervous—shook her hair more loosely on her shoulders, and went down. I watched her as she went straight to the doctor, holding out her hand; then I followed, keeping behind the crowd.

The doctor kept Joss' hand. "Mais . . . c'est la petite Anglaise!" he said. I edged round to see her better.

She was making a comical face—a moue, I thought wisely. "Not so little," she said, and appealed to M. Perrichaut, "I am not very little, pas si petite, am I, monsieur?" Hester had crept up beside me. "She sounds silly—like a lady," said Hester disapprovingly.

Silly or no, M. Perrichaut seemed to like it. Soon he was asking her, "Vous dinez avec nous, mademoiselle?" "He is asking her to dinner," I told Hester.

"I—I have not been invited," said Joss.

"Je vous invite," and the piccolo was sent to tell Mme. Corbet to set another place. "À côté de moi," said the doctor gallantly.

"Monsieur le Directeur s'y connait," said M. Perrichaut. The most important people were standing round him and now Joss was in the center of them. Everyone was whispering about her. Mlle. Zizi had seen her, but she could not very well send her out.

"Absolument ravissante," said M. le Maire. He was standing just in front of me and began to discuss Joss' looks with the man beside him; I could not catch it all but I heard, "Ce teint lumineux!"

"What are they saying?" hissed Hester.

"Compliments," I hissed back.

Eliot was by the bar talking to the young town clerk whom Mauricette pointed out to me because she admired him. The town clerk was dark and good-looking, but Eliot could look over his head and the heads of most of the others. Joss must have seen him at once, but she appeared not to see him, nor did he look at her. I did not like this any more than I liked her pretending to be shy. Things had gone . . . out of truthfulness, I thought. I put my elbows on the warm iron rail and leaned my head on my hands, hiding my eyes as if I did not want to see, to look or think, but I was not left in peace for long. Fairy lights had been strung between the trees and now they came on, red and blue and yellow. "Ah! C'est jolie!" cried a woman and people came out onto the terrace to see. Eliot was with them and it was then that the next odd thing happened.

I heard my name called; Willmouse was running across the garden. He did not usually run, but now gravel spurted up behind him. I ran down the steps to meet him. "Cecil, a most e'straordinary thing."

As soon as he reached me he began to tell it, though he was half out of breath. "I was having my walk along the river when I saw a man ——"

I stiffened. "A . . . dark man?"

"Like Mme. Corbet," said Willmouse and I knew he meant swarthily dark . . . as ours had been, I thought. "He came out of the bushes," said Willmouse, "and he had a motor bike; it was a big new red one, at least it looked new. He wheeled it along the bank and then onto the plank bridge to the barge ——"

His voice must have carried to the terrace. I saw Eliot come to the rail and look down.

"Onto the Marie France?" I asked.

"Yes. The man looked up and down the river as if he wanted to see if anyone were there. He couldn't see me."

"Why not?"

"Because the bulrushes are so tall. Then do you know what he did?" Willmouse paused. "He wheeled the bike across the deck and dropped it over the other side."

"Into the river?"

"Yes."

"Don't be silly."

"He did. Cecil, it was a new ——"

"And what are you doing out so late?"

Eliot's voice cut across me and it was the voice he had used that first morning when he came out of Mlle. Zizi's room; I had heard it again in the courtyard at Dormans. He had come down the steps. "Where have you been?" he said to Willmouse.

"F-for my walk." Willmouse was so startled that the words would hardly come.

"Willmouse always goes for a walk," I said defensively.

"You be quiet," said Eliot; and to Willmouse, "You know quite well you are not allowed out so late." Willmouse opened his lips again, but "Not a word," said Eliot. "I will not have disobedience. You can go to bed at once," and he wheeled Willmouse round.

"But Eliot! You never ——" I think I wailed it. It was terrible to see Eliot taking Willmouse up the steps and marching him away like a prisoner.

"In England we discipline boys," said Eliot crisply; to Willmouse he said loudly, "How often have I told you ——" and at once I knew that Eliot was acting.

Acting on Willmouse! I pushed my way after them to the foot of the stairs. "You have never told him," I cried passionately.

"Cecil, stay where you are," said Eliot. His face made me quail, but I stayed there only until he came down, then, challenging him with a look that I hoped was hate, I walked straight up, but the door of our room was locked. I went into Joss' room and tried the door there; it was locked as well. I rattled the handle. "Willmouse, it's Cecil. It's Cecil." There was no answer. I was not surprised. Willmouse was always still and silent if he was offended.

I went back to the landing, where I had another pain, and with it such a sense of desolation that I could hardly bear it. Down below they must have been going in to dinner; I heard chairs scraped back, more bursts of laughter, voices. I wondered if Joss was sitting next to the doctor, if Hester and Vicky were there.

There is nothing more melancholy than listening to a party from which one is shut out. Smells of food drifted up with the scent of flowers and I thought of Willmouse's banquet and gave a little sob. He was locked in by this inexplicable Eliot and only I cared, mounting guard beside him, but a guard with a bad pain and half in tears. "Willmouse. Willmouse." Still no answer. I could imagine him rigid with shock. "I hate Eliot," I said. Then I jumped.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 104

NEXT MONTH

EDNA FERBER

Author of "Giant," tells the story of America's last frontier—and of a girl born with a heritage of conflicting loyalties.

ICE PALACE

tells of Christine Storm and two men. Bound together by Christine, they are torn apart by Alaska. This new serial begins

In the April Journal

My constipation worries are over!

Milk of Magnesia gives more complete relief than laxatives which act only on constipation... better relief than all of them! This is because Phillips' is more than just a laxative. It's also a remarkably effective antacid that relieves any accompanying acid indigestion. And Phillips' works leisurely. Taken at bedtime, it lets you sleep undisturbed—brings wonderful relief the next morning. Get Phillips' Milk of Magnesia either regular or in new, mint-flavored form that tastes delightfully clean and refreshing. Either way, Phillips' is the best laxative money can buy!

PHILLIPS' Milk of Magnesia

REGULAR · FLAVORED

ROSEMARY CLOONEY, star of "THE LUX SHOW," live from Hollywood every Thursday, in color, on NBC-TV gentle, so gentle, so gentle to you . . .

softer and smoother your skin will be, too . . .

THAT'S THE BEAUTY OF LUX

Gentle is the word for Lux . . . naturally gentle, as your complexion and bath soap should be. And gently is the way the rich Cosmetic lather cleanses your skin, to leave it soft and smooth.

Whether you choose pastel pink, green, yellow, blue or white—you and Rosemary Clooney can always count on Lux to give you this natural gentleness. Lux gives you, too, a beautiful fragrance, a blend of many costly perfumes.

Lux . . . the proved beauty care . . . used by more beautiful women all over the world than any other complexion soap. Lever Brothers unconditionally guarantees complete satisfaction with Lux Soap —or your money back. Look for the Lux Pastels—each in a matching wrapper.

9 out of 10 Hollywood Stars depend on Lux

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 102

In his cat-quiet way he had come up the stairs and was laughing at me.

When he saw the tears he stopped laughing. He said, "I'm sorry. I had to do that."

"Willmouse is little. He wanted to see a banquet."

He said, "I know," and then, "I am not as bad as you think." He was carrying a tray; on it were some chicken under a small glass cloche, gaufrette potatoes, some of what we called "party toast"—toast Melba—butter, a meringue and glass of grenadine; it was a bit of the banquet, but I was not going to relent.

"He won't eat it," I said distantly.

"We shall see," said Eliot. He unlocked the door but kept me out. "Leave him to me," he said.

I went into the Hole because something had happened to my pain; there, in that smelly little cupboard, I found out.

Even there wonder overcame me. Wonder and fear. I shivered. Dazed, I came out of the Hole and went into Joss' room and found what I needed in her drawer. It was no use trying to reach her, she was at dinner . . . and so is Mlle. Zizi, I thought. I had to manage for myself with those strange first necessities of being a woman, and it was inexpressibly lonely. When I was comfortable I began to cry with excitement and self-pity. I was still crying when I went back on the landing.

I could hear Eliot's voice inside our room; then I thought I heard Willmouse give a tiny laugh like a crow. Eliot was even more of a magician than I thought. Always if Willmouse was punished he did not speak for at least two days. I listened and, yes, I heard him laugh again. Then Eliot came out. "Still here?" he asked me.

"Yes," I said, muffled.

"I think he will eat it all," said Eliot. "He liked the drink."

"You needn't lock the door!" That came out like a cry.

"I said I would and I must," said Eliot. "I will come up later." Then he looked at me. "You are in a state, Cecil. What is the matter?"

He should not have asked that; the tears came flooding.

"Is it Willmouse still?"

I shook my head.

"What is it, then?" He put his arm round me, bending down. "Tell?"

Who could resist Eliot when he was Eliot? Eliot, not that other cold stranger. "Never talk to anyone about these times," mother had said when she told us, "especially not to a man. Women should be private." In Southstone I think I should have shrunk suitably from telling Eliot, but Les Oeillets was different and it came out with a rush. "I—have turned into a woman."

I did not know how else to put it, but Eliot did not laugh. He asked, "Just now?"

"Just now," and the tears flowed.

"That isn't anything to cry about," said Eliot gently.

"It . . . hurts."

"Not when you consider how exciting it is."

"Exciting?" That was unexpected.

"Of course."

"But . . . how?"

"Because now you are ready for love."

Love! Probably nothing in the world that Eliot could have said at that moment could have helped me more. Love! Like Mlle. Zizi, Juliet, Cleopatra, Eve, like . . . Joss, level with Joss. "I, Cecil," I whispered, dazzled.

"You."

"But"—the tears came back—"I am not pretty like Joss."

"You are not pretty like Joss. You are pretty like Cecil."

With my Bullock sturdiness, my pinkness and mouse hair? "I, pretty?"

"Very," said Eliot, and he kissed me on the mouth.

"That scoundrel," Uncle William called him later. I only know that night he seemed like an angel to me.

He had to go to dinner, but he took me downstairs and put me to sit in the office, which was empty; somehow, in the rush and hubbub, he got Toinette, who was motherly, to make me some tea. How did he know there were only two things in the world I could have swallowed, things English and familiar, bread and butter and tea? The pain had the edge taken off it now and Toinette patted me and called me "pauvre gosse." Soon I felt much better.

It was a long peaceful wait until people began to come from dinner to dance or sit at the tables in the bar. I stole out on the stairs to watch. Nobody noticed me and I was glad. Then Hester came to sit beside me; she had been dancing and was excited. "Joss is the belle of the ball, isn't she?" she said.

Everyone wanted to dance with Joss. When the men tapped one another on the shoulder, taking one another's partner, she changed partners all the time; she was flushed, far more excited than Hester. Eliot danced with Mlle. Zizi, with some of the wives and daughters, with Vicky and Mauricette, but he never seemed to see Joss nor Joss him; she carefully looked away when they passed; she smiled at her partner and tossed her hair back and fluttered her lashes up and down. "Is that flirting?" asked Hester, but I was beginning to see there was another kind of growing pain. I knew Joss was miserable and I ached for her.

"Qui a laissé ces trucs-la dans mon bureau?" Mme. Corbet had found the tray with my plate and tea glass. "Is the whole house to be a nursery?" she scolded and I had to take them to the kitchen. On the way back I had to wait at the service door. They were dancing the carpet dance. The crowd had moved back against the wall to watch the dance and I could not get past. As I stood, there was a loud sound of eating in my ear, a smell of sweat and garlic: Paul. His face and neck were glistening with sweat, his hair hung limply, his apron and shirt were soaked and covered with stains. He must have been washing up for hours and had taken a moment to eat; he had a piece of sausage clamped in a length of split bread.

We shouldn't have sent him to Coventry, I thought, and this time was going to make

Gauze Diapers · Crib Sheets —all styles · Diaper Liners · Pre-Folded Diapers · Disposable Diapers

All made by a Johnson & Johnson Company

And the special people in it—your husband, your baby—count on you to make it a happy world. That's why you care so much . . . why you choose the best baby products you can find to keep that wonderful baby of yours happy and comfortable. Chix knows how much you care. That's why they put extra care, extra quality into all the products they make—to make them the very best!

Next to you Chix cares the most myself speak to him when I saw he had not noticed me; he was watching Joss. When people are watching they forget to pretend, and there was something in Paul's face that made me afraid; it was wild, like a wild animal that does not think of itself or any other animal but only of what it wants. Then I learned part of the explanation of why he looked like that: M. Armand called impatiently and Paul turned to go but left the door open and I saw him take a bottle from the shelf behind the door; he tilted it right up before he drank, so that I knew it was almost empty. When he put it back he nearly missed the shelf and a moment after I heard a crash of plates.

He came back. Three or four times I noticed him in that door and then I saw that Joss was smiling at him. She smiled only because she was smiling at everyone, but, "It is flirting," Hester said disapprovingly when I got back to the stairs.

It grew late. Some of the people were going home. Vicky had fallen asleep on a sofa; Mme. Corbet looked at her two or three times, then picked her up and carried her to bed. The Brass Instruments Band had finished, but a pianist and violin had taken its place. The music sounded very quiet after the band, and the notes of the violin came softly across the floor, sweet with a faint throbbing that made it sound tender.

Joss was standing just below us and for the moment she was without a partner. I think she hoped she would be left without one, for she turned this way and that and I was sure she was looking for Eliot. Then she saw him and for the first time that night they looked at each other. She stood still and I knew her eyes would not plead, only look, unmistakably look. She had had to humble herself to do that, but Eliot walked away to the bar. I clenched my fists. Was Eliot quite impervious? To the throbbing music that seemed to us so beautiful? To Joss? Eliot, who had kissed me upstairs? It was only a moment; the next, Joss was smiling at the piccolo, at the town clerk; then she smiled and waved at someone else. I looked to see and it was Paul. The wave was too much. He gave a tug at his apron, threw it away, and reached her before the piccolo. "Mlle. Joss," said Paul, and bowed.

God sells us all things at the price of labor. LEONARDO DA VINCI

If he had been clean it might have been different. Mauricette had danced, and M. Armand, "but not Toinette or Nicole," said Hester. M. Perrichaut called out sharply and a gentleman, who Mauricette told us was M. Dufour, of the commissariat, came up and said to Paul as he stood just below us, "Et toi, mon gaillard, rentre chez toi et restes-y." M. Dufour was, I suppose, in charge of Paul, but Paul had emptied all of that bottle and he shouted so that the words were heard through all the rooms above the music, "Galeux! Gros dégueulasse!" to M. Dufour.

Other men came up; the older ones talked soothingly, but the town clerk took hold of Paul, who shook him off.

"Rentre," said M. Dufour curtly. "C'est ce que tu as de mieux à faire," but Paul had Joss by the hand.

Joss did not know what to do. Gently she tried to take her hand away, but he was putting his arm round her when suddenly between them was Eliot.

He had cut in front of Paul so quickly that no one had seen him come up, and almost from inside Paul's arm he took Joss and danced with her away down the room. At the same moment M. Dufour caught Paul by the shoulder, the town clerk took his other side, and between them they marched him to the door. "Tordu!" shouted Paul as they took him away. "Pelé! Galeux! Fumier!" The words died away along the passage. Hester was crying, "Poor Paul! Poor Paul!" I felt too miserable to speak.

Joss and Eliot did not speak either as they danced. She kept her eyelids down so that her face looked closed; Eliot's was set.

The music stopped when they were by Mlle. Zizi, who had come to the foot of the stairs and was watching. Eliot slowly took his arm away but kept Joss' hand. Joss' chin began to shake. For a moment I thought they would have made it up, that he would take her into the garden in the moonlight among the fairy lights, but Eliot did another of his incomprehensible things. He held out his free hand to Mlle. Zizi, who gave him her hand wonderingly. He put Joss' into it. "Take her to bed, Zizi," he said.

"No!" They said it together. Joss' was a curt refusal, while Mlle. Zizi sounded as if she were being stifled. "No!"

"Yes," said Eliot gently and inexorably. "The party is over now." He turned away abruptly and said, "Good night."

"Eliot, where are you going?" It was a cry from Mlle. Zizi.

"Into the garden to smoke," he said, still gently, and stepped outside.

"Cecil. Cecil."

I had been asleep . . . one minute, I thought, and Joss was standing by my bed. She had put her cold hand under the bedclothes and was clutching me. "Cecil."

"Wh-what is it?"

"Sh-h! Don't wake Willmouse."

"What is it?" But I had sunk my voice lower, jerked awake now by her cold and shivering.

"It's Paul."

"Paul?"

"On a ladder, looking in at my window."

"Paul is?"

"Yes. He is coming in."

"What for?" I said stupidly, but Joss only shivered and said, "Oh, Cecil!"

Then I knew it was true and fear started up as I remembered that look on his face at the dance, but some wisdom saved me from telling Joss. "He has been drinking," was all that I said.

You are responsible for how many eyes?

Because a mother never stops being a mother, your family's eyes are never very far from your mind. Not the children's, certainly, from the time they were born . . .

You'd be the first one to notice any change in their eyes—or your husband's. Trouble with reading . . . or distances . . . or headaches . . . or perhaps just not quite as quick, or as sure, in their seeing.

It's up to you to see that they all have the periodic examinations they need. And don't, in your responsibility for your family, neglect your own seeing . . . your eyes, too, may change.

AND ISN'T IT TIME FOR UP-TO-DATE EXAMINATIONS?

MARCH 1958

S	M	T	W	T	F	S
..	..	..	..	..	..	1
2	3	4	5	6	7	8
9	10	11	12	13	14	15
16	17	18	19	20	21	22
23	24	25	26	27	28	29
30	31	..	..	..	..	..

Presented as a public service in the interest of better vision, by Shuron Optical Company, Inc., Geneva, N. Y. —world's largest organization devoted exclusively to serving the ophthalmologist, optometrist and optician.

SHURON

GOOD VISUAL CARE DOESN'T COST... IT PAYS!

©1958 Shuron Optical Co., Inc.

No matter where you go now...

You Can't Escape from Germs!

HOW LISTERINE ANTISEPTIC REDUCED COLDS

Those who did NOT gargle Listerine twice daily had

89% more severe colds than those who did

85% longer colds, measured in days

73% more sore throats

51% more "ordinary" colds

Listerine Antiseptic kills germs by millions, on contact—gargle Listerine at least twice every day!

Germs are everywhere these days. Colds and sore throats due to colds are really going the rounds. Take this precaution—morning and night, gargle Listerine Antiseptic full-strength. Listerine kills germs associated with colds on contact . . . by millions.

Tests with more than 3,000 people over a 12-year period proved that those who gargled Listerine twice daily had fewer, shorter and milder colds than those who did not. So, reach for Listerine!

Reach for Listerine

. . . your No. 1 protection against infection

"What can we do?"

There was only one thing to do and I sat up. "I will get Eliot."

"No!" She sounded outraged. "I will go and call Mme. Corbet."

"You can't do that."

"Why?"

"She will send Paul away." We were whispering like conspirators. "He will lose his summer bonus and not get his lorry."

"I don't care about his lorry. I must get Mme. Corbet or he will come in." She was shaking and I made up my mind. I turned back the bedclothes. "Get in," I said. "I will go and talk to Paul."

"But ——"

"I'm not afraid of Paul," but as I said it that was not true; I was afraid of that look in him, of the words he had shouted as he was taken away, but Joss was horridly easy to convince—she agreed at once. "You are sure you don't mind? It isn't you he has come for," she said, "so you will be all right."

Slowly, fearfully I opened the door but Paul was not in Joss' room. There was no sign of him and I slid along the wall and into her bed with a feeling half of relief and half of flatness. Then, with a thrill of fear, I saw that, though no one was there, the two ends of the ladder were against the sill.

I knew then a little of what it must have been to be a Grecian maiden, Polyxena, for instance, bound on the fagots, or, perhaps not as noble as that, one of the goats father had told us about, tied up as bait for a tiger. Paul was a little like a tiger and tigers have no pity.

Faint and far I heard the Hôtel de Ville clock strike three times. I remembered that afterward, three o'clock, and then I heard the ladder creak as somebody came up. I gripped the clothes round me and lay as flat as I could, my heart beating so that I could hardly breathe but, oddly, in the top of my head. It was not Paul coming up the ladder, it was an animal thing, the tiger. A head and shoulders rose black outside the window, dark with a white patch of face; a hand shook the catch loose so that it fell, the window slowly opened.

I screamed, though without a sound. Nothing hurts as much as a scream in silence. Eliot! Eliot! Eliot! It was a scream, a wild prayer; and I heard footsteps running on the gravel.

The ladder and its figure lifted backward into the air. Paul gave a cry, half muffled, an animal's cry, as he disappeared, and there was a thud. The ladder had fallen backward onto the courtyard grass.

I slid out of bed and crept to the window to look. The ladder lay on the grass; it must have spun as it fell and fallen hard, for it was still quivering, but Paul was standing up, miraculously jumped clear or fallen off. He was standing, though rubbing his elbow and knees, and facing him was Eliot.

Then Eliot had come; but how? How had he heard me? His room was not on this side. Then my sense woke up. How could Eliot have heard me when I had not made a sound? And what was he doing in the garden in the middle of the night—or not the middle, three o'clock in the morning?

Paul was still without his apron and again I saw that without the long white limp garment he looked a man; all at once it seemed possible, even fitting, that he should drive a lorry. Eliot was not as usual, either; he was wearing . . . and I stopped.

Was he Eliot? What made me so sure he was? This man was in what Willmouse had said Eliot once wore, "Not Eliot's clothes,"

OTHER VIEWS, SIZES AND PRICES OF VOGUE PATTERNS ON PAGES 80 AND 81

Vogue Design No. S-4868.	One-piece dress and jacket; 12–20 (32–40). $1.50.
Vogue Design No. S-4872.	Suit and blouse; 10–18 (31–38). $1.50.
Vogue Design No. S-4873.	One-piece dress; 12–18 (32–38). $1.00.
Vogue Design No. 9178.	One-piece dress; 10–20 (31–40). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 9452.	One-piece dress; 10–18 (31–38). 75c.
Vogue Design No. 112.	One-piece dress and coat; 10–18 (31–38). $2.00.

cotton trousers, a striped jersey, the cap. The sight of the cap brought back the fear when that face had looked at us, the dark man's face. In the moonlight I strained to see who it was and yes, it was Eliot. Yet that made me more afraid. I saw the glint of his eyes as he lifted his head and . . . what was he doing? As I asked that I saw what I had not noticed before, a small case on the grass. He must have dropped it when he ran to the ladder. Then was Eliot going away? The case was too small to count as luggage, but suddenly I knew Eliot was going away.

I think Paul knew that too. I thought I heard him say, "Vous partez, hein?" with some swear words, though it was too far for me to catch the whole of the quick French.

"Ssst!" That came from Eliot like a warning, but Paul was drunk, drunk and angry, I thought. Now he was daring to bait Eliot. "Vous partez, hein?"

He went nearer. Out of my small experience I could have told him not to go near Eliot when Eliot was that cold stranger, but Paul made a sudden sideways lunge at the case.

I could not see what happened then, who hit whom. Paul's arms went as they had done when he battered me, but Eliot was fighting as . . . one must not fight, I thought, appalled. "Never hit in the stomach or kick," Uncle William had taught us, but I saw Eliot's knee come up into Paul and Paul let out a sound as if he were torn; then he doubled over, took two or three steps bent across the grass, made a noise like a gurgle and fell on his knees and was sick, his hands beating at his chest, his head wagging.

Eliot waited. I can see him waiting now, nothing seemed as cruel as that, and then he was . . . unfair again, but it was worse than unfair, it was cowardly. "Never hit anyone who is down"—that was Uncle William, too, but as Paul's head bent lower Eliot struck down at his back. It was so quick I could hardly believe I saw it, like lightning. What made it truly like lightning was that, in the moonlight, I thought I saw a long thin thing flash in Eliot's hand. For an odd moment I thought it was his paper knife—but he would not carry a paper knife in the garden.

Paul slid gently forward on to the grass, face downward. His legs kicked once or twice, then there were only quivers, like the ladder.

Eliot looked toward the house, along the windows. I shrank behind the curtains. I could not bring myself to look at his face below the cap; I think I expected it to change into that other man—the third Eliot. There were our Eliot and the cold unkind one, and him. When I looked again he had lifted Paul; he stood a moment, put Paul down and moved the case, putting it under the bushes. Then he came back to Paul, lifted him again and carried him away round the house.

What had I seen? I did not know. I remember only that heart beating in the top of my head and I seemed to have turned to ice against the window. I could not even shiver. I looked out into the garden where there was nothing but the garden and the moonlight, a few marks on the grass, and the ladder. I could not believe there had been anything else, been that —— But what was that? What had Eliot done to Paul? As I asked the question I seemed to hear Eliot's voice saying, "I'm sorry. I had to do that." Then? Then?

I do not know how long I stood there. It might have been a few minutes, it might have been half an hour, but suddenly as I looked down I saw Eliot was back.

He was alone. He came to the ladder, at which he looked down consideringly. It had left marks in the grass, two long scars. I thought he was wondering if he should take the ladder away when, through the night, came a sound that might have been a low hoot from the river or an owl. Eliot turned and picked up the small case.

Once again he scanned the house and again I shrank back against the curtain. Then he was gone.

When I took my hands from the sill the marks of them were there, soaking wet.

It was a morning filled with absences. That sounds contradictory, but it was the absences that made themselves felt. There were two parties for breakfast, Americans on their way from Germany to Paris, and we saw once again how hard hotel people worked. Mauricette told us that when the Brass Instruments Ball had finished it had been past one o'clock but she, Mme. Corbet and Paul had had to set to work, sweep out the dining room and hall and lay sixty places for breakfast. "And they will not have coffee and rolls," Vicky told us, "they will have grapefruit, bacon and eggs, hot rolls, jam, coffee and tea and milk." M. Armand, Mme. Corbet and Mauricette had to get up at half past six; we knew that because we were woken by cries for Paul.

A long time had gone by last night before I had taken myself out of that room and got into my own bed with Joss and Willmouse. All I could think of was how heavenly warm she was.

"Well?" Joss asked as I settled down. She had been wide awake.

Why did I not tell her what I had seen? "I have seen nothing, nothing at all"—that was what I was saying over and over again in my head, and aloud I said briefly:

"He has gone."

"Are you sure?"

"Quite sure."

I had imagined myself lying awake, seeing it over and over again, but at once I had fallen asleep.

"Paul. Pa-ul. Paul!" That was Mauricette. Then came Mme. Corbet's steps and she flung open our door, "without knocking," as Joss observed. Mme. Corbet was too hurried to see we were three in the bed together and she did not scold us. "Have any of you children seen Paul Brendel?" She always spoke as if we did not know him.

It was a relief to see Mme. Corbet. If she wanted Paul I could not believe he would not come. "When did you see him?" she asked.

"At the party last night," said Joss.

"Tscha!" and Mme. Corbet shut the door.

Wakened by the noise, Hester and Vicky came in. We were all awake now, in spite of our late night, wide awake except Willmouse who was fast asleep on the far side of our bed. Nor would he wake.

"Mme. Corbet, Willmouse, our little brother, hasn't woken."

"Then wake him."

"We—we can't."

Everyone was out of temper that morning and Mme. Corbet snapped, "What is wrong with him?"

Nothing was wrong with him except that he was asleep, fast asleep, pale, but he was often pale. When we shook him his head rolled, when we opened his eyelids his eyes showed the whites. "I don't like that," said Hester. It certainly looked alarming. "Is he ill or asleep?" I asked.

"I don't think you sleep when you are ill," said Joss. "He is just . . . too asleep."

That was what we told Mme. Corbet. "Grands Dieux!" she said. "Why worry me for that? Let him sleep."

When ten o'clock came and he had not stirred we began to worry more. Joss made up her mind. "I'm going to the hospital," she said.

"To tell mother?" I spoke out of my yearning; inexpressibly that morning I was longing for mother.

"Don't be an idiot," said Joss. "I am going to ask Monsieur le Directeur if Willmouse is all right."

"You could telephone."

"I can't in French. I don't know how to get the number," and Hester said, "I wish Eliot were here."

Eliot had gone to Paris, Mlle. Zizi told the monsieur from the police, M. Dufour, who came asking questions.

I had come into the hall on my way upstairs. Les Oeillets was quiet again, but in the hall was M. Dufour sitting on a chair, his hat on one of the console tables. I was examining him out of the corner of my eye when Mlle. Zizi

Politeness is to goodness what words are to thoughts. JOUBERT

JANE POWELL, beautiful Lustre-Creme Girl says: "Yes, I use Lustre-Creme Shampoo! Blonde hair just has to shine and look soft. A Lustre-Creme Shampoo works that magic for me every time." Lustre-Creme is used by the world's most glamorous women—shouldn't you use it, too?

For the most beautiful hair in the world

4 out of 5 top movie stars use Lustre-Creme Shampoo

When Jane Powell says, "I use Lustre-Creme Shampoo," you're listening to a girl whose beautiful hair plays a vital part in her glamour-career.

Your hair can have that Hollywood-lovely look with Lustre-Creme Shampoo. Under the spell of its lanolin-blessed lather, your hair will sparkle with highlights, shine like the stars! Yet it's so easy-to-manage—behaves like an angel—even right after shampooing. Waves are smooth—curls springy.

You'll see—and he will, too—how much lovelier your hair can look when you change to Lustre-Creme, the shampoo of the stars!

Lanolin-blessed creme or lotion never dries . . . it beautifies came from her room. She was in a pale green dressing gown, her hair twisted up, her face just as it was without rouge; she suddenly looked to me most beautiful.

"I regret I kept you waiting, monsieur," she said.

"Une demi-heure," said M. Dufour, but he did not sound angry. His eyes were brown and very kind. He kept them on Mlle. Zizi.

They spoke in French, but I could follow them. "I wanted to see Monsieur Eliot," said M. Dufour, "but Irène says he is not here."

"He has gone to Paris, monsieur."

"He has a business there?"

"So I understand."

I began to think there was some deep feeling between these two: monsieur was warmer to Mlle. Zizi than she to him; she still distantly called him "monsieur."

"How did he go to Paris if his car is here?"

Now I came to think of it, the Rolls was on the drive outside. It had not been there last night, but Mlle. Zizi was explaining. "Since yesterday Fouret's have had it for graissage. Today Monsieur Eliot drove up with friends. Look, Fouret's tag is on the windscreen if you wish to see it, monsieur."

She minds his questions about Eliot, I thought, and he does not like asking them. "This is a routine check on all strangers in the town, Zizi," he said. "We have nothing against Monsieur Eliot."

"What could you have?" asked Mlle. Zizi, more cold than ever, but he went quietly on with his questions.

"He stays here?"

"Is that a fault?"

"Zizi, I have to ask. Please understand."

He went on, "He was here at the dinner yesterday evening?"

"You saw him," said Mlle. Zizi.

"But he went to Paris in the day?"

"No. He was here all day. He was in the bar writing letters. Then he took an early lunch and spent the afternoon in the cove." Her eye fell on me trying to make myself small. "I you do not believe me, ask this child," sa Mlle. Zizi.

My stomach gave a sudden unexpect heave. I thought I was going to be sick. Dufour turned those kind brown eyes on n "Did you see Monsieur Eliot in the cove

"Yes, monsieur."

His eyes dwelt on me a moment—did guess there was something else? Then I felt soft little touch on my elbow; it was Heste as usual. M. Dufour passed to her.

"And did you see Monsieur Eliot in t cove?"

"Yes, monsieur." I do not know how v agreed silently not to tell. Hester added, "H gave us money to go bathing."

"You see!" cried Mlle. Zizi, then she bur out indignantly, "But why should you as questions? You know Eliot."

"I know him," said M. Dufour, and agai he sounded sad, "but I have to make m report."

He had picked up his hat when Mme. Co bet came out of the office. "Have you sai anything about Paul?" she asked Mlle. Ziz

"Paul. Ah, yes!" and Mlle. Zizi turned t M. Dufour again. "I suppose it is you w have to tell. It is Paul Brendel, the boy yo sent me."

"He was troublesome last night. Wha now?"

"Only that he seems to have gone," sai Mme. Corbet.

The strange morning went on. The docto came to see Willmouse. Mme. Corbet brough him upstairs. "Sixty people to breakfast, th dinner last night, and now they imagine ill ness," she said. "These children think they own the whole hotel."

She stood at the bedroom door while M. le Directeur bent over Willmouse and listened to his breathing; he felt his pulse and then raised one of Willmouse's eyelids and looked into his eye that still looked horrible with its rolled-up white.

"He is tired out with excitement," said Mme. Corbet, "so he sleeps."

"Il a été drogué," said M. le Directeur.

"Drogué? What is drogué?" asked Joss.

It was Mme. Corbet who answered in a bewildered voice, "Drugged."

"Willmouse?"

M. le Directeur was asking if there were any sleeping tablets in the house that Willmouse could have found.

"I keep Zizi's," said Mme. Corbet. She added that it was impossible.

Impossible, but it had happened. Standing at the foot of the bed with Joss, I knew it was not impossible. Unwillingly I knew more. While they had been talking I had seen that supper tray again and the grenadine and heard Eliot's voice saying smoothly, "He liked the drink." But why? I thought giddily. Why? Then I remembered how Eliot had suddenly and inexplicably ordered Willmouse to bed when Willmouse had done nothing to deserve it. But . . . and I remembered. Willmouse had been talking about the motor bike. I almost said it and clapped my hand to my mouth.

Willmouse woke in the afternoon, but he was drowsy and stupid and his voice was thick. Joss telephoned the hospital, Mme. Corbet getting through for her, and Willmouse was given hot tea. He immediately fell asleep again, but he was warmer.

Joss stayed with him, and Hester and I wandered out along the river. We tacitly agreed we should not go and see mother; I could not have trusted myself near her. We avoided the cove and between us was a weight of silence. Even to Hester I could not speak of what was in me, and as if she felt a barrier she did not speak either until we came out on the towing path when, "Look," she said, "the Marie France is gone."

"It had to go sometime," I said. It did not seem important, but there seemed a curious blankness on the river where the little barge had been.

We went in to goûter, getting it ourselves. Mauricette was leaning on M. Armand, reading the paper over his shoulder. "That is why Monsieur Dufour came asking about Monsieur Eliot," she said in French, but I was be-

Suited to Perfection . . . in Town & Country Shoes:

POLISHED CALF, WITH SPRING SUITS IN MIND. ALL ON THAT WONDERFUL JUST-RIGHT HEEL THAT LOOKS HIGH, BUT ISN'T. VERVE, THE PUMP IN NAVY: FLAPPER, THE T-STRAP IN BENEDICTINE: LATTICE, THE DRAPED SLING IN RED. ALL 12.95 THE PAIR. MATCHING HANDBAG, SOCIAL WHIRL, 8.95 PLUS TAX. TOWN & COUNTRY SHOES RANGE FROM 8.95 TO 12.95. COORDINATED HANDBAGS, 5.00 TO 10.95 PLUS TAX. YOUR FAVORITE STORE CARRIES THEM. WRITE US FOR NAME, TOWN & COUNTRY SHOES, EMPIRE STATE BUILDING, NEW YORK 1, NEW YORK.

America's Best Fashion Shoe Value

ginning not to notice if people spoke in French or English. "Why?" I asked.

"'Vol de diamants, à Paris,'" read out M. Armand, "'Coup de main audacieux dans le quartier de l'Etoile. Le malfaiteur s'enfuit avec cent millions de francs de diamants.'"

"Diamonds?" I asked, and, "What does it mean?" asked Hester.

"Only that there has been a robbery," I said.

"Tell her," said M. Armand, giving the paper to me to do my translation. "Now, nicely, for your sister."

Painfully I began: "An armed —— Qu'est ce que c'est 'malfaiteur'?" I asked M. Armand.

"Gangster," said M. Armand.

"Armed gangster steals one hundred . . . million; it is million?" I asked.

"Million," confirmed M. Armand.

"One hundred million francs' worth of jewels and escapes.

"Once a month Mlle. Yvonne Lebègue, secretary to M. Roger Dixonne, a diamond . . . merchant," I read, stumbling over the unfamiliar words, "whose offices are in the Rue La Fayette, ninth ar—— What is that?"

"Neuvième arrondissement," explained M. Armand, which left me none the wiser.

"Collects pierres précieuses—precious stones, chiefly diamonds, from a colleague in the Place du Trocadéro. On Friday, toward three-fifteen, Mlle. Lebègue was being driven on her way to the Rue La Fayette through the Rue Dumont d'Urville by Jean Sagan, Monsieur Dixonne's chauffeur. She had with her . . . un lot spécial . . . special lot of . . . qu'est ce que c'est 'pierres taillées'?" Mauricette pretended to cut sharply with a knife. "Oh, cut stones! . . . valued at about one hundred million francs in a small . . . qu'est ce que c'est 'une mallette d'aluminium'?"

Row on, no matter what happens. RABELAIS

Mauricette seized a saucepan and tapped it to show me. "Oh, aluminium case." I had not known that cases could be of aluminium. ". . . which she placed under her feet in the car, a Mercèdes. When the Mercèdes was almost at the top of the street near the P.T.T., a small light blue car, parked on the right side of the road, drew out suddenly and stopped, forcing the Mercèdes to stop. At the same time a man appeared by the car, swung open the door by Mlle. Lebègue, seized the case, slammed the door and was gone. It was so quickly and quietly done that the chauffeur did not see him at all and, though there were many people on the pavement, no one realized what had happened until Monsieur Sagan jumped out crying 'Stop that man! Stop him!' and they heard Mademoiselle Lebègue's cries. Meanwhile the small car had driven off. Monsieur Sagan ran through the crowd but there was no sign of the thief, who must have . . . very well known"—I translated literally—"known Monsieur Dixonne's habits to be able to organize this attack in less than two minutes."

"Ah ça! Par example!" cried M. Armand, full of admiration, "C'est un peu fort." He added wisely, "La femme était dans l'coup."

"What woman was in it?"

"La secrétaire," said M. Armand.

Mauricette said they would catch the thief, the police had the number of the small car. M. Armand said the driver was probably just an accomplice and the car was surely stolen; they would find it presently. I went on reading, "This is the third time there has been one of these ——" I stumbled.

"Holdups," said M. Armand.

"—— in this quarter. Paris police are looking for a man of thirty-five or thereabouts, tall, slim, dressed in thin trousers and a green jacket. The swiftness and . . . au . . . audacity lead them to think it is the work of an experienced thief, perhaps the international bandit Allen, who was behind the jewel raids in Cannes last year, whom all efforts by the police failed to catch."

The newspaper said they were checking all foreign people in a radius of Paris and Mauricette was teasing us. "Vous deux, Mlle. Cecil et Mlle. Hester, et ma p'tite Vicky, ma p'tite reine," and she picked up Vicky and danced around the room with her. Then she stopped and pointed out a picture printed in the newspaper to me.

We were in the kitchen where everything was familiar: M. Armand, Mauricette, the pots and pans; but now everything seemed to slide together into a blur behind the picture of a man and I spelled out the headline above it: "'I have seen him and shall know him again,' says Inspector Jules Cailleux of the Sûreté Général, who is handling the case. 'This time we shall get him.'"

I took the newspaper up to Joss. "Inspector Cailleux? He was the one at Dormans," said Joss.

"Yes, on that day ——" I broke off. I still did not like to mention that day to Joss, but Hester said, "When Eliot was queer."

There was a silence. Then I brought out huskily, "Perhaps he was queer because he did not want Inspector Cailleux to see him."

"Don't imagine things," said Joss sharply, but the sharpness told me she was imagining too.

"Willmouse, wake up. Wake up! Willmouse!"

It was next morning. Late the night before Willmouse had stirred, smiled and woken again. Mme. Corbet must have been worried because she came straight up to him and he had had hot soup, some bread and butter, had smiled at us and gone back to sleep. In the night I had heard him rustling. He wanted to go to the Hole and I had taken him. Surely now he must be awake enough to talk . . . or not to talk, I thought desperately.

All night I had pondered, conning over these difficult bits and pieces. Why I? I thought. Why should it be I? People are not sent what they cannot bear; mother had said that in the train, but that was about pain. I

Crane's Paper Opens the Door . . . gives voice to your good wishes

Crane's — THE GIFT FOR ALL OCCASIONS

CRANE'S FINE PAPERS • MADE IN DALTON, MASSACHUSETTS • SINCE 1801

100% RAG EXTRA NO. 1 QUALITY PAPERS FOR SOCIAL AND BUSINESS CORRESPONDENCE · CURRENCY · SECURITIES · CARBON · TRACING could have borne a pain, but this, this horrible knowledge that was in me I could not bear. It's imagination, I said, pushing it out of sight. At all costs, I thought, that was what I must do, refuse it, keep it down, be silent, not talk, not let Hester talk, or anyone else. "Willmouse, wake up!"

He opened his eyes. "Have I been asleep?" asked Willmouse.

"Can you understand me?" I said.

"Why not?" He was astonished.

"I want you to promise me something. Willmouse, if they—anyone—ask you if you saw anything, say nothing. Promise."

"Did I see anything?" he asked.

Two parties were coming for lunch. "You must tidy your room," Mme. Corbet told me.

"Shall I make the bloodstain for you as Paul isn't here?" I asked. I had meant to be sarcastic, to show Mme. Corbet we knew what frauds they were, but she only nodded. To her it was normal hotel business and she said, "You could bury the skull as well, but first put Rita and Rex in the kennel or they will dig it up now."

"Where are Rita and Rex?"

They were not on the house step in their usual place, nor inside the house, nor in the garden; then I heard barks from the orchard, barking and whining. I remember that as I went to see what had excited them I passed the box hedge, rubbing a leaf in my hands to catch the hot bruised smell, and dawdled in the orchard to see if any greengages were left. There were a few, on the trees, overripe in the sun, but still firm under the leaves; I ate both kinds and they added to the chaotic feeling in my stomach. Then, with the dog leashes in my hand, I went down the first long alley.

At the end of the alley there was a pit under the wall; it was filled with loose earth and rotting leaves; everything was thrown there to make a compost heap for Robert's garden. In this heap Rita was digging; her excited whines and barks sent quivers through Rex, who was sitting upright on the grass, his ears pricked. He was holding something in his mouth and his tail thumped proudly at the sight of me. He got up now and came to me and put the thing into my hand.

It was an espadrille, gray-white and sodden, with the tapes still knotted. I flinched and dropped it on the ground while Rex looked up at my face and thumped his tail.

"Wait, boy," I said. It was a sound like a croak and I took three steps to see what it was that Rita was digging.

In the brown-yellow of the leaves was something pale. I took another step and the whole orchard seemed to tilt and run into a blur as the kitchen had done when I saw Inspector Cailleux's picture, but now the orchard ran into the sky. The pale thing was a foot, a foot and ankle lying downward, the rest was under the leaves. There was an edge of blue cotton trouser, but the ankle was bare. The foot was cold and stiff with a dreadful stiffness. The smell of decay that rose up from the leaves and rotting weeds filled my mouth and nose and seemed to me the smell of death. There was no escape now. My head had come out of the sand and I had to know. The foot had worn the espadrille, Paul's espadrille—and this was Paul.

"Greengage indigestion!" said Mme. Corbet. She had come upon me sick on the garden path. "Too many greengages," she said and her topknot shook, not with pity but with indignation.

I did not contradict her. I could not, I could only gasp and moan; and she had to help me, unwilling as she was, until at last I could lean against her and get my breath. "Are . . . Rita and Rex shut up?"

"I put them in the kennel," said Mme. Corbet, annoyed. "I have everything to see to. Everything! Have you finished?" she asked sharply.

"I—I think so."

"Then go and lie down. You will not have any lunch."

Thankfully I escaped and went upstairs. In our room I went to the washing stand, which had not been emptied and cleaned. I washed and washed my hands; I think I was trying to wash away the smell of the dead leaves. I remember I was trembling and the beating was back in my head. You know what you have seen, said that beating. You will have to do something now. What are you going to do? I should have liked to creep into the unmade bed and pull the clothes over my head, but Toinette was at the door. I escaped from her and went into Vicky and Hester's room.

Toinette had finished in here, it was tidy and clean. There were fresh flowers—pimpernels, daisies and wild geranium—in Hester's liqueur glass. As I noticed it I had an overwhelming desire to look at Eliot—Eliot who had done . . . that. I opened the drawer where she hid her photograph. The little frame was lying on its face. I picked it up, and it was empty.

I was still staring at the empty frame when Joss came in. "Mme. Corbet says ——" She broke off. Then, "I took it," said Joss.

"The photograph?" She nodded. "I told Hester I wanted to copy it—make a portrait." Her face was so set and hard it looked like a stone carving of Joss.

"But you didn't," I said and asked, "What did you do with it?"

"I sent it to Inspector Cailleux," she told me.

"The Dormans man?"

"Yes."

"Joss!"

"Eliot shouldn't play fast and loose." She was not stone now. "That is what they call it and that is what it is; keep you, then push you away, take you and push you away. It's cruel. It's not only me; he has done it to Mlle. Zizi, and Monsieur Armand says the diamond merchant's secretary woman as well. He played with us, like—like chess, she and Mlle. Zizi and me."

"He wasn't playing with you."

"Shut up," blazed Joss, "shut up!" but I was steady.

"He didn't play with any of us," I said. "We were the only people he didn't play with."

Joss went to the window and stood with her back to me.

"When did you do it?" I asked.

"Yesterday. As soon as I knew, after you had brought me the paper, I wrote and went out to the corner and posted it. It caught the post."

"You don't know it was he."

"If it isn't they won't come," said Joss, but we were both waiting for them to come. "I knew it as soon as I saw the paper," said Joss.

"Just from Inspector Cailleux?" I said, marveling.

"Not from him. From Eliot," and she cried, "That was what made him so unhappy."

"They will get it this morning," I said slowly.

"And Paris isn't very far," said Joss.

There was a silence. We were both listening. Then, "What will they do to him, Cecil?" asked Joss. "Will they put him in prison?"

"They have to catch him first," I told her. "Joss ——"

She had sat down on the bed; she was still listening for sounds outside and, almost absent-mindedly, she raised her eyes to me. "They won't put him in prison," I said.

Her eyes came alive. She rapped out, "Why not?"

"Because if they catch him I think he will have to be hanged." Holding to the bedpost, I told her what I had found. When I began she put out her hand and caught my wrist as if she would stop me. It was a strangle hold and my hand went limp and white; when I had finished and she let me go the blood rushing back into it hurt excruciatingly. There was another silence, then, "They don't hang people in France," she said, "they guillotine them."

The only perfect people are those we do not know. DE BOUFFERS

"It's the visitors for lunch." I said that quickly when we heard the car slow at the gates.

"It's too early," said Joss.

We were in her room and had only to go to the window to see what car it was, but we stayed huddled together on the bed. The car drove in and stopped.

Joss laid her cold hand on my cold one. "Cecil, you look."

"I can't."

"You can. You didn't send for them."

I did not go to the window, but went downstairs just as M. Dufour walked in. "What, again?" said Mme. Corbet, who was crossing the hall.

"Again," said M. Dufour; his voice did not sound kind, but curt and angry. Behind him were two other men; one was big, in a tweed jacket, and carried a dispatch case; the other was small, and I held to the banisters as I recognized him. Yes, it was the Dormans man with the sandy hair and mustache, even the sand-and-olive-colored suit.

As M. Dufour talked rapidly and angrily to Mme. Corbet she caught sight of me. "Go into the garden and call Mlle. Zizi," she rapped out in French.

Mlle. Zizi must have been lying in the long chair on the terrace, but I think she, too, had heard the car, because as I came to her she was standing and as still as Joss had been. Did she have some sixth-sense warning? I reached her and she gripped me. "Who is it?"

"The police."

"Police!" Her face looked suddenly older, but her eyes were like a child's, filled with fear, looking far over my head.

"Where is Irène?"

"With them. They want you." I paused. "Mlle. Zizi ——"

No answer, only the fingers gripping me, kneading my arm.

"Zizi!" Mme. Corbet came down the terrace. "Zizi. Vas-y."

Then Mlle. Zizi did let me go. She looked at Mme. Corbet and backed away from her. "You!" she said, her voice ugly. "You sent for them."

"I? Why should I?" Mme. Corbet put out her hands, but Mlle. Zizi still backed away from her.

"It was you."

"Zizi. Qu'est-ce que tu nous racontes?"

"It was you."

"Hush," I said like a grownup. "Listen. Listen!" and I stamped my foot. They stared. "There is something you should see before you go in. It—he"—I thought I was going to be sick again and tumbled the words out—"it's in the orchard."

"What 'it'?" But I could not tell them.

"Look, quickly, in the heap where the leaves are thrown."

"What is it?" But I had taken refuge in being a child and had begun to cry.

"Something . . . I think . . . I found. Oh, look! Look quickly. I will go in and say you are coming, but go. Go."

The policemen were in the bar where Mauricette was bringing them drinks on a tray. M. Dufour was walking up and down, the other two were sitting calmly at a table; Inspector Cailleux was looking round him with what I imagined was a detective look, taking every detail in. I could see Joss on the stairs, her hand holding the rail.

"Et Mlle. de Presle? Elle vient?" barked M. Dufour at me.

With Joss watching I was dignified in spite of my red eyes. "Dans un petit moment," I said, closing the garden door behind me; but M. Dufour sprang forward and wrenched it open, for just then down in the orchard Mlle. Zizi began to scream.

When anything happens in a house the children are treated like cattle. We were rounded up, herded upstairs and into our rooms; as we went up we could hear Mlle. Zizi having hysterics, and M. Dufour trying to calm her. Mme. Corbet had to leave her to him, for as usual she had everything to do: control Mauricette, Toinette and Nicole, who seemed to

Designed and fashioned to be 6 ways more comfortable than any other bra you've ever worn! It's the "New Romance" Bra by Formfit with 6 new fabulous fitting features. Designed for your active life, it fits and feels just like part of you. Have it in White cotton in sizes 32A to 40C. See what "New Romance" No. 562 will do for you. At fine stores everywhere. $2.50

"New Romance" Bra by Formfit comes in handy pick-up packages.

1. New Equalift supports and beautifies with definite separation . . . balanced lift!

2. Elastic underarm gives no-gap snug fit!

3. Adjustable elastic band stays down and stays in place, actually breathes with you!

4. Beautiful shape permanently circle-stitched into each cup!

5. Ladder-stitched cups give a smooth line!

6. Elastic back-releases — plush-lined for comfort — keep bra in place, give you complete freedom of movement!

THE FORMFIT COMPANY • CHICAGO • NEW YORK • CANADIAN PLANT, TORONTO

DRESS BY FAVA-SAN • FURNISHINGS BY HARVEY PROBER

want to have hysterics, too; enlist M. Armand's help; telephone the doctor; install Inspector Cailleux in the little salon and allow his assistant to use the telephone in the office.

After Mlle. Zizi stopped screaming a horrible calm lay over the house—the house, not the garden; the garden was full of police, and Rita and Rex bayed frantically in the kennel. Each time their noise rose it meant a fresh batch of police had arrived. M. Armand saw us looking out the windows and came up and shuttered them. "Better not to look," he said gently, but we could not help looking through the cracks, all except Joss, who sat as if she had been frozen on the bed.

A dark blue van drove up.

"What's that?" asked Willmouse fearfully.

"It's the dead car," said Vicky, who was not supposed to know anything. "It has come for Paul."

The truth spoken so flatly shocked us and we stayed perfectly still listening to the tramp of feet. "He's on a stretcher," said Vicky, peering, "all covered up."

I had a hiccup that shook me from my heels to my head. Hester began to cry.

"It was all my fault," said Joss. Sitting on the bed, she twisted her hands together. "If I had gone on painting —— Cecil told me to but I would go to the party."

"We went to the party too," said Hester loyally.

"If I hadn't smiled at him ——"

"Well, if we had never talked to him ——" I could say that.

"—— he would never have come up the ladder," said Joss, not listening.

"Did he come up a ladder?" Hester and the Littles asked. "Why?" they asked.

"To . . . look at Joss."

I told them how Eliot came. "He needn't have come. It was because he thought we were in trouble. He could have gone," I said. "He shook the ladder and Paul fell."

"Nobody meant it, it happened," said Hester; she added mournfully, "And now Eliot has gone."

"I saw him go." They all turned to me, listening carefully as I told them.

"That was how he was dressed," said Willmouse, nodding, when I described the clothes. "But . . . I can't believe it," said Willmouse. He looked stunned.

"I can," said Hester. "Eliot always said 'I'm sorry. I had to do that.' If you are all right, really all right, you don't do things that are sorry."

Presently Mme. Corbet appeared. "He wants to see you."

"Who?"

"Inspector Cailleux."

She drove us downstairs, all except Joss, who was not to be ordered. "I shall come when I'm ready," she said.

Inspector Cailleux was in the little salon. We had never been allowed to enter it, now we were to go in and sit on the yellow satin chairs, but first we had to wait. The door was open; we could see M. Dufour and the tweed-coated man. When we peeped round we saw that Inspector Cailleux, in his funny-colored suit, was sitting at the pretty center table; it seemed terrible it should be used for this. Another man was at a table carried in from the bar. He was writing, but the other three were talking; by straining every sense I could just keep up.

"I can*not* believe it," M. Dufour was saying. He was walking up and down. "Everyone knew Monsieur Eliot. Why, he was here, dining at this big dinner with us all last night. He must have a nerve of iron."

"He has," said the clipped soft voice of Inspector Cailleux.

"What does he say?" whispered Willmouse.

They must have heard Willmouse whisper, for Inspector Cailleux asked, "Can those children understand French?"

"Very little," said M. Dufour, "except the big one, perhaps." He came to the door. "She is not here yet. Shall I close the door?"

"No, leave it. It's too hot," said Inspector Cailleux.

The talk went on. "But how?" M. Dufour was saying, "How? Monsieur Eliot was here all afternoon. You have heard."

"I have heard. That does not mean to say he was."

"But he was. We have evidence. If this was his work, he had an accomplice."

"He had no accomplice." Inspector Cailleux's voice sounded tired. "He works alone, or practically alone; there may be a man hired to drive a car or to telephone, but then he is discarded. We have caught them, Dufour, and they know nothing. He's too clever to have accomplices; sooner or later one of them would give him away. No, never accomplices, only tools, simple people; especially women."

"What are they talking about?" asked Willmouse, and I lost the rest until Inspector Cailleux said slowly, "I know that man's work as if it were my own."

"Tell us," Willmouse commanded me urgently and I translated as best I could, but it was hard work listening and telling.

"But . . . right under our noses!" said M. Dufour.

"Under your noses," said Inspector Cailleux. Then he threw down his pen. "What's the good? He has had thirty-six hours. He is hundreds of miles away by now."

"I don't think he is," said Willmouse when I had translated.

"What do you mean?"

"I know where Eliot is."

"Where?"

"On the barge," said Willmouse, "the Marie France." The Marie France had gone and I remembered that soft strange hoot in the night.

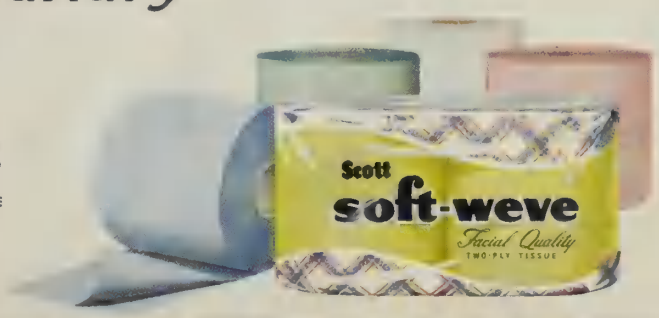
I gazed at my little brother. "But how did you know?"

"He was dressed for it," said Willmouse simply. He added, "Barges go very slowly, but I don't suppose they will think of looking for him there."

"Cecil!" said Hester urgently.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 115

"We no longer call it 'going on a diet.' We call it 'developing sensible eating habits.'"



"Double Daffodil" negligee—a burst of pleated petals on a slender silk stem—designed for Scott by Pallavicini. Matching double luxury—the superb 2-ply "facial quality" bath tissue, Soft-Weve by Scott. Now wrapped in cellophane to show you the lovely, delicate Soft-Weve colors.

SCOTT PAPER

Probably the most noticed luxury in your home...

Soft-Weve® by Scott

2-PLY "FACIAL QUALITY" BATH TISSUE

"Don't want any more." You can almost hear the stubborn little feet departing.

The milk she didn't drink holds vitamins she needs. Too often the foods that children need the most are the very ones it's hardest to get inside them.

Extra vitamins can help . . . but do you know the things that vitamins cannot do, as well as what they can? The two are equally important.

You can easily get the facts: Just ask your pharmacist for a copy of Squibb's free leaflet "Hidden Hunger." Make a note: Vitamins . . . Drugstore . . . "Hidden Hunger."

And if at any time the child is not doing well, see your doctor. Let him use his skill and judgment to prescribe proper treatment.

SQUIBB

a name you can trust

OLIN MATHIESON CHEMICAL CORPORATION, 1958

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 112

I looked up. Mlle. Zizi had come into the bar. I had seen her once without her make-up, but now her face seemed to have come through it. She was a strange gray-white color and her face was knotted as if it had cords in it. She looked at us, then into the little salon and pointed to it inquiringly, and then at us again.

We shook our heads.

Her eyes turned from one to another of us; they seemed to be asking us, and she put her fingers to her lips. Slowly, solemnly, we nodded.

Mme. Corbet's quick voice was heard in the hall and Mlle. Zizi turned almost in a panic to go. In the doorway she met Joss.

Joss stopped when she saw Mlle. Zizi. For a moment they faced each other. Then Mlle. Zizi spoke.

"They have told me. So! It was you who sent the photograph."

"Of course." Joss crossed in front of her and said, "Let me sit down, Hester."

In the little salon the voices grew louder. We listened and I said, "They're talking about us."

M. Dufour came to the salon door and beckoned us in. He started when he saw Mlle. Zizi. "Zizi," he said, "you should be resting."

"Resting!"

"Well, something. Don't stay here. Please," and he said, "Irène, take her." Mme. Corbet put her arm round Mlle. Zizi and led her away as we filed in.

Because we knew our scarecrows were very dirty we sat on the edge of the yellow chairs. Last of all Joss, her chin high, spots of red in her cheeks, took a chair by the door.

"Must the little children be in this?" asked M. Dufour in French.

Inspector Cailleux did not raise his head. "They are in it," he said.

He wrote for a few minutes, then suddenly he sat up and looked at us. "Which of you took this photograph?"

It was said so casually, and in English, that we started. I do not know what we had expected, but he was simply holding the snapshot up.

"I did," said Hester with modest pleasure.

"And you are"—he looked at a paper—"Hester?" She nodded. "Ten years old?" Hester's curls bobbed again. "Ten years old," said Inspector Cailleux in French to M. Dufour, "and she has succeeded in doing what no one else has ever done, getting a photograph of Allen." Then in English, "I must congratulate you, ma p'tite. It is most valuable."

"Valuable?" The pleasure was wiped from Hester's face. "You mean . . . my photograph helped you?"

"Helped me! It brought me straight here," and to M. Dufour again he said, "I am one of the few, the very few, who have seen Allen. I had him once—for an hour."

"He got away?" M. Dufour sounded almost pleased.

"He got away." Inspector Cailleux's voice forbade any more questions and I remembered how the newspaper had said: "—— whom the police failed to catch."

"I must ask you for the negative." Inspector Cailleux was speaking to Hester again. "But we shall give you something very pretty in exchange. A doll. You would like a doll?"

"No," said Hester, her eyes horrified.

"Eliot gave me a doll," said Vicky. "We don't want yours."

"Listen," said Inspector Cailleux. "I am going to speak to you as if you were not children, but grown up. You know this man Allen?"

We shook our heads.

"You know Monsieur Eliot?"

We nodded. "He's our friend," said Willmouse.

"Your friend is a thief," said Inspector Cailleux. "A thief who stole in many countries, deceived people, took their money and was often cruel to them. I must tell you that sometimes he killed them."

"Like he did Paul?" asked Vicky, interested.

"Vicky, you are not to say things like that," Joss cut in from where she sat by the door.

"If you please, mademoiselle ——" said Inspector Cailleux. "I must ask you to be quiet. I shall come to you . . . later." He returned to the Littles. "He killed Paul," he said. "Are you going to like him after that?"

Hester, Willmouse and Vicky said instantly, "Yes."

Inspector Cailleux looked nonplused and perhaps a little angry. "Like him or not, you have a duty. You know what duty is?"

We all nodded. Eliot was our friend . . . but when a friend kills a friend? And with a paper knife. I felt sure now it was the paper knife, or what we had thought was a paper knife. A rift was being torn between us and Eliot; each word that Inspector Cailleux said made that rift more.

"If you know anything, have seen anything strange or out of place, about this man Allen or Eliot," he was saying, "it is your duty to tell me."

Dead silence.

Hester was the most honest of us and the most easily worked upon. She put up her hand.

"Well?"

"He," said Hester as if her throat were dry, "he ——"

"Yes?" said Inspector Cailleux encouragingly. "He?"

"He lay in the cove ——" said Hester.

"Yes?" said Inspector Cailleux again, but I had pinched her and she shut her lips.

Again there was silence, but this, of course, could not go on; they were the police. I thought Inspector Cailleux had seen that pinch; detectives saw everything or they would not be detectives. Each of them knew something, but I knew it all. What was I to do? Here in front of Inspector Cailleux all dreams and wishes fled. These were the police. Soon I should have to tell.

It was beginning to come out.

"You were the one who had the sleeping dose." Inspector Cailleux had turned to Willmouse and he asked M. Dufour, "You think Allen gave the dose to him?"

"The chef, Monsieur Armand, says Monsieur . . . Allen took up a tray for the boy. We think, but we do not know."

"We can guess," said Inspector Cailleux, and to Willmouse, "What was on the tray you were brought?"

"Food," said Willmouse. "Banquet food; chicken and party toast and a meringue. A beautiful meringue," said Willmouse, remembering.

"Anything to drink?"

"Grenadine."

"The supper things were washed up," said M. Dufour, "so that, of course, we do not absolutely know."

"We can guess," said Inspector Cailleux again and his pale eyes studied Willmouse. "This child knew something. They say he slept for two days. It must have been strong."

"The drug or the reason?"

"Both," said M. Dufour. "But it was abominable! To drug a child."

"This was Allen," Inspector Cailleux reminded him. "The little boy is lucky to be alive."

"Who are they talking about?" Willmouse whispered more urgently to me.

"You."

"Why?"

"Because they think . . . Eliot . . . put you to sleep."

"Eliot?"

"Yes."

"Why? Why?" said Willmouse imperiously to Inspector Cailleux.

"Because, my little man, you knew something he did not want you to tell. It was not a very pleasant thing to do to you, was it?"

"It was silly," said Willmouse. "Why didn't he ask me not to tell? He needn't have put me to sleep. He could have trusted me."

"Was this man God to them?" asked Inspector Cailleux. He was getting angry and the questions came fast.

"Why did he send you to bed?"

To be really cosmopolitan, a man must be at home even in his own country.
THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON

. . . understands that they must run to meet the Spring . . . and follows them, through the wonder of the season . . . knowing their small, bright world will never look so big again. This is the shoe believed in and trusted through the years, for its fine fit and quality . . . its fine respected name.

THE STRIDE RITE SHOE

Green Shoe Mfg. Co., Boston, Mass.

An information-packed article about your baby's care, feeding, growth and fun.

When Baby Wants To Feed Himself

Your helpless little spoon-fed baby will soon get firm notions about feeding himself! If he's not allowed to practice when he shows interest, he may lose interest—and want you to go on feeding him for months. When he tries to grab your spoon, give him a small spoon of his own. While he's gradually learning to make it work, you can manage his feedings—without so much competition! Let baby decide whether he's a right-handed eater or a lefty. At first, you'll probably find he's both. About the middle of the second year—sometimes later—he'll start using one hand more than the other.

● As soon as your doctor OK's a switch to Junior Foods, ask him about mixing baby's Strained and Junior foods for a while. Mix Heinz Junior with Heinz Strained Macaroni, Tomatoes, Beef and Bacon—or add Heinz Junior Chicken Noodle Dinner to the same tasty flavor, strained style. Then baby gets used to Junior Foods' grown-up texture gradually.

● First birthday party coming up? Keep the smallfry guest list small and the celebration short—you'll make baby's happy birthday happier for everybody! With a simple cake, why not serve Heinz delicious Strained Orange Juice or the new apple-base juices? Babies love them all: freshly-pressed Apple, Apple-Prune, Apple Juice with Pineapple, Apple Juice with Apricots, Apple-Grape; strained, sweetened slightly, fortified with Vitamin C.

● How long can you keep baby food after it's opened? In Heinz easy-to-seal-again jars, second helpings stay fresh 2 or 3 days with good refrigeration.

● Look away occasionally—if you can!—when your eager self-feeder makes a mess. If you watch every wobbly smeary spoonful, it's hard not to help. Baby may want help later in the meal, when he's tired. What he needs most is praise and encouragement from mommy. Heinz tasty Junior Foods encourage a do-it-yourself feeder, too; the slightly coarser texture is easier to trap with a spoon! Heinz Junior Foods include many Strained flavors baby loves.

● When baby jabbers his own private "jibberish" (from about 10 to 18 months) isn't it fun to listen to his inflections? He asks himself questions, then seems to give himself answers. Sometimes they're serious and other times apparently quite amusing! His conversation makes plenty of sense to him—and he wonders why grown-ups can't understand it. Actually, this delightful babble is a sure sign your baby will soon be talking.

● Heinz new juices, like all Heinz Baby Foods, are prepared in exclusive baby-food kitchens located in the nation's garden spots where the finest fruits and vegetables grow. Heinz baby-food experts select the pick of each crop and pack it at flavor peak to insure better flavor, color and texture.

● Baby's first real smile—a big unmistakable grin—comes along sometime in his second month. About the fourth month, things strike baby so funny he just has to laugh out loud! Baby smiles when he tastes favorite foods, too.

Over 90 Better-Tasting

- Strained Egg Yolks
- Baby Fruit Juices
- Pre-Cooked Cereals
- Strained and Junior Meats

57

HEINZ
Baby Foods

- Strained Baby Foods
- Junior Baby Foods
- Teething Biscuits

"I was out late."

"Why were you out late?"

"I had been for my walk."

"Where did you go?"

"Along the river."

"Did you see anything?"

They were coming closer—like bloodhounds, I thought, and prickled with apprehension.

"I saw the barge," said Willmouse.

"What barge?"

"The Marie France."

"What was the barge doing?"

"Nothing," said Willmouse truthfully, but Inspector Cailleux was looking deeply into him.

"Do you like barges?" he asked.

"No."

"Then there was something especial about this one? Something you saw, perhaps?" rapped out Inspector Cailleux.

"I would rather not talk to you," said Willmouse.

"I am not playing," cried Inspector Cailleux and hit the little table with his fist so that it shook. Vicky burst into tears.

"I don't like it," she wailed. "I want mother."

As if mother's name had been a touchstone we all began to weep, except Joss, who was still disassociated from us; I was ashamed, but the tears were gathering, unbearably heavy and hot in my eyes. Helplessly we wept. There was more to come, more shockingness, but we had moved M. Dufour. He protested, "I told you this was not for children."

"Some of them are not children."

We jumped. Mlle. Zizi was standing in the doorway. At the sight of her distorted face even Vicky was quelled.

"You are asking them questions," said Mlle. Zizi. "Why? You need only ask her." She pointed at Joss. "Ask her what the ladder was doing on the lawn under her window, why the marks of it were on the grass." Mme. Corbet had come running after Mlle. Zizi, but Mlle. Zizi shook her off. "Ask her."

Inspector Cailleux looked at Joss, who had risen like a girl in class. Slowly I rose, too, but no one noticed me.

"Is that a child?" said Mlle. Zizi, and to M. Dufour, "You have seen her with your own eyes, how she behaved at the dinner. She drove Paul Brendel out of his mind. You saw that too. Well, ask her what happened. The ladder was at her window. Elle a couché avec l'un après l'autre."

I did not understand the word "sleep" used like that, "sleep with one after the other," nor its import; I was only sure that in some way it was hideous and unjust and I moved near to Joss. "She didn't sleep," I said. "She was wide awake. Why, she came to my room and sent me in ——"

"You?" Their eyes all shifted to me.

"Don't be a fool," said Joss curtly to me.

"These little children must go out," said M. Dufour, springing up distressed, but Hester and the Littles had already left their yellow satin chairs and come to Joss and me; they did not understand, but knew we were threatened and they stood loyally round us.

Once again we seemed small and alone in that French house. M. Dufour was kindly, but he was thinking of Mlle. Zizi. Only one person would have defended us: Eliot; and he —— I could not go on. I swallowed, and felt as if the tears were running down my throat.

"So! Two of you," said Mlle. Zizi. "And this is what I took into my house."

Your dear house! In that moment of misery I almost said it. Les Oeillets, the gold-green days, the love, to end in this.

It was at that moment I heard a sound in the courtyard outside that made me look up. These were the windows from which Mlle. Zizi had so often watched for Eliot. Now I looked out and saw the big gate was shut as it had been on our first night. It had been shut by the police. The sound I had heard was the jangling of the bell.

A gendarme opened the wicket; he spoke for a moment to someone outside and opened the gate.

Inside the salon there was turmoil. The two other policemen had jumped up and Mme. Corbet was explaining to them, shouting over our heads while M. Dufour talked to Mlle. Zizi as if he were scolding her. Only Inspector Cailleux stayed at his desk, quietly watching.

"Zizi! You haven't a shadow of proof," scolded M. Dufour.

"Haven't I?" She wheeled on him. "Why did I have to put Monsieur Joubert out of the hotel?" Everyone stopped to listen. "They said it was painting!" said Mlle. Zizi, and she spat the word again, "Painting!"

I had felt Joss quivering, but now happened something so alarming that it burned out everything else. Joss, dignified, aloof, almost grown-up Joss, crumpled like a little girl. "Mother. I want mother," she wailed like Vicky.

We stood round her, appalled too. "Help me. Help me," sobbed Joss.

We could not help her. How could we? We barely understood. There was no one to help us now and soon, soon I should have to —— Helpless in my tears I looked out the window and saw that a man had come in through the gate. He was dressed in a gray suit and brown felt hat and was followed by a porter with a handcart and two leather suitcases. There was something very familiar about the man; his small figure looked square and solid and there was a wonderful calmness about him.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 118

WE NEED YOUR HELP!

PLEASE . . . Include your city postal-zone number in your address when writing us about your present subscription, renewing your subscription,
ordering new subscriptions,
questions concerning any of the Curtis magazines.

This will help us to handle your order or answer your question more quickly. If you have a postal-zone number, use it—always!

We have pledged to the Post Office Department that we will co-operate with them to help achieve the most economical and efficient means possible of delivering your magazines to you.

In order that we may co-operate with the Post Office Department in this endeavor we must include the zone number for each subscriber's address in zoned cities.

So, help yourself to better service by always using your zone number!

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
INDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA 5, PENNSYLVANIA

On Baby: Sleep-and-Play Pajama. Three-piece terry knit. White/azure, white/pink stripes. S-M-L. $3.00.

How to stripe up a friendship

Left: Doll-Print Panti-Dress Set. Jiffon neck. Rumba ruffle pant. Azure, pink, yellow print. 6 mos.-2 yrs. $2.50.

Center: Snap-Fastened Shirt. Double-breasted. Diapenda tapes. White. 3 mos.-1½ yrs. $1.00.

Right: Boys' Topper Set. Sleeveless jacket. Plasticized pant. White/blue, white/red pin dot print. 6 mos.-1½ yrs. $3.00.

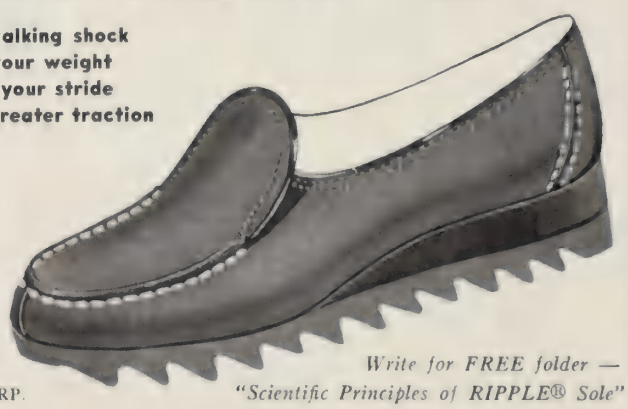
Once some handsome stripes lost their candy cane. "Where, oh, where," they cried, "will we find a cosy place to run up and down again?" The Carter people heard them and said, "Come and live on our soft cotton knit terry play pajama. There you can go up and down . . . and even round and round in the washing machine! You'll be Carter-Set so you won't shrink out of fit, and you'll never need to be ironed. Best of all, you'll be a yummy present for a sweet-tooth baby." And, luckily for babies, it all came true!

Carter's

THE WILLIAM CARTER CO. NEEDHAM HEIGHTS, MASS.

puts the whole FAMILY on EASY FEET

MOST REVOLUTIONARY SHOE DEVELOPMENT IN 2,000 YEARS*



"RIPPLE® Sole

"The Shoe that WALKS for You"

Feel the pavement "soften" as resilient cushions (angled backward) ease your foot DOWNWARD and FORWARD! AND . . . when you lift your foot, released energy actually propels you along step by step! Most comfortable shoe you've ever worn for work, for play, and YES! for golf! Tests prove ONLY RIPPLE® Sole's scientific action:

- ✓ Absorbs walking shock
- ✓ Balances your weight
- ✓ Lengthens your stride
- ✓ Provides greater traction

Reader's Digest*

You'll find smartly-styled RIPPLE® Sole Shoes at better shoe and department stores. Try on a pair — you'll live in them.

Write for FREE folder — "Scientific Principles of RIPPLE® Sole"

TM-RIPPLE SOLE CORP.

Manufactured in the United States by Beebe Rubber Co. under license from

RIPPLE SOLE CORPORATION, 26 West Adams, Detroit 26, Michigan

Now—so easy to be a blonde again!

Actually simpler than setting your hair!

If your hair was born to be blonde—and isn't—or if you're a brownette with blonde ambitions, fabulous Light and Bright, Richard Hudnut's shining new discovery, is for you! It's a different hair lightener, so easy to use, you can "do-it-yourself" at home. It was designed to bring out all the hidden gold in your hair . . . make you as blonde as you were truly born to be.

Light and Bright is so simple and easy to use; simpler, in fact, than setting your hair! There's no messy mixing. No complicated testing. No worrisome timing. All you do is apply Light and Bright to dry hair, using a brush, cotton pad or small sponge. Then comb through, let dry —and that's it!

Light and Bright works so gently, so gradually, you don't have to worry about getting too blonde too fast. It gives you genuine "color control"! Each time you use Light and Bright, your hair gets a little lighter, a little brighter. Until finally, when you reach just the color that's right, you stop.

Light and Bright contains no harsh ammonia. Instead it's formulated with a special built-in conditioner that helps keep your hair soft and easy-to-manage. You'll really be delighted at the wonderful way Light and Bright makes you a true, natural-looking blonde again with lovely, shining-soft hair! And once this gentle home brightener has brought to light your real blondeness, that drab, mousey look is gone for keeps. Yes, when you use Light and Bright, your glamourous new golden look won't wash out or fade. And Light and Bright is guaranteed by Good Housekeeping.

Don't wait another day. Let gentle new Light and Bright make you as blonde as you were born to be. Get a bottle today—be a blonde beauty tomorrow. Only $1.50 plus federal tax at cosmetic counters everywhere.

Guaranteed by Good Housekeeping

Advertisement

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 116

My heart suddenly calmed too. It was Uncle William.

"Uncle William!" The shout I gave filled the little salon. I do not know how we burst out of it, past Mlle. Zizi, Mme. Corbet and M. Dufour. I think I heard Inspector Cailleux ordering us to sit down, but I was not listening, nor were the others. All of us, even Joss, rushed through the bar into the hall.

Uncle William came in. Joss threw herself into his arms, I had mine round his neck, Vicky and Hester were hugging his legs, Willmouse danced up and down in front of him. Uncle William! Dear, dear, dear Uncle William!

"My name is Bullock."

We had always winced and thought that people must laugh when Uncle William said that, but now nobody laughed, nor did we wince. "Bullock," and he put down his card on the desk, "of Bullock, Roper and Twiss, solicitors, Southstone. That is in Sussex, England."

"À votre service, monsieur," said Inspector Cailleux and introduced the others: "Monsieur Dufour, Monsieur Lemaitre, Monsieur Aubry." They bowed. "Madame Corbet," said Inspector Cailleux; he did not introduce Mlle. Zizi.

"You have some trouble?" asked Uncle William after he had shaken hands. "The police?"

"You have doubtless heard at the station or on your way here of these shocking events," said Inspector Cailleux dryly.

"I have heard nothing. I do not speak French," said Uncle William. "I have come to take my sister—if she can travel—and my nieces and nephew home . . . to England," he added firmly, looking at us.

"You said you wouldn't come and you came!" said Hester, stroking his coat.

"How did you know to come, now, just now!" cried Joss, still clinging to him.

"But I was sent for," said Uncle William.

"Sent for?"

Freeing himself from us, he said, "This came yesterday," and from his wallet took out a telegram. He read aloud:

"'Come immediately Hôtel des Oeillets Vieux-Moutiers Marne France your sister in hospital children urgently—repeat urgently—need your help.'"

"But who sent it?" asked Mme. Corbet.

"It isn't signed," said Uncle William.

God gives the nuts, but He does not crack them.
GERMAN PROVERB

"Someone must have sent it," said Inspector Cailleux and looked round on us all. I tried to put a surreptitious hand on Hester, but I was too late.

"Eliot, of course," said Hester.

"Eliot!" That came from Joss, Mlle. Zizi, Mme. Corbet and Inspector Cailleux.

"Yes. He always did look after us," said Hester, beaming.

"The fool!" Mlle. Zizi's cry rang out as she darted across the room and snatched the telegram from Uncle William. She was crumpling it in her hand, tearing it with her teeth as they caught her. Inspector Cailleux ripped it away and M. Dufour and Mme. Corbet struggled to hold her as the little sheet of paper was smoothed out and pieced together on the table.

"Châlons. Eleven-twenty-five yesterday morning."

"He was heading for the German border," said M. Dufour.

"Obviously," said Inspector Cailleux and snapped, "Get me Lavalle on the telephone." Then he stopped. "No, wait. Châlons," he said, puzzled. "But Châlons is almost here."

"C'est à vingt-et-un kilomètres," said the man in the window.

"Twenty-one kilometers at eleven o'clock in the morning yesterday," said Inspector Cailleux.

"He had been at the dinner," reminded M. Dufour.

"But only until about midnight. He had at least nine or ten hours," said Inspector Cailleux. "I don't understand," but he said it as if in a minute, or minutes, he would understand and he began to pace up and down. Mlle. Zizi was quiet now, limp and sobbing against Mme. Corbet.

"Could he be walking?" asked M. Dufour.

"With the roads watched?"

"Cross country?"

"There are roads into Châlons," said Inspector Cailleux irritably and he walked up and down. "Somewhere slow, where we would not look for him. Of course not. We are looking everywhere fast. Very clever, Monsieur Allen. Slow. Vieux-Moutiers, Châlons, into Germany."

"Châlons? You mean Châlons-sur-Marne?" said Uncle William in his pleasant voice. "On the Marne?"

"The Marne!" Inspector Cailleux stopped. "The Marne!"

From the river, into our silence, came the hoot of a passing barge. END

AMERICA'S BEST-DRESSED WOMEN

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 65

This is not her complete wardrobe, because she also has two country houses and an island retreat, plus another apartment in another city. She has about two thirds as much in each of the other places, with greater or smaller emphasis on casual and lighter clothing for varying weather and social situations.

But by and large her New York wardrobe is her "showcase" wardrobe and it could not be replaced for less than $100,000. To maintain it, her average yearly clothing purchase of the larger items is 15 hats, 8 suits, 3 cloth coats, 2 dozen pairs of shoes and 25 dresses, of which 20 are from custom houses (mostly Balenciaga or Dior) and the others are run up by a dressmaker who adapts designs from her own ideas and sometimes copies a favorite dress in another color or material.

This does not count furs and jewels which are bought differently (not so often, and they seldom wear out) and would add disproportionately to the total wardrobe figure, bringing it up to a replacement value of around $1,500,000.

This is not unusually high. Many women spend more without achieving the chic for which this woman is famous. One of Bergdorf Goodman's best customers every year spends a rock-bottom $100,000 on clothes and has never yet been mentioned on a best-dressed list, though she undoubtedly would like to be.

Nor can it be said that, strictly speaking, this wardrobe is average. It is only what one woman has. Some have less, some far more. Some accumulate, others give their clothes away—to friends, servants or charities—after a few seasons' wear. Others—a few—resell them. But the idea that these women commonly wear gowns costing thousands of dollars and toss them aside after one or two wearings could not be further from the truth. They love clothes. Otherwise they would not have the patience to collect and always wear perfect ones, flawless in assembly and detail. They respect their clothes as they would a beautiful porcelain or art object, wearing them again and again, sometimes for years.

"It's like having a Gauguin that you adore on your wall. You do not," Mrs. Winston Guest points out, "take it down when all your friends have seen it." And when a woman like that says to another woman, "Darling, I've always loved you in that dress"—says fashion expert Eleanor Lambert—she doesn't mean, "Oh, that old rag again," she really means it! When one appears in the same dress as another, it's not a disaster but a mark of real éclat, if it's a $1200 jeweled velvet by Mainbocher or one of Charles James' classic satins. And if it doesn't happen too often! This winter, Mrs. Paley

CONTINUED ON PAGE 120

Men of Action need Canada Dry Ginger Ale for a quick-energy lift! Will not upset mealtime schedules!

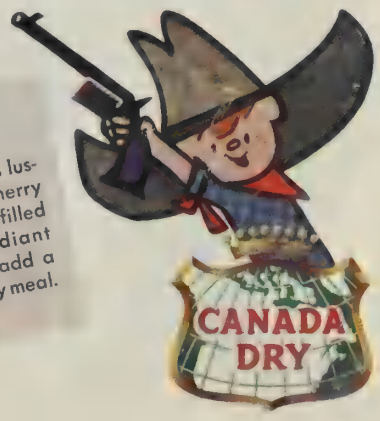
Such a cheery, delicious, thirst-satisfying powerhouse of pep . . . thanks to natural wholesome ingredients. Premium larger-crystal sugar for nourishment, select imported ginger for delectable flavor, and pure, pure water livened by "Pin-Point Carbonation" with sparkling bubbles that aid digestion. Canada Dry Ginger Ale brings youngsters back to life.

It perks up dispositions right on the spot. And it's so easily served . . . no kitchen fuss...just lift the cap and enjoy the fizz, flavor and fun. Whenever pep disappears, serve Canada Dry Ginger Ale . . . so light, dry (less sweet), not filling . . . so easily digested it never disturbs mealtime schedules. Keeps youngsters from 5 to 95 mentally alert, physically alive.

FIRST IN TASTE: Canada Dry, the Original Pale Dry Ginger Ale...often imitated but never duplicated!

Canada Dry makes 10 other completely refreshing, tasty flavors. Try these favorites! Today!

Canada Dry True Fruit Orange



NOW! Over cracked ice pour the golden goodness of True Fruit Orange. Serve it after hard work or play from NEW KING-SIZE bottles.

Canada Dry Root Beer

TODAY! Fill a mug with ice and the foamy old-fashioned flavor of this sparkling Root Beer. Serve at parties, or for a hearty, tasty pick-up.

Canada Dry True Fruit Cherry

TONIGHT! Pour this luscious deep-red cherry drink into a goblet filled with ice. The radiant color and flavor add a bright touch to any meal.

SPAGHETTI SUPREME

So easy with Borden's Grated Parmesan and Romano Cheese

½ cup chopped onion • ½ cup sliced celery • 1 clove garlic, minced
⅔ cup sliced mushrooms • ¼ cup butter • 2 (8-oz.) cans tomato sauce
1 cup water • 1 teaspoon Worcestershire sauce
1½ teaspoons salt • ⅛ teaspoon pepper
1 cup fresh, frozen or canned cooked shrimp (optional)
¼ cup Borden's Grated Parmesan and Romano Cheese
½ pound spaghetti, cooked and drained

Sauté onion, celery, garlic and mushrooms in butter until tender. Add tomato sauce, water, seasonings and shrimp (optional but delicious!). Simmer for 25 minutes.

Add Borden's Grated Parmesan and Romano . . . an exclusive blend of two great Italian cheeses. Mix well. Pour over spaghetti and top it off tastily with a sprinkling of this cheese. Serves 4 to 6.

P.S. Keep Borden's Grated Parmesan and Romano handy to perk up casseroles, onion soup, vegetables!

If it's Borden's, it's got to be good!

Borden's Fine Cheeses • Milk Ice Cream • Starlac

See Borden's TV shows, "The People's Choice" and "Fury" over NBC. ©1958 The Borden Co.

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 118

wore a ball gown she bought nine years ago. Mrs. Guest took to Europe a suit that has had eight seasons' wear.

When Mrs. Byron Foy, the former Thelma Chrysler, died last year she left her entire wardrobe to the Metropolitan Museum of Art. The Metropolitan accepted only a small but representative part of it: 132 pieces, including 60 designs by Christian Dior—ball gowns, cocktail dresses, day dresses, coats, hats, suits. Each ensemble was a collection unto itself with its own hat, shoes, gloves, bag, wrap and occasionally fur, seldom if ever worn interchangeably with other outfits. Many of the dresses were put together with slip, bra and any necessary boning all in one garment, so she had only to step into it and be zipped up and she was dressed. There was, of course, no machine stitch anywhere.

What are the best-dressed women themselves like?

Mrs. William S. Paley is a tall, slender, classic brunette whose first marriage was to Stanley G. Mortimer, scion of one of America's oldest families, of socially revered Tuxedo Park, New York. After they were divorced in 1946 she married Paley, head of the Columbia Broadcasting System. She was the youngest of three famous and stunning daughters of the late Boston brain surgeon, Harvey Cushing, and she is so beautiful and utterly feminine that people seem unable to mention her name in passing without remarking on her beauty again, even though it may have been mentioned several times before in the same conversation. Her mother is said to have announced early, "My girls will all marry wealth in this country or a title abroad." Whether this was a promise or a justifiable vote of confidence, one of Mrs. Paley's sisters married Vincent Astor—they were later divorced and she is now Mrs. James Fosburgh—and the other is Mrs. John Hay Whitney, wife of the U. S. Ambassador to Great Britain.

Mrs. Paley has been named one of the "best-dressed" fourteen times. She has four children, the oldest fifteen, and spends most of her time at the Paley estate, Kiluna Farm, near Manhasset, Long Island. Shorter periods of the year are spent at homes in Montego Bay, Jamaica; Squam Lake, New Hampshire; and in California and Europe, where they usually go in January. When she is at home on Long Island, she usually spends several days a week in New York City and stays overnight in their suite at the St. Regis Hotel when she and her husband go to the theater or have an engagement in the evening.

Her days in the city are heavily scheduled with committee meetings and luncheons, and if she has fittings the appointments are plotted down to the minute—a dress from 3:30 to 3:50, shoes from 3:55 to 4:10—so that everything will be ready when she arrives and the most can be accomplished in the least time.

She is a highly regarded fund raiser, particularly for the Association to Help Retarded Children, of which she is local chairman, and the North Shore Hospital, where she heads several committees and nearly every year runs the annual benefit ball.

Her entertaining is usually done on the weekend at Kiluna. The Paleys like to invite six or eight friends who dress for dinner in the evening and afterward watch a movie in the Paleys' projection room. They sometimes show cartoons first for their children and any children of their guests, and then a first-run foreign film brought out from New York. A large entertainment is a project several months in the planning, with 500 or 600 guests and a staff to handle invitations, music, food, decoration, parking and gate crashers, who always number at least a half dozen.

For dinner or evening she wears colors—brown-and-ice-blue, pink-and-orange—often with a high neck and some draping or soft gathers over the bosom. Seldom is it anything black or severely cut, or daringly décolleté. There is always some fullness at the hip—even in the daytime her suit skirts are either slightly gored or with a little flared peplum or panel.

The rest of the time she wears skirts and sweaters—she collects sweaters—and she gardens, planning formal hedge arrangements with the gardener or digging a little herself, never without white cloth gloves to protect her hands. She likes formal gardens outside, wants to get some topiary shrubs and try trimming them in cat shapes. Inside she likes huge colorful mixed bouquets and has them in every room in the house, bringing them from the estate greenhouse in the winter. Once or twice a week she likes to sleep until just before lunch at 1, but most mornings she is up by 8:30. She eats everything—pies and cakes—but will diet stringently rather than go in for calisthenics. Keeping fit is a vaguely good idea, but frantic exercise—golf, for instance—is totally unappealing. This spring she hopes to find time to start oil painting, still lifes at first. Last October she sent her nine-year-old son to his school's Halloween party garbed in yards and yards of black felt and a white vest which she herself made into a beguiling penguin outfit.

She weeds out her wardrobe once in the fall and once in spring, and she gives away as many things as possible that she hasn't worn for a year, to friends or to people she knows who need something. But she puts evening dresses away to take out and start wearing again a couple of years later.

She has never bought a fur or expensive jewel for herself.

Last year she went to Miss Eleanor Lambert, fashion publicist for the New York Dress Institute, and asked if there was some way she could avoid being named on future lists. "She said she was afraid her daughter would start taking it seriously and would think it was a talent or something. I told her not to worry," said Miss Lambert, "it is a talent."

In 1944 a serviceman wrote to Mrs. Winston Guest, "Betty Grable and Dorothy Lamour belong in an old folks' home compared to you." A like comparison might be drawn now, but Mrs. Guest has evolved quite a bit since she left an established position in Boston's Back Bay society to land a $57.50 job in the Ziegfeld Follies in New York. Then she had just made her debut in a Commonwealth Avenue mansion designed for her family by Stanford White, and been elected "Glamour Girl of the North Shore." Mrs. Guest is slimmer, tanner, haughtier-looking now; and if her fan mail has dropped off, she is much better in clothes—a tall, narrow, classic column. She emphasizes this effect by wearing sheaths more than anything else: narrow skirts, practically straight every place; narrow shoulders; little sleeves or none at all.

CONTINUED ON PAGE 122

TO A LOST CHILD

By HANNAH KAHN

I will feed you love
As one feeds a bird
And the larks will sing
For your delight.

I will wait for time
Till you learn the word,
I will wait for stars
To transform your night.

And the day will come
When you must go,
With the falling leaves
And the winter near—

You will not return,
This I know—
But I will remember
That you were here.

Hot Green Beans Caesar... exciting to eat, easy to do with Del Monte Blue Lake Green Beans

Please, please don't ever think of trying this special recipe with any other green beans!

Del Monte Blue Lake Green Beans have exactly the tender-crisp texture you want – never limp or slippery. With seasoning or without, their rich yet delicate flavor is a joy – there's nothing "flat-tasting" about these green beans!

And what a pleasure to buy green beans already so perfectly cooked! Get Del Monte Blue Lake Green Beans and you're all set—to take off into a glamorous recipe, or to heat and serve just plain hot, buttered and wonderful.

HOT GREEN BEANS CAESAR

- 2 tablespoons salad oil
- ¾ cup of ½-inch bread cubes
- 1 can (1 lb.) DEL MONTE Brand Blue Lake Cut Green Beans
- 1 tablespoon vinegar
- 1 tablespoon salad oil
- 1 teaspoon minced onion
- ¼ teaspoon salt
- 2 to 3 tablespoons grated or shredded Parmesan cheese

In the 2 tablespoons salad oil, sauté the bread cubes until golden brown and crisp. Drain DEL MONTE Green Beans. Mix vinegar, the 1 tablespoon salad oil, minced onion and salt. Turn beans into skillet with bread cubes; pour vinegar mixture over beans; heat and stir till hot. Sprinkle with cheese. Serves 4. Ideal with salmon, sole, haddock, crab, lobster, etc.

Del Monte® Green Beans

Cut—Whole—French Style

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 120

Her blond hair is worn long and straight, too, parted in the middle and drawn simply back and turned under. It is always perfectly neat, kept that way during the day by an almost invisible hair net. Her vivacity which once was likely to skip unpredictably into tactlessness is now controlled, cool, poised.

She married Winston Guest, cousin to Winston Churchill and heir to one of the country's great fortunes, at the Guest estate in Palm Beach in 1947. They honeymooned in Havana with the Ernest Hemingways and on their return to New York leased Gardiner's Island, famous as the pirate Captain Kidd's headquarters (his loot is still supposed to be buried somewhere around), and set up housekeeping there. She modeled a little in New York and "did" Hollywood briefly with a bit part in the movie, Diamond Horseshoe.

Now she lives in a New York penthouse apartment overlooking the East River; has a three-year-old son; collects porcelain; visits often in Boston and Palm Beach; goes "somewhere" for part of nearly every week. With her husband, who is president of a Mexican airline, Aerovías Méjico, she makes quick trips to Europe two or three times a year. If they are only going to Paris for a week, she travels simply with a long chiffon evening dress and two short evening frocks, and two wool day dresses in a fold-over bag, wearing a three-piece tweed suit and carrying a hatbox, and mink coat over her arm.

She is an expert horsewoman, owns and rides her own hunters in the National Horse Show every fall and keeps a stable of hunters and racing thoroughbreds in Middleburg, Virginia. She has never had an important race horse, but she had an exasperating near miss a few years ago when Pieces of Eight, which she sold after it lost a claiming race, went on to gather total winnings of $90,000. She rides four or five times a week, often leaving her Manhattan apartment before eight in the morning so she can have several hours' riding time in Westchester County and still hurry back in time for lunch.

She has served as chairman of the New York March of Dimes fashion show, cochairman of the April in Paris Ball, the U.N. Children's Fund Drive dinner, the Police Athletic League fund drive and the U.S. Olympic Fund-Raising Dinner. Last year she was cochairman of the Palm Beach Polo Ball, which raised more than $200,000 for the cancer fund.

She has three suits she has been wearing for eight or nine years. "Good clothes simply do not wear out if you hang them up," she says earnestly, and she hangs them up herself if her maid is not about. It saves pressing them—"Clothes are ruined by maids pressing them all the time." She prefers to lunch in Paris where the women don't wear hats so much—she likes herself best hatless.

She dislikes slacks as "masculine, at least on me." She seldom wears black, but makes an exception of a little black silk cocktail frock by Mainbocher, utter simplicity except for a frilly black marquisette-and-velvet apron held in place by the dress' only adornments, two diamond clips at the waist.

She used to like Dior until he became "too difficult to dance in." She has been off French designers generally since she spent "hundreds of dollars" for a French original, only to have Ethel Merman turn up in the same "original" at the same party, the first time she wore it. Miss Merman frankly admitted to all that hers was a copy she'd bought for $70. Mrs. Guest was not amused.

The Duchess of Windsor spends less and less time in New York these days and more and more in France where she and the duke, who has not been well, can live quietly and see friends without entering into a complex social routine. Consequently she spends less money on clothes. But when the Windsors do make their appearance in New York in late fall, it is almost with the éclat of the old days when they came off the Queen Mary with 77 pieces of luggage and then held court in Suite 28-A of the Waldorf Towers or in their friends' homes in Manhattan and Palm Beach (for, as royalty, they are technically the "hosts" in whatever home they happen to be) for a full six months of every year.

No one has sustained more criticism than the Baltimore-born divorcee who caused a king to renounce his throne—for her supposed extravagances for clothes, jewels, hairdressers and beauty treatments. She has taken it calmly, for the most part not even acknowledging it. Undeniably she has spent a great deal of money on herself, but no more than a great majority of the women of her social sphere, and not so much as some who do not show the results so advantageously.

It has been said that she does not own or pay for many of her clothes and gems. This is denied by the designers themselves, her supposed victims. She has been lent jewels and furs on occasion; this is common practice, particularly in Europe where designers feel it is sound policy to show off their creations on charming, socially prominent women. Even in New York, most of the tiaras worn during the visit of Queen Elizabeth II were borrowed from Tiffany's, Cartier's, and Van Cleef and Arpels—and most of them were not even tiaras but diamond necklaces wired upside down to make do. (Jewelers, however, have been less enthusiastic about lending their wares since Princess Grace of Monaco, formerly actress Grace Kelly, received as a wedding gift a brilliant diamond-and-ruby necklace which Prince Rainier had formerly seen on another woman at a ball. The prince was prompted to remark about "secondhand" jewels.)

The duchess does not need to borrow extensively. She has a great wardrobe of her own—actually the critics who say she borrows outrageously are counterbalanced by those who claim she buys extravagantly. She often sells clothes after a season's wear. She has beautiful jewelry, perfect grooming and posture and unerring taste. She will stand motionless for hours in a fitting room, and keep fitters and seamstresses changing and redoing one seam over and over again until perfection

SPAM COUNTRY DINNER. Such a good combination of flavors! Cook, drain 1 pkge. (6-8 oz.) wide egg noodles. Combine with 1 can cream of chicken soup, ½ cup milk, 1 can SPAM, sliced, then cut in strips, 2 tbsp. chopped green pepper, 1 tbsp. finely chopped onion, 2 cups cooked peas, 1 tsp. salt. Pour into 1½ qt. casserole. Bake 30 min. in moderate oven (350°).

SPAM 'N' RICE RING. Delicious, picture-pretty! Spoon half of 2 cups cooked rice into greased 9-in. mold. Top with half of 1 can SPAM diced. Pour on half of Soup Sauce: 1 beaten egg, ⅔ cup cream of celery soup, ½ cup milk, ¼ tsp. salt, ½ tsp. crumbled basil. Add remaining rice, SPAM, Sauce. Bake 30-45 min. at 325°. Unmold; fill with vegetables.

Which Spam® Dinner is top winner?

These are the three winning Spam casseroles as indicated in a recent survey. But which one ranked first? (Answer below)

SPAM 6-IN-1 SUPPER BAKE. Vegetables cook right with the macaroni for time-saving! Boil in 1 pt. boiling water for 4 minutes: 2 cups diced onions, 2 cups diced celery. Add 1½ qts. boiling water, 1 tbsp. salt, 1 pkge. (7 oz.) macaroni. Boil uncovered, stirring occasionally until macaroni is tender. In meantime, heat together 2 cans mushroom soup, 1 cup milk. Season with salt, pepper, and garlic salt or powder. Slice thinly, then cut in triangles, 1 can SPAM. Line 2 qt. casserole with SPAM triangles. Drain macaroni and vegetables. Place in casserole with SPAM triangles. Pour in hot soup mixture. Dot SPAM triangles over top. Sprinkle with grated sharp cheese. Bake 20 min. at 350°.

THE WINNER: luscious "Spam Country Dinner", followed closely by hearty "6-in-1 Supper Bake" and attractive "Spam 'n' Rice Ring". Three delicious one-dish meals. Try them all!

What's SPAM made of? Nothing but sweet juicy pork and mild tender ham ...carefully selected, superbly seasoned.

SPAM is the registered trade-mark for a pure pork product packed only by Geo. A. Hormel & Co., general offices, Austin, Minnesota, U.S.A.

THE ONE AND ONLY

SPAM

... MEAT OF 1,000 USES!

Also marketed in Canada

HORMEL

is achieved. She plans her dinner parties for weeks in advance, harmonizing floral centerpieces, china, silver, lighting, food and music as well as guests; she delights in the invention of a special touch such as the consommé jelly which she hollows out and fills with caviar and covers with a dollop of sour cream.

If she has a fashion flaw, it is that she sometimes seems too perfectly assembled—coat, suit, hat, even shoes and bag in the same color and material. Some feel that she lacks imagination and creative flair. But she knows what is right for her and when the opportunity arises she can be dramatic too. When she planned the Hospitalized Veterans Music Service Ball, the entire Waldorf ballroom was done in coral pink and white—coral-pink candles in the silver candelabras, coral-pink tablecloths held in place by huge coral-pink satin bows, with an over-all canopy of coral pink covering the ceiling. For this occasion, she wore a dress of white taffeta, with the entire skirt heavily beaded in panels the exact same shade of coral pink.

And when she was honorary chairman of the April in Paris Ball last year she preferred wearing a pale yellow silk-shantung dress with long full skirt and tiny bolero embroidered in yellow, pink and blue roses, by Balenciaga. The prescribed dress had been red, white and blue gowns in honor of Lafayette.

But most often she wears blue to highlight her remarkable Mediterranean-blue eyes, which were the inspiration for the famous "Wallis blue" gown created by designer Mainbocher—who dyed the material sixty-seven times to achieve the exactly right shade—for her marriage to the Duke of Windsor.

She has never been known to buy anything on impulse. She often views a collection several times, studying the gowns chin in hand in an attitude suggesting Rodin's "Thinker." Sometimes she makes notes in a little book—one of the few persons allowed to do so because of the designers' fear of style pirates—and goes away to think out her final decisions.

Her fashion trade-marks are well known: the little hats; the plain center part; the white gloves; the single strand of baroque pearls at the throat; everything fitted, fitted, fitted. She sees no need for a wide style range. She buys, for example, a Balenciaga tunic dress in white jersey and black crepe and has the same dress done again in all black.

She diets rigidly, never eating anything fattening and eating very little in all. She likes white flowers, and the Waldorf suite is kept filled with white gladioli, roses and chrysanthemums. She doesn't like gold jewelry and thinks it "should never be worn after six o'clock." In a heavy social season she will have her hair done once a day, usually by a man who comes to the suite. If she has another important engagement in the evening, he may come back to redo it. Servants address her as "Your Royal Highness" and back out of her presence, bowing.

She has been persuaded to modify some of her fashion trade-marks in recent years, for a softer, more flattering effect. The flatly disciplined center-part coiffure, always with the little "wings" to offset a slightly prominent jaw structure, has given way to a fluffy wave. Her always-white gloves, formerly wrist-length, now cover the wrist in a gauntlet. She still wears little hats perched on the back of her head, but they have feathers, veiling, sometimes a little brim, rather than the plain beanie of old.

If her clothes seem unadventurous, they reflect her main role, which is catalytic—causing reaction rather than reacting herself. Nearly always smiling slightly, she seldom if ever breaks over into hilarity. At dinner she is ever unobtrusively alert to the lagging conversation, ready with a new gambit to start it rolling along a more promising track, with her own remarks and observations designed more to provoke wit and comment in others than to display it.

At sixty, the duchess says she has grown weary of the best-dressed title. Last fall she denounced it as a "phony list." She thinks younger people ought to get more play on it to "inspire them to be more careful about their hats and shoes."

When Salvador Dali painted the Countess Mona von Bismarck, then Mrs. Harrison Williams, he showed her in rags amid a nightmarish collection of marble heads, bronze horses and twisted figures, but with the head coiffed, radiant and superbly jeweled. It symbolizes her past more than her present; she has now, and has had for twenty-five years, one of the most brilliant and extensive wardrobes in the world. She has been married to three wealthy men: the first, Henry Schlesinger, Milwaukee industrialist and owner of the farm where her father was a horse trainer; New York banker James Bush; and Harrison Williams, whose public-utilities fortune was once estimated at $680,000,000. She married Williams in 1926, and although the stock-market crash ruined his declared hopes of making it an even $1,000,000,000, she still inherited a fortune which was estimated at $90,000,000 when he died in 1953.

In 1955 she married the Count Albrecht Edward von Bismarck, a nephew of the German Iron Chancellor, and they have since spent most of their time on the island of Capri. Their home there is a huge cliffside stone fortress, overlooking the Mediterranean, built by Tiberius in the first century B.C., and remodeled by Williams. The count has been seriously ill and she left his side only briefly this winter to settle business affairs in New York. People tend to speak of the countess as someone from the past because for the past two years she has been in semiretirement and for twenty-five years before that she had been regarded as the most beautiful, brilliant, fatal woman in New York. "Dozens of men have always been madly in love with Mona Williams," recalls a friend who visited her at Capri and at her great estates near Bayville, Long Island; Palm Beach, Florida; in Paris; and in the colonial-type Fifth Avenue mansion in New York which has been sold now and converted into the national headquarters of the Audubon Society.

She has great vivacity, and a handicap that adds to her charm: she is slightly hard of hearing so that she bends forward to catch every word, giving an impression of intense interest and anticipation as she watches the speaker raptly.

Visually her rare quality has always been her coloring, her brilliant violet eyes, quite pink cheeks, her hair silver since her early thirties and worn short and curly. "Her eyes seem to capture whatever light there is in the room, and shine like diamonds," Dali said. She has always given this quality full sway, never subdued it with too-brilliant colors. Her clothes have bordered sometimes on the bizarre in design and concept—a glass dress mounted over silk—but they are generally pastel in coloring, and her rooms, too, are white or off-white, with gray or gilt accents. Many of the rooms of her town house were carpeted wall to wall with white velvet.

She has always bought hugely—entire collections, if a designer had a grouping that appealed to her particularly. She keeps great wardrobes at all her houses, though she may not visit one for five years. When she does arrive she finds waiting roomfuls of dresses, suits, hats, and hundreds of pairs of shoes—she is especially fond of shoes. And sweaters. Once Harrison Williams was being questioned in connection with alleged mismanagement of corporation funds when she was named to a list of best-dressed women. Descriptions of her wardrobe appeared in the newspapers, and when hearings resumed the first question put to Williams was, "Is it true that your wife ordered seventy-five sweaters from Schiaparelli in Paris?"

Her favorite jewels are emeralds.

Mrs. Williams was named on the first best-dressed list put out by Paris designers in 1933 and has appeared on almost every list since. When she was in New York this winter she saw friends, lunched at the Pavillon, dressed with great chic in clothes bought mainly in Europe. "She is still so superbly well dressed,"

TWO NEW SHORTCUTS to a delicious meal in minutes

COPYRIGHT CARNATION COMPANY AND GENERAL FOODS, 1958

TUNA-RICE AU GRATIN with Carnation
3-minute cheese sauce

1½ cups water
½ cup chopped green pepper
2 tablespoons chopped onion
2 tablespoons chopped pimiento
½ teaspoon salt
1⅓ cups (4⅝ ounce box) MINUTE RICE
2½ cups Carnation 3-Minute Cheese Sauce
1 cup (7-ounce can) tuna, drained and flaked

Bring water, pepper, onion, pimiento and salt to boil in saucepan. Add rice and mix just to moisten all the rice. Cover; remove from heat and let stand about 5 minutes. Meanwhile, prepare Carnation 3-Minute Cheese Sauce (below). Add tuna to sauce. Arrange hot rice mixture in mounds on plates. Serve tuna-cheese sauce over rice. Makes six servings.

CHEESE SAUCE

1⅔ cups (large can) undiluted CARNATION EVAPORATED MILK
½ teaspoon salt
2 teaspoons dry mustard
2 cups (about 8 ounces) grated process American cheese

Simmer Carnation, salt and mustard in saucepan over medium heat to just below boiling (about 2 minutes). Add cheese. Stir over medium heat until cheese melts (about 1 minute longer). Makes 2½ cups sauce.

ONE: NEW, IMPROVED MINUTE® RICE!

Adds its own natural rice goodness... picks up and blends the flavors as no other rice can. (And when you serve new Minute Rice as a vegetable, it's ready to eat in 5 minutes!)

TWO: CARNATION 3-MINUTE CHEESE SAUCE!

So easy to make. Lump-free cheese sauce every time. The secret is Carnation, the milk with the special blending qualities that assure smoother results... without fail. No other form of milk will do!

said Herald Tribune fashion expert Eugenia Sheppard, "that nobody can ever describe what she wears." There was one change. Her hair that had been silver for so long was brown—the result, she said, solely of taking a new pill with liver extract in it.

Mrs. Henry Ford II—"young Mrs. Ford"—is credited with getting "some chic at last into the Ford family." She has livened up Mrs. Edsel Ford's wardrobe with both advice and encouragement, and is just what the Duchess of Windsor asked for—young, wholesome, pretty. She is a member of the McDonnell clan of New York, one of fourteen brothers and sisters of whom one, Jeanne Vanderbilt, former wife of Alfred Gwynne Vanderbilt, also has been a "best-dressed" woman. Mrs. Ford divides her time between Detroit, where her husband heads the Ford Motor Company, and New York, where they are now buying hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of paintings and furnishings for a new home on Long Island. She has three children. She is much interested in art, is a member of the fine-arts section of President Eisenhower's "People to People" committee, and a trustee of the Detroit Art Museum Founders' Society. She buys beautifully cut suits, beautifully made dresses, lovely hats—but as yet has failed, though always being beautifully turned out, to find a style that is dramatically her own.

What do all these women have in common?

For one thing, Mainbocher, most difficult and despotic of American designers and the one whose clothes are coveted by more wealthy women than any other. Mainbocher's first job was in Sears, Roebuck's complaint department in Chicago, where his name originally was Main (pronounced like Maine) Bocher. The elision took place when he went to Paris to study art and took up fashion designing to become the only American ever accepted in the French haute couture. Mainbocher (now pronounced Mehng-bow-shay) collections hold few startling developments for anyone at all familiar with fashion; their allure is in their utter rightness, anywhere, any time, the result of rich materials painstakingly engineered to flatter the female body without flattering it too much, to be à la mode without hurrying things. "For my trade," said actress Paulette Goddard, "they are too genteel." During World War II Mainbocher closed his Paris salon and reopened in New York to glad cries from women who had had to go abroad to find him before. He will not permit the slightest deviation in color, material or line in any design after he has brought it to what he is convinced is its highest possible degree of perfection, and if a customer has a detail altered elsewhere and he finds out about it she is banned from the salon. No one is permitted to view a collection who has not received an engraved invitation ahead of time. His fitting rooms are pale gray green, eighteenth century, paneled, with flowers, coffee table, cigarettes, comfortable chairs, and room to walk around, sit down and "feel" a dress. The salon atmosphere suggests the joining of hands for a séance, "so all tippytoe I'm afraid to talk in a normal voice until I'm back out on Fifty-seventh Street," complained one customer. Here was conceived the suit which Mrs. Winston Guest has worn for eight years, a suit so painstakingly engineered that a woman could play tennis in it, except that "ladies who wear Mainbocher suits never sweat," a saleslady delicately explains. The average price for a Mainbocher suit is $800; for a day or cocktail dress, $600 to $700; for an evening dress, $1200 to $1400.

There is also Maximilian, where you can buy a Russian-broadtail cape with assorted snap-in collars in ermine, sable and chinchilla; a raincoat for daytime in water-repellent gold corduroy lined with golden crown chinchilla. The day raincoat is $9350; a raincoat for evening, lined with Russian crown sables, is $18,000. A two-piece broadtail suit lined with mink is $4950; a short sable jacket is $40,000; a long sable coat, $58,000; and a mink egg warmer, if you are a very good customer, free. But seldom is price ever mentioned at Maximilian's. If you have to ask, they agree with J. P. Morgan: you can't afford it.

As to shoes: you can buy a pair of 24-carat gold-plated alligator pumps for $200. Mrs. Foy used to select a single style at the start of every season and order 30 pairs in various materials, including a dozen in white satin which were held and dyed to match swatches of material from her new dresses as the season went on. Women have shoes dyed to match their hair, their cars, their living-room ceilings.

Hattie Carnegie's will custom-make a poodle's coat to match his owner's. A Philadelphia client bought a $12,000 wardrobe for the Grace Kelly-Prince Rainier wedding in Monaco—15 pieces averaging $800 each. This was not an unusual order for this woman, and a fitter once asked her what she does with all her clothes. "My husband likes for me to have them," she replied. "He's a very busy man. I'm his hobby."

Hattie Carnegie designed the Wacs' uniform in World War II. Mainbocher did the Waves'.

Valentina, designer to Clare Boothe Luce, Lynn Fontanne and women who like much drapery and floating effect, coined one of fashion's most famous phrases years ago (she recently retired): "Mink," she observed coolly, "is for football games." She still thinks so. "The only really elegant fur," she feels, "is sable. So soft, so flattering to the skin. Mink?" She smiled. "Please. Out in the fresh air, sit in it, eat hot dogs in it, anything. But not evening, not elegance, I beg of you."

A woman can spend as much as $350 a week at Helena Rubinstein's or Elizabeth Arden's to get in shape to wear these clothes, with facials, coiffures, massages, poundings, vapor baths, "Days of Beauty" (or longer if desired) and exercise routines—and some women do. They spend hundreds more on cosmetics and creams for every conceivable purpose, including youth-revitalizing pure queen-bee jelly at $2000 a pound. They learn the skillful use of make-up: a touch of rouge at the corner of the eye for radiance, a reddened ear lobe brightest pudding this side of the rainbow!

Fruit Cream Pudding made with JELL-O Pudding and Pie Filling

Just follow the simple directions on the Vanilla Pudding package. When pudding is chilled, fold in whipped cream. Then, spoon alternate layers of pudding and well drained fruit cocktail into dessert glass. Makes six delicious servings. Bright, rich and creamy—here's one dessert that's 'different' and easy! The five colorful bite sized fruits in canned fruit cocktail are ready to use, right from the can. Treat your family tonight. They'll all agree Fruit Cream Pudding with fruit cocktail is truly a rainbow-bright idea!

CANNED FRUIT COCKTAIL FROM CALIFORNIA

Cling Peach Advisory Board • California Canning Pear Growers • JELL-O is a registered trademark of General Foods Corporation to make a too-large ear "go right back into the head. We can do," promises Miss Mala Rubinstein, "whatever seems necessary."

At Mr. John's Swiss woodcarvers whittle away at permanent blocks on which regular customers' hats are fitted, hats which may cost anywhere from $60 to $600. Maximilian's has men who do nothing all day but sew together tiny "let-out" strips of mink ¼" wide, with almost invisible seams $\frac{1}{10}$" wide. Sophie (Mrs. Adam Gimbel) of Saks Fifth Avenue buys her cut velvet from saberers in France whose skill it is to slash between two faces of woven-together silk, separating them so neatly that they fall apart, mirroring each other with the patterned pile left standing exactly $\frac{1}{9}$" high everywhere.

And there are lesser-knowns: Bob's, one of a few remaining entirely custom bootmakers, where the original mold of the foot costs $90 and a minimum $50 for every pair of shoes thereafter—shoes immediately distinguishable to the experienced eye by their exceptionally narrow neat heel. Marie Morrison's charges $50 to clean a very elaborate ball gown—but worth it when you consider the investment.

And of course there are Lilly Dache, Charles James, Pierre Balmain, Guy La Roche—the names go on like a little girl's jump-rope verse.

But the "best-dressed" women have more personal things in common also.

They have shiny almost-black French alligator handbags that cost a minimum of $250; diamonds and pearls in every design category; good figures; and fears of gaining weight. Few know the taste of anything sweet that didn't get that way with saccharin—a wise plan if it prevents a five-pound weight gain which would destroy the usefulness of a fortune in closely fitted garments.

Every man has a right to be conceited until he is successful. DISRAELI

Storage is a problem which Mrs. William Randolph ("Bootsie") Hearst, Jr., solves by sending her huge-skirted ball gowns and petticoats not in use to the big Bronx warehouse which holds the vast array of medieval art treasures, classic pillars and old armor collected by the late William Randolph Hearst, Sr.

Carrie Munn, "best-dressed" society woman who has made a thriving business out of designing her own clothes, saves hairdresser's time by sleeping on a hard little cylindrical kapok pillow imported from Japan—the same kind the geishas use. She arises in the morning insisting she's refreshed, with no hair of her elaborately rolled blond upsweep disarrayed. Her husband, wealthy attorney and publisher Orson Munn, who gave her the choice sixteen years ago of starting in business or selecting a diamond bracelet at Cartier's ("I grabbed the check!"), observes with equanimity.

At luncheon, cocktails and dinner in New York they have in common the Colony and the Pavillon, two of the country's most famous and expensive restaurants, where a lunch check for two can come to $30 with no strain whatever. Particularly at luncheon, between 1 and 3, the fashion parade becomes a pageantry seldom duplicated. Designers, fashionable women and the people who write about them gather and look at one another for a few hours, then rush back to their workrooms, possibly out to buy, or just retire to consider what they have seen. At the Colony they observe one another in the red-and-white anteroom; at Pavillon they are seated immediately by Henri Soule—fashion people on the left; foreigners, internationals and "names" up a short landing and beyond; and society people along the corridor in between. Here are seated the Countess von Bismarck, Mrs. Herbert Weston, Mrs. William Randolph Hearst, Jr., and Mrs. Norman Winston and her archenemy, Mrs. Gilbert Miller, who aren't speaking. One thing is certain: if worst enemies wind up next to each other, it is not accidental. Soule arrives every morning at 10 to plan the seating arrangements as carefully as he would for his own dinner party.

How significantly all this adds up to a "best-dressed" woman has not yet been answered to universal satisfaction. Who is to say? The Fashion Academy? The International Ladies Garment Workers? Almost everybody seems to feel he should have some say. So far, the New York Dress Institute has been the most active and vocal, putting out every January the list that is regarded as the closest thing to a last word on chic women. It is the work largely of Miss Eleanor Lambert, smart blond public-relations expert for the institute and twenty-five of the biggest clients in the couture field. It was her idea that the institute's thirty-three Couture Group designers should put out their own list after the Paris designers shut down during World War II. She picked up the reins before they ever touched French soil and has been putting out a list every year since. Not, however, for an uncritical audience. Letters come in irritably demanding to know, "My wife is very well dressed. Have you considered her?" and "Why don't you pick out the best-dressed secretaries?" In the fashion world the clamor becomes less reproachful, more bitterly accusatory of "racket"; "publicity stunt"; and "Objective? Why, the best-dressed list is Miss Lambert's income," dismisses Charles James, whose own classic ball gowns have won top awards and sell for $800 to $1400.

Miss Lambert is unruffled. "The list is honest," she asserts firmly. She has been offered as high as $10,000 to see that a woman "made" the list. Another woman who supposedly had "influence" with Miss Lambert was once offered $50,000. But "It's honestly conducted by honorable people with a spirit of respect for the whole subject of clothes in the self-expression of modern taste. It cannot be had." Miss Lambert has no idea who will be named until the 1500 ballots start coming back in mid-December from designers, fashion experts, society and the fashion press. Then "I just publish them."

If the same people tend to make the list year after year, and if these people all have money and are prominent socially or in some other way, "Doesn't it figure? Would a woman get votes if she stayed home all the time or never did anything where she would have the chance to show off a magnificent and varied wardrobe?"

An equally formidable roadblock would exist for the woman in "a dress that was just a nice little dress, at a gala where it would be compared with the great gowns of the world on which no effort had been spared to make them real works of art." That is where the worlds would separate and the woman with good taste but smaller resources would fall by the wayside. "She is just as well dressed in her way and her circle and for the kind of life she lives, and that's what we mean by 'It's not all money.' But side by side—and it's a hypothetical situation, because it doesn't occur—how could they compare?

"I cheated on the list only once," she says, "when Mrs. Harrison Williams was in mourning and I took her name off."

Actress-writer Ilka Chase airily dismissed the accolade as quite unimportant to her. But "in the main the people who deserved it have understood what it means and taken it as a tribute." Miss Lambert admits the difficulty of distinguishing between a publicity stunt and the Couture Group's "enlightened self-interest, as Bernard Gimbel calls it." But you have to look at the goals, she says. "If you want to say the Dress Institute is in it for fashion promotion, then sure, it's a publicity stunt. But who else is going to do it? And it sets up a standard, a criterion of taste, a viewpoint for looking at this moment of history. It has faults. It isn't the same list I'd make out. But I can't think of anybody good who's been left off.

"People ask me," she says, "'Why make a thing of saying a woman is well dressed if she is?' I think it's the same as the Nobel prize—just because the purpose was achieved when penicillin was invented doesn't mean you shouldn't award a prize. Rewarding excellence in any field is good. It's an inspiration to others." END

B&M does something wonderful to beans!

For hours and hours B&M Brick Oven Baked Beans are baked in a rich and golden brown sugar sauce with lots of tender selected pork. Only this slow oven baking in real brick ovens gives these special beans their "home-baked" flavor. Serve 'em with B&M Brown Bread and Corn Relish.

B&M
brick oven
BAKED BEANS
SEALED OVEN-HOT IN BOTH GLASS JARS AND TINS
BURNHAM & MORRILL CO., Portland, Maine

Eight generous slices . . . eight full ounces

They're called Kraft De Luxe Slices because they have really rich cheese flavor!

Why do Kraft De Luxe Slices taste so much better than others you may find in the grocer's dairy case?

It's simple. Kraft cheesemakers are very fussy about the natural cheeses from which they make these handy pasteurized process cheese slices.

For example, it takes fine natural cheddar cheese to give such wonderful mellow-sharp flavor as you get in Old English brand. And only truly fine nut-sweet natural Swiss can make the Kraft De Luxe Swiss slices so good! That's why they are called Kraft De Luxe Slices.

That's why your cheese sandwiches taste so extra good when you use the handy slices marked Kraft. Try them all—the Kraft American, Kraft Pimento, Old English brand, Kraft Swiss, Kraft Brick, and Kraft Muenster.

STUART

Golden from the broiler, savory of herbs, chicken in a bed of rice and almonds. Green beans, pearly onions, a well-seasoned tossed salad complete the meal.

a Bird in the Pan

A broiler brushed with garlic butter:
a fryer subtly spiced: a capon rubbed with curry and served with a savory gravy:
a roaster stuffed with vegetables. simmered in its juice:
all birds in the pan.

By IRMA GOODRICH MAZZA

Putting new flavor frills on an old American favorite, chicken, is a little like sewing duchesse lace on Aunt Hannah's nightshirt. But with chicken, the results are so good we're glad to do it. Let us not scorn the birds plain fried or roasted or stewed, for they are the ways in which chicken is superb. But let us use seasonings to give the birds a chance to show what they can do. Seasoning is to poultry what spice is to life.

Yet the best seasoning is lost unless the bird comes delicately browned and succulent from its pan. This motto is one to be graven on the kitchen wall, picked out in color for all to see, and conned over each day poultry is on the menu:

The prime law of poultry cooking is low temperature.

Broilers with a basted-in bouquet of herbs, nestled in a feathery bed of rice with tender mushrooms—the attentions demanded are only token ones, small gestures to make for so much goodness.

BROILED CHICKEN WITH MUSHROOMS: Allow ½ broiler for each person. For 4, rub both sides of 2 split broilers with lemon juice. In a small saucepan melt 6–8 tablespoons butter, adding 2 minced cloves garlic. Lay the chicken, skin side down, on broiler rack, in preheated broiler. Brush generously with melted garlic butter. Broil for about 12 minutes, basting often with the butter. Turn chicken over and broil, basting often, until golden brown, about 15 minutes. While chicken is broiling, melt 4 tablespoons more butter in a small skillet. Add 8 large peeled and chopped mushrooms, 2 teaspoons marjoram, ½ teaspoon salt and a good healthy pinch of nutmeg. Cook slowly for about 5 minutes. When chickens are golden, remove from the rack and place in broiler pan. Baste chicken again. Pour the mushroom mixture over all and bake in a slow oven, 300° F., for about 20 minutes or until chicken is very tender. Arrange on a warm platter and—if you like—pour a little warm brandy over the chicken, ignite and let the flame burn out before serving.

This way of seasoning chicken is as unlikely as any I have met, but it has become one of our favorite ways. Quick to prepare, crisp and richly golden brown, chicken done this way is special. And let us not pretend that the easy method (no standing over a hot, spattering pan) is not one of its positive virtues. The recipe was the memory-making gift of one small Japanese maid to a grateful Monterey household.

FRIED CHICKEN TORI: Disjoint 1 large or 2 small fryers and wipe each piece with a damp cloth. Singe if necessary to remove any extra feathers, and so on. Then select a pan that is just large enough to accommodate the chicken without overlapping any of the pieces. In the pan melt 3 tablespoons butter. Preheat the oven to moderate, 350° F. Then mix together ¼ cup flour, 2 teaspoons dry mustard, 1 teaspoon paprika, ½ teaspoon black pepper and 1½ teaspoons salt. Put this into a paper bag, mix, and toss the chicken pieces in it one at a time. Lay the floured chicken pieces in the pan without overlapping and turn in the butter just once. Dot small pieces of butter (using plenty) over the chicken. Bake 35 minutes for small chickens, 45 for large. Turn the chickens over once during this time. Then turn the oven to very hot, 450° F., and bake 10–15 minutes longer or until the chicken is golden brown and bubbly.

ROAST CURRIED CAPON: Wipe well 1 dressed 3-pound capon inside and out with a damp cloth. Put the neck and giblets in water to cover; add a pinch of salt and simmer for ½ hour. Strain and save the broth for gravy. Rub the inside of the bird with the following mixture: 1 teaspoon each salt and curry powder, and ½ teaspoon ground ginger. In the cavity place 1 leek or whole onion, 1 branch celery with leaves, 1 spray parsley, 10 whole black peppers and ½ clove garlic. Melt 2 tablespoons butter and stir in ½ teaspoon each curry powder, salt, grated lemon peel, and ⅛ teaspoon cayenne pepper. Skewer the bird with pins, closing all cavities, truss, and rub the skin all over with the butter mixture. Lay the capon on a rack in an open CONTINUED ON PAGE 168

Copyright © 1957 by Irma Goodrich Mazza
This is an excerpt from the book
ACCENT ON SEASONING
recently published by Little, Brown & Co.

Make it a party!

Make it merry—with Good-and-Plenty Pizza! Fun to eat—fun to make, too, with French's new recipe. French's own mustard recipe calls for rare spices, specially grown mustard seeds, and the very finest vinegar. That's why French's Mustard is so light and lively—and why more women choose it and use it than any other mustard!

On food...
In food...

no other mustard has the light and lively flavor of

FRENCH'S MUSTARD

Make French's Good-and-Plenty Pizza

With a new tangy crust . . . and the best-tasting filling this side of Rome!

Pizza Crust

2 cups biscuit mix
2 tbsps. French's Mustard
½ cup milk

Measure mix into a bowl. Stir mustard into milk; blend into mix. Knead 1 minute on board dusted with biscuit mix. Roll to fit 12-inch pizza pan. Prick surface with fork. Bake in hot oven (425°F) 5-7 min. or until set; remove from oven. Reduce heat to moderate (375°F). Prepare filling.

Pizza Filling

2 cans (8-oz.) tomato sauce
1 tbsp. sugar
1 tbsp. French's Minced Onion
2 tbsps. French's Mustard
¼ tsp. French's Oregano
1 lb. bulk pork sausage meat, well cooked and well drained
1 cup grated sharp Cheddar cheese
2 tbsps. grated Parmesan cheese

Combine tomato sauce, sugar, onion, mustard, and oregano; bring to a boil; simmer 10 min. Pour into partially baked crust. Sprinkle with half of Cheddar, then sausage, then remaining Cheddar, top with Parmesan. Return to oven; bake 12-15 min. or until cheese melts and crust is deep golden brown. Yield: 6 servings. Friendly Warning: Because French's Mustard has a special flavor, texture and color all its own, don't expect best results from this recipe with any other mustard.

SEARCH FOR AMELIA

CONTINUED FROM PAGE 58

and the darkened house, then she was put into the convent at Stirling and her mother had returned to France.

It was then she had begun to draw. She understood that her mother did not value her letters, scarcely bothered to read them; she began to embellish them with sketches. It was her way of asking for attention. At the convent besides art and deportment she learned the discipline of love. Once when she was thirteen she was quite ill with influenza and the mother superior had cabled her mother and Allison had replied that she was coming with all speed and Alix was so overjoyed that the fever left her. But Allison did not come—she sent a box of expensive toys which Alix looked at once and put away.

